About the Author

Preface

Twist all our victories into one bright wreath,
On which let honor breathe . . .

—William Cartwright (1611–1643)

INEVITABLY, ANY ATTEMPT to compress more than 500 years of warfare into a pair of volumes must entail certain compromises. As a result, minor confrontations may have been inadvertently ignored or underreported in this book, while the very geographic limitations imposed by such a project—of describing only conflicts occurring within the territorial boundaries of the New World since the arrival of the Europeans—furthermore means that descriptions of several colossal global efforts such as World War II appear strangely stunted, because most of their action was played out overseas.

Nevertheless, the narrow continental focus of this work also serves to reveal certain historical trends, common to virtually every modern nation-state in the Americas. The earliest explorers, for example, encountered lands already embroiled in warfare, and used the divisions existing between native tribes to facilitate their own campaigns of subjugation—by playing off Arawak against Carib, Tlaxcaltecan versus Aztec, northern Inca against southern Inca, and so on—as described in Volume 1's first chapter, titled "Discovery and Conquest." French, English, and Dutch sailors then arrived to scavenge amid the fringes of Spain's sprawling new empire (see "Seaborne Challengers"), eventually setting up shore establishments of their own in defiance of Madrid's opposition (see "Rival Outposts"). In time, these footholds came to be contested as minor prizes during larger European conflicts (see "Intercolonial Friction"), before finally flourishing to such an extent as to become the primary cause—and even active participants—in a worldwide struggle for economic supremacy (see "High Tide of Empire").

The evolution of most American colonies culminated with them seeking their own liberty (as described in the sixth chapter on "Independence," at the beginning of Volume 2), which in turn inaugurated a distinctly new—and oftentimes painful—transitional phase into full autonomy (see "Struggles of the Young Republics" and "Nationhood"). Finally, the gradual emergence of the United States as the world's dominant superpower brought an end to all foreign designs on the Western Hemisphere (see "Pax Americana") and ushered in our own contemporary age (see "Modern Era"). This chronology is intended to provide both scholarly and amateur historians with rapid access to information about past conflicts and, in particular, considerable detail on some of the lesser-known hostilities of the New World.

In conclusion, the author would like to acknowledge the kind and patient assistance received from countless esteemed colleagues and friends during the compilation of this book, most especially Dr. Basil Kingstone, head of the French Department, Dr. Berislav Primorac of the Classical and Modern Languages Department, and Dr. Ronald Welch of the Geography Department at the University of Windsor, Ontario, Canada; the entire staff of the Archivo General de la Nación in Mexico City; Dr. Pedro González García, director of the Archive of Indies in Seville; Dr. José Ignacio González-Aller, director of the Museo Naval in Madrid; Mr. André Gousse, military curator of Parks Canada; Dr. Leo M. Adoption of the Gregorian Calendar

BY THE LATE 1500s, the Julian calendar—named in honor of its ancient Roman reviser Julius Caesar—no longer coincides with the seasons or the new moons, because its original reckoning of a year being 365 and one-fourth days long had been a slight overestimate. Therefore, on February 24, 1582, after lengthy studies by the Neapolitan astronomer Aloysius Lilius and many others, Pope Gregory XIII issues a bull declaring that a new reformed calendar is to be introduced. The Friday following the feast of Saint Francis on October 4, 1582, rather than being reckoned as October 5, is instead to be designated as October 15 so as to cut out 10 excessive days and restore all subsequent equinoxes to their proper cycle.

This change is accepted in most of Italy, Spain, and Portugal and in France it is instituted two months later—moving from December 9 to December 20, 1582—while the Netherlands and much of Germany introduce it in 1583. Protestant England, however—being opposed to any hint of Catholic suzerainty—refuses to comply. Consequently, from 1582 through 1700, English “Old Style” (O.S.) Julian calendars lag 10 days behind the “New Style” (N.S.) Gregorian calendars used by the Spanish, French, Dutch, and Portuguese. As a result, it becomes customary to use both dates whenever corresponding internationally, such as when Adm. Robert Blake writes to England’s secretary of state, John Thurloe, from “aboard the George in Calary Bay, 18/28 April 1655.” To further add to the confusion, Old Style calendars continue to recognize the New Year as beginning on March 25, rather than recognize the Gregorian changeover to January 1.

This difference between both systems increases to 11 days in 1700 when New Style calendars declare it to be a leap year and incorporate a February 29, while those of the Old Style later go directly from February 28 to March 1. This 11-day discrepancy will persist until September 1752, when Britain finally adopts the modern Gregorian calendar, still in use today. The date following Wednesday, September 2, 1752 (O.S.), is declared as Thursday, September 14 (N.S.), a change bringing British calendars into alignment with those used by Spanish, French, Dutch, and Portuguese colonies; a few protests are held in England, nevertheless, with mobs chanting: “Give us back our eleven days!”

For purposes of this book, all dates are given using the modern Gregorian calendar unless specifically followed by the O.S. designation.

Discovery and Conquest (1492–1572)

INITIAL CONTACTS (1492–1498)

On a Friday morning, October 12, 1492, the Genoese-born explorer Christopher Columbus steps onto an island called Guanahani by its Arawak-speaking Taíno inhabitants, but which he renames San Salvador (today generally believed to be Long Bay on Watling Island in the Bahamas). Having led a trio of Spanish vessels across the Atlantic in hopes of establishing a new trade route between Europe and Asia, the admiral erroneously assumes that he is somewhere near Japan.

After briefly exploring San Salvador's adjoining islands, Columbus coasts along northeastern Cuba, where he becomes separated from his caravel Pinta, commanded by Martín Alonso Pinzón, then visits the north side of an island that he names Española—literally, the “Spanish” island because of its strong resemblance to Spain's coastline—a term that will later become Anglicized as Hispaniola. Here, his flagship Santa María is accidentally wrecked on December 24, but the Spaniards are generously welcomed ashore the next day by Guacanagarí, the local chieftain. With only one ship remaining to him, Columbus decides to leave part of his crew behind while he returns to Spain. The Arawaks prove amenable, in turn hoping that these visitors will protect them against their more ferocious Antillean neighbors, the Caribs, who have been raiding them from seaward for several generations. The Santa María's timbers are consequently used to construct a small fortress within the native village, which Columbus dubs Navidad or “Christmas” in honor of the auspicious day on which he and his men had been received. He then installs a 36-man garrison under the officers Diego de Arana, Pedro Gutiérrez, and Rodrigo de Escobedo.

Setting sail with his remaining caravel on January 4, 1493, Columbus overtakes the Pinta two days later, just east of present-day Monte Cristi, Dominican Republic. On January 13, both vessels encounter a Carib war party in Samaná Bay, their faces “blackened with charcoal.” After an uneasy parley, fighting erupts when a 7-man Spanish boat-party is set upon by 55 natives. The Spaniards' steel weapons frighten and scatter the Caribs, and three days later Columbus sets back out into the Atlantic for Spain.

Upon his return to Europe, the explorer proclaims his discovery of new islands and gives a glowing account of exotic, fertile lands rich with gold and inhabited only by primitive peoples. He encourages a much larger expedition to gather around him for his second voyage—intended to establish a permanent foothold.

NOVEMBER 3, 1493. Columbus returns to the Antilles with the title “Admiral of the Ocean Seas,” heading a fleet comprised of five Spanish ships and a dozen caravels bearing 1,500 people, as well as several score of horses and domesticated animals. The first island he sights is called Dominica in honor of the day of discovery—it being Sunday—while the next is named Maria Galante, after the admiral's flagship Santa María la Galante, or Marigalante to its Spanish seamen. Other islands are spotted as the fleet picks its way through the Leeward Islands, then passes northern Puerto Rico toward Columbus's original outpost of Navidad (Haiti). A handful of Caribs are seized en route, but no major clashes occur.

Upon reaching Hispaniola, the Spaniards find their compatriots dead, apparently from a tribal war against the rival chieftains Caonabó and Mayreni. Columbus orders a new settlement constructed nearby, christening it La Isabela in honor of the Spanish queen. The colonists—many of them criminals banished from Spain—soon become disillusioned by the hardships, disease, and poverty that they experience, and frictions develop both among themselves as well as with the local tribesmen.

JANUARY 21, 1494. Having established a secure base on Santo Domingo, the Spaniards dispatch two expeditions in opposite directions on the island, searching for the natives' goldfields.

FEBRUARY 2, 1494. Twelve of Columbus's vessels return to Spain under Capt. Antonio de Torres

Trade Factory

In the late 15th century, commercial expeditions from Europe faced voyages over immense distances. Companies therefore sought to establish a permanent footing in any distant new territory to stockpile wares for repeat visits, as well as to resist hostilities. Because a firm's overseas business was supervised by a resident agent or factor (a term derived from the Latin verb factum, meaning "to do or make"), such outposts became known as "factories."

As early as 1445, Portuguese merchants tried to bypass the Italian stranglehold on Middle Eastern trade routes by sailing down the African coastline. They erected their first factory on Arguin Island (modern Mauritania), which was transformed over the next six years into an impregnable fortress. The Portuguese Crown received a quarter of the profits from its trade in gold, slaves, and other regional goods, appointing a captain to command the outpost's garrison. The company otherwise ruled this tiny private colony in accordance with Portuguese customs and laws. Over the next half century, a string of similar factories was extended all down the West African coast, until Vasco da Gama at last rounded the Cape of Good Hope and reached India. Some outposts were founded without permission along uninhabited stretches of shoreline; others were created in cooperation with tribal chieftains. All served to maintain Portugal's claim over this trade route against European competitors.

Upon Columbus's return to Spain from his initial voyage of discovery, his backers immediately sent him back across the Atlantic to assert ownership by establishing just such a permanent settlement. It was assumed that Columbus's outpost would soon begin serving as a factory for trade with nearby Japan, China, or India. When the Asian mainland was not encountered within the next few years, however, this commercial focus was supplanted by a drive to exploit the native peoples of the New World.

MARCH 12, 1494. Columbus, after recuperating from a brief illness, leads a small army inland from La Isabela to the supposed goldfields around Cibao. Almost a week later, he arrives and builds a second fort called Santo Tomás, installing Capt. Pedro Margarit as its commander and establishing a garrison of 56 men. Returning to La Isabela, Columbus then sends an additional 70 men to reinforce Santo Tomás because of rumors of an impending native attack.

APRIL 9, 1494. Concerned by the overcrowding of his original La Isabela encampment, Columbus sends Capt. Alonso de Ojeda with more than 400 men overland toward Santo Tomás, hoping to expand upon this foothold. During this march, some minor incidents occur with the Arawaks because of heavy-handed Spanish punishments against theft.

APRIL 24, 1494. Looking for the Asian mainland, Columbus sets sail with three vessels to explore farther west. Probing southern Cuba as far as Isla de Pinos, he turns back, then slowly circles Jamaica and the southern side of Hispaniola.

JUNE 1494. During Columbus's absence, frictions on Hispaniola increase, both among the Spaniards and with the local natives. When the admiral's brother Bartholomew arrives with an additional trio of ships from Spain, he finds discipline badly deteriorated, and Margarit immediately goes aboard one of the vessels with his followers to set sail for Europe.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1494. Exhausted and sick, Columbus puts back into La Isabela, bitterly disappointed at his inability to find any trace of either China or Japan.

MARCH 26, 1495. Defeat of Caonabó. After a lengthy convalescence, the admiral and his brother Bartholomew march inland on March 24 at the head of 200 Spaniards, 20 horsemen, and a score of fighting dogs to do battle against Caonabó, the principal leader of Arawak resistance. Two days later, they defeat a mass of Indians in what the Spanish later call the Battle of Vega Real or "Royal Plain," capturing this chieftain and condemning him to transportation to Spain, while executing many of his followers. This massacre, coupled with disease and enslavement, effectively ends organized Arawak opposition on Hispaniola.

MARCH 10, 1496. Still plagued by his failure to locate Asia, as well as by negative reports circulating against him in Spain, Columbus decides to visit Europe. He sets sail aboard the caravels Niña and Santa Cruz (the latter also known as La India, being the first European vessel constructed in the New World), which are crowded with 225 Spaniards and 30 Indian

Treaty of Tordesillas

When he learned in 1493 of Columbus's first transatlantic voyage, the Portuguese king João II complained that this new route infringed upon the 14-year-old Treaty of Alcáçovas-Toledo. By its terms, Spain had agreed to respect Portugal's monopoly down the African coast by not sending any expeditions "below the Canary Islands." Spanish diplomats replied that their explorer had in fact sailed west, not south, but this argument failed to calm the situation. Spain's joint monarchs, Ferdinand and Isabel, therefore asked the recently elected Pope Alexander VI to mediate. The pope issued a trio of bulls on May 3–4 upholding the Spanish monarchs' claim. His second Inter caetera bull of May 4 even suggested that a dividing line be created 100 leagues (roughly 300 miles) west of the Cape Verde and Azores islands. All lands west of this boundary would belong to Spain, just as all lands to its east were already being monopolized by Portugal.

Yet, because the pope was originally Spanish—having been born 61 years earlier in Valencia as Rodrigo Borgia—and had become a venal individual open to bribes and other excesses, João II refused to abide by his decision. Instead, he pressed Ferdinand and Isabel directly for a settlement, until a new treaty was signed at the Spanish city of Tordesillas on June 7, 1494. It shifted the dividing line 270 leagues farther out into the Atlantic, thus running some 1,100 miles west of the Cape Verde and Azores islands. Such a realignment would eventually allow Portugal to occupy Brazil, although the treaty was never recognized by any other nation. Indeed, when the Colombian tribal chieftain Sinú was informed of its existence by a Spanish expedition probing upriver in quest of the Tarufi gold mines in 1514, he replied that "the Pope must have been drunk, for giving away what was not his."

passengers—among the latter the captive chieftain Caonabó. Running short on provisions, the Spanish fight their way onto the island of Guadeloupe, seizing food and a dozen Carib captives before departing again on April 20 for Madeira. The admiral has chosen this unusual route to avoid a French fleet rumored to be blockading Spain's coast.

JUNE 24, 1497. At 5:00 a.m. on this Saturday morning, 47-year-old John Cabot—an Italian navigator residing in Bristol and commissioned by King Henry VII of England—sights either the northern tip of Newfoundland or Cape Breton (Canada) after traversing the North Atlantic via Iceland. Briefly exploring this region with his 50-ton, 18-man

Matthew, he apparently names Capes Ray and Saint George along with the islands of Saint Pierre and Miquelon before sailing past Cape Race and out into the Atlantic again, returning to Bristol by August 6, convinced that he has reached Asia—"the country of the Great Khan."

SUMMER 1498. Reinforced with four ships and 300 men, Cabot returns to North America, determined to find "Cipangu" or Japan. After briefly exploring southern Greenland, he sights Baffin Island at a latitude of approximately 66° N, then coasts south as far as the 38th parallel without encountering any sign of a major Asian kingdom. Disappointed, he returns to Bristol late in autumn, dying shortly thereafter.

The initial belief that a new Far Eastern trade route has been found gradually gives way to disillusionment, especially because these newly discovered islands apparently have little commercial value. Thus the urgency to establish a fortified Spanish outpost and monopolize this western route against other European rivals, such as the Portuguese and Italians—who have earlier done much the same during their explorations of Africa and Asia—soon begins to evaporate. In case after case, the Antillean natives prove to be simple folk, eking out a subsistence-level living while barely possessing any clothes or tools, much less valuable barter items.

This alters the Spanish colonists' attitude as well, from one of mercantile adventurism to a desire to occupy the land. In the absence of better economic prospects, they lay claim to increasingly extensive plots and begin clearing these to plant crops—eventually importing slaves to help in this work. Those natives who befriend the Spaniards are decimated by disease, while those who resist are unable to match the Spanish weaponry or armor. The Church further encourages assimilation to gain converts. Thus, as the search to reach Japan, China, or India vainly continues, the Caribbean islanders go under.

JULY 31, 1498. His prestige at court fully restored, Columbus returns to the New World, this time having followed a more southerly route across the Atlantic in hopes of spotting the chimerical Asian continent. Having quit Spain at the head of a squadron of four ships and two caravels with 500 men, the admiral sends three craft directly from the Canaries toward Hispaniola, while leading the other trio farther south. Thus he discovers the island of Trinidad, Gulf of Paria, and Margarita Island (Venezuela) before continuing toward Hispaniola, where he arrives on August 20.

During Columbus's absence, La Isabela has been abandoned by his brothers Bartholomew and Diego in favor of a new town on the island's southeastern coast, which they have christened Santo Domingo. A serious insurrection has also developed among the Spanish settlers, most of whom have sided with Francisco Roldán against the Columbus brothers. The admiral finds his own authority greatly diminished among the disgruntled inhabitants, forcing him to enter protracted negotiations with Roldán, eventually appointing him his lieutenant governor.

OCTOBER 18, 1498. Five Spanish ships depart Hispaniola to recross the Atlantic, sighting the South American coast again during their voyage.

SUMMER 1499. In Spain, Bishop Juan Rodríguez de Fonseca has increasingly begun acting as minister for West Indian affairs, authorizing rival captains to make independent explorations despite Columbus's supposed primacy over such matters. One of the first challengers to sail is Columbus's former subordinate Alonso de Ojeda, who departs Santa Catalina at Cadiz on May 18, 1499 with two ships piloted by the admiral's former sailing master, Juan de la Cosa, and accompanied by another pair of vessels under the 48-year-old Florentine navigator Amerigo Vespucci.

After sighting land around Guyana, the first two ships explore the northeastern shores of South America from the Gulf of Paria as far west as Cape de la Vela, naming this stretch of coastline Venezuela or "Little Venice" because of the native huts perched on stilts along its shores. At Chichiriviche, a Spanish landing party clashes with Carib warriors ashore, suffering one dead and a score wounded. They christen Cabo San Román on August 9, explore the Laguna de Maracaibo by August 24, and then quit Cape de la Vela for Santo Domingo six days afterward.

Meanwhile, the second group under Vespucci veers southeastward, probing the Brazilian shoreline well past the mouth of the Amazon River before turning back at a latitude of 6°30' S on August 23. Vespucci then visits the island of Trinidad and the Gulf of Paria before continuing westward in Ojeda's wake. After receiving a hostile reception from natives on the mainland, he rests on Curaçao and Aruba before venturing farther southwest and eventually swinging around to rejoin Ojeda at Santo Domingo.

JULY 1499. A third expedition enters the Gulf of Paria, consisting of a single 50-ton caravel with 33 crew members under Pedro Alonso Niño—another of Columbus's former pilots—and his merchant partner Cristóbal Guerra who have quit Spain in late May just a few days after Ojeda. After successfully bartering for pearls in the Gulf, their caravel is attacked upon exiting the Dragon's Mouths (near modern Port of Spain, Trinidad) by 18 Carib war canoes, which the Spaniards drive off with considerable difficulty by firing their artillery to frighten the occupants and capturing one craft.

Niño and Guerra then trade peaceably at Margarita and Cumaná for several weeks before venturing west and reaching Golfo Triste by November. When they attempt to land near Chichiriviche, however, several hundred warriors confront them on its beach, compelling the Spaniards to retrace their course toward Cumaná. After spending three weeks acquiring more pearls and visiting the nearby Araya salt pans, Niño and Guerra set sail for Spain on February 13, 1500. The profits from their voyage will encourage other imitators.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1499. Having completed his exploration of Venezuela, Ojeda calls at Yáquimo (southern Santo Domingo) to replenish his supplies. When Lieutenant Governor Roldán visits his ships on Sunday, September 29, news of Bishop Fonseca's granting of licenses to explore the New World helps revive the Spanish settlers' resentment against the Columbus brothers, who have always sought to monopolize these affairs. Several months of turmoil ensue, culminating with numerous arrests, banishments, and even executions on the admiral's orders.

Ojeda, meanwhile, sails north with Vespucci on his return passage toward Spain, traversing the Lucayas (Bahamas) and enslaving 232 of its natives before recrossing the Atlantic via the Azores, Canaries, and Madeira, reaching Cadiz by mid-June 1500.

JANUARY 26, 1500. Vicente Yáñez Pinzón, a veteran of Columbus's voyages, appears with four caravels and 150 seamen off the eastern tip of Brazil, exploring its coast in a northwesterly direction. Near Maranhão, one of his landing parties is set upon and 11 members killed, plus many others wounded by arrows as they rush to their companions' aid. Near the mouth of the Amazon River, 36 natives are taken aboard as captives, after which Yáñez Pinzón continues as far as the Orinoco River, the Dragon's Mouths, and the island of Tobago before finally reaching Santo Domingo on June 23. After refreshing his supplies, he presses on toward the Bahamas, but two of his vessels are sunk by a hurricane in July, the remaining pair being obliged to retire to Santo Domingo for repairs. The explorer subsequently strikes out across the Atlantic, returning to Spain by September 30.

Another two-ship expedition under Diego Lepe follows a similar course up the South American coastline and back toward Spain around this same time, although it does not make many contacts ashore.

APRIL 22, 1500. A dozen large Portuguese trading ships under Adm. Pedro Álvares Cabral (sometimes referred to as "Pedro Álvares de Gouveia") and Vice Adm. Sancho de Toar sight the Brazilian coast near latitude 19° S, around modern Bahia's Porto Seguro. Although this region nominally lies within the Portuguese sphere of influence as defined by the Treaty of Tordesillas (see sidebar titled “Treaty of Tordesillas”), Cabral has in fact not come in search of this territory. His actual destination is India via the Cape of Good Hope, but having departed Cape Verde in West Africa, Cabral has circled too far out into the Atlantic, thus inadvertently coming within sight of South America.

His vessels spend the next fortnight coasting southward, occasionally visiting ashore to refresh their provisions and treat with local inhabitants. After celebrating Easter Mass on land, they name this shoreline Terra da Vera Cruz or “Land of the True Cross”; then on May 3 they set out into the South Atlantic once again, bound toward the Cape of Good Hope. Cabral also detaches Capt. Gaspar de Lemos’s caravel to carry word of his discovery back to King Manoel I, but this report is greeted with scant enthusiasm as the commercial allure of the Far East commands much greater attention. Only a few sporadic crossings will be made by Portuguese ships to Brazil over the next 30 years, until the French threaten to take over this region, prompting the first serious Portuguese colonizing effort by Martim Afonso de Sousa in 1532.

on his second voyage, receives a license from the Spanish Crown to outfit two ships at his own expense to explore any lands on the far side of the Atlantic not already sighted by the admiral or any other Spaniard. After consulting with the veteran seaman Juan de la Cosa, de Bastidas appoints him as senior pilot for his expedition. They set sail from Cadiz that same October with the ships San Antón and Santa María de Gracia, plus two smaller consorts.

AUGUST 23, 1500. Francisco de Bobadilla, Knight of the Order of Calatrava, arrives at Santo Domingo in command of the caravels Goda and Antigua, with plenary powers to investigate reports of deteriorating conditions upon this island. He finds Columbus inland at Vega Real and Bartholomew, Columbus’s brother, at Jaragua dealing with its rebellious settlers, so Bobadilla immediately assumes office as governor. The admiral is thereupon recalled to the capital, arrested early in October, and taken in chains aboard one of Bobadilla’s ships—along with his brother—to set sail early that December back toward Spain.

JANUARY 1501. De Bastidas and de la Cosa arrive at Cape de la Vela (modern Venezuela) and begin to expand on the Spaniards’ mainland knowledge by charting and bartering with local natives. They slowly explore as far southwest as the Gulf of Darién, in the process discovering and naming such ports as Santa Marta and Cartagena as well as the mouth of the Magdalena River on April 1.

Their vessels weakened by teredo worms, de Bastidas and de la Cosa eventually depart and touch at Jamaica, experiencing many difficulties before one of their vessels finally founders off Jaragua in western Santo Domingo. They succeed in rescuing part of their gold but are arrested by Governor Bobadilla on a charge of tax evasion for their dealings with the locals. In 1502, de Bastidas and de la Cosa are exonerated; they return to Spain late that same year.

FEBRUARY 3, 1501. The Spanish Crown repeats an earlier ban of 1499, prohibiting all foreigners from traveling to the West Indies. Such restrictions will be reiterated numerous times over the next two decades, to little avail.

SPRING 1501. The merchant Cristóbal Guerra and his brother Luis return into the Gulf of Paria from Seville aboard their 50-ton caravel to barter for more pearls. During their westward progression they endure some clashes with natives and seize a number as slaves before returning to Spain that same November.

On December 2, the Catholic monarchs order Cristóbal Guerra's arrest for his enslavement and sale of these natives. He must forfeit any proceeds, while the Indians are to be freed and returned across the Atlantic.

AUGUST 10, 1501. The Florentine navigator Vespucci returns to the New World, this time piloting a Portuguese expedition commanded by André Gonçalves. They sight the Brazilian coast and slowly reconnoiter down its shoreline past modern Rio de Janeiro—"January River," so named because it is sighted on January 1, 1502—and the River Plate. After perhaps reaching as far south as Patagonia by late January 1502, they eventually reverse course.

When Vespucci reaches Lisbon again on July 22, reports of this and similar immense distances of new coastline being explored convince him and a growing body of other scholars that these territories cannot be part of Asia but, rather, a completely new continent.

MARCH 12, 1502. Ojeda's Failure. A colonizing expedition led by Ojeda from Cadiz arrives off pearl-rich Margarita Island (northeastern Venezuela) and includes the ships Santa María de la Antigua under Capt. García de Ocampo and Santa María de la Granada under Juan de Vergara (both partners of Ojeda), plus the caravels Magdalena under Pedro de Ojeda (the commander in chief's nephew) and Santa Ana under Hernando de Guevara.

Having become separated, a shortage of supplies leads some of these Spaniards to attack a peaceful native settlement at Cumaná on April 2, killing 78 Indians at the cost of one Spanish fatality. Continuing westward, Ojeda and his men eventually reach the port of Santa Cruz (so called because it is discovered on May 3—the day of the Feast of the Cross; today it is called Bahía Honda, Colombia). Here they are joined by Juan de Buenaventura, one of Rodrigo de Bastidas's men, who had been left behind at nearby Santa Marta (see "January 1501" entry) where he had learned the natives' language and customs. Shortly thereafter, when Ojeda attempts to erect an establishment ashore, his Spaniards are pelted with arrows by local tribesmen, obliging his expedition to come ashore in full armor to subdue these opponents. Ojeda then erects three small fortresses to protect his new town, while skirmishing with the Indians farther inland and detaching Vergara's Granada—later, his nephew's Magdalena as well—to hunt for provisions.

On Vergara's return passage from Jamaica, where he has ventured to secure food, 25 of his men go ashore to forage at Valderrábano (24 miles southwest of Bahía Honda), suffering 19 slain before regaining their ship. By late May, Ojeda's fledgling colony is in such dire straits that Ocampo and Vergara lure their partner Ojeda aboard the Granada, clapping him in irons to be conveyed to Hispaniola, thus abandoning Bahía Honda.

APRIL 15, 1502. The first contingent of a massive new colonizing expedition reaches Santo Domingo from Spain under Gov. Designate Nicolás de Ovando, Knight of the Order of Alcántara, which—when joined by its second group 15 days later—will comprise a total of 32 ships bearing 2,500 settlers (among them, the chronicler-priest Bartolomé de las Casas, as well as the future conquistadores Hernán Cortés and Francisco Pizarro).

Ovando immediately deposes Bobadilla as governor and sets about extirpating the last seeds of rebelliousness from this island, preparing to send all troublemakers home aboard the returning fleet under Capt. Antonio de Torres. The new governor also has orders to keep Spanish residents from intermingling among the natives and to charge tribute from the latter. (A couple of years later, natives will furthermore be assigned as seasonal laborers for the Spaniards.)

Just as Captain de Torres's vessels get under way from Santo Domingo early in July 1502, Columbus, who has been exonerated and given a new (if somewhat more limited) commission, passes by the island with four ships, having departed Cadiz on May 9 and discovered Martinique on June 15. The admiral is now heading farther west in another attempt to find Asia. Columbus has been ordered not to touch land at Santo Domingo until its situation is stabilized, so he merely sets some messages ashore, along with a recommendation that Torres's fleet not weigh anchor because of signs of an impending hurricane. His advice is ignored, and all but two ships and a handful of lesser vessels are subsequently destroyed by a violent storm, which costs Torres, Bobadilla, Roldán, the imprisoned chieftain Guarionex, and countless others their lives. Among the few survivors is Rodrigo de Bastidas.

Columbus's quartet of ships rides out this hurricane at Puerto Hermoso, at the mouth of the Jaina River, and then are blown past Jamaica toward southern Cuba. From here, the admiral reaches Guanaja Island (Honduras) on August 14 and rounds Cape Gracias a Dios by September 12. He works his way down the Central American shoreline as far south as Veragua (Panama) without encountering any major kingdoms. He is nonetheless convinced that he has reached the outer fringes of Indochina. On November 2, he names the harbor of Portobelo (Panama) and later pauses to gather provisions in a bay that he dubs Bastimentos.

JANUARY 6, 1503. Buffeted by contrary winds, Columbus returns into Veragua (Panama) and establishes a camp ashore named Santa María de Belén.

FEBRUARY 6, 1503. Unable to sail eastward because of contrary winds and storms, Columbus sends 70 men up the Belén River from his Santa María base camp, establishing a brief trade in gold pieces with its natives. This barter soon degenerates into hostility, though, with the local quibián or "chieftain" being captured by the Spaniards, then escaping.

SPRING 1503. On Santo Domingo, the new governor de Ovando declares war against the natives of Saona Island for killing eight Spaniards who had been circling around to the north to settle there. Capt. Juan de Esquivel leads a punitive expedition that defeats these tribesmen, along with their mainland overlord Cutubano or Cutubanamú at Higüey.

Around this same time, four Portuguese ships visit Brazil, returning home with several captives and tropical wood.

APRIL 16, 1503. Columbus's Defeat at Veragua. With his ships dangerously deteriorated after long exposure in the tropics, the admiral tows three out to sea from Veragua in anticipation of departing (the Gallega being left behind as unseaworthy). However, his shore parties are attacked by 400 infuriated natives before he can set sail; 7 of his 20 men at the base camp under Capt. Diego Méndez are killed, and all but 1 of Capt. Diego Tristán's 12-man boat party are slaughtered when they venture upriver. The remainder finally fights its way offshore.

Columbus subsequently touches at Portobelo, Bastimentos, and Mármol Point before finally steering for Cuba with his two remaining ships (another having been scuttled).

JULY 7, 1503. Exhausted, Columbus is shipwrecked on Jamaica with his two ships and 116 surviving men, where they construct a palisaded camp at Santa Gloria Bay on its northern coast to resist native attacks. His subordinate, Diego Méndez, is sent to Santo Domingo with 6 seamen for help, but although Méndez arrives five days later, de Ovando is slow to help. Columbus will endure more than a year of native hostility and Spanish mutinies before Méndez finally appears with a hired caravel on June 28, 1504. This ordeal will mark the end of the great explorer's efforts in the New World, as he returns to Seville desperately ill by November 7. He will die at Valladolid on May 20, 1506.

On Hispaniola, meanwhile, de Ovando has brought order into the settlers' lives and crushed the last shreds of Indian resistance by a brutal massacre at Jaragua: with 70 riders and 300 infantrymen he visits Anacaona—Caonabó's widow and native queen of the southwestern portion of this island—luring her with a false invitation to dine, only to then seize the queen and burn her principal followers alive on suspicion of plotting a revolt. Spanish units under Diego Velázquez and Rodrigo Mejía subsequently subjugate this entire region, establish new towns, and three months afterward hang Anacaona.

Shortly thereafter, news also reaches de Ovando that the nine-man Spanish garrison installed this same spring at Higüey under Capt. Martín Villamán has been massacred by disgruntled natives, one man alone surviving to bring word of this disaster. The governor promptly orders Capt. Juan de Esquivel to prepare another punitive expedition for the east, comprising 300–400 Spaniards under lieutenants Juan Ponce de León and Diego de Escobar, plus numerous native auxiliaries. They take 8–10 months to hunt down Chief Cutubano on his Saona Island refuge and execute him, after which this territory is completely occupied.

JANUARY 5, 1504. The 60-man, 120-ton French ship Espoir of Capt. Binot Paulmier de Gonneville, damaged by a South Atlantic storm while bound from the Canaries toward the Cape of Good Hope, reaches Santa Catarina Island (Brazil). Welcomed ashore by Chief Arosca, the Frenchmen remain here until June 3, when they depart for Normandy aboard their repaired vessel. Their report will inspire future contacts.

SPRING 1504. Cristóbal Guerra returns into the Caribbean with a small colonizing expedition, meeting the ships of Juan de la Cosa near Cartagena in the summer. Guerra chooses to remain and attempt a settlement at this place, while de la Cosa presses southwest into the Gulf of Darién, vainly searching for a passage farther west. Eventually Guerra sends his fellow explorer a message begging for help against Indian attacks, but no one can reach Guerra before he is slain.

De la Cosa, meanwhile, beaches his ships because of extensive damage caused by teredo worms and camps uneasily on the shore with 200 men, while building two smaller brigantines from the ships' remains. Yellow fever and native attacks take a heavy toll, so only 50 Spaniards reach Jamaica and subsequently are rescued from Santo Domingo. Early in 1506, de la Cosa returns to Spain with his survivors.

APRIL 24, 1505. After having explored the unconquered island of Borinquen or Boriquén (modern Puerto Rico) the previous year with Martín García de Salazar, Vicente Yáñez Pinzón is granted a license by the Spanish Crown to settle it. However, he evidently fails to carry out this project within the allotted year, instead supposedly sailing around Cuba—thus proving it to be an island—before returning to Spain.

SUMMER 1506. Alonso de Ojeda, released from his legal entanglements (see “March 12, 1502” entry), returns to the Caribbean with a small expedition, supposedly to establish a stronghold in the Gulf of Urabá, but actually only coasting from Paria as far west as Panama before retiring into Santo Domingo.

EARLY 1508. Capt. Sebastián de Ocampo, a veteran from Columbus’s first explorations, is ordered by Governor de Ovando to sail with two caravels from Santo Domingo to explore Cuba. He circles around this land, starting on its northern shore, returning eight months later to confirm it as an island.

MARCH 1508. Yáñez Pinzón and Juan Díaz de Solís are commissioned to attempt another exploration of the New World’s mainland, Pinzón aboard the hired merchantman San Benito, and Díaz aboard the Magdalena. Although failing to find any passage toward Asia’s long-sought Spice Islands, they nonetheless expand upon Columbus’s original Central American reconnaissance (see “April 15, 1502” entry) by sailing west from Hispaniola until sighting land, then traveling northwest from Cape Gracias a Dios as far as the northeastern tip of the Yucatán—and perhaps even beyond into the Gulf of Mexico—before returning to Santo Domingo in frustration and regaining Spain by August 1509.

JUNE 15, 1508. Occupation of Puerto Rico. The veteran campaigner Juan Ponce de León is given license by Governor de Ovando of Santo Domingo to reconnoiter and occupy the adjacent island of Borinquen or Boriquén, known among the Spaniards ever since Columbus’s day as “San Juan Bautista.” Ponce de León consequently sets sail from the capital city of Santo Domingo on July 12 to gather more men and provisions from his landholding of Salvaleón de Higüey at the eastern end of the modern Dominican Republic.

Upon departing the Yama River mouth during his first attempt, Ponce de León flounders when his carabelón or “large caravel” bearing 42 men—many of them natives from his Dominican plantations—plus 8 sailors is driven back by a storm and runs aground on August 3, its provisions spoiling. A

Juan Ponce de León

One of the earliest conquistadores to have campaigned in the Antilles and whose name is forever linked with his supposed quest for the Fountain of Youth or Fons Juventutis, Ponce de León may have been born on April 8, 1460—although some sources estimate that the actual year was as late as 1474—in Santervás de Campos, a hamlet near Palencia in the Spanish province of Valladolid. Descended from a minor noble family, he became a page in Spain’s royal household before pursuing a military career. At the end of the centuries-long struggle to expel the country’s Moorish occupiers in 1492, the unemployed Ponce de León joined Columbus’s second transatlantic expedition the next year. He left behind his wife, Inés, as well as a young son and daughter. Once reunited, two more daughters would be born in the New World.

Instead of winning his fortune as a colonist on Santo Domingo, a decade of disappointment ensued. But when Nicolás de Ovando arrived as the new royal governor and started hostilities against the island’s Taíno natives, Ponce de León so distinguished himself that he was granted title to the town and district of Salvaleón de Higüey in eastern Santo Domingo. Among his subalterns was the youthful Vasco Núñez de Balboa, future conqueror of Panama. Ponce de León even gave him a puppy named Leoncito, who accompanied Balboa on all of his Central American forays.

From his Dominican vassals, Ponce de León heard stories of the wealthy adjoining island of Borinquen, so he pushed across to claim it. Despite gaining a small fortune, he nonetheless became so disillusioned when his title as governor was repeatedly contested that he abandoned his peaceful existence to lead a new expedition north of Cuba to conquer another new territory. Whether he was actually searching for the Fons Juventutis of European myth remains a matter of historical conjecture, although he did reach Florida. Mortally wounded while attempting to establish a foothold there, he retreated and died in Havana. His remains were returned to San Juan and buried in Santo Tomás de Aquino Monastery (erected in 1523; the modern San José Church). Eventually, his remains were transferred into an honored spot in the city’s cathedral in 1908 to help mark Puerto Rico’s quadricentennial.

second departure a few days later touches at Mona Island before the explorer reaches southwestern Borinquen and establishes friendly contact with the district chieftain, Agüeybana, who is willing to allow the Spaniards to establish a permanent base in exchange for their help against Carib raiders.

Another storm beaches Ponce de León's vessel here on August 10, but while it is being refloated, he explores the island's interior with his host. Learning that the gold-bearing Guayanés, Maunabo, and Sibucu rivers empty to the island's north coast, Ponce de León quickly returns to his caravel and circles around the eastern tip. On August 12, he steps ashore near the Toa River mouth to found a tiny settlement.

Next month, he shifts this toehold eight miles farther east by erecting a small fort to defend a bay that he optimistically dubs Puerto Rico or "Rich Port" (today known as Pueblo Viejo, lying between the modern cities of San Juan and Bayamón). In a third move, Ponce de León transfers his base to a small fortified site called Caparra, two miles inland from the great natural harbor of San Juan de Puerto Rico. Some crops are planted and gold gathered in token of possession, after which Ponce de León returns to Santo Domingo in April 1509 to report to de Ovando, leaving two Spaniards behind at Caparra as permanent residents.

De Ovando acknowledges the explorer's accomplishment by appointing him governor and chief justice for Puerto Rico on May 1, 1509—subject to confirmation from Spain—and Ponce de León returns to Caparra that same month, soon to be followed by his family and a few more settlers. Despite epidemics that will ravage the island's native population over the next few years, he amasses a tidy fortune by having gold panned and mined.

JULY 10, 1509. Diego Columbus, son and heir to the great admiral, leads a sizable convoy into Santo Domingo in an effort to succeed de Ovando as its governor. The newcomer's ships are largely destroyed by a hurricane shortly thereafter, and Diego Columbus finds the island's native population—100,000 at his father's first contact—shrunk to a mere 30,000 survivors. Among his retinue is the well-connected Cristóbal de Sotomayor, a son of Pedro Álvarez de Sotomayor or "Pedro Madruga"—the influential Conde de Camiña—who bears a commission from King Ferdinand as the new governor of Puerto Rico. Ponce de León is therefore deposed, but once de Ovando reaches Spain, he has Sotomayor's appointment rescinded on August 14 so that Ponce de León is reinstated by November. To mollify any ill will, the latter in turn delegates Sotomayor as his deputy governor, but Sotomayor soon resigns and retires to his allotted native village, called Villa de Sotomayor (near modern Aguada). Eventually, Ponce de León's commission will be invalidated for a second time in 1511, leading him to seek opportunities elsewhere.

Meanwhile, other captains continue to probe the Panamanian coast, which is soon called Castilla de Oro or "Golden Castile." Juan de Esquivel prepares to establish a small Spanish colony on Jamaica; Ojeda receives title to the coastline stretching eastward from Colombia's Gulf of Darién, renaming this whole area as New Andalucía; while 44-year-old Diego de Nicuesa arrives from Spain with five vessels and a similar grant farther to the west at Veragua, sparking arguments between both leaders as to the boundary between their jurisdictions.

NOVEMBER 10, 1509. Repulse at Cartagena. Seconded by Juan de la Cosa, Ojeda sets forth south from Hispaniola with two ships and two brigantines bearing 225 men to establish his new colony at San Sebastián de Urabá (near the modern Colombia-Panamanian border). Four or five days later, his expedition appears off Cartagena, pausing to storm ashore with 100 soldiers and kidnap natives to serve as slaves. Ojeda's column surprises a village called Calamar, slaughtering many of its inhabitants and securing some 60 captives; but when his raiders then press on against the larger town of Turbaco, 12 miles farther inland, things begin to go awry. Turbaco's inhabitants flee into the underbrush, and the Spaniards disperse in hot pursuit. They quickly lose contact with one another and are destroyed piecemeal by Indian counterattacks in the jungle, suffering 70 deaths—among these is de la Cosa, who is captured alive and tortured before succumbing. Ojeda is heavily beset, yet manages to win free and is rescued.

His vessels are joined some days later by the five-ship, 700-man expedition of his rival Nicuesa (who has quit Santo Domingo on November 20), and both Spanish contingents now unite to throw 400 fighting men ashore and raze Turbaco. The two expeditions then part company, Nicuesa pressing on toward his destination of Veragua, while Ojeda limps toward the Gulf of Urabá. Ill fortune then descends upon Nicuesa, whose squadron is scattered by a heavy storm, his own flagship being lost upon the Panamanian coast. It takes three months for him and his survivors to straggle to the Belén River mouth, where his remaining vessels are riding at anchor under Lope de Olano, unaware of their leader's fate.

MARCH 1510. Ojeda's reduced company establishes a new settlement at San Sebastián de Urabá, but they are soon beleaguered within their town by this region's ferocious natives. A renegade named Bernardino de Talavera arrives, having run away from Cape Tiburon (southwestern Santo Domingo) with a Genoese ship and 70 followers. Despite this reinforcement, Indian ambushes continue to take a heavy toll on the Spaniards, until Ojeda himself is wounded in the thigh by a poisoned arrow. Cauterizing this injury with hot irons, Ojeda waits in vain for further reinforcements and resupply to reach him from his financial backer, Martín Fernández de Enciso, on Santo Domingo.

Eventually the wounded leader offers to sail toward Hispaniola in person aboard Talavera's ship for provisions, promising his colonists that, if he does not return within 50 days, they are free to abandon San Sebastián. Ojeda's proposal is accepted and he departs, leaving his colony under the temporary command of one of his soldiers, Francisco Pizarro. During their passage, Ojeda and Talavera are driven far northwest and shipwrecked east of Jagua (Cuba). It takes many weeks before a caravel under Pánfilo de Narváez arrives from Jamaica to rescue them.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1510. Unaware of Ojeda's tribulations, Fernández de Enciso sets sail from Santo Domingo with two ships, a caravel, and a smaller brigantine bearing 150 men and more than a dozen horses to carry provisions and relief to San Sebastián de Urabá. After clearing port, a stowaway (fleeing from his creditors) named Vasco Núñez de Balboa is found hidden aboard in a barrel.

Upon arriving opposite Cartagena, Fernández de Enciso finds the survivors of Ojeda's expedition limping away from their deserted outpost; having waited the stipulated 50 days, Pizarro and his subordinate Valenzuela have quit this place with the two brigantines left to them. Valenzuela's brigantine sinks with all hands near Fuerte Island, leaving Pizarro to seek refuge ashore near Cartagena with his 30–40 remaining followers. Fernández de Enciso incorporates them into his command and sails on for San Sebastián de Urabá, finding its stockade and 30 shacks already burned by local tribesmen.

Uncertain how to proceed next, Fernández de Enciso is convinced by Núñez de Balboa to sail farther west into the Gulf of Darién (which the latter knows from his earlier service under Rodrigo de Bastidas). Here, they quickly establish a new town called Santa María la Antigua del Darién, but quarrels soon break out among its inhabitants. Fernández de Enciso is deposed, thrown into prison, and deported back to Spain, while the charismatic

Contagion

When Columbus returned into the Antilles in November 1493, he did not know he was also bringing the first of several European diseases that would decimate its native peoples. This initial influenza epidemic, along with malaria and typhus, ravaged the Spanish residents at his settlement of La Isabela. Yet they would prove much deadlier among the Taino inhabitants of Hispaniola. They in turn spread it to neighboring islands, as their infected refugees fled. Having no natural immunity, they all suffered a terrible death rate, typical of many first-time sufferers exposed to new epidemics.

The importation of domesticated European animals worsened the problem, as they mutated many diseases. Other contagions soon followed. Smallpox crossed the Atlantic to Santo Domingo in 1518. From there, it was carried to Santiago de Cuba the next year. Then, Pánfilo de Narváez conveyed it on to Veracruz when he set sail in early March 1520 with 1,400 men crammed aboard 18 vessels. The toll taken by such epidemics within the crowded central Valley of Mexico claimed countless more victims, even long after the Aztec capital fell. A total population of more than 1.5 million Mexicans was reduced to less than 200,000 by 1610. This decline also contributed to other calamities, such as famines and floods, because there were not enough people to plant and harvest or maintain the system of finely tuned dams. Measles inflicted even more losses after it appeared in 1531.

All the casualties caused by Spanish weaponry during their conquests were insignificant when compared to the millions lost to sickness. This catastrophe was so dreadful that it has been described as "the greatest natural tragedy in human history." Some later conquistadores even found that their penetrations into new territories were facilitated by contagions, which had already weakened or eliminated their foes. For example, when Ponce de León sailed through the Bahamian archipelago in quest of Florida in 1513, he met only a single elderly woman living amid its once-populous islands. And as late as 1580, a small band of Spaniards overcame the resistance of 30,000 Caracas Indians in northern Venezuela once smallpox had swept through their camps and killed perhaps as many as two-thirds.

Núñez de Balboa assumes overall command. His bravery and just dealing soon win the allegiance of local tribesmen as well.

OCTOBER 1510. Having reunited his command at the Belén River mouth, Nicuesa leaves a small contingent behind, under Alonso Núñez, while venturing southeast himself to establish his governorship over Veragua (northern Panama). After being repelled by the natives of Portobelo, he comes ashore at Nombre de Dios in October, gaining a shaky foothold despite the hostility of its residents.

Drawing by native scribes from about 1541–1542, in the Codex Mendoza, showing the effects of a smallpox epidemic in Mexico. (Author's Collection)

NOVEMBER 1510. Nicuesa's lieutenant, Rodrigo de Colmenares, arrives at Santa María la Antigua from Santo Domingo with 60 reinforcements plus abundant supplies and arms. Noting how Núñez de Balboa's unofficial new Santa María settlement is flourishing—although with a faction remaining opposed to his self-proclaimed rule—Colmenares proposes that Nicuesa take over as this town's governor.

LATE DECEMBER 1510. Desperate to hang on at Nombre de Dios, Nicuesa recalls Alonso Núñez's small contingent from the Belén River mouth to better resist the surrounding natives. This meager infusion of strength allows Capt. Gonzalo de Bada-joz to lead a 20-man foray inland from Nombre de Dios, winning the Spaniards some breathing room; however, the Indians then adopt a different tactic, retiring as far into the jungles as they can and leaving the 60 invaders isolated upon the coast.

It is at this juncture that Nicuesa is joined by Colmenares, who holds out the promise of usurping command of Núñez de Balboa's settlement at Santa María la Antigua. The governor readily accedes, sending a caravel on ahead under Juan de Quincedo to openly announce his intention, while gathering up the rest of his flotilla. This advance warning allows Núñez de Balboa to prepare for this contingency by organizing a protest to greet Nicuesa upon his arrival, obliging him to retreat toward Santo Domingo aboard his brigantine.

Nicuesa's vessel never arrives, being lost with all 17 hands on March 1, 1511.

SPRING 1511. After the chieftain Urayóan has secretly drowned the young Spaniard Diego Salazar and left his body decomposing for three days at the bottom of the Guairabo (modern Grande de Añasco) River to prove that Puerto Rico's occupiers are mortal, a native uprising erupts early this June under the direction of the main tribal leader Guaybana—brother and successor the previous year to the deceased Agüeybana—as well as Urayóan, Guarionex, and Mabodamaca.

Among their first victims are Ponce de León's former lieutenant governor Cristóbal de Sotomayor and his nephew Diego, whose town of Sotomayor is torched and all its inhabitants slain except for Juan González—who carries a warning to other inhabitants and to Ponce de León at Caparra. In all, some 80 Spaniards are killed and perhaps 11,000 natives rise in revolt before this rebellion can be contained and eventually crushed by Ponce de León, who requests reinforcements from Santo Domingo and divides his counterattacking forces into three companies under captains Miguel del Toro, Diego de Salazar, and Luis de Almansa. Salazar defeats Mabodamaca's 600 warriors while they are encamped between Quebradillas and La Isabela, slaying 150 of them and scattering the rest. Ponce de León subsequently reestablishes his residence at Aymaco on the Yaucol River.

The deaths of Spanish residents at the hands of Puerto Rican rebels prompts Queen Juana in Spain to issue a decree on June 3 of this same year, authorizing Spaniards to make war against the Caribs anywhere in the New World and to treat any prisoners that they seize as slaves. The chronic labor shortage in the Antilles means that this law will be eagerly seized upon and used as a pretext for slaving raids against outlying islands.

NOVEMBER 1511. Conquest of Cuba. The jovial, 46-year-old giant Diego Velázquez de Cuellar, deputy governor for the western half of Santo Domingo, departs Salvatierra de la Sábana with 330 Spaniards and some native auxiliaries aboard four ships. He is in pursuit of the Arawak chieftain Hatuey, who has fled west and reestablished himself on Cuba in the wake of de Ovando's Jaragua massacre (see "July 7, 1503" entry).

Velázquez's small Spanish army disembarks at Puerto de Palmas ("Port of Palms") near Cuba's Guantánamo Bay, where it is shortly joined by another contingent under Velázquez's lieutenant Pánfilo de Narváez, who takes charge of the actual military operations against Hatuey. Hatuey is soon defeated and burned at the stake so that by early 1512 Velázquez can establish the first official Spanish settlement on Cuba: Nuestra Señora de la Asunción de Baracoa.

From this northeastern corner, he drives west to Camagüey, and then regains the southern shore where he establishes a new capital called Santiago de Cuba. Over the course of the next couple of years, Velázquez's cohorts gradually pacify this large island, moving ever farther west: the town of San Salvador del Bayamo is founded in 1513, Puerto Príncipe (modern Camagüey) in 1514, followed successively by Sancti Spíritus, Remedios, San Cristóbal de la Habana, and so on.

FEBRUARY 23, 1512. Having once again been deposed the previous year as governor of Puerto Rico in favor of one of Diego Columbus's appointees, Ponce de León obtains a patent from Emperor Charles V to probe north of Cuba for new territories—later alleged to include the island of Bimini, which according to Indian legend has waters of marvelous curative powers, supposedly the long sought-after Fountain of Youth of European lore. He will spend the next year preparing this private expedition.

EARLY JANUARY 1513. Capt. Cristóbal Serrano reaches Santa María la Antigua del Darién with 150 soldiers aboard two ships, further bearing a royal commission appointing Núñez de Balboa as governor of Darién. The latter has spent the previous two years exploring and pacifying this region, capturing the cacique (chieftain) Careta at Mosquitos Point, as well as subduing the tribes of Ponca and Comagre.

MARCH 3, 1513. Exploration of Florida. On this Thursday afternoon, Ponce de León sets sail from San Germán de Puerto Rico with three vessels, traversing the Caicos and reaching Guanahaní in the now entirely depopulated Bahamas archipelago 11 days afterward. Continuing northwestward, he sights new land on March 27, subsequently deciding to name this territory Florida, because the date is Easter Sunday (in Spanish, Pascua Florida). Ponce de León disembarks north of modern St. Augustine by April 2, taking possession of this area—which he believes to be yet another Caribbean island—for Spain 6 days afterward. He then explores the coast southward, and on April 21 clashes with a party of Ais natives just below the Saint Lucie River mouth, despite his best attempts to establish friendly contacts. Two Spaniards are wounded during this encounter, and an Indian is seized a few days later to be trained as an interpreter.

Rounding the Florida Keys by May 8, Ponce de León heads up Florida's western or gulf side to a latitude of at least 26°30' N, and perhaps even higher. On Friday, June 4, while careening his carrack Cristóbal near Sanibel Island, his followers are attacked by 20 Calos war canoes—some lashed together two-by-two. The Spanish sink 5 of them, killing numerous occupants and capturing four, while suffering only a single fatality. Another Calos flotilla appears a week later, ineffectually showering arrows upon the intruders, until Ponce de León decides to reverse course on June 14. They reach the Dry Tortugas seven days afterward, where they obtain a fresh supply of meat before retiring toward Cuba and the Bahamas, then weathering a hurricane and finally regaining Puerto Rico by October 15.

Traversing the Atlantic to Spain early the next year, Ponce de León receives—with the help of his friend and former mentor, the court tutor Pedro Núñez de Guzmán, brother to the influential Ramiro Núñez, Lord of Toral—a knighthood and appointment on September 27, 1514, as governor of his newly discovered “island of Florida,” as well as the office of mayor of San Juan de Puerto Rico in perpetuity. Ponce de León will not actually attempt to subdue his new Floridian claim until 1521.

Earlier this year, Núñez de Balboa received word that his previous deposal, arrest, and deportation of Fernández de Enciso has been deemed illegal in Spain (see “Summer 1510” entry). With judgment already rendered against him as a usurper, and an order issued for his recall, Núñez de Balboa is anxious to achieve some great success before this reprimand can arrive. He therefore decides to act upon a rumor that he has heard from the friendly chieftain Comagre of a great ocean on the far side of Panama's mountains, allegedly permitting access to rich and distant kingdoms.

Deciding to act upon this information, the conquistador sets out from Santa María la Antigua on September 1 with 190 Spaniards, 1,000 Indian auxiliaries, and numerous war dogs aboard a brigantine and 10 large canoes. They travel westward to the port of Acla, establishing a base camp in the village of Chief Careta (now Núñez de Balboa's father-in-law) from where his expedition strikes inland into the jungle. Passing through the territory of the vassal Ponca, the Spaniards are then confronted farther south by a hostile native concentration several hundred strong, led by the Cuarecuán cacique Torecha, whose followers are easily scattered by the invaders' firearms, then cruelly slaughtered. Núñez de Balboa occupies the dead Torecha's village on September 23, and two days later advances to catch sight of a vast new body of water farther to the south.

OCTOBER 17, 1513. Eager to explore the newly encountered Pacific, Núñez de Balboa ventures out onto its waters with 70 soldiers aboard eight native canoes to conquer some offshore islands allegedly rich in pearls; but his expedition is instead washed back onto the mainland beaches of Chief Tumaco's territory, who promptly submits to Spanish rule and offers up tribute. On October 28, his town is renamed as San Lucas, where the conquistadores remain encamped until November 3 before pressing northwestward in search of other shoreline territories to subdue.

Shortly thereafter, the Spaniards capture the hated regional overlord named Pacra, condemning him and three subordinates to be torn to pieces by their Spanish war dogs so as to ingratiate themselves with—as well as to frighten—the lesser tribesmen. Núñez de Balboa resumes his progression early in December, defeating chiefs Bocheriboca, Chiorisco, Tubanamá, and Pocorosa in quick succession before at last regaining his ally Comagre's village of Acla by December 14 (now ruled by the latter's son Panquiano, as the aged cacique has died since the expedition's departure).

Recuperating for a month from his trans-Isthmian trek, Núñez de Balboa sets sail on January 17, 1514, returning triumphantly into Santa María la Antigua two days later. He at once sends messengers with presents of gold and pearls across the Atlantic to Ferdinand, announcing his discovery. Fully as the conquistador expects, the king's displeasure is mollified by his vassal's feat. Although Núñez de Balboa will not be confirmed as governor of Darién (this post having already been granted to the well-connected Pedro Arias de Avila, who sets sail from Seville on April 12, 1514, with Martín Fernández de Enciso plus 2,000 men aboard 22 ships), Núñez de Balboa is nonetheless appointed in March 1515 as adelantado or “advance military governor” for the newly discovered territories of Panama and the South Seas.

Having crushed all Cuarecuan resistance through several-score brutal executions, Núñez de Balboa rounded up a few terrified natives to act as guides, determined to continue his trans-Isthmian push to the new ocean. Two days after forging deeper into the dense Panamanian jungle, his weary column halted on September 25, 1513, when these guides pointed out a nearby promontory from where this body of water could apparently be seen. Balboa ascended alone, then excitedly called down to his Spanish companions to join him and gaze south toward a blue expanse that stretched to the horizon. Believing that they had found the long-sought route to the East Indies, the conquistadores felled a giant tree and built a cross on which they carved the names of the Spanish monarchs. It was raised on a foundation of stones to serve as a permanent marker.

Descending into a nearby valley, Núñez de Balboa and his small army scattered and subdued the tribesmen of Chief Chiriquí, in whose village the conquistadores then rested. While there, three 12-man patrols were sent out under Francisco Pizarro, Juan de Ezcaray, and Alonso Martín to find the actual shoreline. Martín succeeded two days later, even paddling out into the ocean briefly aboard a canoe before returning to report to Balboa.

The commander thereupon advanced with 26 of his soldiers, reaching this beach by the early evening of September 29. The Spaniards rested upon its sands as the tide came gently rolling in. Finally, when Núñez de Balboa became engulfed by the waters, he rose and waded fully armored through the waves, sword in one hand and a Spanish flag in the other, shouting that this ocean belonged to Spain. This body of water was christened as the Gulf of San Miguel because it was Saint Michael's Day by the Church's calendar. The ocean itself, however, received the name "the Pacific" because of its gentle welcoming embrace of Balboa and his men.

JUNE 3, 1514. The elderly European campaigner Pedro Arias de Avila (whose name is commonly contracted, both during his lifetime and ever since, as "Pedrarias Dávila") reaches Dominica with his followers, pausing a few days later at Santa Marta to send three barks inshore to lay claim to this port. Local natives react with hostility, obliging the Spaniards to open fire before retiring.

LATE JUNE 1514. Pedrarias Dávila's expedition reaches Santa María la Antigua del Darién and relieves Núñez de Balboa as governor of this territory. (Among the more than 1,000 new arrivals are such famous future conquistadores as Bernal Díaz del Castillo, Diego de Almagro, Pascual de Andagoya, Sebastián de Velalcázar or Benalcázar, Hernando de Soto, and Francisco Vázquez de Córdoba.) Núñez de Balboa is briefly detained to answer charges of having deposed Fernández de Enciso, yet is soon released.

JULY 1514. Finding insufficient provisions at Santa María la Antigua to refresh Pedrarias Dávila's men and more than 1,000 sailors, Capt. Juan de Ayora—one of Dávila's favorites—ventures westward with a ship and three or four caravels, pillaging friendly coastal tribes despite instructions to the contrary. He returns into port by early October, sailing for Spain shortly thereafter with much ill-gotten booty.

AUTUMN 1514. One of Pedrarias Dávila's nephews is sent northeastward across the Gulf of Darién with 450 men aboard two ships to ascend the Cenú River (Colombia) and locate its Tarufi gold mines. The local natives contest the Spaniards' advance, eventually compelling Pedrarias Dávila's nephew to turn back after three months, with only 200 slaves and a little gold to show for his efforts and having suffered 150 casualties.

LATE 1514. Ponce de León returns to the West Indies from Spain at the head of a small expedition intended to conduct reprisals against the Caribs on Guadeloupe. Pausing off that island to refresh provisions following their transatlantic crossing, one of the Spaniards' laundering parties is ambushed and carried off into the jungle, along with its escort of soldiers, before Ponce de León proceeds with his voyage to Puerto Rico.

1515. During this year, a series of Spanish indiero or "Indian-hunting expeditions" under Capt. Diego de Salazar nets 2,000 natives from Curaçao and Bonaire, who are shipped as slaves to Santo Domingo.

MARCH 20, 1515. Two caravels reach Santa María la Antigua del Darién bearing Núñez de Balboa's appointment as adelantado for Panama and the South Seas, which Pedrarias Dávila grudgingly confirms.

Pedrarias Dávila was one of the first of many impoverished noblemen to come out from Spain seeking to win lands and vassals on the American mainland. Pedro Arias de Ávila was born in the Castilian city of Segovia around 1440. He was the younger brother of the first Conde de Puñonrostro and a nephew of King Enrique IV's royal accountant Diego de Arias. Raised as a retainer at court, the handsome young Pedro married Isabel de Bobadilla, a niece of Queen Isabel I's favorite lady-in-waiting. Known as "Pedrarias Dávila" throughout his lifetime, he saw a great deal of military service against the Moors in Spain and North Africa.

Still vigorous at the age of 73, Dávila used his influence at court to obtain command on July 27, 1513, of an expedition being sent across the Atlantic. He was to replace the adventurer Vasco Núñez de Balboa as governor at Darién and rule over the newly united provinces of New Andalucía and Castilla del Oro or "Golden Castile" (northeastern and northwestern Panama, respectively). The veteran therefore set sail from Seville on April 12, 1514. Yet shortly after arriving, he was disappointed to learn of Núñez de Balboa's promotion to the military governorship of the South Seas.

Dávila realized that such a vast new territory would reduce his own title to secondary importance. He also could not personally lead forays through the steamy jungles like his charismatic young predecessor, and his efforts to wring wealth from the primitive natives of Darién were viewed with contempt by the audacious conquistadores. Dávila would even be remembered by the disdainful nickname Furor Domini or "Wrath of God" in the chronicles of Bartolomé de las Casas.

The elderly governor's arrest and execution of Núñez de Balboa in 1519 sealed his reputation for cruel unscrupulousness. Despite founding the city of Panama and using it as a springboard for expeditions that he sent all up and down the Pacific coast, riches continued to elude him. Eventually Dávila would be replaced as governor of the Isthmus in 1526, retiring to his holdings at León in Nicaragua, where he died on March 6, 1531, at 91 years of age.

on April 23. The ambitious governor is now consumed by jealousy at his subordinate's better prospects. Dávila's ferocity and aggressiveness have earned him a reputation for cruelty among Santa María's natives, yet scant profit. In contrast, the more humane Núñez de Balboa is not only popular but there is feverish excitement throughout the Spanish Caribbean about his latest push southward, which Dávila realizes will reduce his own Darién governorship to insignificance.

EARLY APRIL 1515. Before Núñez de Balboa receives his promotion, Pedrarias Dávila dispatches an expedition northwest along Panama's coast from Santa María la Antigua under captains Gonzalo de Badajoz and Alonso Pérez de la Rúa to sail toward Portobelo and attempt to cross the Isthmus. The latter pillage their way inland until their greed leads them to treacherously assault the natives under Chief Paris, after being generously greeted with four chests of gold dust. This plan backfires—Pérez de la Rúa being killed along with almost half the Spanish force, and the chests lost—before they retreat to the coast.

When news of this disaster reaches Pedrarias Dávila, he sends Capt. Gaspar de Espinosa with 200 men to recuperate this rich prize. The latter first crosses the Tubanamá Range and cruelly subdues the province of Chepo, establishing his headquarters at Natá before advancing against Paris. The latter is eventually burned alive while defending his capital, which goes up in flames.

LATE SPRING 1515. Another of Pedrarias Dávila's favorites—Capt. Gaspar de Morales, seconded by Francisco Pizarro—departs Santa María la Antigua with 80 men to conquer the offshore Perla or Rica Islands in the Gulf of Panama. Reaching the Pacific shore, they compel the caciques Chiapes and Tumaco to furnish them with canoes, which they then use to fight their way ashore and defeat and enslave the island inhabitants. The main island is renamed Flores and its chieftain made to promise an annual tribute of pearls before Morales and Pizarro retire to the mainland.

Their return march toward Santa María la Antigua is complicated by a general Indian uprising against the Spaniards, but they nonetheless fight their way through by early August, Morales taking ship shortly thereafter for Spain.

LATE JULY 1515. Núñez de Balboa and his fellow captain Luis Carrillo quit Santa María la Antigua with 150 men aboard five vessels to venture southward into the Gulf of Urabá and up the Darién River, in search of the legendary Dabaybe goldfields. After traveling as far as they can by ship, Núñez de Balboa and Carrillo continue with 50 men aboard four canoes, until they are ambushed in midstream by a hostile native flotilla. About 30

Spaniards are wounded, including their leader, while Carrillo is killed and the survivors forced to retreat back into Santa María by the end of August.

EARLY 1516. While Pedrarias Dávila is absent on an expedition to Acla (Panama), Núñez de Balboa secretly recruits 60 followers aboard a ship from Cuba to attempt to sail toward Nombre de Dios and lead his own enterprise across the Isthmus into the Pacific. However, the governor suddenly returns into Santa María la Antigua, arresting Balboa for attempting to disobey orders, and detaining his vessel.

Relations between Pedrarias Dávila and his subordinate are eventually patched up by having the latter marry the governor's daughter María, after which Núñez de Balboa is sent with 80 men to re-establish the former Spanish base camp at Acla.

FEBRUARY 2, 1516. The veteran explorer Juan Díaz de Solís arrives from Spain opposite present-day Montevideo (Uruguay) with 60 men aboard a 60-ton ship and two 30-ton caravels. His mission is to discover a new route around the South American continent so as to link up with Núñez de Balboa's southwesterly probes out of Panama.

Díaz de Solís duly lays claim to the mouth of the future River Plate estuary with a formal ceremony, then sails northwestward up its course in the mistaken belief that it will lead him into the Pacific. As the waterway gradually narrows, he continues with his smallest caravel alone, until some Indians are sighted opposite what would later become known as Martín García Island, signaling to the Spaniards to land. Díaz de Solís ventures ashore with two officers and six seamen, all of whom are suddenly massacred by the natives.

Díaz de Solís's expedition therefore returns into Seville by September 4 under his brother-in-law and navigator Francisco de Torres, minus one ship, which runs aground at a latitude of 27° S opposite Santa Catarina Island (Brazil) and maroons 11 survivors.

EARLY 1517. Still suspicious and envious of his subordinate Núñez de Balboa, who is at Panama's Pearl Islands preparing his southerly seaborne expedition toward Peru, Pedrarias Dávila lures his son-in-law back into the town of Acla with a crafty message, then has him thrown into prison on a trumped-up charge of treason.

After almost two years' incarceration, the Pacific discoverer is finally executed in January 1519, allowing Pedrarias Dávila to transfer his capital from the unhealthy Santa María la Antigua and, instead, found Panama City on August 15 of that same year.

LATE 1519. Gaspar de Espinosa departs Panama City westward with Núñez de Balboa's former two brigantines, the San Cristóbal and the Santa María de Buena Esperanza, piloted by Juan de Castañeda. They explore the Central American coastline as far as the Gulf of Nicoya before returning.

LATE NOVEMBER 1519. Magellan's Circumnavigation. The 39-year-old explorer Ferdinand Magellan (in Spanish, Fernando de Magallanes) appears off Brazil with his flagship Trinidad, the San Antonio under Juan de Cartagena, the Concepción under Gaspar de Quesada, the Victoria under Luis de Mendoza, and the Santiago under Juan Rodríguez Serano. After entering a vast bay, which they dub "Santa Lucía" on December 13 (probably modern Rio de Janeiro's Guanabara Bay), they rest for two weeks before departing again, rounding Cape Frío on January 10, 1520, then sighting Montevideo.

The River Plate is explored over the next three weeks by the small Victoria and Santiago, while the others chart its estuary. Convinced that this waterway does not lead westward to the Pacific, Magellan resumes his passage southward on February 3, finally coming to anchor at San Julián on March 31. Two nights later, captains Cartagena and Quesada lead an armed mutiny by some of the disgruntled Spaniards against their Portuguese-born commander, which Magellan checks next morning by blocking the exit with the Trinidad, the Victoria, and the Santiago. When the San Antonio attempts to slip past on the night of April 2–3, it is boarded and recaptured, the Concepción surrendering next day. By April 7, more than 40 mutineers have been condemned to death, but only Quesada is actually executed, while Cartagena and another accomplice are sentenced to be marooned.

The expedition then winters at this anchorage rather uneasily, Rodríguez Serrano's Santiago being sent out on a coastal reconnaissance and becoming wrecked on May 22 near the Santa Cruz River. On August 11, Cartagena and his companion are set ashore, and Magellan's four remaining ships weigh anchor on August 24. By October 21, they come within sight of Cape Virgenes and begin to probe the strait entrance when a sudden storm blows the San Antonio and the Concepción directly into this passage—thus leading to the discovery of the Strait of Magellan. The expedition disperses and explores this waterway for another month, during which time the San Antonio's crew rises against its new captain, Álvaro de Mezquita, and sails back for Spain.

After vainly awaiting his consort's reappearance, Magellan sails into the strait on November 21, emerging on its far side one week later, to sail directly out across the Pacific toward Asia.

CONQUEST OF MEXICO (1517–1521)

More than a generation having elapsed since Columbus's initial contact, without any rich Asian trading countries being found, Spanish efforts have now become increasingly focused upon colonization rather than commerce. Parties raid the Carib islands and South American mainland to bring away captives as slave laborers, while penniless adventurers and soldiers continue to emigrate from the Old World—in much larger numbers than merchants, as these fighting men at least can hope to win large landholdings simply by dint of arms.

On the island of Cuba, the acting governor, Diego Velázquez—having secured his hold over its terrified populace—decides to investigate native rumors of other unknown “islands” due west of his newfound colony. Apparently these refer to neither Florida nor Honduras but, rather, to another much richer land, so he organizes a small reconnaissance force under Francisco Hernández de Córdoba.

FEBRUARY 8, 1517. Hernández de Córdoba departs Santiago de Cuba aboard the San Sebastián, accompanied by one other ship and a brigantine, with a total complement of 110 men (including the famous pilot Antón de Alaminos and future chronicler Bernal Díaz del Castillo). They circle through the Windward Passage before coasting along the north side of Cuba to replenish their supplies; then they strike out westward from Cape San Antonio.

FEBRUARY 20, 1517. Discovery. Hernández de Córdoba sights Isla Mujeres off northeastern Yucatán, followed shortly thereafter by its mainland. He is greeted off Cape Catoche by fully dressed Mayans in boats, whose chieftain comes aboard the next day and invites the Spaniards to land. Despite such a friendly beginning, a contingent of Spanish soldiers is soon attacked by local warriors when they penetrate the jungle near the modern town of Porvenir. Fifteen Mayans are killed by crossbow and harquebus fire, while a like number of Spaniards are wounded (two subsequently dying). Hernández de Córdoba also obtains several finely wrought gold pieces and two native captives before venturing round the peninsula and landing near Champotón in the vicinity of Campeche late in March to take on water.

Camping ashore overnight, he and his men awaken the next dawn to find themselves surrounded by warriors painted in black and white, whose leader, Mochcouh, launches an immediate attack. Twenty Spaniards are killed, two others captured, and Hernández de Córdoba is compelled to make a fighting retreat to his boats, suffering numerous personal wounds. So many of his men are dead or injured that he abandons his brigantine and sails directly to the southwestern tip of Florida for resupply, only to again be attacked by Indians in canoes. Limping back into Cuba two months after his departure, now with only 54 men, Hernández reports to the governor, then shortly thereafter dies.

Notwithstanding this initial rebuff, Velázquez and other Spaniards are intrigued by Hernández de Córdoba's account of the new land's wealth and relative sophistication, its natives being clothed (unlike the more primitive Arawaks or Caribs of the Caribbean), capable of erecting stone houses, plus practicing many other skilled crafts. Another expedition quickly begins to form under the governor's 28-year-old nephew Juan de Grijalva.

LATE JANUARY 1518. Reconnaissance. Grijalva sets sail from Santiago de Cuba with two ships (both called the San Sebastián), the caravel Trinidad, and the brigantine Santiago, bearing a total of 200 men. His three principal captains are 32-year-old Pedro de Alvarado y Contreras, Francisco de Montejo, and Alonso de Avila, while his expedition is further strengthened by several culverins, or light cannon, and war dogs.

A lengthy layover ensues on the north shore of Cuba, during which the Santiago turns back and is replaced by the brigantine Santa María de los Remedios. Grijalva's force finally quits the harbor later known as Matanzas on April 8 and passes Cape San Antonio toward the end of this same month.

MAY 3, 1518. Grijalva sights the island of Cozumel (northeastern Mexico), which he explores for four days before heading south and discovering Ascensión Bay. Reversing course, he then rounds the Yucatán Peninsula, following Hernández de Córdoba's earlier route.

MAY 26, 1518. Grijalva comes ashore near Champotón with three cannon, several harquebusiers, and a sizable contingent of troops. The natives allow him to draw water and even present him with some gold gifts before ordering the Spaniards to leave. Grijalva refuses, and two days later his company is confronted at dawn by an army in war paint. This time the natives fail to press home their attack because of the Spaniards' frightening artillery discharges, so the battle ends indecisively, with a single Spanish fatality and about 40 wounded (of whom 13 later die) and an unknown number of Mayan casualties. That night, Grijalva stands out to sea and heads farther west.

JUNE 8, 1518. After resting at the Laguna de Términos, Grijalva passes the mouth of a large river, which is christened with his name; some days later Pedro de Alvarado makes a reconnaissance up another large river, which in turn is given his name (today's Grijalva and Alvarado rivers).

JUNE 17, 1518. Grijalva reaches an island near present-day Veracruz where there are signs of a recent human sacrifice and so names it Sacrificios Island. The local Totonac Indians offer him an elaborate welcome, hoping to ingratiate themselves with these powerful new strangers and then use them to help throw off Aztec rule.

JUNE 24, 1518. Grijalva receives a minor embassy from the distant Mexican emperor, then ceremoniously lays claim to the island of San Juan de Ulúa before detaching Alvarado a few days later to return to

Senior Aztec officers, as depicted by native scribes in the Codex Mendoza, 20 years after the Spanish conquest. The figure at right, clad in a splendid white uniform with a plumed helmet, represents a tlacochcācatl or "quartermaster-general," in command of the Aztec armories. (Author's Collection)

Cuba aboard the San Sebastián with a report and booty. Grijalva meanwhile presses deeper into the Gulf of Mexico, eventually reaching as far north as Cape Rojo before turning back. Despite importuning from his men, he refuses to establish any permanent beachhead ashore, preferring instead to make a protracted reconnaissance before retiring toward Cuba.

During his prolonged absence, Governor Velázquez grows increasingly restive at the notion of this wealthy new find not being fully claimed, as he fears usurpation by other Spanish rivals; a single ship is therefore sent out under Cristóbal de Olid in a vain attempt to locate Grijalva, while preparations for a third expedition simultaneously go forward.

OCTOBER 23, 1518. After offering command of this latest enterprise to various individuals, Velázquez selects a 34-year-old alcalde or magistrate at Santiago de Cuba named Hernán Cortés. It is Velázquez's intent for Cortés to secure a foothold in this new territory to await the governor's arrival with a main body; yet Velázquez is soon disconcerted by the speed and scope of his subordinate's preparations, for Cortés musters seven vessels and more than 300 eager volunteers within a matter of weeks. Alarmed,

Aztec Warriors

When the first Mexica or Aztec nomads migrated into the lush Valley of Anáhuac early in the 12th century, they found it already crowded. The kings of Culhuacán dominated the many other tribes. As primitive latecomers, the Aztecs were driven from their first squatter camps near Zempoala, Tula, Chapultepec, and Contitlán. Finally, they were reduced to a miserable existence amid the marshes and tiny islands that dotted the western banks of the valley's vast saline lake.

According to legend, they established their capital of Tenochtitlán on the largest of these islands in 1325, guided by an eagle clutching a snake in its talons. Because of its remove far out over the water, the Aztecs created an inaccessible city that allowed them to better resist aggression. From this stronghold, they eventually grew so formidable in military prowess that by the mid-15th century the Aztecs were the dominant valley tribe.

Yet given their early difficulties, warriors and priests remained the dominant classes in their society. The Aztecs also continued their military expansion well beyond the valley in ritualized warfare intended to satisfy their war-god Huitzilopochtli. Their armies often paraded past his main temple in Tenochtitlán, observing human sacrifices of enemy captives, before departing on their campaigns. Lesser kingdoms proved no match for the Aztecs' disciplined and fearsome fighting columns, yet they were often subdued only gradually—rather than in a single sweep—so as to ensure a steady supply of altar victims.

By the time the Spaniards appeared, the Aztec military system had evolved into a sophisticated force led by seven military orders named Eagle, Serpent, Jaguar, Wolf, Deer, Coyote, and Grasshopper. These elite warriors, clad in elaborate quilted uniforms with colorful back-banners for identification in battle, were armed with wooden lances and clubs edged with razor-sharp obsidian, and they carried shields. They led huge companies of tribal conscripts armed with spears, slings, or bows and arrows. Yet despite their fanatical courage and patriotism, the Aztec warriors' cruelty during previous campaigns now haunted them. Many enslaved vassals turned against them, helping the Spanish invaders vanquish Tenochtitlán.

the governor decides to replace him at the last minute with Luis de Medina; but Cortés gets wind of this proposed change.

NOVEMBER 18, 1518. Rather than allow himself to be superseded, Cortés weighs anchor from Santiago de Cuba with his 100-ton flagship Santa María de la Concepción and five other vessels, sailing along southern Cuba and gathering more recruits and supplies while openly defying Velázquez's repeated recalls.

FEBRUARY 10, 1519. After almost three months, Cortés has gathered a fleet comprised of his 100-ton flagship, three other ships of 70–80 tons apiece, plus seven lesser vessels and brigantines at Guaniguanico near the western tip of Cuba, bearing 500 troops (12 of them harquebusiers and 30 crossbowmen), 50 sailors, 16 horses, and 14 large artillery pieces and numerous smaller ones, plus war dogs, a doctor, 2 interpreters, a dozen women, as well as a couple hundred Cuban porters and black slaves.

With this expedition, he strikes out eight days later for Cozumel but is scattered by a nocturnal storm; his fleet straggles in to drop anchor by February 21 with one ship missing. As the island's inhabitants have fled into the jungle, Cortés lands his troops and horses to recuperate and orders repairs made to his fleet before coaxing the natives back to their homes through kind usage. Learning of reputed Spanish castaways living on the nearby mainland of Yucatán, he secretly sends an Indian messenger to them, hoping to gain intelligence.

A couple of weeks later, his expedition resumes its passage, touching at Isla Mujeres before Capt. Pedro de Alvarado's vessel springs a bad leak, obliging the entire fleet to return to Cozumel.

MARCH 13, 1519. While preparing to once more depart Cozumel, Cortés is joined by a Spanish castaway named Gerónimo de Aguilar, who has been living among the Indians of Yucatán for eight years and has answered his covert summons.

A few days after setting sail and watering at Isla Mujeres, Cortés rounds the Yucatán Peninsula and locates his missing ship anchored in Puerto Escondido near the Laguna de Términos. He then proceeds to the Grijalva River mouth, probing almost two miles upstream—with only his smaller vessels bearing a small contingent—until they come within sight of a large Mayan town enclosed “by a thick wooden wall and battlements” named Potonchán. Cortés requests permission to buy provisions and water, which the Chontal natives refuse. Instead, their noncombatants exit into the interior, while the Spanish main army moves upstream and covertly joins their leader Cortés under cover of darkness.

APRIL 17, 1519. After celebrating Palm Sunday with a Mass at Santa María de la Victoria, Cortés's expedition goes back aboard ship and resumes its progression westward, sighting the islands of San Juan de Ulúa by April 20. The next day, the fleet drops anchor in the islands' lee, and a boat bearing two subordinates of the regional Aztec administrator Teutliltzin (also rendered as Teudile or Teudilli) contacts the visitors, inquiring as to their intentions.

APRIL 22 (GOOD FRIDAY), 1519. Cortés ferries his army ashore, complete with horses and artillery, and has his Cuban laborers swiftly fell trees and erect a fortified camp opposite San Juan de Ulúa. The Spaniards are given a friendly reception by the local Totonac Indians, vassals of the Aztecs for the past 40 years.

Two days later, the regional overlord Teutliltzin arrives with an impressive Aztec retinue, exchanging presents and banqueting with Cortés. Learning that the visitors wish to meet the Emperor Moctezuma II at his capital of Tenochtitlán (modern Mexico City), Teutliltzin sends a request and other reports inland by messenger, while assigning 2,000 native tributaries to wait upon the Spaniards.

MAY 1, 1519. Teutliltzin returns with an embassy sent by the hueyi tlatoani or "great speaker," the Emperor Moctezuma II. The embassy bears even more wealthy gifts for Cortés—thus unwittingly exciting the Spaniards' greed—but also brings a message discouraging the strangers from visiting the Aztec capital. Cortés nonetheless insists and, while awaiting a reply, receives a delegation of Totonac Indians from nearby Cempoala, who reveal to him that many subject tribes are resentful of Aztec rule.

Teutliltzin reappears 10 days afterward with a few more presents, plus a final rejection from the emperor of the Spaniards' request for a meeting; the local tribune also withdraws their 2,000 native servants overnight, thereby cutting off the Spaniards' food supply. Cortés consequently sends Pedro de Alvarado to probe inland with 100 soldiers, 15 cross-bowmen, and 6 harquebusiers, who return after wending nine miles through the dunes and swamps only to find a few abandoned Indian hamlets. Simultaneously, two brigantines with 50 men apiece are sent northwestward up the coast under captains Francisco de Montejo and Rodrigo Álvarez Chico to search for a better anchorage for the fleet.

During these absences, Cortés convenes a general meeting of his small army and gets them to agree to found a new Spanish settlement in Mexico, which is to be called Villa Rica de la Vera Cruz or "Rich Town of the True Cross." He is elected as its "mayor," a legal fiction that will allow him to sever all ties with Velázquez and report directly to the king in Spain.

JUNE 7, 1519. Once his two brigantines return, Cortés decides to shift his land base 40 miles north-westward of San Juan de Ulúa into the more sheltered harbor near Quiahuiztlan in Totonacan territory beyond Cempoala. He therefore marches overland with 400 soldiers, all his horses, and two small artillery pieces, while his ships circle around with the remaining force. During their progression,

Cortés's "Disease of the Heart"

When the Aztec tribune Teutliltzin first visited the Spaniards' fortified coastal camp amid the dunes near San Juan de Ulúa on Easter Sunday 1519, he was accompanied by more than 4,000 retainers, "handsomely dressed" in cotton garments and bearing a profusion of gifts. Cortés corresponded with European presents, then entertained Teutliltzin at a well-attended banquet in his ample tent. Once this feast concluded, he informed his visitor in a speech "that he was a vassal of Don Carlos of Austria, Emperor of the Christians, King of Spain, and lord of a great part of the world, whom many and great kings served and obeyed, and that all other princes rejoiced to be his friends because of his goodness and power."

Teutliltzin replied that he was very glad to hear this, yet "Cortés should know that his lord Moctezuma was no less a king and no less good, and he was astonished to learn that there could be another such great prince in the world." It therefore was agreed upon to send an account of their meeting to the Aztec emperor and request permission for the Spaniards to visit his inland capital.

In a sly exchange that delighted his Spanish onlookers, Cortés further asked whether Moctezuma might have any gold. When Teutliltzin responded yes, the Spanish commander asked for some to be sent "because my companions and I suffer from a disease of the heart which can only be cured with gold." The Aztecs returned a week later with many fine items of gold, silver, and jewelry, and the emperor even asked Cortés to state what else he might need for "the cure of his sickness" before departing, as Moctezuma would not be able to receive him at Tenochtitlán. Naturally, the very wealth of his offerings only strengthened the Spaniards' resolve to press inland.

the Spanish army is splendidly received by the immensely fat chief Xicomecoatl of Cempoala, who proposes to Cortés that an alliance with the inland tribes of Tlaxcala and Huejotzingo will help overthrow the Aztecs.

JUNE 28, 1519. From Cempoala, Cortés completes his journey to the coastal town of Quiahuiztlan and secretly encourages its inhabitants to seize a score of Aztec tribute-collectors, two of whom he releases that same night in a false gesture of friendship. The Spanish commander then proceeds to the nearby harbor and lays out the future city of Veracruz (then known as Villa Rica la Vieja), assigning lots and having bricks made to erect a fort.

A few days later, two of the emperor's young nephews arrive with a large Aztec delegation, bearing gifts in thanks for the release of the two captive tribute-collectors and informing Cortés that, while the Spaniards may now travel to Tenochtitlán, they might not be received by Moctezuma himself. Cortés returns a smooth reply, while arranging for the liberation of the remaining 18 captives—yet still covertly encouraging the local natives to refuse paying tribute to Mexico.

When news of this tax rebellion spreads, the regional Aztec collectors flee to their garrison town of Tizapantzingo, whose troops sally to punish the Totonac and Cempoalan rebels. Cortés counters by advancing swiftly upon this hilltop fortress with some Spanish soldiers and a host of native allies, scattering the Aztec army through sheer fright at the sight of his horsemen, thereby overrunning this base and expelling its defenders—disarmed but otherwise unharmed.

JULY 1, 1519. Once more back in Villa Rica, Cortés hastens its fortification and is reinforced by the arrival of a single caravel from Santiago de Cuba under Francisco de Saucedo or Salceda, bearing 60 more soldiers and nine horses. More importantly, this officer brings word that Velázquez has now been authorized from Spain to take possession of any new lands discovered west of his Caribbean colony. This news prompts Cortés to send the flagship Santa María de la Concepción and two caravels directly across the Atlantic with messages and gifts for the king, in hopes of winning approval for his independent campaign. These vessels set sail on July 26, under Cortés's emissaries Alonso Hernández Portocarrero and Francisco de Montejo. (They will reach the northwestern shores of Cuba by August 1 and re-

Certain disgruntled elements within Cortés's army, still displaying vestiges of loyalty to the Cuban governor, are also put down shortly thereafter by means of a few arrests and the executions of a pair of ringleaders. Finally, to discourage any further talk about turning back, Cortés persuades the masters of the other nine ships anchored in the harbor to beach and disassemble their craft, incorporating their sailors into his dismayed army's ranks.

AUGUST 8, 1519. Having completed Villa Rica's defenses and installed a 150-man Spanish garrison under Capt. Pedro de Ircio, Cortés begins marching inland for Cempoala at the head of 300 soldiers, 40 crossbowmen, 20 harquebusiers, 15 horsemen, 150 Cuban servants, 800 Cempoalan auxiliaries, and many war dogs. Shortly after reaching Cempoala, though, news overtakes him that four Spanish vessels have been sighted off the coast, so Cortés returns hastily with 100 men.

Joining Ircio's patrols along the shoreline, Cortés meets three disembarked Spaniards, who inform him that the vessels are under the command of Alonso Álvarez de Pineda and have been sent by Francisco de Garay, governor of Jamaica, to stake a claim over Mexico. Cortés therefore arrests this trio and lures another four men ashore into an ambush the next day, after which this rival flotilla stands away.

AUGUST 16, 1519. Having rejoined his army, thrown down Cempoala's pagan temples, and renamed this city as Nueva Sevilla, Cortés resumes his advance inland. Most Indian tribes prove hospitable to the 400 Spaniards, 15 horsemen, and 300 auxiliaries, so during the next couple of weeks they march uncontested through Jalapa, Xicochimalco (modern Xico Viejo), Ixhuacán, Zautla, and Ixtacamaxtitlán.

AUGUST 31, 1519. Tlaxcala Battles. Cortés's small army penetrates into the territory of the hostile Tlaxcaltecs, an engagement immediately erupting between his mounted vanguard and 15 brave Tlaxcaltecan scouts, who kill two horses and wound three others with their obsidian-tipped swords, javelins, and arrows before these few natives are slain. The conquistadores carefully conceal their horses' bodies so that they cannot be examined.

Pushing deeper the next day, Cortés is confronted by 1,000 warriors, who emerge from over a low hilltop and engage his army in hand-to-hand combat, slowly retreating through a maze of ravines where more warriors are waiting, until the Spaniards finally fight their way out onto an open plain and scatter their enemies with cavalry charges and artillery blasts at sundown. The Indians suffer many fatalities, as opposed to only injuries among the Spanish ranks. Cortés also remains in possession of the battlefield and camps overnight at Teocatingo, leading half his army on the morning of September 2 on a punitive sweep through half-a-dozen surrounding villages and seizing 400 captives before being chased back into his fortified encampment.

The next dawn, a huge Tlaxcaltecan army under the main command of Xicoténcatl the Younger appears in battle array, well armed and with their faces painted red, “which gave them the look of devils.” They send provisions in to the Spaniards to fatten them up for human sacrifice, then launch repeated assaults across the camp’s encircling ravine, all of which are repelled with heavy losses until the Tlaxcaltecan withdraw at nightfall. Cortés makes another sweep with half of his troops on September 4, burning 10 nearby towns and sacking a large, half-empty city before regaining his encampment at noon and bloodily repulsing yet more Tlaxcaltecan assaults. Two days afterward, he orders the hands of 50 Tlaxcaltecan visitors cut off, believing that they are spies, then chases away a nocturnal probe by Xicoténcatl.

A delegation of six Aztec noblemen visits the Spaniards’ camp and witnesses how daily assaults by the Tlaxcaltecan enemies are gradually losing impetus due to the many hundreds—perhaps even thousands—of casualties caused by the invaders’ superior weaponry. Finally, Tlaxcala’s leadership sues for terms, Xicoténcatl entering Cortés’s camp on September 12 to symbolically ask forgiveness for his attacks. The Spaniards are duly propitiated, and their entire army is welcomed six days afterward into the capital of Tlaxcala amid great festivities.

OCTOBER 12, 1519. Having refreshed his troops (and sent his lieutenants Pedro de Alvarado and Bernardino Vázquez de Tapia to make an unobtrusive visit to the Aztec capital of Tenochtitlán), Cortés resumes his march inland, reinforced by several thousand Tlaxcaltecan. A couple of days later, his army enters the large city of Cholula, a major Aztec satellite.

OCTOBER 18, 1519. Cholula Massacre. Convinced that the Cholultecans are plotting in secret concert with Moctezuma to attack the Spaniards within their streets, Cortés feigns a departure. Thousands of Cholultecan porters duly assemble at dawn, and the Spanish leader summons 30 of their chiefs into his quarters. He accuses them of treachery and has them murdered before firing a gun that signals to his men to butcher the porters. More than 6,000 people are slaughtered, after which Cholula is cruelly pillaged over the next two days.

The Aztec emperor sends propitiatory messages to Cortés, denying any knowledge of projected perfidy by his subjects and renewing his invitation for the Spaniards to visit his capital—while at the same time secretly arranging for other obstacles to be created to hinder the Spaniards’ advance.

NOVEMBER 1, 1519. Cortés’s army departs devastated Cholula for Huejotzingo, still determined to reach the Aztec capital. Although their Cempoalan auxiliaries retire at this point toward the coast, they are replaced by perhaps 1,000 Tlaxcaltecan, for a total of 6,000 native auxiliaries assisting the 400 Spaniards.

Hearing rumors that an Aztec ambush may be planned along the main highway leading into Tenochtitlán, Cortés instead veers up into the mountains, passing through the 13,000-foot-high gap between the snow-capped volcanoes of Ixtaccihuatl and Popocatepetl (still today called the Paso de Cortés or “Cortés’s Pass”), so as to descend into the Valley of Mexico and behold the Aztec capital set upon its lake, described as being “the finest spectacle in the world.”

NOVEMBER 8, 1519. After being well received at Amecameca and Ixtapalapa, the Spanish army reaches the shores of Lake Texcoco and marches along a six-mile causeway toward the Aztec capital, being personally welcomed into Tenochtitlán (population: approximately 200,000) by the reluctant Moctezuma, who leads a procession of hundreds of his most noble retainers to house the visitors in the home of his deceased father, the former emperor Axayacatl.

NOVEMBER 14, 1519. Having been dazzled by the wonders of the Aztec capital, Cortés receives a message from Captain de Ircio of a clash between his garrison left behind at Villa Rica (Veracruz) and an Aztec contingent stationed farther north of that port at Nautla, under General Cualpopoca. Nine Spaniards and many Cempoalans having been killed, Cortés seizes upon this incident as a convenient excuse to confront Moctezuma, visiting the emperor in his palace that same evening and launching into a complaint. The next morning, he returns with about 30 armed men and insists that the chief shift into the Spaniards' quarters. After a lengthy discussion, Moctezuma agrees, creating a sensation among his people, despite being allowed to perform his usual daily activities accompanied by a few Spanish guards.

Summoned by the emperor, Cuapopoca arrives from the coast 20 days afterward, along with his son and 15 other offending officers. On Cortés's orders, they are tortured and then burned alive in the main square of Tenochtitlán, while Moctezuma is placed in irons.

The Spaniards then spend the next several months living uneasily in the wary Aztec capital, learning everything about its empire, receiving vast amounts of tribute, reconnoitering outlying provinces, and even convincing the captive emperor to help them build four brigantines on the lake. The headstrong young lord Cacama of Texcoco threatens to raise a rebellion, free his captive uncle Moctezuma, and drive out the foreigners, yet he, too, is seized through treachery and imprisoned by Cortés.

than his own. It has departed Cuba on March 5, comprising 11 ships and 7 brigantines under Velázquez's 45-year-old lieutenant, Pánfilo de Narváez. The Cuban governor, after learning of Cortés's dispatch of treasure ships directly toward Spain in an effort to circumvent his authority, is now determined to have the usurper arrested and hanged.

Narváez has lost one ship and 40 men during a Gulf storm before reaching San Juan de Ulúa on April 19. Here he finds a single ship awaiting him, bearing Judge Lucas Vázquez de Ayllón, who has been dispatched from the island of Santo Domingo to prevent fighting between the two rival Spanish contingents. Narváez contemptuously sends the lawyer away and dispatches three emissaries to Villa Rica, who are promptly arrested by Cortés's garrison commander. Narváez therefore disembarks all his 1,400 men (including 80 riders, 70–80 harquebusiers, 90 crossbowmen, and 650 foot soldiers) to begin building a base camp ashore. However numerous, though, his army is not entirely loyal, many troops being more impressed by tales of Cortés's prowess in dealing with the powerful Aztec empire.

EARLY MAY 1520. After ordering the recall of 150 Spaniards sent under his lieutenant Juan Velázquez de León to settle the Gulf coast near Coatzacoalcos, Cortés departs Tenochtitlán with some 80 of his own Spanish soldiers, leaving another 120 behind as an occupation force under Pedro de Alvarado. After meeting Velázquez de León and marshalling a total of 340 Spaniards at Cholula, Cortés strikes eastward to confront Narváez, unaccompanied by native auxiliaries. Although outnumbered four to one, the clever and charismatic leader nonetheless sways many members of this latest Spanish expedition by a steady stream of messages and gifts sent into Narváez's camp at Cempoala.

MAY 29, 1520. Narváez's Defeat. Confident of victory, Narváez goes to sleep on the rainy night of Whitsunday, May 28, high atop Cempoala's main pyramid. Familiar with the terrain, Cortés moves against him in the darkness, a company of troops under 23-year-old Gonzalo de Sandoval hastening up the pyramid's steps to fall upon Narváez and his closest companions before any general alarm can be raised. Amid confused fighting, the thatched covering of Narváez's abode is set ablaze, and his right eye is torn out by a pike-thrust; he is dragged before Cortés, and the rest of his army surrenders. At the cost of only 17 dead among Narváez's men and 2 of his own men, Cortés incorporates this vast new army into his ranks.

A company of 200 Spaniards is then sent northward under Diego de Ordáz to settle the Gulf coast beyond Pánuco, while a similar number returns southeastward under Velázquez de León to reestablish the colony at Coatzacoalcos, thereby ensuring Cortés's hold along the entire Mexican shoreline against any other rival claimants.

However, these detachments will soon be recalled by even more alarming news: during Cortés's absence from Tenochtitlán, Alvarado—misconstruing the traditional Aztec festival of Toxcatl on May 16 as a war dance in anticipation of a surprise attack—has massacred a large group of native celebrants, precipitating a vengeful descent against the Spanish quarters within the capital that only abates when Alvarado forces Moctezuma onto its rooftop to quell the angry crowd.

JUNE 24, 1520. Cortés, having first warily circled around the lake into Texcoco, returns to a silent and sullen Tenochtitlán in the afternoon with more than 100 Spanish horsemen and 1,000 soldiers, as well as fresh Tlaxcaltecan levies. He finds only five or six of Alvarado's men actually dead, but the garrison is isolated and shunned by the Aztecs; Cortés reproves his lieutenant for his ill judgment. Cortés is also angry with Moctezuma, having learned during his coastal campaign that the emperor has secretly contacted his antagonist Narváez, promising friendship.

JUNE 25, 1520. Wanting the Mexican markets to be reopened so as to obtain food for his troops, Cortés releases Moctezuma's brother Cuitláhuac, lord of Ixtapalapa, to arrange matters. Instead, this chieftain begins rallying Aztec resistance. When Cortés sallies into the narrow city streets with 200 troops and sends Ordáz in the opposite direction with a like number, they are all attacked by swarms of warriors, who kill four or five Spaniards and wound many others with stones and arrows hurled down from rooftops.

Retreating into their quarters at nightfall, the Spanish become besieged, enduring repeated attacks over the next several days. The sheer weight of Aztec numbers prevents their escape from the city, so Cortés orders three mobile wooden towers built in hopes of tearing down nearby strongpoints. Hoping to ease the siege pressure while the towers are being completed, Cortés directs Moctezuma to again address the mob from the roof of the Spaniards' quarters. Although protected by Spanish soldiers, the unhappy emperor is stoned by his own people and dies three days afterward. His body is released for interment at Chapultepec, and Cuitláhuac is now the acknowledged leader of the Aztecs, soon to be crowned.

When the towers are ready, Cortés sallies with 500 Spanish troops and 3,000 Tlaxcaltecan warriors in support, but they must soon retreat as the Aztecs cripple the towers. Repeated Spanish assaults of bloody hand-to-hand combat succeed in overrunning the main temple, yet even this capture of the war-god Huitzilopochtli's shrine does not sap Aztec fury.

JUNE 30–JULY 1, 1520. “Noche Triste” Retreat.

Thirsty, hungry, and desperate, the Spaniards decide to cut their way out of Tenochtitlán after midnight, cloaked by heavy fog and drizzle. They pass undetected over one bridge before being decried and attacked along the Tacuba Causeway. Countless war canoes appear out of the night, filled with archers and enraged fighters. Cortés's conquistadores—crowded together and unable to deploy their cannon or cavalry—make easy targets, some 450 perishing in the darkness. Many drown, being heavy-laden with booty, while 46 horses and 4,000 Tlaxcaltecan auxiliaries are also lost. (One of the last Spaniards to fight his way out of the city is Alvarado, who—according to a legend circulated many years later—allegedly vaults across a gap in the causeway, still remembered today as the Puente de Alvarado or “Alvarado's Bridge.”)

Reaching the mainland town of Popotla, Cortés turns back with five horsemen to assist the final escapees before pausing beneath a large tree to weep, giving birth to the name of the Noche Triste or “Sad Night” retreat. He then leads his battered survivors on toward Cuajimalpa, hoping to circle westward and northward out of the valley to regain the safety of Tlaxcala. However, the Spaniards are hounded by Cuitláhuac's 40,000 warriors. On July 2, a pitched battle is fought to gain the hilltop temple of Teocallihueyacan, after which the Spaniards press on through Tepotzotlán and other deserted Indian towns, suffering greatly from hunger and thirst. They are almost overwhelmed again when the Aztecs muster a huge force at Otumba on July 7, but the imperial army is repelled by desperate counterthrusts during which Cortés personally slays the Aztec standard-bearer with his lance. The battle is finally ended when Juan de Salamanca kills the imperial general

The next day, 340 Spanish survivors and 27 horsemen finally stagger into the safety of Tlaxcaltecan territory, being greeted by the 4,000 inhabitants of the border town of Hueyotlipan and recuperating there until July 11. The Aztecs remain behind their frontier, unwilling to clash with the fully mobilized Tlaxcaltecan army, 50,000 strong. While recovering from his own minor wounds at Hueyotlipan, Cortés is visited by solicitous allied noblemen from the city of Tlaxcala, 12 miles away. Patrols are sent out to skirmish against the Aztecs before the main Spanish army retreats into the Tlaxcaltecan capital itself.

AUGUST 1, 1520. Cortés leads the most rested men of his army on a punitive expedition through Huejotzingo, Cholula, and Acatzingo against the province of Tepeaca or Tepeyácac, a small but strategically placed Aztec tributary state. His aims are to discourage the number of assaults occurring against other isolated Spanish units, as well as propitiating his fierce Tlaxcaltecan allies, who clamor for this campaign.

Six days later, the Spaniards and 40,000 Tlaxcaltecs overrun the hilltop town of Tepeaca, killing some 400 warriors in a pitched battle before its gates. The town and its surrounding area are then cruelly ravaged, most citizens being either branded on the face with the letter “G” (for guerra) and enslaved by the Spanish, or sacrificed and eaten by the Tlaxcaltecs. Such atrocities prompt many other Aztec satellites to refrain from attacking the invaders, and some even seek terms so as to shift allegiance from the Aztec cause.

Tepeaca is temporarily renamed once this campaign is concluded on August 21 as Segura de la Frontera (modern Tepeaca, Puebla, relocated to the foot of its hill in 1543), becoming Cortés's new army headquarters so as not to deplete the resources at Tlaxcala.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1520. Cuitláhuac is officially elected emperor in Tenochtitlán, but aside from strengthening his capital's fortifications and stockpiling weapons, he takes no offensive steps against the foreign enemies. Smallpox has appeared within the Valley of Mexico as well, causing many thousands to sicken and die—the new emperor among them on November 25. Cuitláhuac is succeeded by his royal cousin Cuauhtémoc, who is another of the late Moctezuma's nephews.

MID-SEPTEMBER 1520. Cortés is contacted at Tepeaca by the lord of Huaquechula, a small province in the Valley of Atlixco below Popocatepetl Volcano, who is so resentful of the large Aztec garrison imposed upon his district that he offers to seize its commanders and hand them over to a Spanish relief column. Cortés therefore dispatches captains Andrés de Tapia, Diego de Ordaz, and Cristóbal de Olid with 300 Spanish foot soldiers, 13 horsemen, and 30,000 Tlaxcaltecan allies. While marching through Cholula and Huejotzingo, though, they become suspicious of the Huaquechulans' motives and so detain their emissaries and return them to Tepeaca in irons.

Cortés frees the captives with his apologies and then personally rides to assume command of this operation. Three days later, he charges by surprise into the stoutly fortified city of Huaquechula, whose leaders immediately present him with 40 high-ranking Aztec captives, while its citizenry attacks the remainder within their quarters so furiously that the Spaniards are powerless to prevent an outright massacre. A detachment of 3,000 warriors from the nearby Aztec army encampment attempt to rescue their officers, setting fire to the outskirts of Huaquechula, but are scattered into the open fields by Cortés's cavalry. The main Aztec force thereupon decamps through the pass between the volcanoes for the Valley of Mexico. The heat is so oppressive this day that many men and one horse die of exhaustion.

EARLY OCTOBER 1520. From Huaquechula, Cortés quickly presses on to seize another heavily fortified Aztec garrison town, Izúcar (modern Izúcar de Matamoros, Puebla). Its citizenry flees before his onslaught, leaving 6,000 Aztec troops under General Nahuiaatl to offer a hearty resistance before being annihilated almost to the last man. Many drown while attempting to swim across the encircling river.

MID-OCTOBER 1520. Once more back in Tepeaca, Cortés instructs his shipwright Martín López to return into Tlaxcala with his assistants to begin shaping thousands of pieces of cut timber into the ribs and planks for a fleet of brigantines. The conquistador commander moreover finds that his recent victories are bringing in native overtures from as far away as Oaxaca.

Also, a trickle of Spanish reinforcements continues to arrive at Villa Rica: half-a-dozen individual vessels bearing an additional 200 adventurers to join Cortés's ranks, plus military stores and more than 20 horses. He furthermore dispatches four of Narváez's vessels to seek help from the licentiate Rodrigo de Figueroa, president of the Royal Audiencia on Hispaniola. He sends a similar expedition to Jamaica to buy mares.

EARLY DECEMBER 1520. Sandoval, one of Cortés's favorite lieutenants, marches northward from Tepeaca with 200 Spanish foot soldiers, 12 crossbowmen, 20 riders, and thousands of native allies to secure the supply route from the Gulf coast by defeating the Aztec vassal-states at Zautla and Xalacingo. He succeeds with very few losses, the chieftains switching allegiances and thereby further shrinking the Aztec empire.

DECEMBER 13, 1520. Now fully confident in his restored military strength, Cortés leaves a Spanish captain in command of only 60 men at Tepeaca, while sending his main army to spend Christmas at Tlaxcala. Cortés rejoins them three days afterward.

DECEMBER 27, 1520. Parading his reconstituted army at Tlaxcala, Cortés counts 40 Spanish horsemen, 80 crossbowmen or harquebusiers, 460 foot soldiers, and 9 cannon. Next day, he summons all the allied chieftains of Tlaxcala, Huejotzingo, Cholula, Chalco, and other lesser towns to inform them that the long-anticipated offensive against the Aztec capital will commence on December 29.

He sets out for Texmelucan on the appointed day, his Spanish army accompanied by only 20,000 warriors under the Tlaxcaltecan general Chichimecatecutli, leaving another 60,000 behind as a reserve. After pushing up an obstructed yet otherwise unguarded mountain road, they reach Coatepec by January 1, 1521, scattering a small Aztec force. The next day, while marching upon the city of Texcoco, Cortés's army is greeted by its frightened rulers, who offer their allegiance and to house the Spaniards. Cortés proceeds through Cuautinchán and Huejutla so as to enter Texcoco by evening, only to discover that most of its populace is fleeing into the Aztec capital aboard thousands of canoes. He therefore allows the city to be sacked and elevates the young son of Nezahualpiltzin as the new king of Texcoco. Three days later, the commander of the conquistadores is approached by the chieftains of Cuautinchán, Huejutla, and Atengo, who agree to switch sides.

JANUARY 9, 1521. Having fortified his base at Texcoco, Cortés leaves Sandoval in command of its garrison while setting out with 15 riders, 10 harquebusiers, 30 crossbowmen, and 160 Spanish foot soldiers, plus 5,000 Indian auxiliaries, to attack the city of Ixtapalapa, located 15 miles away. Despite its defenders' best efforts, the invaders fight their way inside by evening and destroy this city, slaughtering thousands. The retreating Ixtapalapans, however, breach its causeway so that their ruined city is suddenly flooded in the darkness, obliging the attackers to flee to higher ground. The next morning, Aztec columns close in upon the waterlogged Spaniards and Tlaxcaltecs, both by land and aboard canoes, driving them back into Texcoco, during which a single Spaniard is killed.

Notwithstanding this setback, Cortés receives a delegation from Otumba that promises friendship, while the inhabitants of Chalco also request his help to expel its Aztec garrison. Sandoval is promptly sent out with 20 riders and 200 Spanish infantrymen, who first fight a screening action to allow a column of Tlaxcaltecs to return homeward, before reaching Chalco and securing its allegiance through the defeat of its Aztec occupiers.

LATE JANUARY 1521. Concerned by such defections, Cuauhtémoc leads his army down the eastern shores of Lake Tenochtitlán, cowing many vassals into submission once more. Cortés meanwhile detaches Sandoval with 200 Spanish infantrymen and 15 riders to fetch the brigantines that Martín López has been constructing at Tlaxcala. En route, Sandoval digresses to eradicate the town of Calpulalpan, where a party of Spaniards has been ambushed and sacrificed during the Noche Triste retreat of the previous year. Its inhabitants flee, only to be rounded up and enslaved by Sandoval's vengeful column.

FEBRUARY 15, 1521. Lakeshore Sweep. Sandoval returns into Texcoco with a six-mile-long column of 10,000 Tlaxcaltecans, protected by an ad-

Navy over the Mountains

The Spaniards were able to subdue the Aztec capital thanks to some remarkable feats of engineering. Realizing that the huge city depended upon thousands of canoes for its sustenance, Cortés recognized this as a vulnerability and so tricked the captive emperor Moctezuma into helping him start constructing four brigantines. The ships were supposedly for returning to Cuba but were actually intended to dominate Tenochtitlán's lake. Almost immediately after losing these vessels during the "Noche Triste" retreat, Cortés instructed his shipwright Martín López to proceed to Tlaxcala to build a new fleet, which could be disassembled and carried piece-by-piece up into the central highlands. Sails, rigging, nails, rope, and other specialized gear were to be brought from the scuttled Spanish ships at Veracruz, while tar for caulking—which was "not known or used in this country"—had to be obtained by a party of sailors.

After three months of intense labor, 13 brigantines were produced. They were taken apart and had started to be carried by 10,000 Tlaxcaltecans, escorted by 20,000 warriors, up into the mountains by February 11, 1521. This enormous column entered the advance Spanish base of Texcoco four days later, triumphantly parading past for six hours in their splendid feathered uniforms "to the sound of many drums, conches, and other musical instruments."

Yet another Herculean task was then initiated when, after four days of rest, work commenced on reassembling the brigantines as well as digging a fortified channel three-quarters of a mile long and 12 feet deep in order to reach the lake's waters directly from the Spanish encampment. The largest of these flat-bottomed vessels measured about 65 feet in length and was armed with iron cannon; the remainder averaged 40–50 feet in length and were equipped with small bronze swivel-guns. All had double or single masts, plus long oars for propulsion; they were capable of carrying 25–30 armed men apiece.

After fifty days' toil by tens of thousands of native laborers, the fleet was ready to be launched. At this point, Cortés assembled all his conquistadores and addressed them: "My brothers and comrades, you now see these brigantines finished and ready for action, and you know how much work they have cost us, and how much sweat they have cost our friends. A very great part of the hope I have to take Mexico lies in them, because with them we shall either quickly burn all the canoes of the city, or seal them up in the canals. In this we shall do the enemy as much harm as the land forces can do, because the enemy can no more live without canoes than without eating."

His words would prove prophetic, as this navy—so painstakingly carried high up into the mountains—quickly dominated the lake and doomed Tenochtitlán.

ditional 20,000 warriors. Two thousand of these porters are carrying food, but the remainder brings countless planks and timbers, which when assembled will constitute López's vessels.

Work commences four days later on their assembly and the digging of an access canal. In the meantime, Cortés leads 250 Spanish foot soldiers, 50 harquebusiers and crossbowmen, 25 riders, plus thousands of Tlaxcaltecan warriors on a major foray out of Texcoco to circle around the entire lake. Some 12 miles away, this force scatters an Aztec army, then the next day storms and burns the city of Xaltocan. The next night, they sleep in the deserted city of Cuautitlán before passing through Tenayuca and Azcapotzalco without opposition, then assaulting and occupying Tacuba. The next morning, they also sack and torch half of this city before testing the outer defenses of Tenochtitlán itself for a week, then pass through Acolman on their way back into Texcoco.

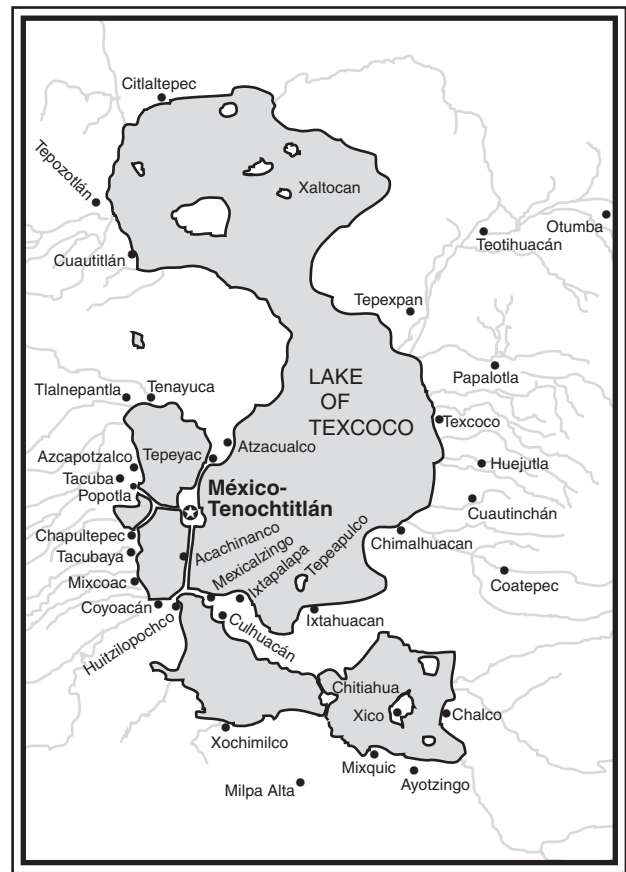

The victorious Tlaxcaltecan contingent is thereupon allowed to return home to boast of their successes and booty. News has also arrived of another Spanish relief force reaching Veracruz, sent by the licentiate de Figueroa of Santo Domingo and comprised of the ship María, plus two small caravels. They will add 200 men and 60 horses to Cortés's ranks.

MARCH 5, 1521. The ship of Alonso de Mendoza quits the Gulf coast, bearing messages and gifts from Cortés for the king of Spain.

MARCH 12, 1521. Having received a plea from his native allies at Chalco, who are being threatened by converging Aztec armies, Cortés dispatches Sandoval to their aid with 300 Spanish foot soldiers, 15 riders, and a column of Tlaxcaltecan warriors. Two days later, they fight their way into Oaxtepec, defeating its garrison.

On March 16, Sandoval's army presses on to overrun the hilltop Aztec fortress of Yecapixtla as well, successfully storming it through a hail of stones and arrows that result in the death of a single Spaniard. Auxiliaries from Chalco and other satellite towns follow the more heavily armored Spanish spearhead into this keep, pitilessly slaughtering its defenders, many of whom plunge in desperation into the river below. This mass of bodies taints the water, preventing Sandoval's men from drinking, so they retire the next day for Texcoco.

Hoping to undo this setback, Cuauhtémoc immediately dispatches another army to reimpose Valley of Mexico at the time of the Spanish conquest.

Aztec rule over Chalco before the Spaniards can intervene. Nonetheless, the inhabitants of Chalco, Huejotzingo, and other towns band together to resist, while beseeching Sandoval's return. Before the Spanish column can arrive, though, the natives unexpectedly defeat the Aztec army, further diminishing the emperor's prestige.

APRIL 3, 1521. Sweep beyond the Valley. After receiving the submission of the chieftains of Tuxpan, Mexicaltzingo, and Nautla, Cortés strikes out from Texcoco at the head of 300 soldiers, 30 riders, and 20,000 allied warriors to disperse a huge new Aztec army that is gathering to threaten Chalco. Resting overnight in the border town of Tlalmanalco, he is joined by a further 40,000 natives and, at 2:00 p.m. the next afternoon, clashes against an enormous enemy host. These subjects of the emperor successfully defend a high and rocky promontory, pushing back Cortés's two assault-columns that gain its summit, in the process slaying a pair of Spanish soldiers and wounding 20. Cortés's battered army therefore fortifies itself overnight and then on April 5 outflanks the promontory's defenders, who agree to abandon the Aztec cause if allowed to return into their homes.

Heartened by this triumph, Cortés decides to continue his march two days afterward and make a wide-ranging foray all around the Aztec capital. At dawn on April 8, his army smashes the Aztec garrison that has reoccupied Oaxtepec, chasing its survivors as far as Jilotepec. Two days later, the Spaniards set fire to Jilotepec's dwellings as well and proceed over the mountains. By April 13, they descend upon the seemingly impregnable Cuernavaca—a city nestled amid deep ravines and accessible only via two defended drawbridges. While these strongpoints are being engaged, though, a Tlaxcaltecan warrior discovers a small and perilous crossing into the city. He is followed across by four Spanish soldiers, who alarm the defenders by appearing unexpectedly behind their ranks. Cuernavaca erupts in flames, and its people submit that same afternoon to Cortés.

The Spanish army then ascends once more into the Valley of Mexico, storming the strongly fortified lakeside city of Xochimilco two days later, taking it by nightfall after very heavy fighting. Cortés himself is almost taken captive when his horse collapses from fatigue; he is saved by a Tlaxcaltecan warrior. On April 16, a fleet of 2,000 canoes bearing 12,000 Aztec warriors appears from Tenochtitlán, 12 miles distant, while an Aztec army pushes along the causeway. Cortés sallies with 600 Tlaxcaltecan warriors to break up these repeated attacks, while his troops burn most of Xochimilco and dig in at their quarters. Three days of combat ensue, until Cortés marches his whole force six miles into Coyoacán on April 20, finding it deserted. He probes Tenochtitlán's outer defenses at the head of 200 Spanish foot soldiers and five cavalymen before finally returning into Texcoco on April 22 to find that many more Spanish volunteers have arrived during his absence.

Such an irresistible progression through the very heartland of the Aztec dominion greatly enhances the invaders' prestige. Perhaps only a dozen Spaniards have been lost during this campaign, although some have been dragged off to become human sacrifices—a fate greatly feared among the rank and file.

APRIL 25, 1521. Undaunted by Cortés's recent successes, four days of ceremonies begin within the beleaguered Mexican capital to celebrate Cuauhtémoc's official coronation.

APRIL 28, 1521. López's brigantines are launched at Texcoco amid great rejoicing by the Spaniards and their auxiliaries. With their tall sails, long oars, and swivel-guns, these brigantines will completely outclass the Aztecs' smaller canoes, promising to wrest control of Tenochtitlán's waters. They are to move out onto the waters from their base via a walled, planked channel 12 feet deep, 12 feet wide, and three-quarters of a mile in length, dug by tens of thousands of native levies. The conquistador commander furthermore musters his entire Spanish force, counting 86 horsemen, 118 crossbowmen and arquebusiers, as well as almost 700 foot soldiers armed "with pikes, shields, and halberds, besides the swords and daggers that they all carried." They are supported by three heavy iron cannon, as well as 15 smaller bronze pieces.

The next day, Cortés dispatches messages to all allied cities—Tlaxcala, Huejotzingo, Cholula, Chalco, and so on—urging them to send as many men and supplies as possible into Texcoco within 10 days for one final offensive against Tenochtitlán. The Aztecs' past tyrannies now redound against them as 60,000 warriors quickly rally into the invaders' already-crowded camp.

MAY 7, 1521. Cortés parades his vast host and subdivides it by assigning 30 horsemen, 170 Spanish foot soldiers, 3 guns, and more than 30,000 warriors to Alvarado, with orders to advance and seize Tacuba. Cristóbal de Olid receives 33 riders, 180 infantrymen, 2 guns, and nearly 30,000 natives to simultaneously take Coyoacán. Sandoval will later lead 23 riders, 160 foot soldiers, 2 guns, and more than 40,000 Indians to occupy Ixtapalapa. Together, these captures will sever three of the four causeways leading out of Tenochtitlán—the fourth, which reaches the mainland at Tepeyac, is to be left open to furnish the Aztecs with a tempting avenue of escape.

Cortés himself is to arm each brigantine with a gun, a half-dozen crossbows or arquebuses, plus two-dozen Spanish sailors and personally lead them out onto the lake to combat the Aztec canoes. His strategy is to weaken his densely concentrated foes by denying supplies into their capital, then gradually fighting his way inside with his three convergent armies.

MAY 10, 1521. Alvarado's and Olid's contingents depart Texcoco, the commanders almost coming to blows that night over lodgings at Acolman. The next day they reach deserted Jilotepec and, early on May 12, march into empty Tacuba, which the Spaniards begin fortifying while a Tlaxcaltecan column probes up its causeway, fighting the defenders of the Aztec capital until sundown.

Olid presses on the next day for Chapultepec, cutting his way through heavy resistance to destroy the aqueducts emanating from the spring there—thereby cutting off Tenochtitlán’s water supply—before proceeding to ensconce his army at Coyoacán.

MAY 31, 1521. The first two Spanish contingents having firmly secured their advance positions at Tacuba and Coyoacán, Sandoval’s unit departs Texcoco for Ixtapalapa.

JUNE 1, 1521. To support Sandoval’s land assault against Ixtapalapa, Cortés sorties from Acachinanco near Texcoco with his brigantines. The terrified inhabitants of Ixtapalapa flee at Sandoval’s very approach, so his column enters uncontested and burns much of this hastily reconstructed city before fortifying the area. Cortés consequently steers away for the Aztec base on Tepeapulco Island, landing with about 150 men and fighting his way to its rocky summit amid fearsome slaughter.

Signal-fires lit all around the lake give warning to the senior Aztec commanders so that a massive fleet of canoes emerges from Tenochtitlán to confront the brigantines. Cortés awaits them in formation, until the wind veers around and allows his much larger vessels to plow right through the crowded native flotillas, using guns and crossbows to finish off survivors in the water. The Aztec fleet is chased six miles back into Tenochtitlán and bottled up inside its canals.

Finding the lake swept clear of opponents for his brigantines, Cortés disembarks with 30 men and seizes the twin-towered Xoloc strongpoint on the Ixtapalapa causeway, despite fierce resistance. He brings another 70 men and three artillery pieces ashore to hold this stronghold overnight, being reinforced at dawn of June 2 by 8 riders, 80 Spanish foot soldiers, and numerous warriors from Olid’s contingent.

JUNE 2, 1521. Heavy fighting rages along both the Ixtapalapa and Tacuba causeways, where Alvarado is also slowly advancing. Cortés pushes almost into the outskirts of Tenochtitlán itself and has the Ixtapalapa causeway cut so that four of his brigantines can penetrate into the inner lake to better protect the Spaniards’ flanks.

JUNE 3, 1521. Amid continual fighting, Cortés orders Sandoval to shift his Ixtapalapa contingent over to reinforce Olid’s at Coyoacán before joining him personally with an additional 10 horsemen. A week-long lull thereupon ensues, both sides skirmishing against each other’s lines, while Sandoval marches his contingent on to take up a new position at Xaltocan, northwest of Tenochtitlán, to threaten the last Aztec-controlled causeway at Tepeyac.

JUNE 10, 1521. Looking to test the strength of Aztec resolve, Cortés orders Alvarado and Sandoval to attack from their bases while he launches a major thrust up the Ixtapalapa causeway at dawn, leading more than 200 Spaniards and 80,000 native allies. Supported by accompanying brigantines, they fight their way past two strongly defended gaps into the streets of Tenochtitlán itself, where a series of seesaw actions ends with Cortés being forced to retreat at nightfall, losing one of his cannon. (He later comments: “Everyone ran away, and everyone fought well; such is war.”)

JUNE 15, 1521. After being reinforced by 40,000 Texcocan recruits under the 24-year-old chieftain Ixtlilxóchitl, Cortés again advances from Xoloc with 20 horsemen, 300 Spanish foot soldiers, 3 guns, and 10,000 allies to fight his way back into Tenochtitlán. Assisted by his brigantines, the attackers win passage through several defended gaps, which his native auxiliaries then fill in with rubble, stones, and lumber. Upon reaching the city proper, the assault column starts lighting fires and leveling houses so that their cavalry will have more room to maneuver. Desperate Aztec counterthrusts throw the invaders back at nightfall, yet not before great damage has been inflicted.

JUNE 16, 1521. Cortés resumes his assault up the Ixtapalapa causeway at 8:00 a.m., only to discover that the Aztecs have toiled all night under the personal supervision of Cuauhtémoc to reopen its breaches and erect new barricades. Five hours of intense combat result in the Spanish recapture of two gaps, yet when darkness falls, they retire again into their fortified quarters at Xoloc.

Alvarado has launched similar strikes up the Tacuba causeway, so Cortés shifts strategy the next day by also attacking it from his base so that both Spanish contingents may link up. Six brigantines and 3,000 allied canoes support both flanks of Cortés’s advance, which seizes three bridges on its first day. By June 18, the remaining four are secured, establishing contact with Alvarado’s force.

Cortés has moreover realized that his tactic of razing buildings in the Aztec capital both deprives his enemy of high positions from which to pelt down missiles and frees up space for the Spaniards' artillery and cavalry, so he directs a series of attrition raids intended to gradually tear down more and more of Tenochtitlán's edifices. The defenders nonetheless continue to resist stubbornly, so when Alvarado prematurely attempts a thrust a few days afterward into the main square of the Tlatelolco suburb, accompanied by only 50 Spaniards, he is quickly surrounded and obliged to swim for his life. Four of his companions are captured and ritually sacrificed within sight of the horrified Spanish army.

JUNE 30, 1521. After a week of rather ineffectual raids against the Aztec capital, Cortés launches another major assault by having Sandoval break camp and feign a withdrawal but, instead, swing his contingent round to join Alvarado for a concerted drive into Tlatelolco's main square. Cortés meanwhile leads 270 Spaniards and almost 50,000 Indian allies in from the opposite direction, both columns fighting their way deep into the city before becoming bogged down. The Spanish commander is wounded and lucky to escape being taken alive, saved only by the personal sacrifice of his servant Cristóbal de Olea and captain of the guard Antonio de Quiñones, while Alvarado's standard is captured by the Aztec chieftain Tlapanecatli. At least 20 Spaniards and more than 2,000 native allies are slain before both columns retire, another 53 Spanish prisoners being paraded to the tops of Tlatelolco's highest pyramids and publicly sacrificed. Four horses, a cannon, and a brigantine are also lost.

Shaken by this setback, the attackers refrain from renewing their assaults over the next four days, while the Aztecs celebrate noisily with "great bonfires, music, dancing, feasting, and drinking." The heads of two Spaniards and two horses are conveyed through towns all along the lakeshore, persuading many chieftains to quit their alliance with Cortés out of sheer fright.

JULY 2, 1521. Emissaries from Cuernavaca inform Cortés that the warrior priests of Malinalco and Couixco have begun attacking their district, emboldened by the Spaniards' recent setback before Tenochtitlán. To prevent such insurgencies from multiplying, Cortés detaches Andrés de Tapia with 10 riders and 80 soldiers to aid his loyal Cuernavacan chieftain Cuauhnáhuac against the warrior-priests. Within a few days, Tapia scatters a host gathered outside Malinalco, chasing its survivors back into their formidable hilltop fortress and laying waste to its surrounding farmlands before rejoining the main Spanish army a week later.

Two days after Tapia's triumphal return, Cortés receives a similar request in mid-July from the Otomí inhabitants of the highlands regarding their Matlatzincan neighbors. He therefore detaches Sandoval to their aid, with 18 horsemen and 100 Spanish infantrymen. This column unites with some 60,000 Otomies and, at a Lerma River ford three days later, overtakes the retiring Matlatzincan army, which is heavy-laden with booty. The latter flee and make a brief stand on the Lerma's far side before scattering into the Matlatzinco or Toluca Valley; they suffer some 2,000 deaths during this pursuit. Gathering with their terrified families overnight atop an impregnable height above Tollocan, the Matlatzincans disappear by the next dawn. Sandoval subsequently overruns the towns of Tenango, Calimaya, Metepec, and so on, before regaining Cortés's encampment with two prominent captives.

These Spanish victories do much to restore the besiegers' prestige, as does a bold foray into Tenochtitlán itself by the Tlaxcaltecs under Chichimecatecutli, which nets a large number of Aztec prisoners during heavy fighting. Soon Cortés's native auxiliaries begin returning, reassured by Tenochtitlán's palpable weakness. He uses them to level more buildings in the Aztec capital, slowly pressing the defenders back. The Spaniards are also heartened by the arrival of a ship at Villa Rica bearing gunpowder, crossbows, and a few more soldiers (having partaken in Ponce de León's recently failed expedition to settle Florida; see "Early March 1521" entry in "Expansion beyond Mexico").

JULY 24, 1521. Concealed before sunrise with 15 horsemen, 100 Spanish foot soldiers, and some Tlaxcaltecan warriors, Cortés surprises Aztec civilians creeping out of beleaguered Tenochtitlán in search of food, pitilessly massacring 800 of them.

The next day, he leads a drive along the streets of Tacuba that reaches as far as Cuauhtémoc's houses, which are torched. Three-quarters of the city are now controlled by the invaders, and communication between Cortés's and Alvarado's headquarters is unimpeded.

JULY 29, 1521. In conjunction with an assault by Cortés, Alvarado's contingent fights its way into the very center of Tlaltelolco, losing three horses but planting his new flag atop the city's twin towers in the face of increasingly feeble opposition. The next day, the Spaniards note the many unburied bodies and emaciated civilians in the remaining Aztec sectors so call on them to surrender. The defenders vow to fight to the last man.

Having exhausted their gunpowder, the Spaniards spend the next four days building a catapult to batter down the walls. It fails, so Cortés and Alvarado resume their direct assaults on August 3, fighting into another city section and slaying 12,000 more civilians. Cortés estimates that only an eighth of Tenochtitlán

Savage fighting left the once-proud Aztec capital in ruins, with most of its 200,000 people dead or gone. Rather than encamp amid the diseased vestiges of the city, the exhausted victors stayed at Coyoacán on the mainland. It was assumed that Tenochtitlán would be abandoned in favor of a new Spanish city, to be created elsewhere in the valley. But when Cristóbal de Tapia unexpectedly arrived at Veracruz that same December 1521, with royal instructions to replace Cortés as "Governor of New Spain," the city's status was revived. Cortés quickly convened an ayuntamiento or "municipal government" for Tenochtitlán, his own troops "electing" him as mayor, with the loyal Cristóbal de Olid as deputy mayor, Pedro de Alvarado as chief magistrate, and so on. This legal fiction allowed Cortés to appeal directly to the Crown as an independent titleholder against his proposed deposal.

It proved unnecessary, though, as de Tapia was easily mollified and dismissed. Yet when Cortés began preparing in late January 1522 to campaign into northeastern Mexico, he announced that his new capital would indeed be erected atop Tenochtitlán's ruins. He later explained to the emperor Charles V that he had "debated with himself as to whether to establish another town within the circuit of the lakes" before opting to rebuild atop the smashed Aztec infrastructure. An island stronghold would offer the outnumbered Spaniards a defensible position in case of insurrection, while the superimposition of their institutions atop Aztec hulks would embody the finality of conquest. Charles V approved, and by the end of that same year, Cortés had two officers start razing all damaged native structures—to be replaced with Spanish-style edifices and streets. The captive Cuauhtémoc's influence was used to conscript tens of thousands of laborers, who toiled throughout the ensuing year clearing away debris. The rubble was used to fill in some of the canals.

It was not until a water-fort was completed on the city's eastern shore late in 1523, to serve as a citadel and berth for the brigantines, that Cortés moved from his residence Coyoacán, early the next year. The first urban plots were distributed among his retainers. Fear of a potential uprising meant that the first Spanish mansions were fortified, two-story residences with massive walls, wooden doors, and tiny windows. Public works continued on such a Herculean scale that, when the Franciscan missionary Fr. Toribio de Motolinía arrived in June 1524, he recorded how the "songs and voices" of thousands of workers "scarcely ceased at night." Last, the native suburbs were cleared for repopulation so that by the time Cortés departed to visit Spain in October 1526, he could report that his resurrected capital held approximately 2,000 Spanish and more than 28,000 native residents. Five years of intensive labor had miraculously transformed the shattered Aztec capital.

now remains under Aztec control. The city is so desperate that some people even call on the Spaniards to finish them off quickly. Aztec warriors nonetheless continue to resist heroically, despite the disease, starvation, thirst, relentless military defeats, and Cortés's repeated offers of clemency over the next several days. Another major assault therefore occurs on August 12, during which many thousands of non-combatants are savagely massacred in their shelters.

AUGUST 13, 1521. Fall of Tenochtitlán. Determined to end the protracted siege, at dawn Cortés assaults the small northwestern enclave remaining under Cuauhtémoc's control. A throng of civilians attempts to escape by canoe, thousands drowning or being swamped by Sandoval's surviving brigantines. Any remaining Aztec warriors are slaughtered by Alvarado, Olid, and the Tlaxcaltecs.

In a last-minute bid to reach the north shore of the lake, the defeated emperor flees that afternoon aboard a canoe with 20 paddlers, only to be overtaken and captured by Garcí Holguín's brigantine. Brought before Cortés, the emperor's surrender marks an end to the capital's conquest, during which at least 100,000 people have perished. The ruins are pillaged over the next four days, and many captives are branded as slaves. Large sectors of the city are burned to prevent the spread of disease.

EXPANSION BEYOND MEXICO (1521–1540)

Cortés's conquest of the Aztec empire inspires a host of imitators. In addition to spreading out to secure outlying vassal states, many Spanish captains advance beyond Mexico's borders in quest of additional native kingdoms to subjugate. Despite his own wealth and prestige, Cortés is constrained to head new exploratory efforts on behalf of less fortunate adherents.

EARLY MARCH 1521. Ponce de León's Repulse.

While the conquest of Mexico is proceeding, Ponce de León departs Puerto Rico with a two-ship expedition bearing 50 horses and 200 men—including priests, farmers, and artisans—hoping to establish a permanent colony in Florida. He reaches Estero Island on its Gulf or western side and rests his followers ashore near modern Charlotte Harbor. They then advance inland through the dense coastal forest to search for fresh food and water and to confront the local king, Escampaba—dubbed cacique Carlos or “chief Charles” by the Spaniards—whose tribal seat is on Mound Key. The invaders cannot speak the dialect of the Calos (also known as the Caloos or Calusa), and in a sharp engagement against these ferocious nomads, Ponce de León is badly wounded in the thigh by a poisoned reed arrow, after which he and his men retreat back aboard ship.

Defeated, Ponce de León retires for Cuba, one of his ships becoming separated and sailing to join Cortés in Mexico (see “July 2, 1521” entry in “Conquest of Mexico”). Ponce de León meanwhile limps into the tiny hamlet of Havana, where he dies that June.

LATE 1521. Because of the drain of Spanish fighting men toward Mexico, numerous Cuban natives begin rebelling and running away from their masters, some seeking refuge in the Baracoa highlands under a chieftain named Guama. Eventually these uprisings are contained when 28-year-old Vasco Porcallo de Figueroa leads 18–20 horsemen in a sweep inland from the port of Trinidad toward Sancti Spíritus, terrifying its Indians into submission.

JANUARY 21, 1522. González Dávila's Exploration.

From the Pearl Islands (Panama), a four-ship expedition sets sail under Gil González Dávila and his pilot Andrés Niño. Their water casks being damaged in a storm, González Dávila is compelled to disembark with 100 men in the territory of Chief Burica (modern Burica Point), to campaign inland until he can rejoin Niño at San Vicente Gulf.

Leaving two ships here with gold treasure, González Dávila and Niño then press northwestward separately, being greeted hospitably by Chief Nicoya and Chief Nicoraguamia (or Nicorao). González Dávila discovers the Lake of Nicaragua in the latter's territory, and on April 17 beats off an attack by 3,000–4,000 warriors under Chief Diriangen; Niño meanwhile sails as far as the Gulf of Fonseca before rejoining his commander at San Vicente.

The expedition eventually regains Panama City on June 25, 1523, reporting to Gov. Pedrarias Dávila, who prepares a follow-up expedition under Capt. Francisco Hernández to lay claim to this new territory.

LATE JUNE 1523. Governor de Garay reaches Havana from Jamaica with 900 men aboard 11 ships, hoping to proceed farther west and conquer the Mexican province of Pánuco (see “August 8, 1519” entry in “Conquest of Mexico”). Learning that Cortés has already taken possession of this territory, de Garay agrees to defer his campaign.

DECEMBER 6, 1523. Alvarado in Guatemala. Cortés’s lieutenant Pedro de Alvarado leads an expedition out of Mexico City comprised of 130 mounted Spaniards, 300 Spanish infantrymen, and a host of native auxiliaries to conquer additional kingdoms to the south.

He reaches the Pacific port of Soconusco and early the next year enters what is today Guatemala, finding its local Quiché and Cakchiquel Mayan tribes locked in civil war. Temporarily allying himself with the latter, Alvarado defeats 10,000–12,000 Quichés near Zapotitlán on February 20, 1524—personally killing their chieftain Tecún Umán by running him through with a lance—then burns their defenseless capital of Xelajú (modern Quetzaltenango) on March 7, amid fearful slaughter by both the Spaniards and 2,000 of their Cakchiquel cohorts.

On April 12, the conquistadores reach the Cakchiquel capital of Iximché, remaining for five days before pressing on to destroy the latter’s nearby rivals—the Zutuhils—by April 18. In short order, Alvarado

Pedro de Alvarado

Notable among the conquistadores because of his blond hair and reddish face, this brave yet hot-tempered commander was nicknamed Tonatiuh or “The Sun” by the awestruck Aztecs. Born in the city of Badajoz in Spain’s province of Extremadura in 1485, Pedro de Alvarado sailed for Santo Domingo at the age of 25 with his younger brothers Gonzalo, Jorge, Gómez, and Hernando. They were followed by their illegitimate brother Juan, as well as several cousins, all seeking service with their uncle Diego de Alvarado, a knight of the Order of Santiago.

The Alvarados took part in the invasion of Cuba in 1511 and were granted lands by Gov. Diego Velázquez at its conclusion. But a half-dozen years of meager existence as a minor Antillean estate owner rekindled Pedro de Alvarado’s appetite for adventure. When Juan de Grijalva was sent in January 1518 to reconnoiter the Mexican mainland, Alvarado sailed in command of one of his three ships. And when Hernán Cortés ran away with the governor’s expedition at that same year’s end, the entire Alvarado clan joined the usurper at Trinidad off the southern Cuban coast. The size of his family contingent, plus his own loyalty to Cortés, meant that Pedro de Alvarado was promoted to captain by the time this expedition rounded Yucatán.

He played a very prominent role in the conquest of the Aztec empire. Courageous in action, he spearheaded most advances into enemy territory and was rewarded with marriage to the beautiful native princess Tecuīhuatzin (given the name Luisa at her baptism), daughter of the Spaniards’ principal ally, King Xicoténcatl of Tlaxcala. Yet Alvarado also committed many atrocities, the most infamous being his senseless massacre of Aztec dancers in Tenochtitlán on May 16, 1520, which almost undid Cortés’s campaign.

After the final collapse of Aztec resistance, Alvarado—like many others among the conquistador ranks—proved incapable of leaving the martial life, continuing to campaign rather than settle down to rich domesticity. Despite conquering his own personal fiefdom in Central America, being promoted to high office by the emperor Charles V in 1527, and marrying the Spanish noblewoman Francisca de la Cueva (his marriage to Luisa was not recognized by Spanish authorities), Alvarado remained restless. He ventured into South America a few years later, losing a great deal of his fortune.

After the death of his second wife, he married her sister, Beatriz de la Cueva, during a visit to Spain in 1539. Yet Alvarado was back in Mexico a year and a half later preparing to lead a naval expedition across the Pacific in search of the Spice Islands. Word then arrived of a major Indian uprising in the interior so, at 56 years of age, Alvarado marched a column inland. Twice repulsed while trying to fight his way up Yahualica Ravine to the top of Nochistlán Heights, he was crushed on July 1, 1541, when his scribe Baltasar de Montoya’s horse stumbled and rolled down the hillside over him. It is alleged that when asked where he was hurt, Alvarado moaned: “In my soul.” The badly mangled conquistador was carried back into Guadalajara, where he died in agony three days later. His body was buried at Tiripitío, but 40 years later it was conveyed by his mes-tiza daughter Leonor Alvarado Xicoténcatl for reburial in the Cathedral at Guatemala City.

also reduces the Cakchiquel to subservience, then razes Atacat on May 9 before progressing farther southeast and entering the territory of the Pipil Indians (modern El Salvador) by June, slaying their leader, Atlacatl the Elder. His successor, Atlacatl the Younger, fights on, at which point Alvarado's drive is halted by rumors of a possible Cakchiquel uprising behind him in Guatemala, obliging him to return by July 21.

After extorting a huge ransom from its terrified Cakchiquel inhabitants, Alvarado founds the city of Santiago de los Caballeros de Guatemala on July 25, 1524, upon the site of Iximché, petitioning Emperor Charles V to appoint him as governor over this vast new territory. On August 26, many of his remaining Cakchiquel vassals flee into the jungle, prompting the conquistadores to chase after them and fight a pitched battle on September 5, after which the natives melt into the jungle and launch a protracted guerrilla struggle.

Alvarado meanwhile resumes his Salvadoran campaign and defeats Atlacatl the Younger, so that by April 1, 1525, Alvarado's brother Gonzalo is also able to found the city of San Salvador upon the ruins of its Pipil capital of Cuzcatlán. (Soon after, however, this Salvadoran outpost falls under the jurisdiction of the ever-ambitious Pedrarias Dávila, governor of Panama, who is attempting to conquer Central America from the south.) On February 7, 1526, Alvarado destroys the hidden Cakchiquel capital of Xepau, compelling its survivors to seek sanctuary atop the mountain retreat of Holom Balam (literally, "Tiger Head") near Iximché.

One year later, Alvarado is formally granted the title of governor of Guatemala and his territory is declared to be an independent captaincy-general. He and his brother Jorge thereupon transfer their capital of Santiago into the Almolonga Valley, at the base of the Agua Volcano—a site today known as Ciudad Vieja. The following year, in 1528, his brother Jorge furthermore wrests El Salvador from the forces of Pedrarias Dávila, moving its capital of San Salvador into the Valley of La Bermuda.

MAY 3, 1524. After visiting Cuba and renewing his loyalty to Governor Velázquez, Cortés's former subordinate Cristóbal de Olid lands on the north coast of Hibueras (Honduras) with a colonizing expedition and founds the town of Triunfo de la Cruz. When Cortés learns of this defection, he dispatches two small counterforces under his cousin Francisco de las Casas and González Dávila, who are encountered separately and captured.

(Although their men are released, de las Casas and González Dávila are held prisoner in Olid's household at Naco. Eventually, they stab Olid one night in bed, and although he flees, de las Casas persuades the soldiery to overtake him the next day and slit his throat.)

OCTOBER 1524. Cortés leaves Mexico City with a large following of conquistadores to personally put down Olid's rebellion in Honduras. Behind him, he leaves the government in the hands of a triumvirate of officials—the treasurer Alonso de Estrada, the accountant Rodrigo de Albornoz, and the lawyer Alonso de Zuazo—and as an added precaution against Indian uprisings, takes the captive emperor, Cuauhtémoc, and other Aztec chieftains with him.

This expedition easily travels down to the mouth of the Coatzacoalcos River but thereafter penetrates trackless jungle, which greatly hampers its progress. Cortés spends many months forging into this wilderness, until it becomes widely believed in Mexico that he and his followers are lost forever. When he reaches Izancanac or Xicalanaco in February 1526, he orders Cuauhtémoc, the captive lord of Texcoco Cohuanacoxtzin, and the Franciscan friar Juan de Tecto hanged on February 20 as suspects in a plot. By the time the conquistadores finally emerge at Naco, they discover that Olid is already dead at the hands of Francisco de las Casas. Cortés therefore lends aid to the new settlers of Trujillo (on the north coast of Honduras), and even wishes to explore Nicaragua, but instead opts to return to Mexico upon learning of Gonzalo de Salazar and Peralmíndez Chirinos's revolt against its interim government.

LATE 1524. Francisco Cortés—cousin and deputy of the famous conquistador—leads an army northward from Colima (Mexico) for Ahuacatlán and Tepic, meeting some resistance at Tetitlán and elsewhere before returning via the coast.

MAY 4, 1526. After a difficult, year-long voyage from Spain via Santo Domingo and Santiago de Cuba, the governor designate Nuño Beltrán de Guzmán reaches San Esteban del Puerto (modern Pánuco, Mexico) and assumes office. To improve the prospects of its 45 impoverished households, he authorizes slave-catching raids into the interior.

MAY 24, 1526. After visiting Havana—where his former antagonist, Governor Velázquez, has died two years previously (early October 1524)—Cortés returns to Veracruz. News of his miraculous reemergence from the Central American jungles, where many feared him dead, ignites a popular uprising against the usurpers Salazar and Chirinos, and Cortés reenters Mexico City in triumph that June. He learns that during his prolonged absence his secretary has secured him a knighthood in the Order of Santiago, plus other privileges from Spain.

JUNE 1526. Two Spanish ships and a caravel bearing some 150–200 men under the 50-year-old Venetian-born explorer Sebastian Cabot (son of John Cabot; see “June 24, 1497” entry in “Initial Contacts”) appear off the eastern tip of Brazil, commissioned to round South America and “discover the Moluccas, Tarsis, Ophir, Cipango [Japan], and Cathay [China].” At Iguaruçú, they find a 12-man Portuguese outpost under Manuel Braga, who gives such glowing accounts of the continent's mineral wealth far inland that the navigator decides to switch objectives. Guided by the local pilot Jorge Gomes, he strikes southwestward on September 29, arriving opposite Santa Catarina Island by October 19. Three days later, he contacts Alejo García and two other survivors from Díaz de Solís's failed expedition (see “February 2, 1516” entry in “Mainland Explorations”).

Cabot thereupon decides to go ashore and set up an establishment to repair his vessels; however, this stopover becomes a protracted stay after his flagship Santa María de la Concepción runs aground and sinks while working into the bay on October 28. Having built a 20-oared galliot named the Santa Catarina from his flagship's remains, the explorer puts out to sea again on February 9, 1527, leaving behind the officers Francisco de Rojas, Martín Méndez, and Miguel de Rodas, whom he holds responsible for the loss.

JUNE 9, 1527. Having pushed up the Paraná River, Cabot establishes a base camp at the nearby confluence of the Carcarañá and Coronda rivers, which he christens Fort Sancti Spiritus in honor of the Pentecost Day. Leaving behind a 30-man garrison, he then probes as far upriver as the Apipé Rapids before reversing course in discouragement, returning into his fort to instead attempt the Paraguay River.

SEPTEMBER 1527. Pánfilo de Narváez enters Santiago de Cuba from Santo Domingo, accompanied by 460 men that he has brought from Spain aboard a half-dozen vessels to conquer Florida. Two of his caravels sail on ahead to the port of Casilda under Vasco Porcallo and Alvaro Núñez Cabeza de Vaca for supplies, while Narváez remains at anchor with the remainder off Cape Cruz (Manzanillo Bay). A hurricane sinks his first two vessels; 60 of 90 men and 30 horses are lost.

OCTOBER 31, 1527. Cortés's cousin Álvaro de Saavedra Cerón sets sail from the Mexican port of Zihuatanejo with 100 men aboard a ship and two caravels to cross the Pacific in the wake of Garci Jofre de Loaisa. On December 15, Saavedra loses contact with his two cohorts, sailing on alone with his flagship Florida. Although he eventually reaches the Caroline and Moluccas islands, he is unable to sail back across the Pacific, dying on his second attempt in May 1529. A handful of survivors fall into the hands of the Portuguese and are returned to Europe.

1528. A large Carib war party from the Leeward Islands assaults the Franciscan monastery at Espinal near Aguada (Puerto Rico), slaying five of its missionaries.

JANUARY 1528. More Indian uprisings are subdued on Cuba by Vasco Porcallo and Gonzalo de Guzmán.

FEBRUARY 23, 1528. Narváez departs Jagua (Cuba) with five ships to proceed with his intended conquest of Florida. Bad weather and the inexperience of his pilot Diego Miruelo leads this ill-fated expedition deep into the Gulf of Mexico, coming ashore at Espíritu Santo Bay (near modern Pensacola). Eventually only his lieutenant, Cabeza de Vaca, and three other men survive this ordeal, reaching Mexico City nine years later.

SPRING 1528. Cabot reaches the confluence of the Paraguay and Pilcomayo rivers, 1,000 miles from the Atlantic, his half-starved seamen being bountifully received by the local Guaraní residents. However, a brigantine venturing farther northward loses 15 men to the more hostile Chantul Indians—possibly at the site today named Emboscada or “Ambush”—so Cabot and his survivors decide to reverse course downriver.

DECEMBER 8, 1528. Nuño de Guzmán reaches Mexico City from Pánuco and assumes office as president of New Spain’s first audiencia or “tribunal.”

SEPTEMBER 1529. A massive Indian uprising obliges Cabot to abandon his establishment at Fort Sancti Spiritus, and after his 30-ton auxiliary caravel San Gabriel is wrecked on the Uruguayan coast—thereby leaving its name to San Gabriel Island, opposite modern Colonia del Sacramento—the discouraged explorer retraces his course homeward that same December, eventually regaining Seville by August 1530. In February, Cabot is condemned to four years’ banishment at Oran in Morocco for having failed to fulfill his original commission and abandoning some of his officers.

OCTOBER 18, 1529. Before dawn, a raiding party of approximately 240 Carib warriors aboard eight seagoing piraguas or “dugouts” steal into the roadstead at San Juan de Puerto Rico (population: 500), seizing a Spanish harbor boat and killing three of its black crew members before transferring their prisoners and sending it to the bottom. At first light, residents fire upon these intruders from ashore, obliging them to retreat. The next year, as a result of this incursion, San Juan’s inhabitants complete a stone stronghouse called the Casa Blanca.

DECEMBER 21, 1529. Nuño de Guzmán’s Campaign. Uneasy at the prospect of Cortés’s return from a lengthy stay in Spain, during which the Mexican audiencia has often acted against his local interests, its president, Nuño de Guzmán, decides to resign office and depart the capital via Jilotepec with an army of 150 riders, 350 infantrymen, 12 cannon, and 7,000–8,000 Indian auxiliaries to gain his own fortune by conquering Mexico’s northwestern highlands.

After crossing the Lerma River at Nuestra Señora de la Purificación Ford near Conguripo and entering the already-subject realm of Michoacán, Guzmán tortures its Tarascan king, Tangaxoan II—whom he has brought along from Mexico City as a hostage—for information on the hidden whereabouts of his supposed wealth, afterward having him burned alive on February 14, 1530. The Spanish commander then gathers a further 10,000 natives into his ranks as porters before venturing west into the territory of the hostile Chichimecs. (Despite exaggerated accounts of Guzmán's cruelty later circulated by his enemy Cortés, the former undoubtedly resorts to vicious acts throughout his expedition, apparently hoping to terrify his enemies into submission.)

MARCH 1530. Nuño de Guzmán's army crosses the Río Grande below Puruándiro into Jalisco (Mexico), marching downstream for three days before turning northwest for another three, then capturing Coima. The Spaniards and their allies subsequently make a devastating sweep through this district's communities of Coca-speaking Tecuexe farmers, defeating the chieftain of Cuitzeo in a one-sided battle near Ocotlán before throwing him to their war dogs.

After erecting a fortress at Jamay, Guzmán proceeds through Pancitlán, reaching Tonalá by March 25, then subjugating its queen along with numerous local subchieftains. The Spanish army then strikes north, repelling a native ambush at Tetlán before dividing at Teul in April. Guzmán's contingent marches southwest to recross the Río Grande and continue toward Ahuacatlán and Tepic; meanwhile, his subordinate Pedro Almíndes Chirinos (also known as "Peralmíndes") takes a more direct route north through Huichol territory into the Sierra Madre range, pressing toward Comanja and Zacatecas.

MAY 13, 1530. Nuño de Guzmán reaches Tepic (Nayarit) to find Chirinos already awaiting him outside. The Spanish commander combines forces and attacks the town, then detaches Cristóbal de Oñate's company to explore inland toward Huejotitlán, Teocaltiche, Aguascalientes, and Nochistlán, while leading his own main body down toward the coast for a respite.

JUNE 5, 1530. Nuño de Guzmán's army, now refreshed, departs Tepic toward Huaristamba. Two days later, a Sunday, it traverses the Santiago River near Ixcuintla and captures Sentispac. Penetrating deeper into hostile territory, the Spaniards are set upon by 2,000 warriors near Cilán, defeating them after two hours' hard fighting. The invaders then cut a bloody swathe of destruction throughout the region, allegedly torching 800 villages before gaining Aztatlán and settling in there to wait out the rainy season.

Many of Guzmán's men subsequently die of illness or hunger in this pestilential backwater, but their commander is able to write to the king in Madrid about his successful campaign, claiming the conquered territory as "New Castile." The Crown responds by the end of that same year, appointing Guzmán as governor over these new lands (which are to instead be called Nueva Galicia or New Galicia).

OCTOBER 1530. A Carib force of 500 disembarks from 11 large war canoes on the eastern shores of Puerto Rico, marching inland to devastate the Luquillo mines before withdrawing. The Spanish Crown responds to this and similar seaborne aggressions by ordering the construction of a small keep on Puerto Rico's coast to prevent future landings, as well as by dispatching two dismantled brigantines from Seville in 1533 under Capt. Juan de Júcar to conduct reprisal raids against the Caribs on Dominica and adjacent islands.

LATE MAY 1532. Two ships ordered built by Cortés depart northwestward from Acapulco to explore the Pacific coastline: the San Marcos under Capt. Diego Hurtado de Mendoza and the San Miguel under Capt. Juan de Mazuela. Only the latter returns, with scant intelligence.

OCTOBER 30, 1533. Capt. Diego Becerra departs "Port Santiago" in Mexico's Manzanillo Bay to explore the Pacific coast with Cortés's ship Concepción, plus the San Lázaro under Hernando de Grijalva. A month later in the Baja California bay today known as La Paz, 22 of Becerra's crew members mutiny, led by the pilot Fortún Jiménez. Becerra is killed, and his adherents are marooned on the Motines coast. The mutineers sail on December 9 for the rival jurisdiction of Nueva Galicia, with some pearls.

Grijalva meanwhile separately explores the islands later known as Revillagigedo and carries a discouraging report to Cortés.

NOVEMBER 1534. A slave uprising occurs at the Jobabo goldfields near Bayamo (Cuba), being promptly put down by a mounted company under Gov. Manuel de Rojas.

LATE APRIL 1535. Cortés in Baja California. The conquistador leads three ships from Nueva Galicia across the Gulf of California, landing in Santa Cruz Bay (modern Pichilingue) by May 3. So many volunteers have flocked to his standard that Cortés's trio of vessels must make several trips to ferry them all across.

Within a month, 300 Spaniards and many black slaves are encamped ashore, believing Baja California to be an island. It soon proves so harsh and inhospitable, though, that 70 Spaniards and 50 horses have succumbed to starvation by November, plus native skirmishers.

Early in 1536, Cortés returns to the Mexican mainland, leaving Francisco de Ulloa in charge of the 30 or so Spaniards who choose to remain at Santa Cruz. Although intending to reinforce this outpost, Cortés is subsequently ordered to evacuate Baja California by the new Crown-appointed Mexican viceroy, Antonio de Mendoza.

JUNE 7, 1538. Hernando de Soto, a veteran of Pizarro's campaign in Peru (see "January 31, 1531" entry et seq. in "Conquest of Peru") and now a knight of the Order of Santiago, arrives at eastern Cuba from Spain to assume office as the island's new governor, further accompanied by an expedition intended to conquer a fiefdom in nearby Florida. He and his family are traveling aboard the 800-ton flagship San Cristóbal of Capt. Nuño de Tovar, leading the similar-sized Buena Fortuna of Luis Moscoso de Alvarado and the Magdalena of Andrés de Vasconcelos, the slightly smaller Concepción of Arias Tinoco and the San Antón of Alonso Romo de Cardenosa, the 500-ton San Juan of Diego García, the caravel Santa Bárbara of Pedro Calderón, and two brigantines. The whole fleet bears 950 men.

De Soto is installed into office the next day, quickly appointing Bartolomé Ortíz as his deputy to administer Santiago de Cuba, thus freeing himself to concentrate upon his broader duties and forthcoming Florida venture. Word arrives of a French raid against Havana (see "May 1538" entry in "Franco-Spanish Wars"), necessitating the immediate detachment of a relief force under military engineer Mateo Aceituno. Tovar is also deposed as second-in-command of de Soto's expedition in favor of Vasco Porcallo. The ships then set sail for Havana at the end of August, while de Soto departs Santiago de Cuba on September 15 to travel overland with 50 riders under Porcallo, inspecting the island before rejoining his fleet at Havana one month later.

EARLY SEPTEMBER 1538. De Soto's pilot, Juan de Añasco, quits Havana aboard a brigantine to reconnoiter the Florida coastline. He returns two months later having failed to obtain reliable information because of bad weather, so he is sent out again in mid-November with a pair of brigantines. This second exploration lasts three months but is more successful; Añasco returns into Havana with four Florida Indians plus a detailed map of Espíritu Santo Bay (near Tampa).

MAY 19, 1539. De Soto in Florida. Cuba's governor finally departs Havana with five ships, two caravels, and two brigantines bearing 513 soldiers and 337 horses to launch his long-delayed Florida campaign. Six days later, they drop anchor in Tampa Bay and go ashore by May 30, enduring their first skirmish against local warriors on June 1, in which two horses are killed and several others wounded. A few days later, a band of friendly Indians is encountered, among whom is a Spanish survivor from Narváez's earlier expedition (see "February 23, 1528" entry) called Juan Ortiz, who has lived as a native for the past decade.

Through Ortiz, de Soto is able to arrive at an accommodation with the regional chieftain Mucozo, then penetrates farther north in search of wealthier and more advanced tribes than these coastal nomads. However, he encounters no major civilizations, and his expedition is steadily eroded by hostile ambushes. Near the Suwannee River, a band of 400 warriors is defeated when they attempt to rescue their captive chieftain, after which the Spaniards winter near modern Tallahassee, being joined from Tampa by their ships. A brigantine explores the Gulf coast westward, returning in February 1540 to report about an excellent harbor at Pensacola. It is agreed to send the ships back to Cuba for supplies and to rendezvous at Pensacola in the autumn.

De Soto's army resumes its northward progression on March 3, 1540, soon suffering greatly from hunger, thirst, and disease. By early October, they have veered far enough inland to enter Choctaw territory (south-central Alabama), where they treacherously seize the local chieftain Tuscaloosa—the Black Warrior. The chief guides them into a trap at Mobila (near the confluence of the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers), where an over-confident de Soto enters the village with only 15 riders while his troops forage outside. Hidden Choctaw warriors stream out of the huts, almost overpowering the Spanish leader, and kill five of his companions. Captive Indians, who are carrying powder and supplies into Mobila's palisades, simultaneously rise up in rebellion. A savage fight erupts, which ends with the Choctaw garrison massacred and Mobila consumed by flames. The Spaniards nevertheless suffer 22 dead, 148 wounded, and the loss of most of their matériel.

Although his relief fleet is waiting at Pensacola, de Soto suppresses this news and marches farther northwest in hopes of reversing his fortunes. After entering Chickasaw territory, the Spanish camp is infiltrated during the night of March 3, 1541, by several hundred warriors bearing firebrands concealed within earthenware pots, which are used to set the encampment ablaze. The Spaniards suffer a dozen deaths and the loss of 50–60 of their horses through stampede before repelling the enemy. Now in desperate straits, they reach the banks of the Mississippi by Sunday, May 8, building barges near present-day Sunflower Landing for a month, while hostile native flotillas patrol offshore.

Slipping across, de Soto next forms an alliance with the Casqui tribe and attacks their enemy the Quapaws on June 26. After wintering near the confluence of the Canadian and Arkansas rivers, he and his surviving 300 men and 40 horses head south toward the Gulf of Mexico, but de Soto dies of exhaustion and a fever en route. Luis Moscoso de Alvarado succeeds him but fails to march the army out; instead, it winters on the banks of the Mississippi and turns to building boats. Finally, on July 2, 1543, the men set sail, 322 Spaniards, 100 Indian slaves, and 22 horses aboard seven pinnaces and a host of dugouts. Natives harass their passage, compelling Moscoso to abandon all his horses by the time they reach the Gulf on July 16. Eventually, 311 survivors reach safety at the Spanish settlements on the Pánuco River on September 10.

JULY 1539. Francisco de Ulloa departs Acapulco and reaches the abandoned site of Santa Cruz (Baja California) with two ships by early September. He then crosses to Sonora and follows its coast to the Gulf of California's head before starting down its western shore in late September. By October 13, he reaches Bahía de la Concepción and, five days later, reenters Santa Cruz, where he remains for 11 days, making several incursions inland. The expedition rounds Cabo San Lucas with some difficulty in November, after which both ships run up the Pacific to Almejas where a landing party clashes with Guaycura warriors. December 4–17 is spent exploring Magdalena Bay, after which they follow the coast farther north. Early in January 1540, the expedition reaches Cedros Island, where one ship remains for three months while de Ulloa continues to Punta Baja. Both return to Mexico later this spring.

FEBRUARY 1540. Coronado Expedition. The newly appointed governor for the northern Mexican province of Nueva Galicia—40-year-old Francisco Vázquez de Coronado—departs Compostela with 250 cavalymen, 70 Spanish infantrymen, several hundred Indian auxiliaries, plus baggage animals and cattle. His objective is to find the legendary “Seven Cities of Cibola,” reputedly rich in gold, but these prove to be a chimera. After reaching the Zuñi pueblos of New Mexico by July, Coronado presses on through northeastern Arizona and the Grand Canyon before eventually wintering on the Río Grande (Tuguez), where he is re-inspired by Indian tales of another rich city farther to the northeast called “Quivira.”

Coronado strikes out across the Texas plains in April 1541, venturing ahead of his army with about 30 riders as far as central Kansas before finally rejoining his main body on the Río Grande in October. By spring 1542, he is compelled to admit defeat, leading the tattered remnants of his expedition back into Mexico.

CONQUEST OF PERU (1524–1539)

While most Spaniards remain engrossed in the subjugation of Mexico and Central America, another explorer named Pascual de Andagoya sails off in the opposite direction—southeastward from Panama City—in quest of another tribe of legendary wealth known as the “Birú” or “Virú.” Traveling some 200 miles down modern Colombia's Pacific shoreline, he ascends the San Juan River, yet fails to find signs of anything other than primitive coastal peoples.

After his return into Panama City, Andagoya's ships and plans are taken over by a trio of investors who create their own company: Francisco Pizarro, his lieutenant Diego de Almagro, and the local priest and schoolteacher Hernando de Luque (the latter acting on behalf of the recently installed local judge, the licentiate Gaspar de Espinosa).

NOVEMBER 14, 1524. Probes. The veteran captain Francisco Pizarro quits Panama City with a 47-ton ship and two large seagoing canoes, bearing 110 men and 40 horses, to explore southeastward down the Pacific coastline. He is to be followed shortly thereafter by his lieutenant Diego de Almagro, with a slightly smaller force.

After touching at Taboga and the Pearl Islands, Pizarro's expedition ascends the Birú River, then reverses course, frustrated at finding the village of Biruquete abandoned by its hostile natives. The Spaniards next endure considerable deprivations while encamped on the ocean shore before eventually being resupplied from the Pearl Islands by Captain Montenegro.

Venturing still farther south, they reach Candelaria by April 14, 1525, then continue into Puerto Quemado to occupy its empty native village and careen their vessel. While doing so, Montenegro ventures inland with 60 men, only to be suddenly ambushed by a large body of Quilian warriors, suffering several losses. Before he can rejoin Pizarro's base camp, it too is assaulted by a native army, which is repelled. Nevertheless, the Spaniards suffer 17 killed and almost 60 injured during these two actions; among the latter is Pizarro (who is wounded seven times, his injuries being cauterized with boiling oil). The expedition therefore limps back into Chochama in the Pearl Islands to recuperate.

Almagro, meanwhile, misses Pizarro while sailing south with his own 70 men and endures a hostile reception from the Quilians at Puerto Quemado as well, during which he loses an eye. Undaunted, he and his men eventually press as far south as the mouth of the San Juan River (at a latitude of 4°10' N) before finally turning back and overtaking the convalescent Pizarro at Chochama. Almagro then reports to Gov. Pedrarias Dávila at Panama City, who although distracted by Hernández's recent revolt in Nicaragua, nonetheless sends Almagro back to the Pearl Islands with 110 men and a commission as co-captain for future ventures against "Pirú" (a corruption of the name "Birú").

SPRING 1526. First Contact. Having assembled another 170-man expedition at the Pearl Islands,

Francisco Pizarro

Francisco Pizarro González was born in the city of Trujillo, in the Spanish province of Extremadura, probably on March 16, 1478. (Some chroniclers, though, give the year of his birth as 1476, 1475, 1472, or even 1471.) He would be the first of four sons eventually born to Ens. Gonzalo Pizarro Rodríguez de Aguilar, the first two being illegitimate with Francisca González Mateos, the maid of the ensign's aunt.

Young Francisco was raised in poverty by his mother's family. He never learned to read or write. Legend has it that he worked as a swineherd, then fled around 1492 or 1493 after losing some of his animals. He joined his father, fighting from 1495 in the first campaign of the great Gonzalo Fernández de Córdoba, who soon become famous as the Gran Capitán. The teenaged Pizarro is believed to have served as a foot soldier in Sicily and southern Italy until 1498, when Córdoba's expedition returned triumphantly to Spain. Yet details of Pizarro's early life remain very sketchy.

On February 13, 1502, Pizarro sailed from Seville as leader of the six-man personal bodyguard of Nicolás de Ovando, the new governor for Santo Domingo. The priest Bartolomé de las Casas, who was also aboard, later described the 24-year-old Pizarro as taciturn, "little given to drink," yet a reckless gambler. Over the next dozen years, Pizarro campaigned as a conquistador in the New World. He first gained distinction as a lieutenant in Vasco Núñez de Balboa's expedition, helping to discover the Pacific Ocean in September 1513.

Yet three-and-a-half years later, Pizarro betrayed his former commander by obeying Pedrarias Dávila's order to arrest Núñez de Balboa for execution. Pizarro was rewarded, once Panama City was founded in August 1519, by the grant of its offshore island of Taboga. After two decades of harsh jungle fighting, he achieved some modest financial security. He even served as alcalde or "mayor" of Panama City from 1522–1523.

Yet the ambitious Pizarro was not ready to settle down. At the age of 45, he entered into a partnership with two Panamanian colleagues to explore and conquer Peru. He would lead this enterprise with great determination and no little greed. Although Pizarro would win a fortune and be ennobled in 1535 as the Marqués de las Charcas y de los Atabillos, the bitterness of his foes would result in his murder.

Pizarro and Almagro strike out on a second reconnaissance aboard two ships and three piraguas. They spend the next several months exploring the coast between the Cartagena and San Juan rivers, often confronted by hostile natives, yet also noticing impressive signs of wealth and civilization. When almost exhausted, Pizarro's expedition decides to remain off this coast, while sending the pilot Bartolomé Ruiz farther south to reconnoiter and Almagro back toward Panama for reinforcements.

Ruiz's 70-day voyage provides the first actual contact with the northernmost fringes of the Inca empire; he sights Gallo and Gorgona islands, San Mateo Bay, Atacames, and San Lucas by October 18, followed by Cape San Antonio on December 3. Off Coaque, a native vessel is captured with two youths and three women passengers, after which Ruiz sails as far south as Capes Pasado and San Francisco before finally turning back.

Francisco Pizarro. (Museo de America, Madrid, Spain)

Upon rejoining Pizarro, he finds the Spaniards worried by their continual losses—especially 14 companions recently slaughtered while venturing upriver in a canoe—yet still willing to persevere upon receipt of his news. Almagro has meanwhile reached Panama by September 1526, only to discover that Pedrarias Dávila has been replaced as governor by Pedro de los Ríos. After meeting this new official on December 14, Almagro sets sail again on January 8, 1527, with 40 additional soldiers to rejoin Pizarro.

Once reassembled, this expedition shifts farther southward to establish itself ashore, visiting Gallo Island before disembarking at the town of Terapulla (renamed Santiago) in San Mateo Bay. Shortly thereafter, the Spaniards are beset by a large Indian army and are compelled to seek sanctuary on Gallo Island. Almagro departs from here in June 1527 for more Panamanian help, leaving Pizarro with only 85 followers. But upon reaching the Isthmus in July, Almagro is detained by Governor de los Ríos, and the same happens when the pilot Ruiz returns into Panama on August 28. Instead, the governor sends his subordinate Pero Tafur on September 14 to recall Pizarro, who refuses to leave Gallo Island. Only 13 of his followers remain with him, soon transferring to Gorgona Island where they are eventually joined by Ruiz with a small ship in March 1528.

Still determined, Pizarro sails as far south as Tumbes with his few Inca captives, releasing them among their compatriots, thereby being well received. He next sails to Paita, Coaque, and Manta without incident, leaving a few volunteers behind when he reverses course toward Gorgona; he returns into Panama by the end of 1528. From here, Pizarro crosses the Isthmus and heads toward Spain to secure royal backing for his projected invasion of Peru.

JULY 26, 1529. Having successfully petitioned Emperor Charles V, Pizarro signs his mark to a charter at Toledo with the Crown, later known as the Capitulaciones de Toledo. It specifies the terms under which he is to explore and conquer any new territories extending 600 miles south of the Santiago River (the modern boundary between Colombia and Ecuador). He also receives a knighthood in the Order of Santiago and will be allowed to rule as “adelantado, governor, and Captain-General.”

JANUARY 18, 1530. Francisco Pizarro sets sail from Spain aboard a trio of ships to return to Panama with his Crown license to conquer Peru, plus 250–300 fresh recruits—a third of whom will die from disease shortly after disembarking. The 52-year-old veteran is furthermore accompanied by his much younger brother and three half brothers: 28-year-old Gonzalo, 22-year-old Hernando, 19-year-old Juan, and Francisco Martín de Alcántara. The rest of this year will be spent preparing for the forthcoming campaign.

JANUARY 31, 1531. Beachhead. Pizarro sets sail from Panama City with 180 men aboard three ships, touching at the Pearl Islands to gather another waiting contingent before proceeding south toward San Mateo Bay. Here the cavalry are disembarked to advance overland, while the ships follow along the coast. When the Spaniards reach Coaque in April, its residents abandon it in fear. Pizarro establishes a base ashore, while dispatching three ships under Bartolomé de Aguilar toward Panama and Nicaragua for more volunteers, bearing gold and precious stones as proof of this new land's wealth.

The first of these reinforcements—30 men from Nicaragua under Sebastián de Velalcázar—do not arrive until September, just as Pizarro is preparing to march still farther south. His progress among the coastal tribes is mostly peaceable, and by October his expedition reaches Portoviejo, where it is refreshed and reinforced by another ship. Upon reaching Puná Island, the Spaniards suspect treachery and so arrest Chief Tumbalá and 17 of his lieutenants, handing them over to their mortal enemies—the Indians of Tumbes—for execution. A brief uprising occurs on the island but is quickly put down by Pizarro.

In March 1532, Hernando de Soto arrives from Nicaragua with more men, and the expedition begins rafting across to Tumbes. Now it is the Spaniards' turn to be betrayed, as the waiting natives quietly slaughter the first boat parties while beckoning others to come ashore. Hernando Pizarro, having disembarked farther south with the cavalry, approaches from the rear and is able to scatter the startled warriors, then occupy their abandoned city. Chief Cacalami is promptly obliged to sue for peace, after which Pizarro installs a 50-man garrison and, on May 16, marches inland, eventually reaching Tangara (renamed San Miguel de Piura) in mid-September. En route he learns that the Inca emperor Huayna Capac has died a few years earlier along with his heir-apparent Ninan Cuyuchi, so Peru is now rent by civil war between two rival successors, Huáscar and Atahualpa.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1532. Opening Campaign. Pizarro marches out of San Miguel at the head of 62 horsemen and 106 soldiers, having left another 60 Spaniards to maintain this outpost. By November 6, he reaches Saña. Two days later, he strikes up into the Andes after being greeted by an embassy from Atahualpa (who has recently defeated and imprisoned Huáscar).

After passing numerous Inca strongholds, the Spaniards come within sight of Cajamarca on November 15, outside which the emperor is encamped with a large army. The next evening, when Atahualpa visits Pizarro's lodgments within the town, the Inca leader is treacherously seized, and several thousand of his courtiers and servants are massacred in a two-hour bloodbath. The stunned Inca army does nothing, and the next day it disperses upon Pizarro's and Atahualpa's commands.

Noting the avarice with which the Spanish fall upon his treasure, the captive emperor offers to fill a room with gold items as ransom for his release.

Pizarro accepts and, while waiting for this booty to be gathered, uses Atahualpa's authority to keep Peru calm. The rival emperor Huáscar is also brought as a prisoner from Cuzco, but he is murdered by his Inca guards at Andamarca—just short of Cajamarca—allegedly at Atahualpa's order.

JANUARY 5, 1533. Growing restive at Cajamarca, Pizarro sends his brother Hernando with 20 riders and some foot soldiers to investigate rumors of an Inca army massing at Huamachuco. These rumors prove groundless, but the Spaniards avail themselves of this opportunity to travel on for another three weeks toward the great temple of Pachacamac on the coastal desert (south of modern Lima). Finding its gilt decorations removed, Hernando Pizarro remains there throughout most of February, searching in vain for this treasure.

FEBRUARY 15, 1533. Another contingent of three Spaniards departs Cajamarca for Cuzco with Inca envoys to speed the gathering of Atahualpa's ransom.

EARLY MARCH 1533. Hernando Pizarro quits Pachacamac to rejoin the main body, meeting peacefully with the Inca general Chalcuchima amid his 35,000-strong army at Jauja on March 17. The Spaniard convinces Chalcuchima to accompany him with a small retinue on this journey, thus depriving the Incas of one of their mightiest leaders.

APRIL 14, 1533. Diego de Almagro arrives at Cajamarca from the coast with 150 fresh Spanish troops and 50 horses. Atahualpa realizes that this portends a full-scale Spanish invasion, so fears for his fate.

APRIL 25, 1533. Hernando Pizarro returns into Cajamarca with Chalcuchima, who is henceforth treated as a captive and tortured to reveal the whereabouts of treasure.

JUNE 12, 1533. Hernando Pizarro departs Cajamarca for the coast, taking 100,000 castellanos and a report for the king of Spain.

JULY 16, 1533. Pizarro makes a massive distribution of booty to his followers in Cajamarca.

JULY 26, 1533. Atahualpa's Murder. Although having fulfilled his ransom pledge, the captive emperor is led into Cajamarca's square this Saturday evening, garroted, then burned at the stake because of the unfounded fear that his general, Rumiñahui, is approaching with a vast army.

Pizarro and Almagro invest Huáscar's younger brother Tupac Huallpa (whom they also hold prisoner) as the new emperor in early August. They march southward out of Cajamarca on August 11 toward the distant Inca capital of Cuzco. By mid-September, they are in Recuay, where they rest for 12 days before resuming their progress.

OCTOBER 11, 1533. Having entered the part of Peru occupied by its Quito faction, Pizarro's expedition encounters increasing signs of hostility. He, Almagro, and de Soto therefore gallop ahead of their main body with 75 riders and 20 foot soldiers to guard the chained general Chalcuchima.

At Jauja, on October 11, they are greeted as liberators by its oppressed inhabitants, while Chalcuchima's former Quitan army—now commanded by Yucra Hualpa—withdraws to the far bank of the Mantaro River in battle array. When a column of warriors is sent back to set fire to the large storehouses within Jauja, Pizarro's cavalry attacks, scattering them with great slaughter. The Quitan army thereupon retreats farther south to join Quisquis's forces near Cuzco, being harried for almost 16 miles by the Spanish riders, who kill many and demoralize the rest. Pizarro's main body enters Jauja on October 19 under Capt. Alonso Riquelme, and, soon after, the puppet emperor Tupac Huallpa dies of natural causes.

OCTOBER 24, 1533. In anticipation of resuming his march from Jauja toward Cuzco, Pizarro sends de Soto on ahead with 70 riders to capture some vital bridges along its royal highway.

OCTOBER 27, 1533. After installing an 80-man garrison in Jauja under Riquelme, Pizarro departs at the head of 30 riders, 30 foot soldiers, some native auxiliaries, and the captive general Chalcuchima to overtake de Soto.

OCTOBER 29, 1533. At dawn, de Soto's flying column surprises Yucra Hualpa's retreating army at Vilcas, while most of its men are absent hunting or gathering. This evening, the Quitans launch a furious counterattack to free their women and children, pressing the Spaniards so hard that a white horse mounted by Alonso Tabuyo is killed and another two mounts are injured.

Next morning, the Incas resume their assault, this time led by banners made from the mane and tail of the slain horse. Despite killing some 600 attackers, de Soto is eventually obliged to release his captives in order to withdraw back into the town and wait for his enemy to retire with their loved ones.

NOVEMBER 8, 1533. Ambush at Vilcaconga. Not wishing to wait for Pizarro before entering Cuzco, de Soto strikes on alone with only 40 riders. While ascending a steep hill toward Vilcaconga on this Saturday noon, the Spaniards—dismounted, dispersed, and leading their mounts—are suddenly surprised by 3,000–4,000 of Quisquis's warriors attacking from above. The cavalymen scatter to avoid an opening barrage of stones, then struggle to ride up toward the hilltop through a hail of missiles. Five Spaniards are killed and 11 wounded during this fray, along with 14 horses. There are 20 Inca fatalities.

De Soto therefore retreats and spends an uneasy night encamped nearby; however, he is reinforced before dawn by another 40 riders under Almagro, and they push forward again, while the Incas fall back.

NOVEMBER 13, 1533. Pizarro overtakes Almagro and de Soto at Vilcaconga and, while marching on toward Jaquijahuana, is met by the 19-year-old fugitive Inca prince Manco, son of Huayna Capac and bitter foe to both Atahualpa and Chalcuchima. At Manco's instigation, the captive general is burned alive in Jaquijahuana's square that evening for having sent secret messages to Quisquis advising him where and how to attack the Spaniards.

NOVEMBER 14, 1533. In an effort to reach Cuzco before Quisquis's Quitoan occupiers can set it ablaze, a flying column of 40 Spanish riders surges on ahead, only to be repelled in a clash at a pass outside that city during which three horses are slain.

NOVEMBER 15, 1533. Pizarro and Manco enter Cuzco together (without opposition, as Quisquis's army has retired), and the next day the Inca prince-ling is proclaimed as Emperor Manco Inca Yupanqui. Some 5,000 Cuzcan auxiliaries are quickly raised and set off with 50 riders under de Soto to pursue the retreating enemy into the Condesuyo Mountains. Thanks to this rugged terrain, Quisquis is able to gain safety—though his rear guard is severely mauled—across the Apurímac Gorge by burning the suspension bridge near Capi after crossing. De Soto and his allies are unable to fight their way across, so they return into Cuzco by the end of December, where the Spaniards are busily gathering booty.

JANUARY 23, 1534. In Guatemala, the conquistador Pedro de Alvarado—having learned of the rich new kingdom being subdued farther southeast by Pizarro—sets sail from the port of Poseción with 100 crossbowmen, 400 soldiers, 119 horses, and 4,000 native auxiliaries aboard a dozen commandeered ships to take part in this latest venture.

LATE JANUARY 1534. Being informed that Quisquis's army is retreating north toward Jauja, Pizarro sends Almagro and de Soto with 50 riders and 20,000 Cuzcan allies to reinforce its 80-man Spanish garrison under Riquelme.

FEBRUARY 1534. Jauja. Before any Spanish reinforcements can arrive from Cuzco (although a small contingent does come up from the coast under Capt. Gabriel de Rojas), this town is attacked by Quisquis in a bungled pincer operation. Approximately 1,000 warriors are to circle through Jauja's hills, slip across the Mantaro River, and occupy the rocky heights behind, launching a coordinated surprise attack when Quisquis's 6,000-strong main body marches up the valley. Instead, the Quitans are discovered while still traversing a bridge 50 miles downstream from Jauja; then their 1,000-man contingent arrives and attacks a day too early. Riquelme easily repels this initial assault across the bridge with 10 riders and some crossbowmen.

The next afternoon, Quisquis appears and camps a mile outside Jauja. Riquelme boldly attacks his army with 18 horsemen, a dozen Spanish foot soldiers, and 2,000 local allies. The Quitans retreat across a swollen stream and pelt the Spaniards with rocks and arrows as they attempt to follow; one Spaniard, three horses, and numerous native auxiliaries are killed before the Spaniards can come to grips with the Quitans and defeat them, inflicting heavy losses. Pursued into the hills, Quisquis is unable to rally his men until Tarma is reached, after which he retires into a mountain stronghold near Bombón on Lake Junín.

FEBRUARY 25, 1534. Rival Spanish Expedition.

Alvarado comes ashore at Portoviejo (Ecuador) with his large contingent, mistreating the coastal tribesmen before striking inland toward modern Guayaquil. News of this challenger's arrival prompts Pizarro's lieutenant Sebastián de Velalcázar to set out from San Miguel de Piura in early March with 200 Spanish soldiers and 62 horses to conquer Quito—the last active center of Inca resistance—before this intruder can intervene.

APRIL 1534. Pizarro and Manco reach Jauja and begin assembling an army to drive Quisquis out of his entrenched positions farther north.

APRIL 7, 1534. Almagro reaches Saña with a small contingent from Vilcas, alarmed at hearing of Alvarado's appearance. He attempts to overtake and assume command of Velalcázar's contingent but is driven back by native opposition along the Quito road.

LATE APRIL 1534. Velalcázar's column is approached, while resting near Zoro Palta (possibly Paquishapa in southern Ecuador), by the Inca general Chiaquintinta. As the Spanish commander is scouting in advance of his troops with 30 riders, he is able to panic and scatter these Quitan warriors, who have never before seen horses.

MAY 3, 1534. Teocajas. After being reinforced at Tumibamba by the Cañari and other subject tribes who hate the Incas, Velalcázar's army pushes north into the Andes, emerging into a highland valley. While approaching Teocajas, a vanguard of 10 Spanish horsemen under Capt. Rui Díaz encounters the main Quitan army drawn up in battle array under General Rumiñahui. One rider returns to advise Velalcázar's army, as the other nine skirmish against masses of enraged Quitan warriors, until the Spaniards are reinforced by another 40 cavalymen. Yet despite wreaking fearful destruction among the natives' ranks, this Spanish company is unable to make the Incas retreat, suffering four conquistadores and a like number of mounts killed before finally retiring for the night. It is not until the next morning that the Spaniards at last break the Quitans' desperate resistance and compel this host to withdraw.

MAY 8, 1534. A few weeks after regaining San Miguel de Piura for a second time, Almagro writes to Charles V, complaining of Alvarado's incursion and reaffirming his loyalty to Velalcázar.

MID-MAY 1534. De Soto and Gonzalo Pizarro march northward out of Jauja with 50 Spanish horsemen and 30 foot soldiers, accompanied by 4,000 Cuzcan warriors under Manco plus numerous local levies. By the time they come into contact with Quisquis's army, it is once more retiring toward Quito. The Spaniards and their allies pursue this enemy as far north as Huánuco, fighting a series of sharp engagements, before returning triumphantly into Jauja by early June.

MAY 21, 1534. Emperor Charles V issues a royal decree subdividing South America among its various conquistadores, although some territorial disputes still remain.

JUNE 22, 1534. After detouring down into the lowlands and reascending the Andes around Lake Colta and Lake Riobamba, Almagro and Velalcázar's army succeeds in fighting its way into Quito, which lies deserted after being evacuated and burned by Rumiñahui five days previously. Capt. Rui Díaz is quickly sent with 60 riders to pursue the Inca general into Yumbo Province, but the latter eludes him.

Rumiñahui thereupon adds the forces of the Latacunga chieftain Tucomango, Quingalumba of the Chillos, and Governor Zope Zopahua of northern Ambato to his own, so as to launch a surprise counterattack against the Spanish occupation force at Quito. This descent is made stealthily at night by 15,000 warriors; nonetheless, the defenders are alerted and man their ramparts. The attack ignites numerous buildings, and vicious hand-to-hand fighting ensues by the light of these blazes. Dawn, however, permits the deployment of Velalcázar's cavalry, which smashes the Inca army and captures its camp. Significantly, seven local chieftains come in next day to submit to the conquistadores.

JULY 1534. Velalcázar marches north from Quito toward Cayambe and Otavalo, vainly searching for the Incas' vanished treasure and venting his fury by massacring the women and children of Quinche. Eventually, Almagro and Velalcázar abandon Quito, encountering further opposition in the Chillo Valley and on the right bank of the Pinta River. On either the Liribamba or Chambo rivers, the Spaniards find a small Inca army drawn up for battle on the far side, which they attack despite losing 80 Cañari allies, who drown in this torrent. Twelve horses succeed in swimming across, though, dispersing these enemies.

From prisoners, Almagro and Velalcázar learn of the proximity of Alvarado's expedition, which has suffered terribly, losing 85 members and almost all its horses during a harsh passage over the Andes.

AUGUST 1534. Alvarado's larger but emaciated army captures eight scouts that were sent on ahead by Almagro and Velalcázar, and soon both expeditions warily confront each other, sleeping on their weapons for fear of a sudden attack. Eventually, a deal is struck on August 26 by both leaders, whereby Almagro agrees to buy Alvarado's ships and equipment for 100,000 pesos, and the latter is to return toward Guatemala, leaving his men behind in Peru under Pizarro's orders. Two days later, they all ride toward Quito, where Velalcázar remains in command of 400–500 Spaniards, while Almagro and Alvarado proceed farther south toward Peru.

While en route, Almagro and Alvarado blunder into the vanguard of Quisquis's retreating army. This contingent, under an Inca leader called Sotaurco, is surprised while holding a pass in Chaparra Province and quickly disperses. Realizing that the main Inca body is nearby, the two Spanish commanders lead a nocturnal dash with all their available cavalry, coming within sight of Quisquis's sprawling camp the next evening. The Inca general immediately orders his warriors, under one of Atahualpa's brothers called Huaypalcon, to hold a steep hill, while non-combatants flee in the opposite direction. This stratagem works, as the Spaniards are unable to ride over Huaypalcon's position, and both native formations succeed in disappearing into the night. When overtaken the next day by the pursuing Spaniards, the Inca rear guard again takes up a defensive posture on rocky high ground, killing 14 Spaniards and 3 horses, plus wounding 20 other mounts.

Although Quisquis succeeds in winning free, his army's morale collapses upon approaching Quito and finding it already occupied by many more Spaniards. When the Inca general orders his officers to march on into a remote sector to continue their resistance, he is murdered. The forces of both Rumiñahui and Zope Zopahua are also hunted down and exterminated over the next few weeks by Velalcázar, marking an end to the Inca empire.

FEBRUARY 1535. Velalcázar sends his lieutenant Diego de Tapia from Quito to pacify the Quillacinga Indians on the Angasmayo River.

MARCH 1535. Fighting almost erupts at Cuzco between pro-Pizarro and pro-Almagro factions among the Spaniards, who each claim the former Inca capital as falling under their jurisdiction according to the royal decree of May 21, 1534 (see "May 21, 1534" entry).

LATE MAY 1535. Pizarro reaches Cuzco and mediates a deal with Almagro, whereby the latter is to lead a new expedition farther south and conquer Chile—reputedly even richer than the Inca empire—while their disputed ownership of Cuzco is to be settled by the Spanish Crown.

JULY 3, 1535. Almagro quits Cuzco at the head of 570 Spanish riders and foot soldiers, plus 100 black slaves and 12,000 Inca allies and yanacones or native porters under Paullu (brother of the puppet emperor Manco), to conquer Chile. Pizarro in the meantime returns to the coast to continue founding new cities, while de Soto sails for Spain.

EARLY NOVEMBER 1535. Because of increasing Spanish excesses and his own lack of power, the emperor Manco attempts to slip out of Cuzco, only to be ridden down and cruelly imprisoned by Juan and Gonzalo Pizarro. Isolated Spaniards also begin to be murdered, prompting the two brothers to lead a punitive expedition against Ancocagua, which is besieged and overwhelmed.

JANUARY 1536. Hernando Pizarro returns to Cuzco from Spain, releasing Manco from bondage and treating him well because the court at Madrid has disapproved of any disrespect toward monarchs. Nonetheless, the young Inca emperor is now secretly determined to drive the Spaniards out of Peru. He is secretly manufacturing weapons and slowly marshaling troops to fall upon Cuzco once the rainy season ends.

APRIL 18, 1536. Manco's Revolt. The emperor leaves Cuzco with Hernando Pizarro's permission,

Manco

The last emperor at Cuzco is believed to have been born in 1516, possibly in its Yucay Valley. Manco was one of the youngest sons of Huayna Capac with the Cholla woman Mama Runtu, so he was considered a member of a lower noble class. It is estimated that Huayna Capac's royal harem had produced some 300 children in all. Little is known about Manco's infancy, except that he was raised in the train of his older half brother Huáscar at the court in Cuzco. Young Manco apparently was more inclined to the study of history than any other subject. He was trained in martial arts at the nearby fortress of Sacsayhuaman.

The emperor Huayna Capac died in 1528. When the Hurí faction under Atahualpa fought against Huáscar's Hanan faction for control of the empire, the 15-year-old Manco was advised to flee into the jungles outside of Cuzco just before Huáscar's final defeat. Manco returned late in 1532, determined to gain the throne despite his low royal standing.

His alliance with the Spaniards expelled the Hurí faction from Cuzco and gave him the throne. Yet the teen-aged monarch was at best a puppet of the invaders. When the high priest Villac Umo at last made him understand that the Spaniards were not mercenary adventurers on a foray but rather permanent occupiers, Manco began planning his revolt. Although he covertly mustered thousands of warriors, escaped, and mounted a major offensive, the Incas could not overcome superior Spanish weaponry on the battlefield. Despite heroic resistance, Manco was driven deep into the jungle. His power broken, he would be treacherously murdered a few years later by Spanish renegades to whom he had given shelter.

supposedly to attend some religious ceremonies in the Yucay Valley but actually to mobilize his gathering army. On Easter Saturday, April 21, news of his plot reaches Cuzco, Juan Pizarro being immediately dispatched with 70 riders to disperse the assembling Indians. He fights his way into Calca and captures part of the Inca train, yet after three or four days of occupation, his contingent is abruptly recalled because of word of an immense native army bearing down upon Cuzco under General Inquill.

The Spanish cavalry fights its way back inside the capital and watches as perhaps 50,000 warriors slowly gather outside. Hernando Pizarro only commands 110 soldiers and 80 riders, the latter divided into three squadrons under Gabriel de Rojas, Hernán Ponce de León, and Gonzalo Pizarro. But when the mounted Spaniards sally, they find the Indians' tactics much wiler; they remain on high ground to blunt the weight of cavalry charges, thus killing a rider and horse on April 30.

Emboldened, Inquill's army then institutes a close siege of Cuzco, launching a massive dawn assault on Saturday, May 6, preceded by a hail of heated stones that ignite many of the city's thatched roofs. Through sheer weight of numbers, they fight their way into the streets, pushing the desperate defenders back into two buildings opposite each other at the east end of the main square. After several days of ferocious sallies and countersallies, Juan Pizarro leads 50 riders in a wild dash at sunrise on May 16, which succeeds in circling out into the countryside and almost capturing the Sacsahuaman citadel above Cuzco from the rear. Juan Pizarro dies from a head wound, but his brothers Hernando and Gonzalo press home infantry assaults over the next few days that eventually carry the fortress amid terrible slaughter. Virtually all its 2,000 Inca defenders are either slain or commit suicide.

Native reinforcements appear and for three more days attempt to recapture Sacsahuaman before finally giving up at the end of May. Nonetheless, hard fighting persists in and around Cuzco until at least August, when the native siege finally slackens.

MAY 1536. Having learned of Manco's revolt on May 4 while at his new coastal capital of Lima, Francisco Pizarro quickly sends a relief column of 30 riders under Capt. Francisco Morgovejo de Quiñones toward Jauja in the mountains, followed by another column of 70 horsemen under his relative Gonzalo de Tapia. The latter climbs inland near Huaitará but is ambushed in a narrow gorge on the upper Pampas River by Quizo Yupanqui's army, which annihilates the trapped Spaniards with rock-slides. The few survivors are sent as prisoners to Manco at Calca.

Quizo Yupanqui meanwhile continues northward and, near Parcos, destroys a second Spanish contingent: 60 men under Diego Pizarro who were marching down the Mantaro River toward Huamanga. Morgovejo is eventually obliged to turn back as well; he is killed before he can regain the coast.

JULY 1536. Francisco Pizarro dispatches 30 foot soldiers from Lima under Francisco de Godoy to reinforce Jauja. While approaching that town, the relief column learns that Jauja has already been overrun by Quizo Yupanqui's army and its 30-man Spanish garrison slaughtered. De Godoy therefore carries the news back into Lima by early August.

AUGUST 1536. Defense of Lima. Flush with his victories in the Andes, Quizo Yupanqui descends onto the coastal plateau with a huge army to extirpate Pizarro's stronghold. Capt. Pedro de Lerma is sent out of the city with 70 riders to check the enemy advance, fighting a sharp engagement in which one Spaniard is killed and many others wounded, yet he cannot halt the Incas' progress. Lima is assaulted, but a surprise sally by Pizarro's hidden cavalry breaks the warrior ranks, persuading Quizo Yupanqui to retire into a defensive position atop San Cristóbal Hill.

After six days of close investiture of the city, the native general decides upon an all-out attack from three directions, personally marching at the head of the eastern column with his senior staff, which receives the brunt of two cavalry squadrons streaming out of Lima under Pizarro. Quizo Yupanqui is killed along with most of his officers and countless followers, shattering the resolve of his army, which begins to melt away that same night.

LATE AUGUST 1536. In Cuzco, the Inca siege has slackened sufficiently for Hernando Pizarro to go on the offensive against Manco, who has transferred his headquarters from Calca into the formidable fortress of Ollantaytambo, 30 miles downstream in the Yucay Valley. The Spaniards fight their way out of the city with 70 horsemen, 30 foot soldiers, and a large contingent of native auxiliaries, leaving Gabriel de Rojas behind with a small garrison. However, once coming within sight of the impregnable Inca fortification—bristling with masses of archers and warriors—Pizarro realizes it cannot be taken, so retreats into Cuzco amid heavy fighting.

Heartened by this success, the emperor in turn sends his army to once more attempt to carry Cuzco, but his columns are smashed in open country by Spanish cavalry charges, so a stalemate develops with both sides remaining exhausted within their bases throughout the ensuing rainy season.

NOVEMBER 8, 1536. Alonso de Alvarado marches from Lima at the head of 100 horsemen, 40 crossbowmen, and 210 foot soldiers to reconquer the interior of Peru. As he enters the Andes 25 miles to the east, he endures a fierce skirmish against an Indian contingent under Illa Tupac, killing 30 and capturing 100. The latter are maimed by having their hands and noses cut off, then released to spread terror among the region's natives. Another engagement occurs on November 15 in Olleros Pass, but Alvarado presses on toward Jauja, sowing destruction.

JANUARY 1537. After being reinforced at Jauja by a further 200 men under Gómez de Tordoya, Alonso de Alvarado resumes his slow drive toward Cuzco.

Major opposition is encountered at Rumichaca, a stone bridge over the Pampas River below Vilcas, but the Spaniards nonetheless continue east toward Abancay.

EARLY APRIL 1537. Almagro returns into central Peru from his failed Chilean expedition, sending a peace embassy on ahead to call upon Manco at Ollantaytambo and listening to his grievances against Pizarro. The Inca emperor at first seems inclined to make peace with this rival conquistador, but changes his mind once Almagro enters Calca (25 miles from Ollantaytambo) with his vanguard of 200 riders. Paucar, the young Inca commander for this region, launches a surprise attack with 5,000–6,000 warriors, obliging the Spaniards to fight their way across the river, reaching Cuzco after nightfall on April 18. Almagro immediately deposes Hernando and Gonzalo Pizarro, imprisoning them along with a handful of supporters, while assuming overall command of the city.

JULY 12, 1537. To ensure his hold over Cuzco, Almagro dispatches his lieutenant Rodrigo Orgóñez with a strong Spanish contingent and 10,000 native auxiliaries under Paullu to subdue Alonso de Alvarado's relief force approaching from the coast. Orgóñez meets this rival Spanish army at night near the Abancay River crossing, overwhelming it almost without bloodshed by sunup on July 13.

LATE JULY 1537. Flight of the Emperor. Despairing of ever being able to beat the Spaniards upon the battlefield, Manco abandons Ollantaytambo to seek safety in Peru's interior. Almagro instantly orders the victorious Orgóñez to pursue the fleeing emperor with 300 riders and foot soldiers. They overtake Manco at Amaibamba, defeating his rear guard, while the emperor himself escapes on foot toward Vitcos. The next day, Orgóñez reaches Vitcos as well, pausing to loot it, thereby allowing Manco to escape into the mountains. The Spanish column then returns into Cuzco by the end of July with enormous booty and many thousands of prisoners, whereupon they discover that Paullu has in the interim been crowned the new puppet emperor.

SEPTEMBER 1537. Almagro opens negotiations with Francisco Pizarro on the coast over ownership of Cuzco. The latter's position hardens when his brother Gonzalo escapes confinement and Hernando is exchanged. Eventually fighting erupts between both factions, and Hernando Pizarro leads an invasion of the central highlands.

APRIL 26, 1538. Almagro's End. After pressing the followers of the infirm, 63-year-old Almagro back into Cuzco, Hernando Pizarro and Alonso de Alvarado fight a pitched two-hour battle a few miles south of this city against Almagro's lieutenant, Rodrigo Orgóñez. The latter defends himself bravely until being wounded in the forehead by a harquebus round, captured, and beheaded. Some 200 of his troops are also slaughtered, and another 150 wounded, as opposed to only 25–26 killed among Pizarro's ranks. Cuzco is thereupon occupied, and Almagro imprisoned. A vengeful Hernando Pizarro has him quickly tried and garroted on July 8.

LATE JULY 1538. At Manco's instigation, the Lupaca tribe in Collasuyu Province attacks its traditional foe the Colla, now vassals of the Spaniards. Hernando Pizarro and Paullu march to their subjects' relief, defeating the Lupaca in a difficult battle on the banks of Desaguadero River. Hernando Pizarro then retraces his steps toward Cuzco, leaving his brother Gonzalo and the puppet emperor to mop up.

AUTUMN 1538. The Conchucos tribes in the hills bordering the upper Marañón rise against Spanish rule, sweeping southward with Manco as far as Jauja, where the Huanca refuse to join them. The rebuffed Inca emperor thereupon moves his army south to Ayacucho, threatening Spanish communications between Cuzco and the coast.

Francisco Pizarro reaches Cuzco in November and detaches Illán Suárez de Carvajal with 200 horsemen and a large force of auxiliaries to deal with this menace. After marching westward to Vilcas, the Spaniards learn of Manco's headquarters in the hilltop village of Oncoy. Hoping to trap their elusive foe, Suárez remains on one bank of the Pampas River with his cavalry, while a captain called Villadiego stealthily seizes the bridge crossing with a company of infantry. Rather than hold this position, however, the eager young officer then presses on with only 30 men (including 5 harquebusiers and 7 crossbowmen) to personally attempt to capture the Inca chieftain, thereby gaining great credit. Instead, his contingent is discovered and massacred after a two-hour fight that only 6 Spaniards survive.

Inspired by this victory, Manco's generals Paucar Huaman and Yuncallo attack and defeat a large force of Spaniards and Indian allies at Yuramayo, killing many. Finally, Pizarro sorties from Cuzco on December 22 with 70 riders, compelling the Indians to retire.

DECEMBER 1538. Cochabamba. Gonzalo Pizarro's 70 Spanish soldiers and Paullu's 5,000 native auxiliaries spend five days fighting their way into wild and remote Cochabamba Valley (Bolivia), only to become trapped inside by huge numbers of warriors led by the Chicha general Torinaseo under the overall strategic guidance of the emperor's uncle Tiso Yupanqui. After a furious day-long confrontation, though, the Chicha army is broken, leaving 800 dead upon the field.

The Spaniards then work their way through the valley, being reinforced early the next year by strong contingents under Hernando Pizarro and Martín de Guzmán that have circled over the Andean range, thus helping to subdue all of Cochabamba's tribes. Even Tiso Yupanqui surrenders by February 1539 after being granted amnesty, entering Cuzco on March 19 with Gonzalo Pizarro's triumphant army.

APRIL 1539. Chuquillusca. Gonzalo Pizarro marches out of Cuzco at the head of 300 Spanish fighting men and a host of native auxiliaries under Paullu to track down Manco at his remote new capital of Vilcabamba, deep within the Amazonian forest. The jungle beyond Vitcos proves so dense that the Spaniards are obliged to leave their horses behind. They nevertheless fight their way through until they reach a rocky hill called Chuquillusca, where 36 are suddenly killed in a native ambush, forcing the rest to retreat.

Ten days later, after being reinforced, Gonzalo Pizarro resumes his attack, delegating 100 Spaniards to storm Chuquillusca, while leading his main body in a flanking maneuver. Manco flees and his followers melt into the wilderness, leaving Vilcabamba, 14 miles away, to be destroyed by the Spaniards. This expedition returns into Cuzco in July with numerous captives, including the empress Cura Ocllo.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1539. Francisco Pizarro returns into Cuzco from Arequipa hoping to negotiate Manco's surrender.

OCTOBER 1539. After a fierce eight-month campaign in Condesuyo Province by Capt. Pedro de los Rios, the Inca high priest Villac Umu submits to the Spaniards.

NOVEMBER 1539. Manco rebuffs Pizarro's peace overture by slaughtering his envoys. In retaliation, the Spaniard has the empress Cura Ocllo stripped, beaten, and shot to death with arrows, her body being floated down the Yucay River in a basket to be found by the Inca's men. Villac Umu, Tiso Yupanqui, and many other prominent captives are also burned alive.

Despite Manco's continuing defiance in the eastern jungles, effective Inca resistance is at an end. Guerrilla warfare persists in certain regions for a number of years, yet Peru is largely subdued. The Spaniards begin managing their vast new estates or dispersing for further adventures.

CONQUEST OF VENEZUELA AND COLOMBIA (1529–1546)

In Europe during the spring of 1528, the Habsburg emperor Charles V—hoping to realize some immediate financial gains from his fast-expanding New World properties—leases mainland Venezuela to the German banking house of Welser (in Spanish, Velzare or Belzare), which is headquartered in the city of Augsburg. Along with this concession goes the right to establish towns, develop mineral deposits, and import African slaves into this new American territory.

A convoy of three ships and a caravel duly departs Seville on October 7 of that same year, bearing 200 men under García de Lerma and Pedro Márquez, to initiate the process of exploring and settling these new lands. The vessels rendezvous in January 1529 at the Antillean island of Santo Domingo with another contingent of 100 fighting men raised by a tough German mercenary named in Spanish records as Ambrosio de Alfinger—although more likely Talfinger or Dalfinger—who assumes overall command of the enterprise. The first of several thousand Yoruba, Ibo, and Fon slaves are also brought across the Atlantic from West Africa.

The subsequent zeal displayed by these German conquistadores expanding out of Venezuela will prompt their Spanish neighbors at Santa Marta into greater competitive efforts, so as to fully secure their own Colombian hinterland. Both groups will also be fired up by native legends of El Dorado or “The Golden Man”—an allusion to the Chibcha coronation ritual, whereby a new leader appears coated with resin and gold dust at dawn, then dives off a raft into the sacred waters of Lake Guatavita to emerge as overlord.

FEBRUARY 24, 1529. Alfinger reaches the town of La Vela de Coro (Venezuela) with 264 men to establish a Welser beachhead and become its first governor.

EARLY AUGUST 1529. Alfinger’s Opening Campaign. The new German governor appoints Luis Sarmiento as his deputy and departs La Vela de Coro with a small army of 180 men to venture southwest against the inland natives. By September 8, he discovers the shores of Lake Maracaibo, having sown terror in his path. Alfinger’s brutality—calculated to cow the numerous dispersed Indian tribes and includes such atrocities as branding them on the face to establish Welser ownership—quickly earns him the sobriquet “Cruellest of the Cruel” among the natives. He is further resented by his Spanish followers, who are discontent with what they regard as foreign leadership in their American territories.

Alfinger conquers a native town on the site of present-day Maracaibo, renaming it as Ulma in honor of his German birthplace of Ulm. Disease and lack of provisions eventually oblige him to return to La Vela de Coro, with a booty worth only 7,000 pesos.

JANUARY 12, 1530. The 28-year-old mercenary Nicolaus Federmann der Jüngere or “the Younger” (also a native of Ulm) arrives at the Paraguaná Peninsula on the eastern shores of the modern Gulf of Venezuela after a stopover on the Caribbean island of Santo Domingo. Accompanied by 123 Spaniards, 24 German miners, and 10 horses aboard a bark owned by the Welsers, his mission is to support the efforts of Alfinger in exploring and securing this new region.

Federmann disembarks most of his men and horses to march overland toward the main town of La Vela de Coro under Georg Ehinger, while he himself returns aboard his bark and stands away from the coast at 2:00 a.m. on January 15, beating upwind toward Santo Domingo.

MARCH 8, 1530. Having taken on further horses, oxen, cattle, and provisions at Santo Domingo and nearby San Germán de Puerto Rico, plus being joined by another Welser vessel out of Spain, Federmann drops anchor off the Venezuelan port of La Vela de Coro and is greeted by Alfinger’s Spanish deputy Sarmiento. Federmann unloads his bark and sends it back to Santo Domingo on March 22 to continue its homeward passage to Spain.

APRIL 18, 1530. Three more Welser vessels reach La Vela de Coro from Seville, bringing a further 200 reinforcements under a new acting governor, Hans Seissenhofer—whose difficult last name is rendered as Juan Alemán or “John German,” or Juan el Bueno or “John the Good,” among the Spaniards. Seissenhofer is sworn into office with Federmann as his deputy, because it is now feared that the long-absent Alfinger must either be dead or lost.

MAY 3, 1530. After a nine-month absence, a sickly Alfinger staggers back into La Vela de Coro with 110 survivors from his inland campaign, the other 70 having been lost due to disease, battle, or executions. He is immediately restored as governor, while Seissenhofer chooses to pursue other interests (he dies a year and a half later).

JULY 26, 1530. González de Leiva's Incursion. Alfinger designates Luis González de Leiva as his lieutenant governor for Maracaibo and sends him back along the coast with 60 soldiers aboard two large war canoes, which were wrested from the Indian chieftain Manaure, to reoccupy that advance base.

González de Leiva encounters steady resistance during his advance, especially from the Cumari tribesmen, who kill three of his men and injure several others. Nevertheless, the Spaniards succeed in capturing 222 prisoners, sending 100 to the frontier outpost of Santa Marta (Colombia) under Capt. Iñigo de Vasuña to be sold as slaves. Another 78 are dispatched toward Santo Domingo aboard Capt. Gil de Nava's ship San Cristóbal, but when this vessel sinks en route during a storm, its survivors are instead sold at Jamaica.

AUGUST 1, 1530. Still infirm from his prolonged military campaign, Alfinger departs La Vela de Coro aboard the ship San Antón to convalesce on the island of Santo Domingo, leaving Federmann as his acting governor.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1530. Federmann's First Venture. During Alfinger's absence on Santo Domingo, Federmann in turn deputizes Bartolomé de Santillana as his acting governor and quits La Vela de Coro with a small army of 16 Spanish riders, 98 Spanish soldiers, and 100 native Caquetío porters to penetrate the jungles. He strikes out southwestward in the general direction of modern San Luis, hoping to expand the Welsers' Venezuelan holdings by driving toward the long-sought Pacific Ocean (called the Mar del Mediodía or “Midday Sea” by these early explorers).

JANUARY 27, 1531. Having recuperated from his previous illness, Alfinger returns to Venezuela from Santo Domingo, reassuming office as governor from Santillana.

MARCH 17, 1531. After a six-month campaign through the interior of western Venezuela, Federmann's sickly army returns into La Vela de Coro, having emerged from the jungle far to its southeast at the Yacaruy River mouth (near present-day Puerto Cabello). During his foray, in contrast to Alfinger, he has managed to establish almost uniformly friendly relations with the mountain tribes, the Cayones being the only people to offer serious resistance to the intruders. But Alfinger is angry at finding his deputy absent upon his return and orders Federmann exiled from Venezuela for four years.

JUNE 9, 1531. Alfínger's Final Campaign. The German governor reappoints de Santillana as his deputy, then leads another major expedition out of La Vela de Coro to continue his territorial expansion farther to the west and southwest. Alfínger explores the region in and around his advance base at Maracaibo until September 1, when he is rejoined by González de Leiva's contingent and officially founds a town, appointing Francisco Venegas as Maracaibo's first mayor.

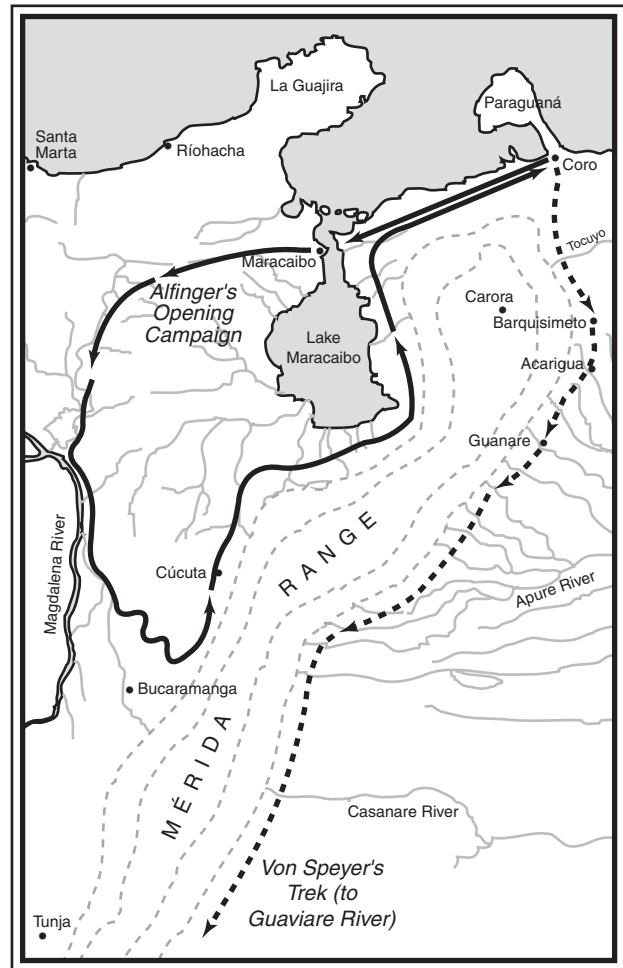

Alfínger subsequently ventures farther north up into the Guajira Peninsula with 40 mounted Spaniards under Capt. Hans von Casimir of Nuremberg and 130 infantrymen divided into three companies under captains Luis de Monserrat, Gómez de Anaya, and Francisco de Quindos. The governor seeks to establish a fixed inland boundary with the nearby Spanish colony of Santa Marta (Colombia) by circling around southwestward in the general direction of the Magdalena River.

JANUARY 7, 1532. After roaming out of Guajira Province in northeastern Colombia and far southward into its mountains, Alfínger detaches his subordinate Íñigo de Vasuña with 24 foot soldiers to return to Maracaibo and La Vela de Coro, bearing 24,000 castellanos of gold booty (weighing approximately 350 pounds) and hoping to bring back further reinforcements.

Eighteen months later, it is learned that this detachment never reaches its destination, becoming lost, instead, in the trackless tropical jungle until its desperately hungry survivors are obliged to bury their gold under a large tree and abandon their companions one by one. Eventually all of them—except for one named Francisco Martín—die of exposure.

JUNE 24, 1532. Having grown increasingly anxious to be reinforced and resupplied, Alfínger detaches his German lieutenant and interpreter Stephan Martin (in Spanish, Esteban Martín) with 20 soldiers to carry dispatches out of the jungle northward to Lake Maracaibo. Martin reaches the Spanish settlement of Maracaibo 34 days later to find its lieutenant governor, Venegas, absent on a retaliatory raid against the Onoto tribesmen, who have massacred 14 local Spaniards.

Martin is quite ill and remains at Maracaibo while a subordinate conveys Alfínger's letters north-eastward to La Vela de Coro. Soon, a company of 50 soldiers returns overland from this latter port, and Martin is able to rejoin Alfínger a few weeks later with 82 Spanish soldiers and a large body of native porters. With this renewed strength, the governor attempts to continue his campaign through the Andean chain, only to be obliged to give up because of its daunting vegetation and towering heights.

For almost another year, Alfínger will continue to probe southward and eastward through these ranges, inflicting untold brutalities upon their primitive mountain tribes, yet finding no major cities or rich gold deposits to conquer and hold. Eventually, he is struck in the throat by a poisoned arrow during a skirmish on May 27, 1533, and dies four days later. His exhausted army is taken over by Pedro de San Martín, who finally strikes out toward the shores of Lake Maracaibo, sending a few survivors ahead to limp back into La Vela de Coro on Monday, November 2, 1533.

Around that same time, Alfinger's deputy governor, de Santillana, is deposed by the Spaniards who, having grown increasingly restive at being ignored by their German rulers, dispatch Luis González de Leiva and Alonso de la Llana to Spain as their spokesmen on January 18, 1534, to petition Emperor Charles V to retract the Welsers' privileges. Instead, a new German governor named Georg Hohermuth von Speyer (in Spanish, Jorge de Espira) is sent out from Europe. He arrives at La Vela de Coro on February 6, 1535, with 700 men.

JANUARY 13, 1533. Founding of Cartagena. The tough Spanish adventurer Pedro de Heredia—his nose missing as a result of a Madrid street brawl—enters Cartagena Bay from Santo Domingo with a ship, two caravels, and a smaller consort bearing 150 soldiers and 22 horses. The next day, he goes ashore near the Indian village of Calamar and rests his cavalry until January 17 before pushing along the low, sandy peninsula. He finds the main native village—protected by a thick stockade of spiny guamacho tree trunks—and discovers that it has been abandoned by its frightened inhabitants.

To assert his claim as new territorial governor, de Heredia goes through the legal fiction of constituting a “city” amid Calamar's empty huts on January 20, although no actual presence is created. Instead, his caravels are detached to explore the nearby port of Zamba and the coastline around Cenú (or Sinú), while he

Soon after Pedro de Heredia staked his claim in June 1533, Spanish immigrants began arriving. Despite his new city's torrid and unhealthy climate, its magnificent harbor was surrounded by a fertile delta and gave access to the interior through a series of navigable rivers. News of gold strikes in its hinterland, plus Pizarro's conquest of the fabulous neighboring empire of Peru, spurred traffic. So many people began passing through Cartagena, many clearing estates amid its delta, that a religious see was created at Cartagena as early as 1534 with Fr. Tomás de Toro installed as its first bishop.

Yet the city itself remained small, serving merely as a way station for passengers and for the import and export of goods. The island beside it, named Getsemaní by the Spanish, was granted to de Heredia's accountant, Rodrigo de Durán. A slaughterhouse was installed on the island once cattle began to multiply in the region. Some years later, Durán's widow, Beatriz de Cogollos, would cede a portion of this island for the erection of a Franciscan monastery.

Cartagena's first foreign enemy materialized as early as 1537, when a lone French corsair vessel prowled past. Because of such threats, the Crown ordered defenses improved throughout the Antilles; but Cartagena's modest increase of only three guns proved woefully inadequate. Five French corsair vessels easily penetrated its harbor on the night of July 24–25, 1543, depositing 450 men. They would extort a ransom of 35,000 pesos and a mass of goods from the populace before withdrawing.

The city recovered enough to receive its first transatlantic convoy in December 1550, which paused for a few days to refresh provisions before continuing to the Panamanian port of Nombre de Dios. Cartagena, however, was swept by an accidental fire two years later, so no more convoys visited until January 1556. The city remained so small that when five French ships set 300 men ashore on April 11, 1559, they easily brushed aside its 36 Spanish defenders. The raiders then pillaged its few houses before agreeing to spare the buildings for a meager ransom of only 4,000 pesos.

Cartagena's status was upgraded two years later, though, when the Crown merged all transatlantic departures from Seville into two annual convoys with naval escorts. Galleons became much larger, so wider and deeper anchorages were needed in the Americas. Cartagena therefore became a major port of call for the South American plate fleets, and royal funds were provided for the construction of strong defenses. Adm. Bartolomé Menéndez added a refinement by visiting in late July 1562 on his outward passage toward Nombre de Dios, then making a second call on his homeward leg. Adm. Diego Flores de Valdés not only returned to Cartagena from Nombre de Dios in late September 1567 but wintered there with his 15 galleons.

The city was so boosted by this increased traffic that, when the English slaver John Hawkins called with 10 ships in July 1568, he was obliged to quit the coast empty handed. Cartagena was now a major lynchpin in Spain's plate-fleet system, with a repair yard called La Machina opposite the Pastelillo fortress at El Boquerón. A swelling number of officials and traders crowded in every year to receive its galleons. Ever-larger amounts of European imports and African slaves were off-loaded for sale into the interior, while regional exports also increased. Cartagena received the title of a “very noble and very loyal” city by a royal decree issued on December 12, 1574, with its own coat of arms. Its strategic role was further confirmed when a small naval squadron was assigned to it two years later and emerged from its harbor to patrol the Caribbean.

and his troops clash with the natives of Canapote and Turbaco before rejoining their flotilla at Zamba.

The Spaniards then make a harrowing, 22-day ascent as far upstream as the Magdalena River before returning into their original seaside site where, on June 1, de Heredia formally names “the first alcaldes (magistrates) and regidores (aldermen) for the town of Calamar, in which he ha[s] his seat, and order[s] that the city be called Cartagena”—soon amended to Cartagena de Indias or “Cartagena of the Indies” to distinguish it from its namesake in Spain.

MAY 15, 1535. Von Speyer's Trek. Because of a food shortage precipitated by his expedition's arrival, the new German governor, von Speyer, immediately sends a 100-man contingent inland, then appoints Federmann (who has also returned to Venezuela with him from his four-year exile in Europe—see “March 17, 1531” entry) as his deputy governor at La Vela de Coro.

On May 15, von Speyer leads a 400-man army and 90 riders toward Barquisimeto to begin a campaign to its plains; his main body reaches Tocuyo five days later, where it is joined by the smaller veteran unit of Lope Montalvo de Lugo and Stephan Martin, who are foraging for provisions. On May 28, this combined force presses southward into hostile territory and commences attacking villages to secure natives to act as porters.

By June 26, von Speyer's army—which has divided into smaller contingents to facilitate its advance—reunites to assault the large town of Oyrabo (today unknown), overrunning it at the cost of three conquistadores. Shortly thereafter, he fights another pitched battle at Catimayagua, and although Indian resistance continues to be strong, their weapons are no match for those of the invaders, who persistently push farther south. On July 16, they reach the shores of the Cojedes River where they encounter the remnants of their 100-man vanguard, retiring with many wounded. Von Speyer reaches Acarigua on July 20 where he remains for several days, terrorizing the district. On August 18, von Speyer plunges west into the unexplored jungles with 30 riders and 100 infantrymen, leaving many men behind at Acarigua to recuperate under captains Sancho de Murga and Andreas Gundelfinger.

AUGUST 1535. From La Vela de Coro, the restless Federmann dispatches a strong contingent westward overland toward La Guajira that consists of 200 Spanish soldiers under Capt. Antonio de Cháves and is supported by 70 horses and numerous Indian porters. The German lieutenant governor intends to meet this contingent at Cape de la Vela by circling around the peninsula aboard ship with more men for a concerted sweep through the entire area.

Cháves therefore marches to the Bar of Maracaibo and traverses it by canoe before proceeding northward into La Guajira. Here he encounters 50 Spanish soldiers out of Santa Marta (Colombia) under Capt. Juan de Ribera, who has been sent out by the acting governor, Dr. Rodrigo Infante, to reassert Santa Marta's claim over this area after Alfinger's far-ranging western campaign of 1531–1533; but contrary to his instructions, Ribera agrees to incorporate his soldiers into Cháves's army for Federmann's forthcoming campaign.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1535. Deep in the interior, von Speyer's increasingly sick column reaches a prosperous native village on the banks of the Masparro River, and von Speyer sends Stephan Martin to recall his main body from Acarigua. While awaiting their arrival, von Speyer's company is attacked at dawn by 600 native warriors, who are emboldened by the Spaniards' evident weakness; yet the Indians merely succeed in slaying one horse and wounding several conquistadores before being defeated and dispersed. The Acarigua contingent is also ambushed during its approach, suffering eight men and nine horses slain.

OCTOBER 1535. Guajira. Lieutenant Governor Federmann delegates his office at La Vela de Coro to Francisco Venegas, then sets sail with an additional force of 100 soldiers and 20 horses to Cape de la Vela (Colombia). After uniting with Cháves's and Ribera's companies, Federmann is further strengthened in February 1536 by the arrival of two ships directly from the island of Santo Domingo that bear 80 more volunteers.

However, Federmann's hopes of effecting a lasting conquest in this region are dashed by the lack of any significant native concentrations. The local Guajiro and Cocino nomads resist fiercely, then simply melt back into the inhospitable terrain. Federmann attempts to establish a town named Nuestra Señora de las Nieves near present-day Ríohacha (Colombia) and sends Capt. Diego Núñez deep into Macuira Province with 60 soldiers to try to found another town, but both efforts fail. Finally, frustrated and hungry, his army heads southward in search of easier prey.

CHRISTMAS 1535. Much farther to the south, von Speyer's lost army is crippled by disease and want, spending an entire month encamped around Coharabichan. Limping into Ithibona by January 9, 1536, the commander decides to leave behind 130 sick soldiers and 19 riders under captains Sancho de Murga and Andreas Gundelfinger, with orders to rejoin his main column once their health is restored. (They never do so; after a year in Ithibona, during which two-thirds of their number succumb, the survivors retrace their route toward La Vela de Coro.) Von Speyer meanwhile continues his progress southward on January 25 with 49 riders and 150 infantrymen.

JANUARY 1536. The new governor designate for Santa Marta (Colombia), Pedro Fernández de Lugo, arrives from Spain with 1,200 men. One of his first tasks after assuming office is to use this host to prevent Federmann's smaller army from pressing out of western Venezuela's Guajira Province and infringing upon Santa Marta's territory. Fernández de Lugo therefore delegates the 26-year-old licentiate Gonzalo Jiménez de Quesada to precede Federmann into the Magdalena River Valley and arrest the German lieutenant governor should he break its frontier. Learning of this design, Federmann instead orders the bulk of his army to retire into the Carora Plains under Diego Martínez, while he returns toward La Vela de Coro for reinforcements and resupply.

APRIL 1, 1536. Deep in the hinterland, von Speyer's lost army enters Guaypíe territory, fighting a ferocious battle at Guachimena. The stench of burned Indian bodies quickly obliges them to abandon this town.

APRIL 5, 1536. Jiménez de Quesada quits Santa Marta at the head of a 600-man Spanish army, advancing southward to rendezvous with another 200 troops who will circle around on some brigantines, then travel up the length of the Magdalena River to meet him. After an arduous trek, the two contingents come together at La Tora, where Jiménez de Quesada installs himself with 220 exhausted survivors.

In October, a detached company of his conquistadores probes the Opón River, emerging onto an elevated and lush plateau that is home to a highly developed Indian civilization: the Chibchas or Muiscas (the latter actually a word in the local dialect signifying "persons" rather than the correct tribal name of Chibchas). The young licentiate heads toward the high central plateau on December 28, with slightly more than 60 Spanish riders and 110 foot soldiers.

MAY 1536. Federmann returns into La Vela de Coro and briefly resumes office, although a cloud of surly disapproval greets his failure at Cape de la Vela. He therefore only remains until December 14, when he departs again with what men he can recruit to continue campaigning in a more southeasterly direction. (In the interim, his previous expedition suffers cruelly in the Carora Plains, losing 120 men to disease, want, and native attacks.)

Federmann and his lieutenant Pedro de Limpias inflict very harsh treatment upon Barquisimeto and Acarigua's Indians but otherwise accomplish little of any lasting military value during their southeastern foray, and they soon turn back.

DECEMBER 1, 1536. After several months of vainly attempting to ford the mighty Opóa River, von Speyer's lost army finally crosses this barrier and fights its way deeper into Guaypíe territory. Passing into Punignigua lands shortly thereafter, the invaders find gold and silver artifacts within an abandoned village, prompting the German commander to detach his lieutenant Stephan Martin with a contingent of troops to again seek a passage westward through these mountains.

During his absence, von Speyer's men weather a dawn attack by local natives. Martin returns with many prisoners yet without having found a route over this range. On January 19, 1537, the invaders turn southward onto fertile plains and are welcomed at a prosperous Indian town that is renamed Nuestra Señora or "Our Lady" (today's San Juan de los Llanos). An inspection reveals that the army's strength is now reduced to a mere 102 men. After a brief rest, von Speyer continues his weary march, again encountering hostile tribes.

LATE FEBRUARY 1537. Somewhere between the banks of the Yari and Caguán rivers, von Speyer detaches his principal lieutenant, Stephan Martin, with 40 men to search for a ford. The rainy season is now fully raging, and these scouts are further beset by hostile bands. Many are injured before turning back, including Martin himself, who dies a few days after rejoining the main body.

Weary and dispirited by the loss of this valuable officer, von Speyer's men insist upon being led back toward La Vela de Coro. The German governor refuses, personally leading another foray at the head of 40 loyal followers, while the 60 remaining stay behind under Captain Santa Cruz. This attempt proves to be von Speyer's last gasp, as he is unsuccessful in finding any hope of emerging from the endless jungles farther south. Returning into Santa Cruz's base camp, von Speyer eventually orders his surviving band of 100 men and 40 horses to turn back on August 13.

EARLY MARCH 1537. Subjugation of Colombia.

With a mere 166 Spanish soldiers, the young explorer Jiménez de Quesada passes through a mountain valley south of Chipatá, which is renamed San Martín, then emerges into an interconnected series of lush plateaus that are home to five major Chibcha tribes: the Panches, Yariguís, Agates, Muzos, and Colimas. After the disappointingly primitive and poor tribesmen encountered along the Magdalena River, the Spaniards are delighted by the wealth and sophistication of these mountain peoples, who share the fertile region delineated by the modern departments of Cundinamarca and Boyacá and produce bountiful harvests. They also enjoy a brisk trade in gold, salt, coca, pottery, fine cotton weaves, emeralds, and so on.

Although the natives are almost a million strong and maintain large standing armies, with a professional warrior caste and draftees, their leadership is divided—Tunja's zaque or "chieftain" Quemuenchatocha being at war with the dominant zipa or "overlord" Tisquesusa of Bacatá or Bogotá. Jiménez de Quesada will therefore be able to use these differences to form alliances, pitting one tribe against another until each of the Chibcha nations is defeated in turn. The invaders press forward in easy stages against only sporadic opposition, overawing most defenders with their horses and weaponry until they forge into Tisquesusa's territory by March 22, which they dub the Valle de los Alcázares or "Valley of the Forts." Its stockaded yet largely vacant capital of Bogotá is seized one month later, after which the confident conquistador army detaches some secondary columns to raid lesser Chibcha communities. The main force storms the rich city of Tunja on August 20 and the religious center of Sogamoso on September 4. Combat is minimal, and the Spaniards suffer only minor casualties during a few skirmishes; most of the Indian population is spared and transformed into docile tributaries.

Jiménez de Quesada returns into the burned remnants of Bogotá on February 16, 1538, being rejoined on May 12 by the contingent of his brother Hernán Pérez de Quesada to divide the spoils. Legend has it that a new capital is created on August 6, when some conquistadores begin erecting a dozen shacks at a spot called Teusa or Teusaquillo on the western riverbank opposite the devastated native city; Jiménez de Quesada, however, does not take any formal steps to legally constitute his holdings until the expeditions of Sebastián de Belalcázar (also spelled Benalcázar, Velalcázar, and so on) and Federmann approach early the next year.

LATE DECEMBER 1537. Federmann's Southern March.

Desperate for a success to bolster his sagging prestige, the German lieutenant governor of La Vela de Coro (Venezuela) decides to make a more determined effort southward, starting out through the nearby Tocuyo Valley with a small army. Here he is rejoined by the remnants of his unhappy troops from the Carora Plains, then encounters a rogue Spanish unit under captains Juan Fernández de Alderete and Martín Nieto, who have rebelled against the rule of the new governor of Paria (eastern Venezuela), Jerónimo Dortal, and have ventured westward on their own account.

Federmann therefore arrests these two captains and sends them back into La Vela de Coro to stand trial, while incorporating their men into his company, giving him a total strength of some 300 Spanish troops, 130 mounts, and a host of native bearers. He then strikes out south-southwestward in the wake of von Speyer's lost army, skirting the north Andean foothills. By April 1538, he crosses the Apure River but misses the survivors of von Speyer's expedition—some say deliberately to avoid falling under his superior's orders again—as they are now wearily retracing their steps northward. To make it easier for his troops to forage for food, Federmann subsequently subdivides his small army into three companies, which advance by separate roads and only occasionally reunite.

After a four-month march, his expedition reassembles at the town of San Juan de los Llanos (called Nuestra Señora or La Fragua, that is, "The Forge," by these early explorers), where it is overtaken by another small company of Spanish troops from La Vela de Coro under Capt. Juan Gutiérrez de Aguilón.

MAY 27, 1538. Von Speyer's 20 surviving riders and 80 infantrymen reemerge from the jungle at La Vela de Coro very sickly and worn out after their three-year campaign against the Indians. Another 9 cavalymen and 40 foot soldiers will also return separately under captains Sancho de Murga and Andreas Gundelfinger, having been left behind on the banks of the Sarare River.

Von Speyer finds at La Vela de Coro that he has been suspended from office for almost a year, being replaced as of July 27, 1537, by Dr. Nicolás Navarro, who has been sent out to investigate conditions in the colony. After protracted hearings, the German governor reassumes power toward the end of December 1538, although he is hampered in his decisions by the presence of Navarro.

JUNE 1538. Another Spanish army almost 500 strong departs Popayán, in what is today southwestern Colombia, under Sebastián de Belalcázar, intending to penetrate the Andes from a westerly direction and subdue the legendary native kingdom of Cundirumarca or “Land of the Condors.”

FEBRUARY 1539. After vainly searching for a pass westward through the Andes, Federmann learns that local Ariare Indians receive gold objects in barter from native tribes on the far side of the mountains. He therefore pushes up toward the headwaters of the Arrari River, losing many Indian porters and horses to the cold weather around Sumapaz. Some 40 days later, he descends into southeastern Colombia’s Fosca Valley with 230 surviving men and 90 horses, only to discover that the entire region has already been subjugated by Jiménez de Quesada and hastily renamed the Nuevo Reino de Granada or “New Kingdom of Granada.” Town plots have even been distributed among Jiménez de Quesada’s 164 soldiers to create the capital of Santa Fé de Bogotá or “Holy Faith of Bogotá.” (Both provincial and city names having been chosen in honor of Jiménez de Quesada’s birthplace of Santa Fé de Granada in Spain.)

Belalcázar arrives in the neighboring Neiva Province around that same time at the head of 150 well-armed men (having detached another 300 to garrison towns that he has occupied along his passage eastward through the Andes from Popayán). Both Federmann and Belalcázar complain that Jiménez de Quesada’s newly conquered territory lies within their respective jurisdictions, yet they opt to submit their disputes for arbitration by Madrid.

EARLY JUNE 1539. Jiménez de Quesada, Federmann, and Belalcázar quit Guataquí (Colombia) to travel down the Magdalena River together aboard

Philipp von Hutten

Philipp von Hutten was born on December 18, 1505, in Birkenfeld Castle at Hassbergen in the principality of Unterfranken in northwestern Bavaria. Little is known about his early life. His older brother Moritz became bishop of the city of Eichstadt. Young Philipp was also a relative of the poet and satirist Ulrich von Hutten.

As a boy of 12, von Hutten was sent to serve as a page and to be educated at the court of Heinrich III, Graf or “Count” von Nassau-Breda-Vianden. The teenaged von Hutten then became attached to the retinue of Emperor Charles V, and so lived in Spain for seven years as of 1522. He traveled with Charles V late in 1529, who was to be crowned Holy Roman Emperor next February 24 at Bologna. Von Hutten remained in Charles V’s service for another four years at Brussels and Toledo, although in an unknown capacity. While at Brussels, von Hutten fell in love with Magdalena von Obritschan, a lady-in-waiting to the emperor’s sister, Maria of Hungary. Lacking enough income to marry apparently inspired him to seek his fortune in the New World.

When the Inca emperor Atahualpa’s fabulous gold ransom was presented by Hernando Pizarro to Charles V at Toledo on February 27, 1534, von Hutten was present. He then used his connections to become enrolled as a captain in the Welsers’ service and sailed from Seville that same October aboard the galleon Santa Trinidad with more than 600 mercenary troops under Venezuela’s new governor designate, Georg Hohermuth von Speyer. They reached San Germán de Puerto Rico by January 1535, from where von Hutten wrote the first of a series of letters home to Germany. The next month, the expedition disembarked at La Vela de Coro.

Eleven years of exhausting campaigns ensued. Von Hutten persisted in his quest for the mythic riches of El Dorado or “The Golden Man” because, as he wrote to his brother, he could not return home empty handed. Eventually, however, he found only murder at the hands of two of his own men. And because von Hutten had referred to the German mystic Dr. Georgius Faust in one of his letters, the legend arose that his death “under a red moon” had been foretold.

some brigantines, arriving at Cartagena on June 20 after a few minor skirmishes with Indians along the way. They then continue their journey via Jamaica across the Atlantic to Spain to resolve their jurisdictional disputes.

JUNE 11, 1540. Von Speyer dies at La Vela de Coro just as he is about to depart that port after naming Juan de Villegas as his deputy governor. He had anticipated joining a 150-man advance unit already gathered at Barquisimeto under Capt. Lope Montalvo de Lugo to make another expedition southward.

NOVEMBER 7, 1540. Bishop Rodrigo de Bastidas reaches La Vela de Coro from the island of Santo Domingo with 200 fresh troops and 150 mounts. Finding von Speyer dead, the bishop appoints Philipp von Hutten—a 29-year-old German veteran of von Speyer's previous three-year southward march—to temporarily succeed him in this post.

AUGUST 1, 1541. Von Hutten's Campaign. This new acting governor departs La Vela de Coro at the head of 100 riders and a few foot soldiers to campaign southward. Montalvo de Lugo has already refused to place himself under von Hutten's orders, leading his own larger contingent away from Barquisimeto some months earlier to the headwaters of the Casanare River, from whence he gains the far side of its mountain range and enters the service of New Granada (Colombia).

Von Hutten therefore remains at Barquisimeto until the end of January 1542, hoping further volunteers will join his standard, until he too ventures southward following von Speyer's old campaign trail. By August, von Hutten's small army has traversed the Opía River, there learning of a rival Spanish expedition that has crossed the Andes eastward from Colombia under Hernán Pérez de Quesada in search of El Dorado. Von Hutten follows this new continent's path until around Christmas, when he enters the territory of hostile Choque tribesmen. After repeated skirmishes, his column veers southeastward, reaching Caguán by January 1543 and pausing to rest.

Capt. Pedro de Limpias descends Caguán's river with 28 horsemen, sweeping through numerous Choque towns and winning considerable booty over the next three months before rejoining von Hutten's encampment on May 8, 1543. Advancing farther southeastward, the main body thereupon suffers numerous losses battling the Choques until the end of the year. Making a fighting retreat northward into the land of the Guaypíes, von Hutten's exhausted survivors remain at the town of Nuestra Señora (San Juan de los Llanos) until the end of 1544, during which time he further probes the adjacent Omegua territory, finding its inhabitants "strong and bellicose."

Convinced that he needs greater numbers of soldiers to conquer all these regions, the young commander decides to retrace his steps northward early in 1545, heading back toward the Venezuelan coast. They reach the Pauta River by May, where von Hutten's weary army rests for several months before detaching a vanguard of 20 soldiers under the youthful Bartholomäus Welser and the grizzled Pedro de Limpias. This vanguard is to precede the army into La Vela de Coro and have provisions sent to Barquisimeto to refresh the main body upon its homeward leg.

However, upon reaching Acarigua, Limpías and his followers refuse to obey the young German, striking out, instead, toward Cubagua to sail away for the island of Santo Domingo, forsaking the Welser service altogether. This mutinous column is ambushed by a band of natives near Maracapaná—just short of Cubagua—who kill three horses and a Spaniard and wound six others, forcing the remainder to retreat into the Barquisimeto Valley.

Here the Spaniards discover that an independent settlement has been established the previous year, called Nuestra Señora de la Concepción de Tocuyo, whose self-proclaimed "governor" Juan de Carvajal refuses to acknowledge the Welsers' authority. When von Hutten and the young Welser reach this place with their 60 surviving soldiers on April 24, 1546, Carvajal wins over most of their Spanish followers, then provides the two young Germans with a safe-conduct to the coast. They continue their journey toward La Vela de Coro with their reduced band, but a couple of weeks later in the Jirajaras Range, they are murdered while resting in their hammocks by their treacherous followers Gregorio Romero and Diego de Plasencia. On September 16, Carvajal will be tried by Gov. Juan Pérez de Tolosa for inciting these murders and executed the next day.

Although the Welsers will continue to hold legal title to Venezuela for another 10 years—their lease does not officially lapse until April 13, 1556—for all practical purposes their influence extends little beyond the mid-1540s when the Spaniards reassume de facto government over this region.

CONQUEST OF CHILE (1540–1553)

In 1539, the veteran conquistador Pedro de Valdivia seeks permission from Francisco Pizarro to forsake his retirement as a widowed Peruvian landowner in the Canela Valley with a small mine at Porco (Bolivia) and, instead, organize a new expedition to secure the territory known as "Nuevo Toledo"—modern Chile—which successfully resisted Almagro's entry four years previously. Despite receiving Pizarro's grudging approval and appointment as Nuevo Toledo's future lieutenant governor, the 39-year-old Valdivia must sell his estate; he then finds few recruits willing to depart conquered Peru to make an arduous trek down the coastal deserts into the forbidding Chilean landscape. Insufficient funds furthermore oblige him to forge a partnership with a rich financial backer, the recently arrived Spanish merchant Francisco Martínez. Valdivia, moreover, will be burdened with Pizarro's former secretary, the impecunious 25-year-old Pedro Sancho de Hoz, who holds a license from the Crown to colonize the distant Strait of Magellan. He therefore will be released from debtor's prison in Lima to overtake the expedition.

JANUARY 20, 1540. Valdivia departs Cuzco with only 10 or 11 soldiers, less than 100 native porters, and a 32-year-old Spanish widow named Inés Suárez as his consort to initiate his campaign. Hoping to secure a permanent foothold in Chile, they are accompanied by a herd of domestic livestock and carry sacks of seeds for planting crops.

En route, Valdivia gathers several hundred additional porters and attracts another 140 fighting men into his ranks, especially after encountering a defeated 70-man Spanish company at Tarapacá that is retreating out of the Andes under the 29-year-old captain Francisco de Villagra, as well as 25 men under Francisco de Aguirre from Tarija in April.

AUGUST 1540. Pedro Sancho de Hoz, having overtaken the expedition in the Atacama Desert, creeps into Valdivia's tent to assassinate him and assume overall command, but finding only Inés Suárez inside, he is arrested.

OCTOBER 26, 1540. Two months after penetrating into Diaguita territory in the Copiapó Valley, Valdivia formally takes possession of all Chilean territory on behalf of the Crown and, under Pizarro's authority, rechristens these lands as "Nueva Extremadura" in honor of his own natal province in Spain. The headwaters of the Copiapó River where this event takes place will consequently be remembered as the Valle de la Posesión.

DECEMBER 1540. Foundation of Santiago. Valdivia's weary army pushes into the long Mapocho Valley, which is framed by snowy Andean peaks to its north and the lesser heights of Cuesta del Prado to its south, and rests at a small farming community nestled between the foot of rocky Huelén Hill—which the conquistador renames Santa Lucía—and the southern bank of the Mapocho River, itself a tributary of the larger Maipó or Maipú. Detachments are sent throughout this fertile landscape, encountering a mild climate very different from the Atacama Desert and submission from thousands of docile Picunche natives.

Recognizing his base camp's strategic value—set amid bountiful terrain and approachable only through narrow passes—Valdivia decides to summon the regional chieftains and elevate it on February 12, 1541, into a permanent capital named Santiago del Nuevo Extremo or “Saint James of the New Extremadura.” Over the next 12 days, plots are distributed among 126 of his followers and a municipal council is appointed. In June, Valdivia assumes office as the self-appointed “governor” of Chile, throwing off Pizarro's authority.

Gold is soon discovered at nearby Marga Marga, and ship construction commences at Corcón to establish maritime contacts with the main Spanish concentration in Peru.

AUGUST 10, 1541. Valdivia strikes southward with 60 riders to assist the beleaguered shipyard at the mouth of the Aconcagua River, leaving behind a garrison of 32 horsemen, 18 harquebusiers, and 350 Peruvian natives to hold his capital at Santiago.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1541. At 3:00 a.m., Santiago is surprised by several thousand Mapuche warriors under their toqui or “chieftain” Michimalonco. They burn down the Spaniards' daub-and-wattle huts and kill 4 defenders along with 15 mounts before finally being repelled after nine hours of desperate fighting. Shaken by this assault, Valdivia subsequently dispatches his subordinate Alonso Monroy overland to Peru with a small party to beseech assistance and reinforcements, while the survivors erect stout fortress-like homes amid the city's ashes.

FEBRUARY 9, 1552. Foundation of Valdivia. After disembarking at the mouth of the Calle-Calle River with a small army and forging inland, Valdivia approaches a native city named Carmenca, 12 miles from the ocean, whose beautiful orchards and broad central avenue so excite his soldiers' admiration that, as they draw near, they spontaneously begin shouting “here shall be founded the city of Valdivia!” Given the site's good defensive qualities, thanks to encircling swamps and streams, as well as a sheltered anchorage capable of receiving both seaborne and river traffic, the governor agrees to establish a permanent outpost.

The settlement is christened Santa María la Blanca de Valdivia or the “White Saint Mary of Valdivia” (Saint Mary of the Snows, better known as the “White Saint Mary,” being chosen as its patron saint), and within a short time, the governor grants plots to 100 of his Spanish followers, the Crown confirming the city's newfound status on March 9, 1554.

Having secured the most densely populated, sedentary kingdoms of Mexico, Peru, Colombia, and Venezuela, the Spaniards now turn their efforts to creating a whole new colonial society in the New World by concentrating on erecting cities, farms, and businesses. Military activity is reduced to carrying out exploratory probes against the more remote nomadic tribes and extinguishing occasional flare-ups of internal strife.

APRIL 10, 1541. Mixtón War. In northern New Galicia (modern Zacatecas, Mexico), the hitherto pacific Caxcán Indians have for several months refused to pay tribute to the Spaniards. A contingent under Miguel de Ibarra therefore enters their district but is attacked on April 10—during a solar eclipse—and defeated by warriors from Nochistlán; only the Spanish captain and two of his men escape from this ambush with their lives.

Rebellion thereupon grips the nearby towns of Tlaltenango, Juchipila, and Teocaltiche, and 10,000 natives soon gather atop Nochistlán Heights under their leader Tenamaxtle (called “Diego el Zacateco” by the Spaniards). Their example is emulated by the more contentious Tecuexe and Coca peoples as far southwest as the Nayarit Range, all being members of the much larger, semi-nomadic Chichimec nation. Through brutal landgrabs and the imposition of their strange new culture, the conquistadores have alienated most of these far-flung tribesmen, whose spiritual leaders furthermore promise their warriors divine rewards for any extraordinary feats performed during the forthcoming struggle.

After Spanish settlers are pushed south, back into central Jalisco, reinforcements begin rushing to their aid from other parts of Mexico. The first such company under Lt. Gov. Cristóbal de Oñate is defeated, however, while a second led by the veteran commander Pedro de Alvarado fares little better. Twice repulsed while attempting to fight his way up Yahualica Ravine, Alvarado is accidentally crushed on July 1 by the falling horse of his scribe Baltasar de Montoya, dying three days later in Guadalajara, thus dissolving this second relief expedition.

Emboldened by these successes, Tenamaxtle ventures farther south out of his mountain fasts, eventually attacking the city of Guadalajara itself on September 28 at its original site (a native town formerly called Tlacotán, located three miles west of modern Tlacotlán). Despite heavy losses, the garrison manages to resist this incursion, although, once these throngs of attackers withdraw leaving behind thousands of dead from disease and malnourish-ment, the garrison's 63 frightened Spanish householders decide to abandon this locale and transfer their capital 15 miles farther southwest behind a defensible ravine in the safer Atemajac Valley (where modern Guadalajara now stands).

On October 22, the viceroy Antonio de Mendoza at last quits Mexico City with an army of 300 Spanish riders, 200 infantry, 50 harquebusiers, a like number of crossbowmen, plus perhaps as many as 50,000 native auxiliaries—who in a special dispensation are permitted to wield Iberian weaponry, ride horses, and enslave rebel Indians during the ensuing campaign. This host is joined by further contingents during its march northwestward and, after scattering a rebel concentration at Payacuarán, arrives before Tenamaxtle's mountain stronghold of Nochistlán on November 19. Although only commanding 12,000 Caxcán supporters, the latter refuses a surrender demand the next day. De Mendoza therefore cuts off the defenders' water supply and by November 24 succeeds in fighting his way to the top, capturing 8,000 prisoners—among them, Tenamaxtle.

Rebel survivors then make a final desperate stand at nearby El Mixtón de Juchipila, atop Coína or Coinan Peak, where de Mendoza again calls for their surrender. The defenders ask to speak to their captive leader first, but when Tenamaxtle is brought forth, they instead free him with a bold surprise attack. Furious, the viceroy orders El Mixtón besieged and its stone walls pounded with artillery. On December 7, native turncoats guide a Spanish column to the summit via a hidden route. The next dawn the garrison is overwhelmed, and some 1,500 Chichimecs are slain during the initial onslaught. Later, many of the 3,000 prisoners are savagely executed as a warning against further rebelliousness.

Although Tenamaxtle succeeds in escaping from this massacre atop El Mixtón, the battle brings large-scale hostilities to a virtual close. Thousands of Indians have died or been enslaved, and a string of small keeps are subsequently established along the camino real or "king's highway" throughout the area to maintain an uneasy peace. Nevertheless, minor raiding persists for another half century.

JUNE 26, 1541. Almagro's Revolt. In Lima on this Sunday morning, a score of embittered supporters of Diego de Almagro the Younger force their way into the undefended palace of Francisco Pizarro and hack the 63-year-old marqués to death, along with his half brother Francisco Martín de Alcántara. This uprising has been prompted by the fact that former supporters of Almagro's father, executed three years previously (see "April 26, 1538" entry in "Conquest of Peru"), have been systematically excluded from the division of Peru's spoils. In a desperate gamble, they proclaim Almagro's teenage son of this same name—the product of a liaison with a native woman from Panama—as the new governor and captain-general.

Young Almagro is soon opposed by the royal envoy Cristóbal Vaca de Castro, who lands in northern Peru and is joined by an army under Alonso de Alvarado, loyal to the dead Pizarro. They press southward together, their ranks swelling with many other adherents, until the two factions finally confront each other at Chupas, just outside Huamanga. A pitched battle is fought here on September 16, 1542, resulting in Almagro's defeat and flight. He is overtaken with a few lieutenants in the Yucay Valley, 25 miles from Cuzco, and carried into that city to be executed. Some of his followers find sanctuary at the fugitive Manco's jungle camps, repaying their reception by instructing the Incas in Spanish tactics.

JUNE 1542. Juan Rodríguez Cabrillo departs Puerto de la Navidad (Mexico) with two ships to continue de Ulloa's exploration of Baja California—also known as "Cardona Island." Rodríguez Cabrillo travels up that peninsula's west coast during the summer months of July through September, making disembarkations at Cabo San Lucas, Cedros Island, and in San Quintín Bay before dying among the Channel Islands, leaving his survivors to return into Navidad by April 14, 1543.

SEPTEMBER 1544. The first Peruvian viceroy, Blasco Núñez Vela—in office for only four months—is deposed by Lima's audiencia for his heavy-handed zeal in implementing Spain's New Laws, designed to protect the Indians. Gonzalo Pizarro enters Lima the next month, having rallied popular support because of fears of an alleged Indian uprising, and compels the viceroy shortly thereafter to quit the capital.

Núñez Vela lands in northern Peru and makes his way toward Quito, organizing a rival government. Pizarro eventually marches north against him in the summer of 1545, defeating the viceroy and his followers on January 18, 1546, at the Battle of Añaquito north of Quito. Núñez Vela is killed during this confrontation, leaving Pizarro as undisputed master of all of Peru.

New Laws

Emperor Charles V's proclamation of the Nuevas Leyes or "New Laws" on November 20, 1542, to govern his American empire can be said to have marked the beginning of the end of the Spanish conquest. After years of debate at court about the cruelties being endured by so many conquered peoples, the emperor decreed that henceforth the natives of the New World could not be enslaved during wars, rebellions, or under any other pretext. This prohibition curtailed all incentives for further military forays into fringe territories, many of which were now being conducted merely to seize hapless tribesmen for sale as slaves. Large-scale Spanish campaigns therefore soon began to wind down.

The New Laws moreover did not allow Crown or Church officials to be assigned native laborers under the encomienda system, while those conquistadores who did enjoy this privilege could no longer pass their title along to their heirs. This practice was supposed to die out within a generation. Various other reforms were enacted as well, such as ensuring that natives who lived near highways were not pressed into service as unpaid tamemes or "porters." Encomienda vassals also could not be marched any great distance from their homes to serve their Spanish masters.

Hard-bitten veterans living throughout the Americas came to resent these measures, most especially their inability to bequeath their encomiendas to their children. Reaction proved so angry, especially in Peru, that Charles V rescinded Article 30 of his New Laws on October 20, 1545, allowing for some encomiendas to be inherited once more. All his other reforms, however, were retained, gradually slackening Spanish military aggressiveness and adventurism. Some frontier outposts may have received a dispensation so that the Chichimecan nomads of northern Mexico, for example, could still be hunted as slaves into the early 1600s. But the days of conquistador armies marching in search of native kingdoms were gone forever.

LATE 1544. The fugitive Inca emperor Manco is treacherously murdered in the presence of his young son at Vitcos while playing horseshoes with Diego Méndez and six other Spanish renegades to whom he has given shelter. The latter then attempt to ride into Cuzco to claim credit for this dastardly deed but are overtaken in the jungle by troops under Rimachi Yupanqui and slowly put to death.

APRIL 1545. An immensely wealthy silver deposit is discovered at Potosí (Bolivia).

AUTUMN 1546. A royal emissary from Spain, the licentiate Pedro de la Gasca, advances into northern Peru, gathering adherents against the usurper Gonzalo Pizarro, whom he pronounces guilty of treason in December of that same year.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1546. After probing northward from Nochistlán into the central Mexican highlands, a band of Spanish explorers under Juan de Tolosa—alias Barbalonga or “Long-beard”—discovers an immensely wealthy silver ore deposit at the foot of a rocky promontory, which de Tolosa nicknames La Bufa (Basque for “Pig’s Bladder”). Less than a year and a half later, this site will be settled and become the city of Zacatecas.

OCTOBER 21, 1547. Gonzalo Pizarro defeats a royalist army under Alonso de Alvarado at Huarina on the southeastern shores of Lake Titicaca.

APRIL 9, 1548. Jaquijahuana. Despite the Huarina setback, Gasca’s royalist army succeeds in driving toward Cuzco, and on this day both armies meet on Jaquijahuana or Sacsahuaman Plain, a few miles west of the city. Some 45 of Gonzalo Pizarro’s closest followers are killed during this battle, while most of the remainder runs across the field to join the royalist ranks. Gasca loses only a single man during this fighting and orders Pizarro executed the next day, thus restoring Madrid’s hold over Peru.

APRIL 22, 1550. This Sunday, the rebellious Nicaraguan brothers Hernando and Pedro de Contreras (Pedrarias Dávila’s grandsons) arrive aboard two frigates at Ancón Bay, five miles southwest of Panama City. Disembarking 262 men, Hernando surprises its sleeping residents at midnight, while Pedro sails into Panama’s harbor the next morning, seizing the two best anchored vessels and crippling the rest.

Their intent is to intercept Gasca, who is bearing a large amount of Peruvian treasure, on his homeward passage toward Spain; however, this royal officer has already proceeded overland for Nombre de Dios two days previously, accompanied by the Panamanian governor Sancho de Clavijo. Finding only 12 chests of gold and 1,000 silver bars—half of Gasca’s bullion—Hernando de Contreras commandeers 40 horses to set off in pursuit, while his second-in-command Juan Bermejo trails along with almost 200 men on foot; Capt. Rodrigo Salguero leads another 25 down a secondary road toward Cruces.

During their absence, Martín Ruiz de Marchena organizes the Panamanian citizenry to resist the rebels’ return, fighting a stiff action around the main square when Bermejo’s infantry reappears at midnight of April 23–24 (having been deterred by a royalist muster farther north at Capira). Driven a mile southwest on to Matanza Hill by dawn, the weary rebel foot soldiers are then reengaged between 8:00 a.m. and 9:00 a.m. and slaughtered over the next several hours; 37 survivors are led back into Panama to be garroted. Learning of this defeat, Hernando de Contreras attempts to circle past the city with his riders and rejoin Pedro’s ships but slips down an embankment and drowns—his head is later displayed in the city. His brother’s vessels are subsequently run down and beaten by a flotilla under Captain Zamorano, and their crews are executed.

NOVEMBER 13, 1553. Hernández Girón’s Revolt. The Spanish citizens of Cuzco rebel against Madrid’s continual efforts to introduce pro-Indian legislation, this time under a respected hacendado or “estate-owner” named Francisco Hernández Girón. The cities of Huamanga and Arequipa soon join his insurrection, and for the next year, the Spaniards of the southern Andes live in a curious state of rebellion, loudly proclaiming their loyalty to Charles V while demanding a freer hand in exploiting the region’s native populace. A royalist army raised by the audiencia or “high tribunal” at Lima eventually defeats Hernández Girón on October 8, 1554, at the Battle of Pucará, north of Lake Titicaca, capturing him at Huamanga in November and beheading him by December.

JANUARY 18, 1567. A plot by certain Peruvian mestizos (offspring of Spaniards and Indians), who call themselves montañeses or “mountaineers,” to assassinate Peninsular Spaniards and seize their lands is foiled at both Cuzco and Lima.

MARCH 1572. A Spanish envoy, Atilano de Anaya, is murdered while en route to visit the new Inca emperor Tupac Amaru at Vilcabamba.

Indians with a native prisoner, from Nueva crónica y buen gobierno by Felipe Huamán Poma de Ayala. (Author's Collection)

APRIL 14, 1572. Vilcabamba. In retaliation for de Anaya's slaying, the Peruvian viceroy Francisco de Toledo ends the Spaniards' longstanding truce with the remnants of the Inca empire by declaring war against Tupac Amaru, then two weeks later dispatches an advance unit from Cuzco to prepare the way for an invasion of their last surviving outpost in remote Vilcabamba. That column is followed by a main army of 250 mounted Spaniards under Martín Hurtado de Arbieta and is accompanied by thousands of native warriors and auxiliaries. A second force of 70 Spaniards under Gaspar Arias de Sotelo is to close in from Abancay, while a third force of 50 under Luis de Toledo Pimentel is to occupy the Cusambi Pass to prevent any escape.

Thirteen miles short of Vitcos, at a place named Coyao Chaca, the 50-man Spanish vanguard under Capt. Martín García de Loyola blunders into a native ambush on June 1, obliging the attackers to retire after two and a half hours of heavy fighting. Three days later, the Spaniards resume their advance; finding Vitcos abandoned, they push higher into the valley. After resting at Pampaconas from June 3 to 16, Hurtado de Arbieta drives deeper into its jungle and learns from an Inca traitor that Tupac Amaru's army is fortified at Huayna Pucará, which is 9 or 10 miles away. The Spanish expedition comes within sight of that place on June 20, and the next dawn a flanking party climbs unseen to some nearby heights, obliging the surprised defenders to retreat toward their keep. When Hurtado de Arbieta follows up with a vigorous frontal assault, the Inca general Colla Topa abandons his position. The same occurs the next day when a Spanish scouting party comes upon another fortification called Machu Pucará, which is forsaken after only token opposition.

At 10:00 a.m. on June 24, Hurtado de Arbieta's army marches into empty, smoldering Vilcabamba. Flying columns are immediately dispatched to overtake the scattering Indians, and after a lengthy pursuit, García de Loyola succeeds in tracking down and capturing Tupac Amaru along with his last surviving general, Huallpa Yupanqui. The Spaniards return triumphantly into Cuzco on September 21, and three days later the last Inca emperor is beheaded on Viceroy de Toledo's orders.

As Spain's settlers forsake their original Antillean outposts for the rich new kingdoms of the American mainland, traders from other western European nations begin drifting into the void. Madrid will vainly attempt to stem this transatlantic traffic into the West Indies, increasing the envy already taking hold against the Spaniards for their rising fortunes. Old World conflicts soon are transposed to the New World, beginning during the first half of the 16th century, when the rulers of Spain and France fight a series of intermittent conflicts known collectively as the Habsburg-Valois Wars (so named for their respective dynastic surnames). These are largely territorial disputes originating in Italy and Flanders that flare into open conflict during 1494–1495, 1499–1505, 1508–1514, 1515–1516, 1521–1526, 1526–1529, 1536–1538, 1542–1544, and 1552–1559, but which actually constitute an almost continuous period of strife from 1494 to 1559.

The coronation of 20-year-old Charles V as Holy Roman Emperor in October 1520 intensifies this rivalry because—already being king of Spain and duke of the Netherlands—his dominions now completely encircle France. The ensuing round of hostilities from 1521 to 1526, called the First Franco-Spanish War, features numerous depredations by French privateers off the coasts of Spain, the Canaries, and the Azores Islands as they waylay vessels bound to and from the Americas. One such pair of ships, bound from recently conquered Mexico with exotic Aztec spoils, is captured in 1522 by Giovanni da Verrazano or Verrazzano—a Florentine-born navigator in the service of Jean Ango of Dieppe—and the fabulous beauty of the spoils helps to persuade François I to sponsor his own exploration of North America in quest of a Northwest Passage to Asia.

Verrazano makes landfall with his 50-man, 100-ton caravel Dauphine near what will later become known as the Carolinas in late February or early March 1524, coasting northward and penetrating through the Narrows into what is today New York City's Upper Bay, hoping that it might prove to be the ephemeral waterway leading to Cathay. After a brief survey, he exits and continues his continental exploration as far northeastward as Newfoundland before regaining Dieppe on July 8 and submitting a favorable report to the king. However, it is not until after that monarch is captured at the Battle of Pavia and compelled to sign the Treaty of Madrid on January 15, 1526, and then responds by forging the so-called Cognac or Clementine League on May 2—uniting France with Florence, Venice, Pope Clement VII, and eventually England—that another three-year round of fighting explodes and the first French corsairs actually strike out across the ocean to make attacks in the West Indies proper.

MARCH 1526. The 130-ton Spanish galleon San Gabriel of Rodrigo de Acuña, separated by storms from Juan Garci Jofre de Loaysa and Juan Sebastián de Elcano's seven-ship expedition bound from La Coruña (Galicia) into the South Pacific via the Strait of Magellan, is attacked by three French vessels off the coast of Brazil before anchoring off Santa Catarina Island on March 26 to recuperate over the next few months.

LATE 1527. After touching at Puerto Rico, the English ship Mary of Guildford under the explorer John Rutt or Rout—who has previously visited Newfoundland and the North American shoreline in quest of the fabled Northwest Passage—arrives at the city of Santo Domingo to trade and is amiably received by the city's Spanish inhabitants. However, after the authorities in the harbor castle fire a round at Rutt's anchored ship, he stands back out to sea, disembarking nearby a few days later with 30 or 40 armed men seeking to barter goods for provisions. When this request is refused, the Englishmen pillage a plantation and then depart.

SUMMER 1528. The French corsair vessel Sainte Anne out of La Rochelle, which is guided by the French crossbowman of the Cartier-Roberval expedition in Canada.

(Canadian Department of National Defense)

Portuguese pilot Diogo Ingenios and accompanied by a Spanish caravel seized off Lanzarote in the Canary Islands, traverses the Atlantic and appears near Margarita Island, then briefly seizes the pearl fisheries on June 24 at Cubagua (Venezuela).

Apparently, this same pair of raiders later attacks and sinks a Spanish caravel near Puerto Rico's Cape Rojo on August 11 before sacking and torching the inland hamlet of San Germán at the mouth of the Añasco River the next day, then standing away back across the Atlantic by October. San Germán's residents rebuild and fortify their hamlet.

AUGUST 3, 1529. In Europe, Franco-Spanish relations are temporarily patched up after a month of negotiations by the signing of the Treaty of Cambrai (known as the "Ladies' Peace" because it is negotiated between Charles V's aunt, Margaret of Austria, and the French queen mother, Louise of Savoy).

DECEMBER 3, 1530. Portugal Claims Brazil. Fearful of French designs upon Brazil, which include a few trading outposts that are already beginning to dot its coastline, King João III decides to supersede Portugal's sporadic private efforts to rescue Brazil by dispatching a royal expedition of two ships, two caravels, and a galleon bearing 400 men under his retainer Martim Afonso de Sousa and his brother Pêro Lopes de Sousa.

This expedition arrives from Lisbon off Pernambuco on January 31, 1531, and sights Cape Santo Agostinho the next day. Shortly thereafter, the Portuguese capture three French ships laden with rare woods and other Brazilian produce. The commodore thereupon detaches his subordinate Diogo Leite with two caravels to reconnoiter northeastward from Pernambuco, and João de Sousa is sent back to Europe with a report for the monarch; the main body departs southwestward by February 17 to continue its exploration. They enter Baía de Todos os Santos and encounter a long-time Portuguese resident named Diogo Álvares Correia, who has married a Paraguaçu woman and is known among the Indians as Cararmurú or the "God of Thunder."

APRIL 30, 1531. At midday, de Sousa's expedition enters Guanabara Bay—dubbed Rio de Janeiro three decades previously by Amerigo Vespucci—and because of its vast, sheltered expanse and abundant resources, the Portuguese explorer decides to pause and refresh his ships. A tiny fortification is erected beside his careening beach, and peaceable relations are established with the local Tamoio natives. When de Sousa finally departs on August 1, a small group of Portuguese remain behind, although this foothold will not prosper and is soon abandoned.

AUGUST 12, 1531. De Sousa's expedition gains Cananéia Bay, where other Portuguese and Spanish ships are found lying at anchor. Also found is a decades-old resident named Cosme Fernandes, a Jewish convert and university graduate—hence referred to as the Bacharel or "Bachelor"—who was marooned by Vespucci's expedition as long ago as January 22, 1502. He has since married a Carijó princess. There is also a deserter from Rodrigo de Acuña's 1526 visit, named Francisco de Chávez.

Familiar with the native trade patterns, they inform de Sousa of rich mines lying far up the Iguaçu River in Incan territory, so the commodore dispatches 40 harquebusiers and 40 crossbowmen upstream on September 1 under Capt. Pêro Lobo Pinheiro, along with native auxiliaries and with de Chávez as their guide—none of whom will ever return; they are instead lured out into the Paraná River and massacred by tribal warriors.

Unaware of their fate, de Sousa puts to sea again on September 26 to continue his reconnaissance as far southwest as the River Plate estuary.

JANUARY 8, 1532. Having wrecked his flagship, de Sousa's depleted expedition returns into Cananéia Bay to recuperate before setting out southward 10 days later to establish a permanent Portuguese colony at what is then known as the Porto do Escravos or "Slaves Port."

Appearing outside its bar by January 20, de Sousa's vessels cross over after two storm-tossed days to begin erecting a fort and town, from whence they hope to probe inland and finally reach the ephemeral mines of the Incas. This settlement is christened São Vicente—January 22 being St. Vincent's feast day on the Church calendar.

MAY 12, 1532. Having departed from São Vicente to return to Portugal for more colonists, a squadron under Pêro Lopes de Sousa learns of a 30-man French outpost recently installed on Itamaracá Island by the Marseillan privateer Jean Barrau du Perret, commander of the 120-ton Pèlerine. He therefore interrupts his homeward passage to capture it after an

Martim Afonso de Sousa consulting at Piaçagüera Bay with its long-time Portuguese resident João Ramalho and the Indian chieftain Tibiriçá before striking inland to found his second settlement at Piratininga, early October 1532. Martim Afonso de Sousa

This Portuguese courtier was born at Vila Viçosa toward the end of the 15th century. His father had been a loyal retainer in the household of Bragança, so young Martim was first made a page to Duke Jaime's son, Teodósio. He later became a page under the crown prince João, who would ascend the Portuguese throne in December 1521 as King João III.

At that time, de Sousa was absent with the retinue that accompanied the widowed Queen Leonor de Austria back to her native Spain. He stayed on there to serve under the emperor Charles V and fought against the French. De Sousa also married a Spanish lady, Ana Pimentel, with whom he would have five children. In 1525, he was recalled to Portugal by João III. De Sousa's cousin António de Ataíde, a childhood friend of the young monarch, was ennobled as Conde de Castanheira and appointed ambassador to France. His influence helped de Sousa obtain the titles of prado and alcoentre, as well as a knighthood in the Ordem de Cristo.

De Sousa also displayed an interest in mathematics and navigation. He started studying in 1527 under the young royal tutor Pedro Nunes who was named royal cosmographer two years later. De Sousa's interest helped him obtain command of the Brazilian expedition when it was proposed by his cousin to the king in 1530. De Sousa's two years of exploration were judged so satisfactory that he was rewarded on his return with the title of governor general of the Portuguese East Indies.

He set sail from Lisbon on March 12, 1534, to assume office in the Far East. His first term proved highly successful, with the creation of a fortress at Diu in Cambodia and vigorous campaigns against the rajah of Calcutta. Therefore, after de Sousa's tenure expired in 1538, he was named for a second time late in 1541. His squadron reached Goa by May 6, 1542, but his second administration was marred by corruption and dissension. The Portuguese even fought among themselves, and de Sousa was recalled in 1545. He returned under suspicion of financial irregularities and was never again employed by the Crown. He died in Lisbon on July 26, 1564.

18-day siege and supplants this stronghold with a Portuguese garrison before proceeding out across the Atlantic.

OCTOBER 10, 1532. De Sousa leads a group of settlers inland from São Vicente guided by the Portuguese castaways João Ramalho and Antonio Rodrigues—they have married the daughters of the local Guaná tribal chieftains Tibiriças and Piquerobi and are therefore familiar with the terrain and trusted by the natives. Pushing through the dense mangroves along the Quilombo River Valley, they ascend the formidable Serra do Mar onto the Piratininga Plain to found a second outpost (which will eventually become the modern city of São Paulo).

JANUARY 1533. João de Sousa reaches São Vicente from Portugal, bringing letters from the king informing Martim Afonso de Sousa that he is to be relieved, but he is also to be rewarded with one of the 15 new “hereditary captaincies” into which Brazil will be divided, depending on whether he chooses to remain in the New World or return to Portugal.

MAY 1533. Martim Afonso de Sousa departs São Vicente, leaving his brother Pêro in charge of his properties while he returns to Lisbon, where he will be promoted to governor general of the Portuguese East Indies.

Shortly before leaving São Vicente, Martim Afonso de Sousa learns of the annihilation of Pêro Lobo’s lost expedition up the Iguaçu River, which he believes has been engineered by the Bacharel Cosme Fernandes and his Spanish associates. He therefore suggests to the acting military commander who is left behind—the mill owner and militia captain Pêro de Góis da Silveira—that they be arrested.

SUMMER 1533. A body of Portuguese troops under Captain de Góis advances on Iguape to detain Fernandes, who has taken up residence there with his family near his Spanish-born friend Ruy García Mosquera. Apprised of the Portuguese captain’s intent, the defenders rally their numerous retainers, other disgruntled residents, as well as some 150 native archers, and prepare to resist.

To better do so, Fernandes and García Mosquera seize a French privateer anchored off Cananéia and land its artillery to prepare an ambush at a trench that they have dug, covering Icapara Bar outside Iguape (modern Trincheira Bay). De Góis’s disembarkation is therefore crushed, 80 of his troops being slain and himself wounded and captured, after which Fernandes and García Mosquera use his ship to mount a destructive counterattack against São Vicente. They thereupon decamp beyond Portuguese jurisdiction, along with their followers.

MAY 10, 1534. The 42-year-old explorer Jacques Cartier arrives off Newfoundland with two ships and 61 men from Saint Malo (France), searching for the Northwest Passage to Asia. After charting part of what are today the shorelines of New Brunswick and Quebec, he returns to Europe by September 5.

AUGUST 9, 1535. Cartier returns to Newfoundland with his 120-ton flagship Grande Hermine, the 60-ton Petite Hermine, and the 40-ton Émerillon and penetrates the Saint Lawrence Seaway as far southwest as Hochelaga (modern Montreal) by October 2 before retiring to winter at the Saint Charles River mouth (modern Quebec City). Although disappointed at not discovering a passage all the way through to the Far East, the Frenchman is nonetheless convinced that this new territory is “rich and wealthy in precious stones,” so he kidnaps a dozen natives before weighing anchor on May 6, 1536, carrying them to Saint Malo by July 16. Cartier’s hope is to spark interest in this new land and thus be granted Crown permission to found a colony, which he mistakenly believes to be called Canada—actually the Huron-Iroquois word for “village.”

LATE AUTUMN 1535. Relations between Paris and Madrid again begin to deteriorate regarding disputes in Savoy and Milan, so numerous French corsairs begin taking up station off the western approaches to Spain and threatening returning ships—especially those bearing treasure from recently conquered Peru. As a result, the Spanish Crown orders the establishment of an armada de la guardia de la carrera de Indias or “guard fleet for the Indies route.”

FEBRUARY 1536. War officially erupts between France and Spain when the former occupies Savoy and penetrates the Piedmont, to which the latter replies in June by invading Provence.

NOVEMBER 1536. A lone French corsair vessel cuts out a Spanish ship anchored at Chagres (Panama).

JANUARY 1537. Emperor Charles V and King François I agree to a short-lived truce.

FEBRUARY 1537. Apparently the same single French corsair ship is sighted between Cartagena (Colombia) and Nombre de Dios (Panama), where it captures a Spanish merchantman near the latter port as it is arriving with a consignment of horses from Santo Domingo.

MARCH 15, 1537. This same French vessel materializes before Havana, prompting Gov. Gonzalo de Guzmán to order three of five 200-ton Spanish merchantmen anchored in his port to sortie under Lt. Juan Velázquez. They overtake and trap the shallow-draught intruder inside the harbor at Mariel (then known as the “Puerto de Tablas”), only to run aground when the French vessel escapes out to sea, and so are boarded when this raider reverses course. Two of the Spanish prizes are burned and the third manned by the triumphant Frenchmen, who return before Havana to extort ransom from its hapless villagers. Other French trespassers are also sighted near Santo Domingo.

MAY 31, 1537. A French corsair vessel enters Santiago de Cuba’s harbor and carries off some merchantmen.

JUNE 14, 1537. A dozen Spanish warships and two caravels sortie from Seville under Capt. Gen. Blasco Núñez Vela, becoming the first fleet of warships officially assigned to escort an outward-bound American convoy, reinforce garrisons throughout the Caribbean, lift the blockade of Havana, and then return to Spain.

OCTOBER 1537. A French ship and auxiliary out of Bayonne, bearing a total of 150 men, arrive off the Lesser Antilles to prowl the Spanish West Indies.

SPRING 1538. This pair of Bayonne ships raid Ocoa, Puerto Hermoso, and La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti), bringing maritime traffic off Santo Domingo to almost a complete standstill.

APRIL 4, 1538. The large Bayonne ship pillages a Spanish brigantine exiting from Santiago de Cuba, then the next day penetrates its harbor and engages the caravel Magdalena of Diego Pérez as well as a small two-gun battery ashore. The shallow draught of Pérez’s craft allows him to gain the Frenchmen’s quarter, though, peppering the intruders with his four culverins from 11:00 a.m. until they finally withdraw an hour past midnight on April 6, having sustained about a dozen casualties. Three Spaniards die during this fray, and the French ship eventually exits Santiago Bay three days later.

MAY 1538. A French corsair ship appears near Havana and robs several houses and churches ashore. Upon learning of this attack at the island’s capital of Santiago de Cuba, 500 miles farther east-southeast, the new captain general, Hernando de Soto, dispatches the military engineer Mateo Aceituno with 100 men. Within a few weeks of their arrival, they throw up the 6-gun fort, Castillo de la Fuerza, to guard Havana’s entrance channel (see “June 7, 1538” entry in “Expansion beyond Mexico”).

JUNE 1538. San Germán de Puerto Rico is sacked and burned by 80 French raiders from the Bayonne ship. During their retirement back toward their boats, they are overtaken during a rainstorm by 30 mounted Spaniards, who attack while the Frenchmen’s powder is wet. Fifteen raiders are therefore killed and another three taken prisoner, who then are exchanged for San Germán’s looted church bells, plus other booty.

JUNE 15, 1538. In Europe, French and Spanish plenipotentiaries agree upon a 10-year truce negotiated at Nice by Pope Paul III, although it is some time before word of this cessation of hostilities reaches the New World.

EARLY JUNE 1540. French corsairs disembark from a single ship near San Germán de Puerto Rico, sacking and burning the town, along with its outlying district.

AUGUST 1540. A leaking, 400-ton English ship with a French pilot commandeers a Spanish merchantman laden with sugar and hides off Cape Tiburón (southwestern Haiti), setting its crew ashore before transferring aboard their prize. They then send their leaking vessel to the bottom and sail home in safety.

MAY 1541. As Franco-Spanish relations again begin to fray over differences regarding the succession in Milan, a 35-man French corsair ransacks a Spanish caravel off Puerto Rico. This same craft then sinks another victim off Mona Island before disembarking some men to loot ashore. It proceeds next to Cape de la Vela (Colombia) and robs a Spanish caravel of 7,000–8,000 ducats’ worth of pearls at Portete.

AUGUST 1541. Cartier returns to Canada with five ships, having brought an advance contingent of a few hundred settlers from France to establish a foothold for a new colony. The titular head of this enterprise—the impoverished, 41-year-old courtier Jean-François de La Rocque, Seigneur de Roberval—is to follow next year with many more colonists, hoping in the process to rebuild his fortune by serving as “lieutenant general of Canada” and exploiting its rich mineral deposits.

While awaiting his arrival, Cartier erects a small fort called Charlesbourg Royal at Cap Rouge, nine miles above present-day Quebec City, and explores the Saint Lawrence River until wintertime.

EARLY DECEMBER 1541. Thirteen well-armed French vessels ransack a Portuguese caravel off Guyana, then are joined by three other vessels to press deeper into the Caribbean and pillage the coastlines of Margarita Island, Curaçao, and the entrance to the Lake of Maracaibo (Venezuela).

JUNE 8, 1542. Roberval reaches Newfoundland with the ships Valentine, Sainte Anne, and Lèchefraye, bringing 100 more French colonists to join Cartier at Charlesbourg Royal (Quebec). Instead, he is surprised to meet his subordinate in the Newfoundland harbor of Saint John’s. Cartier had earlier abandoned this advance foothold because of the harshness of the past winter and the hostility from the Iroquois. Cartier refuses Roberval’s order to return to Canada with him, instead continuing toward France with his own survivors.

Undismayed by Cartier’s disobedience, Roberval proceeds to Charlesbourg Royal and reestablishes that outpost, then begins exploring Canada. However, although the population of his community is too numerous to be directly assaulted by the Indians, many of the French settlers are ill prepared to withstand the ensuing winter, and so they suffer cruelly from cold, famine, and disease. The next September (1543), they are retrieved by a rescue mission under Paul d’Austillon, Seigneur de Sauve-

Roberval

Jean-François de La Rocque is believed to have been born around 1500 at Carcassonne. His father was serving at that time as the city’s connétable or “governor,” being a well-connected member of the king’s household. Young Jean-François was raised at the royal court in the circle of the crown prince, François d’Angoulême. As they grew older, both young men campaigned together in Italy. They also hunted deer on the La Rocque estates in the Ardennes and Languedoc. When his parents died, Jean-François became Seigneur de Roberval. He also was knighted and made a flag-bearer in the king’s army.

This connection would save Roberval in 1535, when he was temporarily outlawed along with other Protestants. Although François I restored his childhood friend into his good graces by 1540, Roberval had lost his fortune. This financial need seems to have inspired his colonizing venture to Canada. On October 17, 1540, the king authorized him to establish a colony there, with fortified towns and churches to spread “the Holy Catholic faith.” To do so, Roberval was given a subsidy of 45,000 livres. François also allowed him to take criminals from jails to bolster his manpower. Roberval moreover received a royal commission as “viceroys and lieutenant general of Canada” on January 15, 1541.

Yet these measures were not enough. Although his pilot Jacques Cartier left that same May 1541 with a first contingent, Roberval remained in France to raise more money. He sold some of his properties, borrowed funds, and even associated with such piratical rovers as Bidoux de Lartigue. The English ambassador soon complained to François about Roberval’s illegal seizures of English ships, for which the king reproved him. The Spaniards were also uneasy about Roberval’s intentions, fearing a design against their American holdings.

Roberval finally set sail with three ships from La Rochelle on April 16, 1541. Although surprised to find Cartier retreating from Canada, he pressed on to establish his own foothold. He treated his colonists with much severity, and his success was so uncertain that Paul d’Austillon, Seigneur de Sauveterre and captain of the ship Sainte Anne, was sent to France that same autumn to ask for the king’s help. François signed an order on January 26, 1543, sanctioning a rescue mission.

After enduring a harsh winter, Roberval and his survivors happily left the next summer. The “gold” and “diamonds” that he carried home also proved worthless, so the expression “as false as Canadian diamonds” became popular. Roberval was given fortification work at Senlis near Paris in 1544, but struggled for the rest of his days against debt. His holdings were mortgaged in 1555, and his château threatened with seizure. Five years later, he emerged one night from a Calvinist meeting in Paris, only to be murdered by Catholic extremists at the corner of the Cimetière des Innocents.

terre, and France's North American aspirations will be entirely forsaken for the next 60 years.

MID-JULY 1542. In Europe, tensions once more escalate between France and Spain, the Pyrenees becoming the scene of clashes one month later, followed by open declarations of war by both nations before the end of August.

FEBRUARY 1543. Two French ships and a small auxiliary attack San Germán de Puerto Rico, burning it and making off with four caravels lying in its harbor. A pair of Spanish galleons and two lateen-rigged caravels on the neighboring island of Santo Domingo are manned with 250 volunteers and set out in pursuit under Ginés de Carrión, captain of the galleon San Cristóbal. Five days later he returns, having captured the enemy flagship and 40 of its crew, while sinking the smaller French consort.

Despite this victory, San Germán's inhabitants are too frightened to return to their dwellings, preferring instead to relocate their town to Santa María de los Remedios in Guadianilla Bay (modern Guayanilla).

JUNE 16, 1543. Antillean Sweep. Five French corsair ships and a smaller consort bearing 800 men assault Venezuela's Margarita Island, then the next month burn the once-rich pearl-fishing town of Nuevo Cádiz on adjoining Cubagua, whose population has already declined to scarcely 10 Spanish inhabitants because of the exhaustion of its pearl beds and the devastation suffered by a destructive hurricane on Christmas Day 1541.

According to some Spanish sources, these raiders are commanded by Roberval ("Robertval" or "Roberto Baal"), but the French raiders may have borne commissions from him or been intending to visit his Canadian colony on their homeward leg.

JULY 16, 1543. Four of these same large French corsair vessels and a smaller consort arrive undetected before Santa Marta (Colombia), landing between 400 and 500 men the next noon to occupy the port. They remain in possession for seven days, destroying everything of value before retiring with four bronze cannons and other booty.

JULY 24–25, 1543. Under cover of darkness, the French squadron—piloted into Cartagena's bay by a Spanish turncoat embittered at a punishment received from Lt. Gov. Alonso Vejines—deposits 450 raiders ashore, who then carry this Colombian port with ease in a three-pronged attack. Its newly consecrated bishop, Fr. Francisco de Santamaría y Benavides, and an overawed populace surrender 35,000 pesos in specie, plus another 2,500 from the royal coffers, before the enemy withdraws. The next month, the raiders are anchored off Cape de la Vela, selling their booty to local residents.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1543. A single 20-man vessel detached from this same French squadron pillages a rich Spanish merchantman off Santiago de Cuba, then attempts a disembarkation, only to be repelled by its two-gun battery under Andrés Zamora. The raider emerges from the bay and proceeds westward, intending to reunite with its main force off Isla de Pinos.

The French squadron, meanwhile, seizes five vessels in early October that are anchored off the new Spanish town of Santa María de los Remedios in Guadianilla Bay (modern Guayanilla), although the raiders are prevented from disembarking.

OCTOBER 31, 1543. The reunited, homeward-bound French squadron appears before Havana, disgorging more than 200 men at San Lázaro Inlet. Advancing across open country, the invaders are checked by fire from La Fuerza Fortress. They retreat toward their ships, leaving behind 20 dead. The rovers then depart the Caribbean altogether via the Straits of Florida.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1544. After an imperial army has fought its way to within sight of Paris, the Treaty of Crêpy is signed in Europe, marking an end to this latest round of Franco-Spanish hostilities. Although François I has been constrained by this treaty to recognize Spain's sovereignty in the Caribbean, some fighting will still persist in the New World. Cuba and Puerto Rico, in particular, continue to be harassed by French interlopers.

LATE OCTOBER 1544. Three French ships prowl past San Juan de Puerto Rico, landing at depleted San Germán to pillage and burn the town. Off Cape de la Vela (Colombia), another trio of French interlopers intercepts passing vessels; they also sell contraband items to local Spanish citizens.

1545. Five French corsair vessels and a small auxiliary surprise the new Colombian port town of Río-hacha (constituted only as of February 2), seizing five Spanish vessels lying in its roadstead. Unable to disembark, the raiders subsequently arrange a truce with its residents, eventually selling them 70 slaves. A similar visit by these same Frenchmen, albeit entirely peaceful, ensues at Santa Marta.

JANUARY 17, 1546. More than 100 French raiders under one “Hallebarde” disembark from a caravel and a smaller vessel. They ransack Baracoa in northeastern Cuba, scattering most of its inhabitants inland. The second of these Huguenot craft—after becoming separated in a storm—proceeds westward to Havana, where it extorts 700 ducats to spare its terrified citizenry’s dwellings.

APRIL 17, 1546. Hallebarde sneaks into Santiago de Cuba under cover of darkness, boarding a Spanish caravel at dawn that has recently arrived from Tierra Firme or the “Spanish Main” (modern Venezuela-Colombia). In little more than one hour, he carries this vessel out, with its crew still locked below decks, to loot at his leisure—an action described as “of great daring” by Gov. Antonio de Chávez.

JULY 25, 1547. Henri II ascends the throne of France.

SEPTEMBER 1547. A French ship approaches Santa Marta (Colombia) but retires when its 16-man boat crew is lured inshore and captured.

LATE MAY 1548. A French corsair vessel is sighted prowling off Santo Domingo.

AUGUST 1548. A French two-master sneaks into the harbor at Santa Marta under cover of darkness, and although crewed by only 40 men, sends a boarding party to seize Pedro Díaz’s merchantman in its roadstead. The next dawn, the rovers threaten to burn this prize if a ransom is not paid from the town. When local garrison commander Luis Manjarrés calls out his militiamen, the French bombard the town’s buildings throughout most of the day, killing two black slaves.

Shortly thereafter, these same attackers seize two Spanish caravels farther east off Cape de la Vela, as the caravels make from La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti) toward Nombre de Dios. Both Spanish craft are robbed and scuttled.

Galleons

Originally, this name did not refer to a specific type of vessel nor was it confined to ships from Spain. Rather, it was applied to a gradual evolution in 16th-century naval architecture, in which the stubby “round ships” and car-racks of the medieval age were replaced by longer, lower-hulled vessels. The Latin term galion had existed for centuries, but it was applied to different configurations in various countries. However, once commercial routes lengthened after the discovery of the New World, shipwrights throughout western Europe began launching “galleons” with more tapered profiles so that they could move more easily across ocean expanses.

No country had a greater incentive than Spain, especially after the conquests of Mexico and Peru during the 1520s and 1530s, which vastly increased the demands of its transatlantic traffic. The 150- to 200-ton vessels in use soon made way for larger ships with pronounced bowsprits, smaller forecastles, and lowered silhouettes. Spain’s development of its galeones was greatly boosted when their “captain general of the Ocean Sea,” Adm. Álvaro de Bazán Sr., ordered the construction of a dozen such vessels in 1550 to help defend Spain’s Atlantic approaches. Their design proved to be much better than Mediterranean styles for resisting storms and enemy raiders.

Similar improvements were also being made in yards throughout England, France, Holland, and Italy, but it was the wealthy silver flow from the Americas that financed the emergence of the true Spanish galleons by the early 1580s. In addition to a more seaworthy design, heavier timbering allowed for artillery to be concentrated upon their lower decks, enhancing stability and cargo capacity. These refined vessels’ primary function was to circulate from Seville or Cadiz to Cartagena, Panama, Veracruz, and Havana, then return. Annual departures of such fleets of galleons or flotas de galeones became so regular that, to distinguish between them, it became customary in Hispanic countries to refer to convoys bound for Mexico as flotas, while those sailing for Tierra Firme were called the galeones.

NOVEMBER 1548. A trio of French vessels are seen prowling off San Germán de Puerto Rico, Mona Island, and Santo Domingo, allegedly wishing to trade, though the region’s Spanish inhabitants remain too mistrustful to oblige.

AUGUST 1549. A French corsair galliot, propelled by 18 oars per side, falls upon a homeward-bound Spanish convoy off Santo Domingo, cutting out a ship laden with sugar and hides, a caravel bearing 150 slaves, plus two smaller island traders.

NOVEMBER 1550. After pillaging a Spanish caravel off Dominica, the 80-man French ship Sacre of Bordeaux under Capt. Menjouin de La Cabane and a smaller consort attempt to snap up two stragglers from a nine-ship convoy off Santo Domingo; they are repelled by its warship escort. Unfazed, the rovers then descend upon LaYaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti) and rob a pair of Spanish vessels of 20,000 pesos. They make off with one ship as a prize, eventually sailing to Bayonne to dispose of their booty.

LATE DECEMBER 1551. The 42-year-old French Huguenot captain Guillaume Le Testu of Le Havre, sailing past the Island of Trinidade after exploring Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil, clashes with two Portuguese ships, and his ship sustains heavy damage before winning free and returning to Europe.

APRIL 1552. With hostilities flaring up in Europe between France and Spain, various disembarkations are made by French corsairs on Puerto Rico and Santo Domingo, as well as interceptions of four Spanish merchantmen.

JUNE 18, 1552. A French ship becomes becalmed before Nombre de Dios; its 14-man crew is captured.

AUGUST 29, 1552. Three Spanish warships and an auxiliary, manned by 130 men—the coast-guard force for Hispaniola under Cristóbal Colón y Toledo, Columbus's 29-year-old grandson—are lost in a hurricane, along with 16 vessels anchored in Santo Domingo's harbor.

SEPTEMBER 1552. A French corsair ship and smaller consort pillage a Spanish ship off Santo Domingo before retiring to Saona Island. These same Frenchmen then return to Santo Domingo's southeastern shore to make off with a ship recently launched at the Zoco River.

EARLY FEBRUARY 1553. A Spanish caravel serving as a dispatch vessel or aviso is taken by French rovers off Mona Island.

MARCH 1553. Le Clerc's Sweep. A French squadron from Le Havre comprising the royal warships Claude under peg-legged Commo. François le Clerc (alias "Jambe de Bois" or "Pie de Palo"), Espérance under Jacques de Sores, and Aventureux under Robert Blondel arrive in the Antilles accompanied by three large and four small privateers, plus two Spanish prizes seized at Santa Cruz de la Palma in the Canaries. They bear a total of 800 men with which to raid Spain's West Indian outposts.

San Germán de Puerto Rico, Mona and Saona islands, and Azua are attacked in quick succession before Le Clerc deposits a large landing force on April 29 to sack Monte Cristi on northern Santo Domingo and then La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti), after which the rovers stand back toward Puerto Rico. Spanish residents among the islands feel powerless to resist, for not only are four of these French craft galliots "whose oars ensure none can escape [them]" but half their total complement consists of harquebusiers. Laden with hides, sarsaparilla, and other booty, the French raiders make a final descent upon Santiago de Cuba before exiting the Caribbean in late May.

MARCH 1554. Having reentered the West Indies the previous month, three French ships under Le Clerc and Sores appear before San Juan de Puerto Rico, and on Palm Sunday—March 18—they raid more than three miles inland near San Germán. Afterward, they take up station off Saona Island, intercepting Spanish vessels, then later switch their base of operations to Mona Island.

APRIL 29, 1554. Off Cabo Frio (Brazil), the French ship Marie Bellotte of Dieppe captures a Portuguese vessel.

JULY 1, 1554. Destruction of Santiago de Cuba. Le Clerc's subordinate, the Huguenot corsair Sores of La Rochelle, leads four ships and four smaller auxiliaries into Santiago de Cuba harbor under cover of darkness and slip 300 men ashore; they fall upon its sleeping residents and occupy the city without resistance. Bishop Fernando de Uranga and a half-dozen other prominent citizens are subsequently held hostage for almost a month and a half, until a ransom of 80,000 pesos can be raised. The French thereupon destroy Santiago's fortress and burn several buildings before retiring on August 16, sparing the church in exchange for all its silver plate.

LATE AUGUST 1554. The French privateers Barbe and Marguerite under Vincent Bocquet of Dieppe, recently arrived in the West Indies, espy five large merchantmen and nine caravels off San Germán de Puerto Rico who have departed Santo Domingo around August 20 for Spain. Patiently tracking them across the Atlantic for more than 40 days, as far as the Azores, Bocquet finally seizes the caravel Tres Reyes Magos of the master Benito García when it becomes becalmed early in October, along with the Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe of Alonso González and the Santiago of Diego Marin. The Santa Catalina of Francisco Morales Camacho is furthermore ransacked before sinking, while the María of Francisco Hernández de León, the San Andrés of Alonso Cano, and the San Juan of Rodrigo Madera all run aground in the Azores and lose most of their cargoes. triumphant rovers return home laden with gold, cochinitilla, and pearls, leaving the shrunken remnants of this Spanish convoy to limp into Cadiz by December 7.

OCTOBER 1554. French blockaders encircle the entrance of Santiago de Cuba.

MARCH 1555. Three French ships disembark 150 men on southern Cuba, who march inland and burn Sancti Spiritus.

JULY 10, 1555. Sack of Havana. At dawn, two sails are spotted near this port, piloted by a Spanish renegade. They disgorge several score corsairs a mile and a half away at San Lázaro Inlet, under the Huguenot leader Sores. They advance inland and take Havana's 12-gun Fuerza battery from the rear, burning its wooden door to gain access, and thereby compelling its two-dozen defenders under alcaide Juan de Lobera to surrender by sunup of July 12. The French then occupy the town and bring four vessels into its harbor to careen.

While in possession of Havana, Sores demands a ransom of 30,000 pesos, bread, and meat in exchange for sparing its buildings, plus 500 pesos for every Spanish captive that he holds and 100 for each slave. Instead, Gov. Dr. Pérez de Angulo (who has managed to escape into the interior) launches a surprise assault at dawn of July 18 with 35 Spanish, 220 black, and 80 Indian volunteers, only to have this attack repelled; the startled French corsairs slaughter their 30 Spanish prisoners (all except Lobera).

The next morning, a wrathful Sores hangs numerous slaves by their heels at prominent places along Havana's outskirts, using them for target practice in a brutal gesture intended to discourage any further Spanish assaults. His men then level the town and buildings throughout its surrounding countryside up to five miles inland before finally retiring back out to sea on August 5 with the fort's 12 cannons.

AUGUST 1555. French Huguenots land at Santa Marta, sacking and burning its churches.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1555. A boatload of 12 French raiders from Guy Mermi's trio of ships—anchored off Mariel (Cuba)—cut out a Spanish caravel laden with hides.

OCTOBER 4, 1555. Mermi's trio of French ships penetrates Havana's harbor, landing 50 men to occupy its town. Discovering it to be still defenseless since Sores's raid in July, they are followed within a few days by at least a dozen other intruders, who rest their crews and careen their vessels. Foraging parties probe inland, securing some commercial booty—principally hides—before putting back out to sea some three weeks later.

This same month, a French assault also occurs at Puerto Plata in northern Santo Domingo.

OCTOBER 25, 1555. In Europe, the emperor Charles V abdicates, dividing his territories between his son, who becomes Philip II of Spain and Sicily, and his brother Maximilian, who becomes the new Holy Roman Emperor.

NOVEMBER 10, 1555. Villegagnon in Brazil. Two well-armed vessels arrive outside Rio de Janeiro's uninhabited Guanabara Bay (known to the French as Iteronne or Genève), having departed Dieppe on August 14 with a mixed group of 600 Calvinists and Catholics under 45-year-old Nicolas Durand, Seigneur de Villegagnon, knight commander of the Order of Saint John of Malta and vice admiral of Brittany, who is bearing orders from Adm. Gaspar de Châtillon, Comte de Coligny, to found a new settlement in this region to be called France Australe or "Southern France" (also France Antarctique or "Antarctic France").

His colonists disembark on Ratier (modern Laje) Island, then transfer northwest on November 13 to nearby Sergipe Island, the name of which is in the process of being changed to Villegagnon (modern Villegaignon Island). Atop this island, they erect a redoubt named Fort de Coligny, with a smaller two-gun battery commanding its channel. A town named Henryville is also founded, and a couple of relatively prosperous years ensue, with the settlers planting crops and enjoying peaceable relations with their Tamoio and Tupinambá neighbors.

The Portuguese governor general Duarte da Costa at Salvador (Bahia) is informed early the next year by São Vicente's regional governor Brás Cubas about this French toehold, but the former treats the report dismissively, believing the foreigners' presence to be merely a transitory shore camp set up by rovers. Upon realizing its permanent nature, though, King João III has his ambassador João Pereira Dantas lay protests before the government in Paris and on July 23, 1556, appoints the energetic Mem de Sá to replace the Brazilian governor general. Mem de Sá takes ship from Lisbon in late April 1557 but is slowed by a difficult Atlantic crossing.

The French colonists, in the meantime, have been reinforced on February 26, 1557, by a second expedition of three ships under the flagship Rosée that brings an additional 18 cannon and 300 people under Villegagnon's nephew Paris Legendre, Sieur de Bois le Compte le Meaux. Religious dissension, however, also arrives with this second contingent, eventually fracturing the colony's harmony and prompting Villegagnon to revert to Catholicism. A group of Calvinist dissidents departs aboard the old ship Jacques on January 4, 1558, followed by Villegagnon himself in October 1559—four months before Mem de Sá's first Portuguese descent.

EARLY 1556. A lone French vessel raids Santa Marta, Cabo de la Vela, Puerto Plata, Havana, and Margarita Island.

FEBRUARY 5, 1556. In Europe, a truce—the Treaty of Vaucelles—is arranged between France and Spain, which is meant to endure for five years but promptly begins to break down when the French monarch Henri II sends troops under Henri, Duc de Guise, to Italy that same spring in support of the anti-Spanish machinations of Pope Paul IV.

The Chevalier de Villegagnon

Nicolas Durand de Villegagnon was born at Provins in the Seine-et-Marne region of France sometime in 1510. His father was a local magistrate, who was ennobled a few years later. He died when Nicolas was only 11 years old. Nicolas was already adept at Latin, and his mother sent the young boy that same year to the Hôtel de Auges in Paris. He studied at the religious schools of La Manche and Montaigu in preparation for the University of Paris. John Calvin was among his classmates.

Durand graduated from that university in 1530 with a law degree and was admitted to the bar at Orléans. But his attempt to find a post in the Parlement of Paris failed. As a result, he approached his uncle Philippe Villers de l'Isle-Adam, grand master of the Order of Saint John of Jerusalem, and was admitted into that order the next year, which had just been granted the island of Malta by King François I. (Although his proper name was Nicolas Durand, Seigneur de Villegagnon, this knighthood meant that he became more commonly known as "the Chevalier de Villegagnon.")

Tall and athletic, the 21-year-old Villegagnon plunged into military and naval pursuits. In 1534, he served as an observer in the fleet gathered at Mallorca by the emperor Charles V to make an attempt against Tunis or Algiers. Six years later, he was sent to the French ambassador in Venice (incidentally befriendng the poet François Rabelais). Villegagnon was given a letter from the French king to the Turkish sultan, Suleiman the Magnificent, and returned to Turin next year with his reply. He also presented François with diagrams of the duke of Milan's forts.

Pleased with his services, the French government included Villegagnon among the 400 knights of Malta attached to Charles V's expedition against Algiers in 1541. Although only an observer, Villegagnon was wounded by a lance thrust into his left arm. While convalescing in Rome, he published a brief account of this campaign in Latin. The next year, he was sent to Budapest to report on a clash between the emperor and the Turks. Villegagnon returned in time to take part in the French defeat of the Milanese at Cerisoles and was put in command of the castle at Ponte Stura until 1547.

That same summer, he was recalled by the new French king Henri II to sweep the Brittany coast of English raiders. Villegagnon then sailed his four galleys in 1548 around Scotland and up the River Clyde to Dumbarton Castle to bring away the six-year-old Mary, Queen of Scots. More sorties ensued against Scotland and Guernsey, until he was sent to Malta in 1551, which was besieged by the Turks. While bringing back word of the order's victory, Villegagnon was briefly held in Cremona Castle by the Austrians.

Released thanks to the emperor, Villegagnon was appointed in September 1552 vice admiral of Brittany, with orders to fortify Brest against the English. While engaged in this work, he heard tales of Brazil, so made a discreet visit to Cabo Frio two summers later. He learned that the Portuguese avoided Guanabara Bay because of its hostile natives, so he decided to plant a colony there. Returning to France, he made a four-hour presentation before Henri and his mistress, Diane de Poitiers. The king agreed late in 1554, granting 11,000 livres toward this project. Villegagnon raised the rest from investors at Dieppe. However, his dream of a Utopian settlement in the New World ended bitterly. He died at Beauvais on January 9, 1571.

SPRING 1556. Capt. Guillaume Mesmin of La Rochelle appears in the Antilles with a large ship and smaller auxiliary, manned by 150 men in total, and seizes a Spanish ship that becomes wrecked on Bermuda during its homeward passage.

SUMMER 1556. A couple of skirmishes occur off Jamaica, as its local Spanish authorities succeed in capturing a few French smugglers who have come to trade.

SPRING 1557. Hispano-French warfare resumes openly in Europe, with an army invading France and defeating the forces of Henri II outside St. Quintin by August 19.

NOVEMBER 17, 1557. On orders from the Crown directed to Chile's governor Jerónimo de Aldunate, the Spanish seaman Juan Fernández Ladrillero sets sail from the port of Concepción with his ship San Luis and the San Sebastián under Francisco Cortés de Ojeda to chart the Strait of Magellan. A storm separates the vessels on February 15, 1558, the latter being lost and its crew extemporizing a craft from their wreckage named San Salvador, aboard which they regain Valdivia by October 1. Fernández Ladrillero has meanwhile struggled into the strait's western entrance by late July 1558, charting much of its shorelines before reemerging early in March 1559, returning into Valdivia by mid-June.

JANUARY 1558. After a storm-tossed Atlantic voyage, Mem de Sá finally reaches Salvador (Bahia) to assume office as Brazil's new governor general. His first task is to dispatch his son Fernão de Sá to assist Capt. Vasco Fernandes Coutinho at Espírito Santo, as well as to travel himself to Ilhéus, as both captaincies are in the grip of native unrest.

SPRING 1558. French corsairs renew their West Indian depredations, and the Spanish merchantman Ascensión of Capt. Bernaldino Rizo is taken off Saona Island. Four French ships out of Bayonne and Saint-Jean-de-Luz also sack Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés, Honduras).

JUNE 1558. French vessels appear within Santiago de Cuba's vast harbor, occupying its desolated town for 10 to 12 days before receiving a meager ransom of 400 pesos, then departing.

EARLY 1559. Seven French corsair vessels under Jean Martin Cotes and Jean Bontemps appear off Santa Marta (Colombia), taking a small amount of booty, against token opposition.

APRIL 3, 1559. In Europe, the Treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis is signed between Philip II of Spain and Henri II of France, marking an end to the Habsburg-Valois Wars.

PRIVATE WARFARE (1559–1587)

The agreement signed between two Catholic sovereigns at Cateau-Cambrésis does little to restrain the activities of Huguenot corsairs, who continue to visit the New World in pursuit of their own ends. Such independent behavior is further exacerbated by the death three months later of 40-year-old Henri II in a jousting accident, leaving France's central government greatly weakened.

Yet the corsairs' heyday proves short-lived, for in April 1562 a civil war erupts in France between a Catholic faction led by François, Duc de Guise, and the Huguenots under Louis de Bourbon, Prince de Condé. The resultant 36 years of violence—known collectively as the French Wars of Religion—drain the Huguenot rovers of much of their expansionist vigor, because they must concentrate upon this fratricidal struggle rather than their overseas campaigns.

The resultant decline in French sea power gradually makes way for a rise in English interventions. Throughout the first half of the 16th century, England has remained Spain's ally in its struggles against France, although this relationship begins to sour as the century reaches its midway point. By the late 1550s, English cooperation has dwindled because of Spain's growing might, its championing of the Catholic Counter-Reformation, and its steadfast refusal to open its American markets to foreign traders. After Elizabeth I's ascension to the English throne in November 1558, such frictions evolve into open hostility.

APRIL 11, 1559. Off Cartagena, five French privateering ships appear under Jean Martin Cotes and Jean Bontemps, setting 300 harquebusiers ashore who brush aside Cartagena's three-dozen Spanish defenders and overrun the city. The raiders pillage its residences, finally agreeing to spare Cartagena's empty buildings in exchange for 4,000 pesos.

JUNE 11, 1559. Spain's Floridian Failure. To establish a permanent outpost to guard its homeward-bound plate fleets, Madrid delegates a 49-year-old Mexican hacendado or "estate-owner" named Tristán de Luna y Arellano—veteran of Coronado's 1540 Florida expedition—to found a new settlement in the Gulf of Mexico. After a preliminary reconnaissance by Guido de Bezares in September 1558, Luna recruits 500 soldiers (mostly from Oaxaca, Zacatecas, and Puebla), plus 240 horses and 1,000 colonists. They depart Veracruz on June 11 of that following summer.

His 13 vessels endure a rough traverse, pausing at Miruelo (modern Tampa Bay) in July to refresh their supplies before proceeding into Bahía Filipina (Mobile) by August 14. Two ships are then detached to carry a report toward Spain, while the colonists divide into two contingents to probe inland. While this exploration is being conducted, a hurricane destroys the Spaniards' coastal camp, along with most of their provisions and ships. News of this disaster reaches Mexico City by September 27, and although relief is quickly sent out, Luna's venture is doomed.

Two sickly settlements are established, one on the coast and the other inland at Santa Cruz de Naniacana, but neither prospers. Disease and want take their toll, until Luna himself falls ill and departs for Mexico in the summer of 1560; he is succeeded by Jorge Cerón. Angel Villafañe is later appointed governor, but his efforts also fail; the survivors disperse to healthier, more prosperous lands.

AUGUST 1559. The rich Spanish caravel Sanctus Spiritus of the master Domingo González is looted by a French corsair outside Havana as it arrives from Veracruz.

NOVEMBER 30, 1559. The Portuguese admiral Bartolomeu de Vasconcelos da Cunha reaches Salvador (Bahia) with his flagship Gavião, another galleon, and 8 lesser vessels to provide Governor General de Sá with the nucleus for a major military expedition to dislodge the French Huguenot settlement from Rio de Janeiro. Ten or 12 anchored caravels will be incorporated into this fleet, but a shortage of men necessitates additional recruitments en route southward.

1560. French corsairs sack Campeche, Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés), and Trujillo (Honduras). The Spanish in turn capture a 30-man French vessel off Guanaja Island, summarily executing three of its Huguenot crew members, while conveying the remainder as prisoners into Guatemala.

Elsewhere, three Spanish galleons are ransacked, one being the 200-ton merchantman Santa María of the master Bartolomé Rodríguez, homeward bound from Honduras.

JANUARY 16, 1560. Portuguese Counterstroke.

The governor general, Mem de Sá, departs his capital of Salvador (Bahia) with the warships and auxiliaries of Admiral Vasconcellos to assault the French settlement at Rio de Janeiro. Additional contingents are picked up at Ilhéus, Porto Seguro, and Espírito Santo before the attackers finally materialize outside Guanabara Bay on February 21 and disembark their forces.

Advancing swiftly against the interlopers' trenches on Villegagnon Island, the governor general's nephew Estácio de Sá—commander of the galley Conceição—and Gaspar Leitão, brother of the Brazilian bishop, help surprise the French defenders and easily overrun these positions, aided by the fact that Governor Bois le Compte is exploring inland with his best troops—a company of Scottish Calvinists. However, the impregnable Fort de Coligny resists until more Brazilian volunteers reach Governor General de Sá from São Vicente, allowing him to outflank the fort on the night of March 15 at the head of 120 Portuguese soldiers and 140 Indian auxiliaries under the Temiminó chieftain Martim Afonso Arambóia. The garrison nonetheless does not capitulate until two days afterward, when 74 surviving Frenchmen and a handful of slaves lay down their weapons; another 42 have also been captured in the environs. The victors thereupon remove all artillery pieces, blow the fortifications, and torch numerous dwellings before departing for São Vicente and Salvador, leaving behind many scattered French residents.

These individuals will reemerge from the interior and build new defenses outside Glória Bay to cover Flamengo Beach and on Paranapuan (modern Governador) Island, with the aid of their Tamoio allies. Eventually, the Huguenots also launch minor counterstrikes against São Paulo and other nearby Portuguese outposts, prompting the governor general to dispatch his nephew Estácio de Sá to Lisbon for greater reinforcements. Villegagnon meanwhile attempts to organize another relief expedition from France the following year, gathering the carrack Aigle and seven other vessels at Le Havre; however, because of growing religious dissension within the home country, this force never sets sail to rescue Rio de Janeiro.

The Plate Fleets

In the early days of colonization, Spanish merchantmen sailed for the New World alone or in small groups. As transatlantic traffic grew in volume and wealth, convoys were sometimes formed. The Crown imposed a wartime decree in 1544, ordering that all private departures from Seville be temporarily merged into two annual convoys, each escorted by a pair of royal warships. Six years later, Spain's "captain general of the Ocean Sea," Adm. Álvaro de Bazán, also launched the first 500- to 600-ton royal galleons, which could better ensure valuable cargoes against storms and enemy privateers.

It was to be the vast amounts of bullion emerging from the Americas that would truly shape the plate-fleet system. Sailings were planned to ensure the safe arrival every year of the king's plata or "silver," as well as private hoards (which were subject to taxation). Already by the late 1550s, the volume of specie flowing out of Mexico began to soar thanks to a new amalgamation treatment for ores called the patio process. Peru soon adopted it as well.

The Crown, as a result, issued a royal decree on July 16, 1561, that started codifying transatlantic traffic. Every spring, two fleets departed separately from Seville; each was led by a pair of royal warships and included two- or three-dozen merchantmen. After skirting West Africa and crossing the ocean on the trade winds, they refreshed water in the Lesser Antilles. One fleet then steered southwest to Tierra Firme or the "Spanish Main," touching at Cartagena before anchoring in the Panamanian port of Nombre de Dios, where they were met by Peruvian traders. The other fleet meanwhile sailed northwest past Jamaica, detaching a pair of vessels for Honduras while the main body pressed on into Veracruz.

The merchants unloaded and sold European wares, while buying and loading American produce. Any silver, though, was consigned aboard the two warships. When the royal bullion was brought aboard from Mexico City or Panama City, all trading ceased. Each fleet then set sail for Havana to weather the hurricane season of late summer through autumn within its sheltered anchorage. If no other dangers threatened, they exited through the Straits of Florida late in the year, bound back across the North Atlantic for the Azores and Seville.

In case of peril, they might winter over and then resume their voyage the next spring. In wartime, the Crown additionally assigned battle fleets to escort convoys out from Spain, as well as home from the Azores. Over the next century, Spain's plate fleets followed this same routine almost every year. Although losses occurred due to storms or enemy action, the volume of specie that arrived financed the splendors of Spain's Golden Age.

JULY 1561. Off Havana, a French corsair vessel obliges an arriving Spanish ship to land its cargo nearby, rather than risk losing it in battle.

JULY 8, 1561. Under cover of darkness, three small Huguenot vessels disembark 30 men near Campeche, who then slip into the sleeping town. Its terrified citizenry and garrison flee into the night, but the next morning they realize how few their attackers are so pursue them as they exit the harbor aboard a captured bark laden with booty and 5 women captives. The Spaniards use another bark and two shallops to overtake the Frenchmen, killing 15 and capturing another 5, while the rest swim back out to their waiting ships.

APRIL 30, 1562. At daybreak, an expedition two and a half months out of Le Havre sights Florida near present-day St. Augustine. Two ships and a large sloop bearing 150 Huguenots under Jean Ribaut of Dieppe explore as far north as modern South Carolina, where they erect a stockade named Charlesfort somewhere inside what is today Port Royal Sound, near Parris Island. Ribaut departs on June 11, leaving 26 volunteers behind under Capt. Albert de la Pierria, vowing to return within six months with reinforcements.

Unfortunately, the religious strife encountered upon his regaining Normandy on July 20 prevents Ribaut from keeping this promise, especially after he flees to England in March 1563, where he is detained. At Charlesfort, Ribaut's disgruntled settlers have already murdered de la Pierria and put to sea under Nicolas Barré aboard a crude boat; they are rescued before the end of 1562 by an English bark.

AUTUMN 1562. The 120-ton Spanish merchantman San Miguel of the master Vicente Martín is captured by some English privateers while homeward bound from La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti).

APRIL 1563. Having departed Plymouth in October 1562 and touched at Tenerife in the Canaries and Sierra Leone, the 31-year-old merchant John Hawkins arrives off northern Santo Domingo with his 120-ton flagship Solomon, the 100-ton Swallow under Capt. Thomas Hampton, the 40-ton shallop Jonas, and a Portuguese prize. He hopes to sell 300 West African slaves. Despite the Spanish Crown's ban against such trade, the Englishmen are allowed to dispose of their cargo at La Isabela with the connivance of Lic. Lorenzo Bernáldez, commander of a 120-man cavalry patrol sent to stop them.

Hawkins will return into Plymouth by September with hides, ginger, sugar, and pearls. However, he has also consigned some of the goods that he has received in payment to be delivered at Seville aboard Spanish vessels. This fraud is discovered, and that portion of his merchandise is impounded.

MAY 1, 1563. Estácio de Sá returns to Salvador (Bahia) with a small Portuguese fleet to once again attempt the extirpation of all French residents within Rio de Janeiro Bay.

FEBRUARY 6, 1564. After being joined at Bertioğa (Brazil) by reinforcements under Gov. Belchior de Azevedo of Espírito Santo, as well as by the Temiminó warriors of Chief Martim Afonso Arambóia, two Portuguese galleons bearing 300 soldiers under Estácio de Sá and a host of lesser consorts anchor outside Guanabara Bay. They are attacked almost immediately by flotillas of Tamoio war canoes, so de Sá requests assistance from the Jesuit missionary Fr. Manoel da Nóbrega at São Vicente.

Despite the subsequent capturing of a French ship inside Guanabara Bay by the galley of Paulo Dias Adorno (this prize being placed under the command of Antônio da Costa), the Portuguese are unable to subdue resistance by the Tamoio Indians; de Sá, therefore, orders a withdrawal on March 29. Two days later, Father Nóbrega arrives with his native auxiliaries, only to quickly become surrounded by Tamoios. They are saved when de Sá's battered squadron unexpectedly returns into the bay after encountering heavy weather at sea. Both contingents celebrate Easter Sunday together on beleaguered Villegagnon Island before exiting for São Vicente on April 2.

JUNE 22, 1564. Jean Ribaut's lieutenant, René Goulaine de Laudonnière, returns to Florida with 300 Huguenot settlers aboard the 200-ton Élisabeth of Capt. Jean Lucas, the 120-ton Breton under Michel Vasseur, and the 80-ton Faucon under Pierre Marchant. Three days later, they disembark and begin to build a triangular compound called Fort Caroline at the Saint Johns River mouth (near modern Jacksonville). They then endure a harsh year of disease, mutinies, and starvation. Two shallops are apparently stolen and used for unsuccessful piratical cruises, while the native chieftain Holata Outina attacks a French foraging party on July 27, 1565, killing 2 and wounding 22 others.

EARLY 1565. A Carib war party surprises the town of Santa María de los Remedios de Guadianilla (modern Guayanilla, Puerto Rico), killing 3 residents and carrying off 30 captives, mostly women. The island's governor Francisco Bahamón de Lugo ambushes the retiring raiders, slaying 77 and setting their captives free, while having his horse shot from beneath him and personally receiving two arrow wounds.

JANUARY 22, 1565. Portuguese Stranglehold. After marshalling greater strength at São Vicente, Estácio de Sá sets sail with his staff and a band of Tupiniquin warriors aboard his flagship to mount yet another attack against the French holdouts inside Rio de Janeiro's vast bay. Five days later, another five small Portuguese ships and eight large war canoes depart nearby Bertioaga with native contingents raised at São Vicente, Cananéia, Espírito Santo, and Piratininga. They reach Ilha Grande by February 4 and are joined in the approaches to Guanabara Bay by the galley São João, another Portuguese ship, and the French prize on February 28. When de Sá's flagship appears the next day, the combined force musters off Ilha Redonda before stemming the entrance into the bay.

Having decided not to penetrate too deeply inside, as on previous occasions, the Portuguese commander disembarks his forces and quickly establishes a highly defensive position that same March 1 behind a stockade on the narrow São João Peninsula, below Pão de Açúcar or "Sugarloaf" Hill. De Sá even formally proclaims this new site as the "City of São Sebastião do Rio de Janeiro," a name chosen to honor Portugal's eight-year-old monarch Dom Sebastião. Five days later, this position is attacked by a host of Tamoio warriors under Chief Aimbiré, who are repelled. A second assault occurs on March 10 by a French ship leading 48 Tamoio war canoes into battle; they are defeated, and the French ship—trapped inside Guanabara Bay—must surrender three days afterward.

De Sá's strategy becomes apparent when 3 more ships arrive outside from France on April 1 to spearhead an attack that is seconded by 130 Tamoio canoes, only to be repulsed. Unable to either enter or depart Guanabara Bay, the French presence inside will gradually wither from lack of contact. De Sá meanwhile begins issuing land grants and appointing municipal officers among his followers as early as July 1, digging in for a protracted stay.

MARCH 1565. Hawkins returns into the West Indies with the queen's 30-gun, 700-ton flagship Jesus of Lübeck, plus the lesser consorts Solomon, the 50-ton Tiger, the 30-ton Swallow, and three small prizes, bearing more than 400 slaves from Sierra Leone. After watering at Dominica, Hawkins is refused trade by the Spaniards at Margarita Island, but then enjoys better fortune upon arriving on April 3 at Borburata (east of Puerto Cabello, Venezuela). Contacting its residents ashore, Hawkins arranges a show of force on April 18 to overawe the local authorities, thereby being allowed to transact business.

MAY 19, 1565. Hawkins enters Ríohacha (Colombia) this Saturday morning, remaining 11 days after employing the same tactic used at Borburata—using a show of force to compel its Crown treasurer Miguel de Castellanos to permit him to sell off his remaining cargo.

AUGUST 3, 1565. While on his homeward leg toward England, Hawkins visits Ribaut's Huguenot settlement at Fort Caroline (modern Jacksonville,

Estácio de Sá departing from Bertioga to assail the French settlement ensconced within Rio de Janeiro Bay, January 1565. (Museu Naval, Rio de Janeiro)

Florida), furnishing its sickly inhabitants with a 50-ton bark, victuals, shoes, and other stores. The English expedition weighs anchor and reaches Padstow by October 20.

AUGUST 5, 1565. The Asturian-born Vice Adm. Diego Flores de Valdés reaches the island of Dominica with three storm-ravaged ships, part of a much larger fleet of 26 ships, 8 auxiliaries, and 2,650 men that departed Spain under his 46-year-old countryman Adm. Pedro Menéndez de Avilés, Knight of the Order of Santiago, to extirpate and supplant the intrusive French settlement in Florida. After refreshing provisions, Flores de Valdés limps on to San Juan de Puerto Rico, arriving on August 9–10 to find Menéndez de Avilés's battered, 1,000-ton flagship San Pelayo and an auxiliary already anchored inside.

The admiral discards the original Spanish plan of rendezvousing at Havana in favor of hastening directly for Florida through the Old Bahama Channel with only 500 soldiers, 200 sailors, and 100 colonists aboard his five ships, plus another ship purchased at San Juan. Despite almost wrecking the San Pelayo in these shoal, uncharted waters on the night of August 26–27, Menéndez de Avilés presses on toward his objective.

AUGUST 28, 1565. Ribaut arrives at Fort Caroline from France, bringing out 600 more Huguenot settlers aboard his 32-gun flagship Trinité; the 29-gun vice-flagship Emerillon under Nicolas d'Ornano (a Corsican nicknamed "Corsette"); the 10-gun Perle under the commander in chief's son Jacques Ribaut; the hired Dieppe transports Levrière of Vivien Maillard and the Emerillon of Vincent Collas; plus the auxiliary Épaule de Mouton or “Leg of Mutton” (a 16th-century type of sail rig). This expedition has been joined during its passage by a privateer ship from La Rochelle under Capt. Jean Du Boys and two small Spanish prizes seized off La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti).

SEPTEMBER 4, 1565. Ribaut’s Massacre. At dusk on this Tuesday, Menéndez de Avilés and his vice admiral, Flores de Valdés, stand into the French anchorage at Fort Caroline (Jacksonville, Florida), in a light breeze, with their half-dozen ships. The startled French crews are able to cut their cables and flee out to sea, outrunning the more cumbersome Spanish warships overnight.

Unable to overtake his nimble foes aboard the San Pelayo, Menéndez probes Fort Caroline’s fully alerted defenses again the next morning before venturing 35 miles farther south to a harbor that he has previously sighted and christened St. Augustine. He finds three of his ships already in possession of Chief Selay’s thatched-roof Timucuan strong-house ashore, which the Spaniards are fortifying by landing troops and artillery as well as by digging a trench. Two shallops are also detached to fetch cavalry mounts from Santo Domingo, while farther to the north, Ribaut takes the desperate gamble of hastening virtually his entire garrison aboard his four largest ships—which have rejoined him after their nocturnal escapade, Captain Corsette having furthermore reconnoitered Menéndez’s new position—to attempt a seaborne strike. All the able-bodied Huguenots consequently set sail on September 10 and come within sight of St. Augustine the next day, but they are struck by a storm before they can disembark.

Witnessing Ribaut’s distress, the Spanish admiral, once the storm abates, leaves Flores de Valdés in command of his anchored ships and his brother Bartolomé Menéndez in command of a holding force within the extemporized fortification at St. Augustine, while he begins an overland march toward Fort Caroline on September 16 with his 400–500 best fighting men, 200 of them being harquebusiers. On the dark, rainy night of September 19–20, Menéndez’s attack force bursts into Fort Caroline two hours before dawn in three columns, sending its 16 defenders fleeing through the marshes toward their remaining ships. Without suffering a single casualty, the Spaniards butcher 142 hapless French residents and capture another 70 women and children by evening. Among the 27 survivors who manage to swim out to the anchored vessels Perle and Levrière are Laudonnière, plus 40 seamen already aboard these ships—including Ribaut’s son. Once the rains stop, the Spaniards call upon them to surrender and open fire when they refuse, so that they must get under way for France by September 25.

Having thus secured the intruder settlement, Menéndez renames it Fort San Mateo or “Saint Matthew” (on whose feast day this lopsided victory has been won), then leaves Capt. Gonzalo de Villarreal as garrison commander with 300 troops. Returning to St. Augustine, the Spanish admiral soon learns from Flores de Valdés that Ribaut has been shipwrecked south of that position, and stranded ashore without food, water, or arms. The Spanish vice admiral has already sortied and retrieved one of the grounded French frigates, after which he sails again with Menéndez on September 28. Over the next couple of weeks, 600 survivors are hunted down and pitilessly exterminated by the Spaniards, Ribaut’s own party of 200 eventually surrendering because of exhaustion on October 10. Their hands tied behind their backs, the Huguenots—save 5 youngsters—have their throats slit at a place later remembered as Matanzas (the Spanish word for “killings” or “slaughter”). Menéndez concludes his ruthless campaign by dispatching his vice admiral back to Spain with news of his victory, where Flores de Valdés will be rewarded with a knighthood in the Order of Santiago and marry his commander’s niece, María Menéndez de Avilés.

The admiral meanwhile departs for Havana on October 30 with three ships and the bulk of his men, leaving a small garrison behind at St. Augustine. Two days later, he finds another 150 French survivors from a damaged ship entrenched on a beach near Cape Canaveral, who surrender on condition that their lives will be spared. (Shipped toward Havana aboard the San Pelayo, these prisoners overcome their guards and seize Menéndez’s flagship, carrying it across the Atlantic to Denmark.) The admiral continues down the Florida Peninsula on foot, reaching the Indian village of Ays by November 4, where he erects a wooden stockade named Fort Santa Lucía and installs a garrison before finally proceeding across to Havana, with only 50 soldiers and 20 French captives, to secure further reinforcements for his Florida outposts.

LATE 1565. A galleon conveying Havana’s retiring governor Diego de Mazariegos back toward Spain is intercepted opposite Mariel by a pair of French corsair galleys under captains Fornoux and Lacroix. A hefty ransom demand is sent into the Cuban capital, but its new governor—Adm. Francisco García Osorio de Sandoval—prolongs these negotiations until Capt. Pedro Menéndez Márquez (nephew of Ribaut's slayer) can sortie in December 1565 and take these corsairs by surprise, killing 15 and freeing their captives while bringing another 50 back into Havana as prisoners to work upon its fortifications.

EARLY JANUARY 1566. Foundation of Santa Elena.

Two ships and 200 men under the Asturian-born Capt. Esteban de las Alas, part of Menéndez de Avilés's original colonizing fleet out of Spain, reach Havana after recuperating at La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti) and capturing a Portuguese smuggler ship off southern Cuba. A royal dispatch vessel soon arrives as well, bearing a report that more French Huguenots are rumored to be preparing to reestablish a foothold north of Florida. King Philip II, therefore, has authorized the dispatch of another Spanish fleet under Adm. Sancho de Archiniega or Arciniega with reinforcements for Menéndez and all other Caribbean garrisons.

Galvanized by this news, Menéndez departs Havana on February 10 with a small flotilla to properly reconnoiter the Atlantic shoreline and adopt immediate countermeasures to protect his fledgling colony. Upon regaining St. Augustine and San Mateo, though, he finds their unhappy garrisons in an open state of mutiny, having even commandeered vessels to sail away. He therefore must allow 100 disgruntled soldiers to emigrate to Santo Domingo, while also sending de las Alas back to Havana with five ships for supplies.

Once de las Alas rejoins him, Menéndez and de las Alas continue up the Atlantic coast with three ships and 150 men, on April 1 meeting Guale, an elderly chieftain who controls the lower half of modern Georgia's shoreline. The Spanish admiral leaves his nephew Alonso Menéndez Márquez and five Spaniards among these tribesmen, while conveying away two emissaries for peace talks. A couple of weeks later, the flotilla reaches the shoreline controlled by Chief Orista, with whom Menéndez de Avilés establishes peaceful relations and leaves 110 men under de las Alas to build a new 6-gun stockade named Fort San Salvador, inland from Santa Elena Point on present-day Parris Island (South Carolina) near the Huguenots' former site.

Upon regaining Guale, the Spanish admiral also persuades his nephew to remain among these Indians to help with their indoctrination before continuing himself toward St. Augustine. (De las Alas's garrison soon begins to desert, and when the first supply ship reaches the isolated outpost of Santa Elena in early June from Cuba, most of his men mutiny, tying him up before sailing away and leaving him with only 25 loyal soldiers. The youthful Alonso Menéndez Márquez will also die that same August in Georgia, but the Spaniards will nonetheless erect small fortified outposts on what would later become known as St. Catherine's and Cumberland islands.)

Menéndez de Avilés, meanwhile, returns into St. Augustine only to discover that its stockade has been burned during his absence by a native attack led by Chief Saturiba, who is also preventing any Spaniards from venturing inland. The admiral therefore orders a new fort to be commenced on a more defensible site before sailing for Havana aboard a small craft to seek assistance.

JUNE 3, 1566. Spanish admiral Sancho de Archiniega arrives at Dominica aboard his 480-ton flagship Tres Reyes, accompanied by 13 ships, 2 caravels, and a shallop bearing 1,500 troops destined as reinforcements for the Puerto Rico, Santo Domingo, Cuba, and Florida garrisons.

JUNE 26, 1566. Menéndez de Avilés returns into Havana aboard a single small craft, reporting that he has spotted 22 enemy sail in the Bahama Channel while returning from his reconnaissance.

EARLY JULY 1566. Capt. Juan Pardo reaches the depleted Santa Elena outpost (South Carolina) with two vessels and bearing an additional 250–300 troops and provisions. As a result of this influx, a larger stockade named Fort San Felipe will be erected.

SUMMER 1566. The Spanish ship Santa Catalina of Juan de Parras spots a sail near the Colorados Islands north of Cuba and gives chase. It proves to be the Nazarena, a raider with a Portuguese captain and mixed French–English–Portuguese crew, who beach their vessel in Matanzas Bay and flee inland into the Yumurí Valley, only to be captured and carried into Havana along with their refloated ship.

AUGUST 24, 1566. The Portuguese admiral Cris-tóvão Cardoso de Barros reaches Salvador (Bahia) from Lisbon with three galleons to form the nucleus of an expedition to be led by the governor general Mem de Sá to eradicate the last French settlers isolated inside Rio de Janeiro's bay.

OCTOBER 1566. Having returned to resupply St. Augustine with three privately raised ships from Philip was born in the city of Valladolid on May 21, 1527. The eldest son of Charles V and Queen Isabella of Portugal, he was educated by tutors in Spain. They gave him a good grounding in history and politics but left him weak in languages. As early as 1542, the 15-year-old Philip served as Regent whenever his father left Spain. The next year, the young prince married his 16-year-old cousin, Maria Manuela of Portugal. Tragically, she died on July 12, 1545, four days after giving birth to their son, Don Carlos.

Philip II

From 1548 to 1551, Philip traveled extensively in Italy, the Netherlands, and Germany, although without learning much about their customs or languages. He married Queen Mary I of England in January 1554, the same year in which he also succeeded his father as king of Naples and duke of Milan. Overwhelmed by the many problems challenging his reign, the emperor had chosen to retire from public life into a monastery. Philip, therefore, inherited his other titles in an orderly succession: he became duke of Burgundy (ruler of the Netherlands) after Charles abdicated on October 25, 1555. He then became king of Spain and Sicily as of January 16, 1556, and ruler of Franche Comté by the next month.

He remained in the Netherlands even when his English wife, Mary, died in November 1558. The next August, however, Philip II moved to Spain (the country of his birth and where he stayed until his death) and married the French princess Elizabeth of Valois in 1560, and the next year he chose Madrid as Spain's capital. In 1563, Philip II began erecting the massive El Escorial monastery as his palace. Small, aloof, austere, and melancholy, Philip II was also deeply religious.

But he would use Spain's might judiciously in championing Catholic causes, for Philip II was very aware of his royal obligations. He spent long hours reading and annotating reports from his vast empire. Ruthless decisions troubled his conscience, and he needed reassurance from his confessors. His reign marked the peak of Spanish power. But the scope of its many commitments around the world inevitably drained away resources, and the first signs of decay also appeared. Despite a painful and debilitating illness, Philip II worked bravely and uncomplainingly until his death on September 13, 1598.

Havana, then explored up the Saint John's River and reinforced all his Florida outposts, Menéndez de Avilés sorties with six of Admiral de Archiniega's warships, a frigate, and a pinnace to bolster the king's Caribbean garrisons against foreign interlopers. He consequently deposits 150 soldiers and some artillery to help fortify the city of Santo Domingo, 100 and some guns at San Juan de Puerto Rico, 50 at Puerto Plata in northern Hispaniola, plus a few more at Santiago de Cuba before capturing five rich prizes at nearby Manzanillo—the seaport of Bayamo—and reentering Havana in January 1567 to deposit another 200 soldiers and six artillery pieces.

NOVEMBER 10, 1566. Captain Pardo ventures inland with 125 men from the advance Spanish outpost of Santa Elena (South Carolina), hoping to discover an overland route all the way to Mexico but never penetrating beyond the Appalachian Mountains.

JANUARY 18, 1567. Portuguese Reclamation of Rio. In Brazil, Governor General Mem de Sá leads a final expedition from his capital of Salvador (Bahia) to eliminate the French Huguenot settlement at Rio de Janeiro. Going aboard the recently arrived squadron of Cristóvão de Barros, he sails first to Espírito Santo to recruit a contingent of native auxiliaries under Chief Martim Afonso Araribóia, then pauses at São Vicente (Santos) for further reinforcements.

Arriving before Rio by January 18 with 11 ships, the governor general enters and joins the Portuguese contingent already occupying Villegagnon Island and other points under his nephew Estácio de Sá. The combined Portuguese force then falls upon the outnumbered French two days later, easily overrunning their defensive positions at Uruçu Mirim (modern Flamengo Beach)—which is held by only 11 Frenchmen and a handful of Tamoio warriors—as well as winning nearby Parapucú or Parapuan (modern Governador Island) after three days of more tenacious opposition.

De Sá consummates his victory by refortifying Rio's entrance and appointing his nephew—who is badly wounded by an arrow in the face during the Uruçu Mirim assault—as the town's new governor. Estácio de Sá subsequently dies of his injury on February 20 and is succeeded by another of the governor general's nephews, Salvador Correia de Sá e Benevides.

SPRING 1567. The 140-ton English slaving ships Paul under the master James Hampton, the 100-ton

Portuguese counteroffensive against French settlements inside Rio de Janeiro Bay.

Solomon under James Raunce, the 40-ton Pascha under Robert Bolton, and a smaller consort arrive at Margarita Island (Venezuela). Although nominally under the orders of John Lovell, these vessels secretly belong to William and John Hawkins, whose distant kinsman Francis Drake is also serving aboard as an ordinary seaman.

MARCH 1567. Pedro Menéndez Márquez installs a fortified mission at Tekesta, at the mouth of the Miami River in southeastern Florida, by garrisoning 30 troops within a stockaded compound under the Jesuit priest Francisco Villareal. Native hostility will soon necessitate the withdrawal of the priest and 18 surviving soldiers, although the return of a Christianized Tekestan chieftain from Spain the next year will temporarily smooth relations.

MAY 8, 1567. At daybreak, the French privateer Bontemps appears outside Ríohacha (Colombia) with four large ships bearing West African slaves. The Spaniards send their noncombatants inland and mass upon its beach, while a boat arrives ashore requesting permission to trade. Treasurer de Castellanos agrees to discuss this proposal with other local leaders and reply the next day.

At dawn the boat returns, but de Castellanos rejects the offer. Bontemps clears for action, begins a bombardment, then dispatches three armed boatloads ashore, who are unable to disembark because of Spanish defiance. After four hours, Bontemps recalls his boats and again suggests a trade. Once more rebuffed, he sails away that same afternoon to surprise nearby Santa Marta on the morning of May 10, holding a rich merchantman in its roadstead for ransom.

MAY 17 (WHITSUNDAY OR PENTECOST), 1567. Lovell's four English slavers appear outside Ríohacha, having already traded peaceably with the Spaniards at Margarita and Curaçao—although also having united with Bontemps to skirmish with the authorities at Borburata. Entering Ríohacha's harbor, Lovell anchors on Monday, May 18, and requests permission to trade, being rejected by de Castellanos.

After a week of smuggling a few pieces ashore, the Englishmen depart on Saturday, May 23, leaving behind 92 slaves for which they receive no payment. Lovell subsequently touches Santo Domingo before returning into Plymouth by late September.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1567. At dawn, Coro (Venezuela) is surprised by Nicolas Valier's French privateering squadron, his Huguenot followers desecrating its church and committing other excesses. Bishop Pedro de Agreda barely escapes capture, although his deacon is taken prisoner. (It is believed that this same French raider also ransacked Margarita Island shortly beforehand.)

LATE MARCH 1568. Having departed Plymouth on October 2, 1567, Hawkins arrives at Dominica on his third slaving voyage with the hired queen's ships Jesus of Lübeck under Capt. Robert Barrett of Saltash and the master William Saunders, as well as the 300-ton Minion under Capt. John Hampton and the master John Garret. The rest of this formation is comprised of Hawkins's own 150-ton William and John under Capt. Thomas Bolton and the master James Raunce, and the 100-ton Swallow, the 50-ton Judith, and the 33-ton Angel. The English are furthermore accompanied by a pair of French privateering craft under Capitaine Planes, as well as an 8-gun, 150-ton Portuguese caravel that Planes has seized off West Africa's Cape Blanco. (It will become incorporated into Hawkins's squadron under the name Grace of God, to be commanded by Drake). They bear a total of 400 crew members, plus 500 slaves.

Revolt of the Netherlands

The 17 provinces of the Low Countries that Philip II inherited as duke of Burgundy were rich and complex. Each enjoyed many ancient liberties, which made any attempt at unified rule difficult. When Philip II left in August 1559 for Spain, he named his half-sister Margaret of Austria as regent. Soon, orders began arriving from Madrid that the government of the Netherlands should be centralized around Brussels. Although wealthy in commerce, industry, banking, and fishing, Philip II felt that the Low Countries were not contributing enough to his empire's needs.

In July 1563, a group of northern noblemen led by Willem "the Silent," prince of Orange, resigned from the regional Council of State to protest against these changes. Spanish imposition of strict Catholicism also offended local sentiments. When Orange and other aristocrats appealed to Philip II for religious toleration, he instead insisted on even greater repression in October 1565. As a result, 200 members of an armed group known as "the Compromise" rode into Brussels the next April 5 to complain. One of Margaret's advisors dismissed them as Gueux or "Beggars," adding to their anger.

Economic problems fed a series of urban riots that same August 1566, which damaged many Church properties in Antwerp, Amsterdam, Ghent, and more. Unable to contend against such widespread unrest, Margaret called off all religious measures until funds could reach her from Spain the next February. But Philip II also decided to act in April 1567 by ordering that his 59-year-old general, Fernando Álvarez de Toledo, Duque de Alva, lead a punitive sweep to restore order. This hard-bitten veteran gathered 9,000 Spanish troops from Milan and marched them across Europe into Brussels by August.

Margaret resigned, while Alva terrorized the populace. A tribunal nicknamed the "Council of Blood" was established, trying and executing thousands of people. Ironically, many victims would be Catholic loyalists. Spanish agents interfered with local government, eliminating privileges and imposing new taxes. Over the winter of 1567–1568, however, the exiled Willem of Orange and other northern noblemen organized an armed resistance. The first clashes occurred in April and May 1568, sparking 80 years of hostilities. What started as an aristocratic revolt grew into a national struggle for independence. With great skill and tenacity, the Dutch—led by privateers known as the "Sea Beggars"—not only won but also emerged by the next century as the greatest maritime power in the world.

Early in April 1568, they call upon Margarita Island (Venezuela), peaceably selling trade items and slaves to its Spanish residents over the next eight days.

APRIL 14, 1568. Hawkins proceeds to Borburata (near Puerto Cabellos, Venezuela) and trades with its Spanish inhabitants, while careening his ships. He also sends a detachment inland to the town of Valencia, as well as sending the William and John, the Grace of God, and the Swallow toward Curaçao for provisions, plus the Judith and the Angel under Drake to Río hacha as an advance party to contact its authorities. Once his main body has refreshed, Hawkins weighs anchor for the latter place on June 1.

MID-APRIL 1568. Shortly before dawn, 400 native warriors under Chief Saturiba fight their way into Fort San Mateo (Jacksonville, Florida), after spring floods have washed away part of its stockade. The Spanish garrison under Captain Villarroel repels this assault during fierce hand-to-hand combat, 1 defender being killed and 3 wounded. Florida's acting governor, Esteban de las Alas, sends a company of 50 soldiers from St. Augustine to reinforce this beleaguered outpost.

APRIL 23, 1568. Gourges's Revenge. This Friday, de las Alas spies the Gascon rover Dominique de Gourges passing by St. Augustine's harbor entrance with 2 ships, a smaller consort, and 2 prizes, bearing a total of 180 Huguenot privateers. Suspecting that they intend to surprise the 120-man garrison at Fort San Mateo (Jacksonville, Florida), the Spanish governor dispatches a warning overland.

Before it can arrive, however, the rovers steal ashore near the Saint John's River mouth, surprising two unwary Spanish blockhouses on Alimaconi Island the next dawn and securing 30 captives. A pair of Spaniards runs into Fort San Mateo to raise the alarm, causing widespread panic and desertion. By the time the invaders actually appear outside its stockade, only 7 soldiers remain to help Captain Villarroel defend it, all of whom decamp inland after a token exchange of shots. With the Huguenots now in possession of the town, Villarroel gathers up as many of his men as he can find and attempts to flee southward to St. Augustine under cover of darkness, only to suffer 30 killed and 38 captured once Saturiba's warriors discover and bedevil their flight. Then, to avenge the massacre of Ribaut's followers, Gourges puts all his Spanish prisoners to death, before sailing away for France on May 3.

JUNE 4, 1568. Drake arrives opposite Ríohacha (Colombia) and sends a boat inshore to request permission to water. Its local official, de Castellanos, orders his three-gun battery to open fire, and after a protracted exchange, Drake retires out of range, instituting a close blockade.

JUNE 8, 1568. Four French ships arrive off Rio de Janeiro, only to find its Huguenot colony eradicated by the Portuguese and Villegagnon Island occupied (see “January 18, 1567” entry). When the French attempt to disembark, they are attacked by local contingents under Gov. Salvador Correia de Sá and his subordinate Martim Afonso Araribóia, who chase the trespassers back out to sea as far west as Cabo Frio, where one of the interloper ships is boarded and overwhelmed by its Portuguese pursuers.

JUNE 9, 1568. This evening, Hawkins’s main squadron rejoins Drake off Ríohacha and slips 200 men ashore a mile away the next noon. They defeat a Spanish company drawn up to bar their path, then occupy the town. On June 15, Hawkins sends a detachment—led by a runaway Spanish slave—on a nocturnal march deep into the jungle; the detachment seizes Ríohacha’s hidden treasures and non-combatants. The English then compel de Castellanos to halt all resistance and permit trading.

JULY 10, 1568. Hawkins’s squadron departs Ríohacha (Colombia) and comes within sight of Santa Marta at dusk. Setting a message ashore, he meets with its governor the next morning, who agrees to allow trade—allegedly after a mock battle is staged so that the Spaniard might maintain appearances with his superiors back in Madrid. The English then remain in this harbor for a few days.

JULY 16, 1568. Hawkins arrives outside Cartagena (Colombia). After his request for trade is rebuffed by Gov. Martín de Salas, the Minion bombards Cartagena’s defenses from long range, while boats are sent into the bay to scrounge for provisions. Everything taken is scrupulously paid for with barter goods in hopes of encouraging further trade, but Hawkins is nonetheless compelled to quit Cartagena empty-handed by July 24.

He then scuttles his Portuguese prize and allows one of his French consorts to part company and prowl the West Indies, while laying in a northerly course across the Caribbean with his eight remaining vessels. After sighting Isla de Pinos, they are engulfed in a hurricane while attempting to round western Cuba; the William and John becomes separated and eventually returns alone to Ireland. The storm abates on September 11 to reveal Hawkins off the Triángulos Reef, deep within the Gulf of Mexico. Intercepting one of a pair of passing Spanish coasters under Francisco Maldonado, the English learn that the only place to leeward where they might repair is the island of San Juan de Ulúa, near Veracruz. Hawkins’s squadron limps toward that haven, capturing two other outward-bound Mexican vessels to preclude any alarm being raised.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1568. Hawkins at San Juan de Ulúa. At dusk, Hawkins’s 10 English vessels anchor within sight of this Spanish island fortress, its lookouts mistaking his squadron for advance elements of the annual plate fleet, which is daily expected from Spain. The next morning, Hawkins gets under way with false colors, luring San Juan de Ulúa’s pilot boat close enough to capture all its welcoming dignitaries. The English then pass the island batteries—which are busily firing salutes—to moor directly beneath its walls, before garrison commander Antonio Delgadillo realizes that they are foreign intruders. Having thus secured San Juan de Ulúa, Hawkins sends a message to the mainland authorities in distant Veracruz, explaining his action and promising to depart once his repairs are complete.

At sunrise of September 17, though, Adm. Francisco Luján’s flagship San Pedro appears outside San Juan de Ulúa, escorting a half-dozen galleons. His second-in-command, Juan de Ubilla, soon brings another five up over the horizon, with his vice-flag Santa Clara. Among their passengers is the new viceroy designate for New Spain, Martín Enríquez de Almanza, who has been sent to restore Crown rule in Mexico City after an attempted usurpation by Martín Cortés, son of the famous conquistador. A boat dispatched by Delgadillo warns these latest arrivals of Hawkins’s occupation. Shortly thereafter, the English commander delegates Delgadillo to relay his terms for permitting this plate fleet to enter: the Spaniards must agree to let Hawkins refit in peace, or he will dispute their entrance. Short of food and water and on a dangerously lee shore, Luján and Enríquez have no choice but to comply—although harboring little intent of honoring this extortionate demand.

Late 16th-century drawing of San Juan de Ulúa by the royal engineer Bautista Antonelli. (Archivo General de Indias, Sevilla)

Contrary winds prevent their entrance until September 21, but once the two fleets are moored side by side within their crowded berths, Spanish troops are slipped under cover of darkness aboard Diego Felipe's dismasted hulk San Salvador, which lies nearest the English vessels. At 10:00 a.m. on September 23, a suspicious Hawkins opens fire against this hulk, and most of his ships get under way. Taken by surprise, as they had not planned on attacking until one hour later, the Spaniards nonetheless react well by overrunning the Englishmen left on the island, thus regaining control over its batteries. In a day-long exchange, all the English vessels are either destroyed or captured except for the Minion and Drake's tiny Judith, which escape out to sea via the perilous eastern channel to anchor overnight off Sacrificios Island. They leave behind several score dead or captured comrades, plus the sunken Santa Clara.

Drake sails directly for England that same night, leaving Hawkins with more than 200 survivors crammed aboard the Minion. The latter creeps as far north as Pánuco by October 8, where—with little food or water—he allows 114 men to surrender to the Spaniards, while resupplying the Minion as best he can, then setting sail eight days later for Europe with the remaining 100 men. A nightmarish voyage ensues, perhaps as few as 15 crew members reaching England alive. This incident at San Juan de Ulúa becomes a rallying cry for all Englishmen, who regard the broken pledge and sneak attack an example of Spanish perfidy.

1569. French corsairs sack and burn the coastal town of Santa María de los Remedios de Guadianilla on Puerto Rico, prompting a majority of its inhabitants to relocate again into the Santa Marta Hills and create a new inland town called Nueva Salamanca or San Germán el Nuevo.

SPRING 1570. Drake returns into the West Indies with the small ships Dragon and Swan—little being known about his activities on this cruise.

AUGUST 13, 1570. Having decided to reduce the perpetually starved Spanish outposts along the Florida coast to just 50-man garrisons at St. Augustine, San Mateo (modern Jacksonville), San Pedro (Georgia), and Santa Elena (Parris Island, South Carolina), acting governor de las Alas sets sail from this latter port with 120 extra soldiers, who are to be repatriated to Cadiz.

1571. Drake again ventures into the Caribbean, this time with the Swan alone, pillaging several rich Spanish barks off Chagres (Panama) before returning to Plymouth.

That same year, the French rover Jean Bontemps lands on Curaçao with 70 men and is confronted in a driving rainstorm by its principal Spanish landowner Antonio Barbudo, who exploits the invaders' temporary lack of firepower to inflict a stinging defeat. Bontemps dies of an arrow wound in his throat, and his head is carried into Santo Domingo as a trophy.

EARLY APRIL 1572. As Adm. Esteban de las Alas arrives off Margarita Island (Venezuela) with a small transatlantic treasure fleet bound for Cartagena (Colombia) and Nombre de Dios (Panama), his flagship is engaged by two French privateers, who break off at nightfall.

JUNE 28, 1572. Drake, having returned into the West Indies with Hawkins's 70-ton, 47-man Pascha and the 25-ton, 26-man Swan under his brother John Drake, comes within sight of the island of Guadeloupe, landing the next day on the south shore of Dominica to refresh provisions. Resuming their voyage on July 1, they pass Santa Marta (Colombia) to put into "Port Pheasant" (Zapzurro Cove) 11 days afterward, 35 leagues west of Tolú. There they find a message nailed to a tree on July 7 by Capt. John Garret of Plymouth, warning that the Spaniards have recently visited this place. Francis Drake nonetheless erects a moated redoubt ashore and instructs his carpenters to begin assembling the three small pinnaces named Lion, Bear, and Minion, brought disassembled from England for inshore raids.

On July 13, a 30-man bark from the Isle of Wight also enters the bay under Capt. James Raunce and master John Overly, accompanied by two Spanish prizes: a caravel intercepted the previous day while sailing from Seville as a dispatch vessel toward Nombre de Dios (Panama), plus a shallop with oars taken off Cabo Blanco. One week later, Drake and Raunce get under way with their entire flotilla, steering for Isla de Pinos.

JULY 22, 1572. The English expedition under Drake and Raunce seize two Spanish coastal frigates out of Nombre de Dios, which have arrived at Isla de Pinos three days previously to load with lumber. Their black slave laborers are well treated and freed, furnishing Drake with fresh intelligence. Leaving Raunce in charge of the four English ships with anchor watches, Drake combines 53 of his own men with 20 of Raunce's and sets out aboard the shallop and three pinnaces to raid Nombre de Dios. By sunset of July 28, they come within sight of their intended target.

JULY 29, 1572. Drake at Nombre de Dios. By the light of a rising moon, the English rovers row stealthily into the roadstead at 3:00 a.m., only to be espied by lookouts aboard an anchored 60-ton Spanish merchantman. Drake nevertheless succeeds in steering his own boat around the Spanish vessel, so that his raiders are able to disembark and seize the six-gun shore battery without opposition. The noise made by their dismounting of its ordinance, though, rouses the nearby townspeople, who begin to muster before the governor's residence in the main square, summoned by the pealing of the church bell and the beating of drums.

Drake leaves a dozen men to guard his beached pinnaces, checks a promontory just to the east to ensure that no guns are installed there, then sends his brother with 36-year-old John Oxenham and 16 others to circle into Nombre de Dios proper, while he leads the remainder noisily up its main street. Upon charging into its main square, the English are greeted with "a jolly hot volley of shot," yet succeed in scattering the hastily assembled militia. Before they can fully secure the town and loot the treasury, however, a rainstorm bursts and Drake faints from a wound which he has received, so his men retreat with him to the pinnaces, boarding the anchored Spanish merchantman as they exit the port at daybreak and sail to nearby Bastimentos to recuperate.

AUGUST 1, 1572. Drake's raiders rejoin their anchored ships, and six days later Raunce quits their joint enterprise. With only his two original ships and three pinnaces, Drake steals into the approaches of Cartagena (Colombia) by the evening of August 13 and cuts out an anchored 240-ton merchantman overnight. The next day, he also intercepts two arriving coastal frigates, bearing news of his Nombre de Dios attack.

Not having sufficient men for all his vessels, Drake, on August 15, orders one prize burned and the Swan scuttled, before standing away for Darién (Panama) to establish a secure base camp nicknamed “Port Plenty” in the remote Gulf of San Blas. From there, he roams the Spanish Main in his pinnaces as far east as the Magdalena River, while his brother befriends the Cimarrons or rebel black slaves living along the Panamanian coast.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1572. Having agreed to unite with the Cimarrons in future attacks against the Spaniards, Drake shifts his flotilla to a new anchorage and begins building a fort before departing on October 7 to hover outside Cartagena once more. Ten days later, his 24-man pinnace and Oxenham’s 18-man pinnace intercept a 50-ton Spanish bark as it approaches from Santo Domingo, releasing its 10 seamen and 5 slaves ashore. On the afternoon of October 20, a 58-ton and a 12-ton frigate are seized as they depart for Santo Domingo, their crews also being freed.

The Spaniards arm two frigates and emerge from Cartagena at dawn of October 22, obliging Drake to scuttle his two prizes, but not to forsake his blockade. Operating inside the vast bay, an arriving frigate runs itself aground five days afterward rather than be taken by the Englishmen, but a host of cavalrymen ashore prevent Drake from pillaging the beached vessel. Moreover, the defenders send an armed shallop on November 2 to try to chase the rovers out of their harbor, exchanging shots for a couple of hours before retiring. Drake nevertheless departs the next day for the mouth of the Magdalena River to resupply, as his provisions are almost spent.

NOVEMBER 5, 1572. Disappointed to find all coastal inhabitants and herds withdrawn inland from the mouth of the Magdalena River on orders from the Spanish authorities, Drake and his rovers intercept an arriving frigate, which is empty. After reaching the outskirts of Santa Marta a week later, the English pinnaces are driven from their anchorage by Spanish snipers hidden along the rocky shoreline. Despite inclement weather, Drake decides to forge still farther east to Curaçao, but upon standing out from the coast, the weary Englishmen seize a 90-ton Spanish vessel laden with victuals. Water and more provisions are obtained when they anchor in a small bay the next day, November 13, releasing their prisoners. A couple of days later, Drake detaches Oxenham’s pinnace Minion to sail directly back and advise his Panamanian base of his imminent return, while he scours the Main with his own pinnace and prize.

NOVEMBER 27, 1572. Drake regains his Panamanian shore establishment, only to discover that his brother John has been slain during his absence in an unsuccessful attempt to board a passing Spanish frigate on October 9. Although saddened, Francis Drake decides to wait until the Spaniards begin bringing their silver bullion overland early the next year in anticipation of the arrival of their annual plate fleet. Another of his brethren, Joseph Drake, succumbs to fever during the ensuing month.

JANUARY 30, 1573. Informed by his Cimarron allies that the Spanish plate fleet has entered Nombre de Dios, Francis Drake sends the pinnace Lion to reconnoiter, which confirms this report when it intercepts a frigate out of Tolú.

FEBRUARY 3, 1573. This Shrove Tuesday, the English captain leaves his Panamanian base camp in charge of Ellis Hixom or Hickson to march through the jungle with Oxenham, 16 of the healthiest rovers, and 30 Cimarrons to waylay one of the Spanish mule trains conveying silver to Nombre de Dios. On February 11, Chief Pedro shows Drake a hilltop tree, from whose tip he can see both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. (Drake is so moved, that he beseeches God “to give him life and leave to sail once in an English ship in that sea.”)

Drawing very near to Panama City by February 14, the raiders send a disguised Cimarron into the city, who returns at evening with news that the treasurer of Lima is to travel in the cool of night toward the Venta de Cruces way station with a 14-mule train bearing many riches. The raiders therefore hasten ahead to lay in ambush along both sides of the trail, but a drunken rover named Robert Pike shows himself to a passing Spanish rider, who carries a warning to the Peruvian treasurer to halt. Despite capturing a couple of other mule trains, the ambushers secure almost no booty before fighting their way through Venta de Cruces and escaping into the jungle.

By February 22, the disappointed raiders rejoin their companions near the base camp. Undaunted, Drake patrols shortly thereafter westward to Veragua aboard the pinnace Minion, capturing a Spanish frigate from Nicaragua with a Genoese pilot before

Isthmus of Panama

Although the narrowest span between the Caribbean Sea and Pacific Ocean, the Isthmus of Panama represented a formidable barrier. Convoys sailing out from Spain had to anchor at Nombre de Dios to discharge passengers and cargoes. People and light merchandise traveled overland by mule train, taking five or six days to complete a crossing. Heavier goods were ferried 50 miles westward along the coast by hired boat to the port of Chagres. They then were lightered another 44 miles up the snaking Chagres River to a way station called Venta de Cruces. The last 18 tortuous miles up Obispo Valley, over the continental divide and down the Río Grande Valley into Panama City, was completed by pack animals. Such trips could take three weeks or more to complete. If droughts dried up the river course, extra portages meant even slower progress.

South American produce, passengers, and bullion were brought back in the opposite direction, after which a commercial fair was held at Nombre de Dios, and the galleons finally weighed anchor. A system soon evolved whereby Spanish merchants avoided living in the torrid climate at Nombre de Dios during its tiempo muerto or “dead time”—before a plate fleet arrived in the spring. Instead, they lived more comfortably, and warehoused their goods more safely, in Panama City. Early each year, they began preshipping bulk items via the Chagres River to have an inventory on hand at Nombre de Dios. This route was two to three times less expensive than mule trains, despite being monopolized by a handful of boat owners. Heavier South American produce followed once the Peruvian silver convoy appeared, its royal bullion temporarily housed at Panama City.

Once a dispatch vessel brought word that a plate fleet had reached Cartagena (Colombia), trans-isthmian traffic began to accelerate. The 1,000–2,000 mules engaged in the trajín—literally “haulage”—were fully committed to shuttling private bullion and other high-value items directly overland to Nombre de Dios. Once the plate fleet dropped anchor there, Chagres boats began ferrying the first purchased Spanish goods along the coast and upriver to Venta de Cruces. Trading at Nombre de Dios ceased once the king’s Peruvian silver and dispatches were brought from Panama City, at which point the galleons left.

With business at an end, the Panamanian mule teams—consisting on average of 30 mules and nine teamsters apiece—resumed servicing the bulk river traffic out of the Cruces way station, as local and South American traders brought their purchased goods back upriver. If it was too late in the year, such shipments could be held up by strong countercurrents in the river, which occurred every June through December during the rainy season (especially along the final four-and-a-half mile stretch between Gorgona and Venta de Cruces). Once the Peruvian convoy cleared Panama City for its homeward voyage to Callao, a sleepy calm descended on the Isthmus, until the next spring.

returning to camp on March 19. Oxenham has meanwhile roamed eastward with the Bear and captured a brand-new frigate laden with provisions out of Tolú (the Lion being scuttled for lack of men).

MARCH 21, 1573. Drake arms his new prize, celebrates Easter the next day, then ventures to sea on March 23 with his new vessel and the Bear. Two days afterward, they encounter the 70-man, 80-ton French ship of the Huguenot rover Guillaume Le Testu of Havre, with whom they exchange gifts and receive a report of the St. Bartholomew’s Day Massacre and other news from Europe.

Drake believes that this reinforcement will permit another attempt against the Spanish silver trains; Le Testu concurs. The Cimarrons are therefore contacted, and a rendezvous is agreed to at the San Francisco River mouth.

MARCH 31, 1573. Drake’s Seizure of the Silver Train. Twenty rovers under Drake, as well as a like number of Frenchmen under Le Testu, land from the English prize and two pinnaces at the San Francisco River mouth and are met by a group of Cimarron allies. Advancing together through the jungle, they silently position themselves beside the trail and, on the morning of April 1, ambush three large mule trains bearing a combined total of almost 30 tons of silver. The 45-man Spanish escort is scattered by gunfire, but during this exchange, Le Testu is “sore wounded with hail-shot in the belly.”

So much bullion has fallen to the raiders that they must bury some 15 tons in hidden spots before retiring into the jungle two hours later, hastening to escape from their Spanish pursuers with the remainder. The badly wounded Le Testu is left to rest with two of his men, while Drake leads the main body on to the San Francisco rendezvous by April 3, being alarmed to find seven Spanish pinnaces anchored offshore rather than his own vessels. He nevertheless extemporizes a raft, setting out onto the open sea with three brave companions and finding the Bear and the Minion by nightfall. The next day, the raiding party is rescued, and the treasure is evenly split between its English and French contingents before they regain their base camp.

There, Drake releases all his Spanish captives aboard the Pascha and parts company with the French, after which Oxenham, Thomas Sherwell, and 10 other Englishmen return to the ambush site in mid-April with 16 Cimarrons. There they discover that Le Testu and one of his men were taken within a half hour by the Spaniards, who have also dug up most of the buried treasure. Oxenham's party, nonetheless, rescues the other lost Frenchman, as well as finds 13 silver bars and a few quoits of gold, before rejoining Drake.

LATE APRIL 1573. Drake sails to the Magdalena River mouth to lay in provisions before departing his Panamanian base camp for Cuba, slaughtering and preserving some 250 turtles while resting at Cape San Antonio for his transatlantic crossing. His passage proves remarkably swift, Drake and his 30 remaining men reaching their home port of Plymouth within 23 days, on Sunday, August 9.

JUNE 1574. Learning that the English privateer John Noble is making captures with a 4-gun, 30-man ship off Escudo de Veraguas Island (Panama), Gov. Pedro Godinez Osorio orders 30 Spanish harquebusiers out of Nombre de Dios aboard a "rowing frigate." Together with a brigantine and launch out of Concepción de Veragua, the force traps the interloper and kills or executes all its crew members except for 2 young boys, who are condemned to the galleys.

DECEMBER 14, 1574. The 20-gun, 120-man French privateer ship of Captain Silvestre attacks Concepción de Veragua (Panama). Disappointed by its scant booty but informed by runaway slaves or cimarrones of other potentially rich Spanish targets, Silvestre detaches a pair of smaller auxiliaries two days later to assault Chagres, farther to the east, and the Desaguadero or "Mouth" of Nicaragua's San Juan River to the northwest.

Three Spanish barks are seized at this latter port, and its town is occupied for three months. From there, the rovers—now reinforced by Gilbert Horsley's 32 recently arrived English adventurers, who are aboard a 7-gun ship—attempt to ascend the river and surprise Granada, instead intercepting some Spanish frigates traveling downstream.

MARCH 15, 1575. Silvestre's and Horsley's frigates set 40 harquebusiers ashore at dawn, attempting to surprise Concepción de Veragua (Panama). Instead, the raiders are discovered on its beach and repelled, after which their vessels bombard the town for the rest of the day.

APRIL 2, 1575. Horsley anchors behind Cape Honduras and, at evening, sends a boat party nine miles south to raid Trujillo. Its defenders are alerted just past midnight, but the Englishmen nevertheless make off with an anchored Spanish frigate the next dawn, steering west. Lt. Gov. Diego López sends a shallop toward Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés, Honduras) with a warning, but Horsley's rovers intercept it 60 miles away that same afternoon of April 3, along with the coaster of Juan Antonio. The Spanish merchantmen of Martín Monte and Vicencio Garullo enjoy better success, however, beating off an attack by these same rovers opposite Triunfo de la Cruz.

The Englishmen then return past Trujillo on the evening of Tuesday, April 5, before continuing east toward Cape Camarón, and eventually regaining Plymouth by June.

AUGUST 27, 1575. The Portuguese admiral Cardoso de Barros departs from Rio de Janeiro with a small expedition to destroy the shore bases being established by French and English trespassers amid the friendly natives at Cabo Frio.

1576. French corsairs raid Santa María de Guadianilla (modern Guayanilla, Puerto Rico), capturing a large number of women. The rovers are then overtaken in a rainstorm before regaining their boats, suffering a considerable number killed plus losing their captives.

JUNE 1576. Spanish admiral Cristóbal de Eraso enters the Caribbean with a plate-fleet escort, scattering seven Franco-English corsair vessels off Margarita Island (Venezuela), one of which scuttles itself rather than face capture.

LATE JUNE 1576. After departing England on April 19 and traversing the Lesser Antilles, Drake's former subordinate, Capt. John Oxenham, reaches the Spanish Main west of Cartagena with his 11-gun, 57-man, 100-ton frigate. Concealing it along this shoreline, he then strikes west-southwestward aboard a captured Spanish frigate and two pinnaces to intercept coastal traffic visiting the annual plate-fleet fair at Nombre de Dios (Panama).

AUGUST 1576. The Bristol merchant Andrew Barker reaches the Antillean island of Trinidad with 70 men aboard the barks Ragged Staff and Bear under William Cox to seek revenge for the detention of his factors and impoundment of his goods by the Spanish inquisitors at Tenerife. After refreshing provisions for six days, the Englishmen pillage a small Spanish ship off Margarita Island (Venezuela), then take on water at Curaçao—suffering 14 men injured at this latter place from an ambush.

AUGUST 26, 1576. The English explorer Martin Frobisher claims modern Frobisher Bay (Canada) for Elizabeth I.

LATE SUMMER 1576. Beset by hostile natives, who have slain at least 30 Spanish soldiers during recent raids, the surviving garrison and civilians of Santa Elena (South Carolina) decide to abandon their fort and town. While waiting aboard their ships to cross the bar and quit Port Royal Sound, they can see their stockade and homes erupt in flames. Most of the Spanish men will subsequently be landed at St. Augustine, while the women and children are conveyed on to Havana.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1576. Oxenham transfers his English frigate and two Spanish prizes with 18 prisoners to Pinos Island (north of Acla, Panama), leaving a 40-man anchor watch aboard while exploring inland with 12 men, guided by black cimarrón allies. During his two-week absence, Oxenham's vessels are surprised and captured by a Spanish frigate and brigantine bearing 20 soldiers out of Nombre de Dios. All his men except a young French page escape ashore.

LATE JANUARY 1577. Oxenham in the Pacific. After building a 24-oar launch, Oxenham rafts down the Chucunaque and Tuira rivers (eastern Panama) with 50 Englishmen and 10 cimarrón allies to gain the Gulf of San Miguel. His expedition then falls upon the offshore Pearl Islands by February 20 (Ash Wednesday), pillaging them over the next three weeks, as well as intercepting Spanish coastal traffic between Peru and Panama.

Learning of this threat from two escapees who reach Panama by canoe on March 6, Gov. Dr. Gabriel

Queen Elizabeth I

Elizabeth was born on September 7, 1533, the daughter of King Henry VIII and his second wife, Anne Boleyn. When she was less than three years old, her father divorced her mother, who was then beheaded. By way of this brutal end, Elizabeth was temporarily rendered illegitimate and therefore removed from the line of succession. She nevertheless received a good education, excelling at languages and music. Once her half-brother Edward was born to Jane Seymour, Henry restored Elizabeth as third in line to the throne in his will of December 1546.

Shortly after Henry's death, the married Thomas, Lord Seymour of Sudeley, tried to seduce the 15-year-old Elizabeth, for which he was executed. A convinced Protestant, she was viewed with suspicion after her older Catholic sister Mary ascended the throne in the summer of 1553. Early the next year, Elizabeth was even jailed for two months in the Tower of London, in the wake of Wyatt's Rebellion. After her release, she lived at Hatfield Palace under the protection of Mary's new husband, Philip II of Spain. Although not a Catholic, he preferred Elizabeth as England's heiress over Mary, Queen of Scots, who had close ties to France.

Tall and red-haired, Elizabeth grew into a smart and determined princess. When her unpopular sister Mary died in November 1558, she succeeded without trouble. Crowned at Westminster Abbey the next January 15, it was expected that the 25-year-old queen would soon marry. Yet any union with a European monarch would draw a weakened England into foreign wars, while suitable English noblemen were all members of rival factions.

Her uncertain past left her wary and calculating; Elizabeth therefore proceeded cautiously. Yet she was every inch a queen, sharp-witted and demanding, and had inherited her father's domineering ways. She had a great sense of duty. In choosing a council, she kept its numbers small and select, with representation from different interests. She conducted foreign policy prudently as well, buying time for England to recover its stability and strength of purpose. A clash against Spain, the world's greatest power, had grown inevitable over the last quarter-century, and when that showdown finally came, the Virgin Queen did not flinch.

de Loarte prepares his defenses, dissuading Oxenham from trying a surprise attack the next evening. As the English withdraw toward the Pearl Islands, they seize a rich bark arriving from Guayaquil, so they return into the Gulf of San Miguel with considerable booty. Meanwhile, de Loarte dispatches a 200-man counterexpedition under Pedro de Ortega Valencia aboard a half-dozen boats on March 13 to hunt down the intruders.

This Spanish contingent meets the rich Peruvian galleon Miguel Angel, a 50-man detachment guiding it safely into Panama by March 28. De Ortega in the meantime continues his search for the retiring Englishmen, while Vice Adm. Miguel de Eraso (Don Cristóbal's son) detaches two frigates from his plate fleet at Nombre de Dios—plus a Panamanian coast-guard frigate and brigantine—to cut off Oxenham's retreat on the Atlantic side of the Isthmus. De Eraso also personally leads 30 harquebusiers to reinforce Panama City.

After ascending the Tuira River for eight days, until his vessels can go no farther because of shallow water, de Ortega proceeds afoot along the Chucunaque's banks with 60 soldiers. At 10:00 a.m. on April 2, after another four-day march, he overtakes 30 Englishmen and 80 Cimarrons eating near the "Piñas" confluence (possibly the modern Tupisca or Chico River), slaying nine Englishmen and capturing four—a wounded sailor and 3 boys—plus scattering the rest into the jungle. Oxenham's 12-man party is also attacked two days later at the village of "Catalina" (possibly modern Yavisa), winning free after suffering 3 killed in an hour-long defense of their extemporized fort. The 4 English captives are then carried back to Panama by April 18, along with the bulk of their supplies and booty.

In May 1577, 40 Spanish soldiers under Capt. Luis García de Melo travel from Panama City to Nombre de Dios with two English captives to destroy Oxenham's launches, which are hidden underwater on the north coast. Instead, Adm. Cristóbal de Eraso appropriates these prisoners, delegating Gabriel de Vera's 80-man royal warship to carry out this mission. Eventually, both Spanish contingents unite and raise the prizes together, after which García de Melo rampages south through cimarrón territory with 60 soldiers in a punitive sweep, emerging into the Gulf of San Miguel, while de Vera gains Cartagena.

Deprived of all means of escape, the English survivors remain in mid-isthmus until late August, when they are surprised by another 120 Peruvian troops in two search columns under recently arrived Diego de Frías Trejo, who seizes Oxenham and 8 of his followers. Other captures follow in mid-December 1577 and early February 1578, until 13 Englishmen are executed in Panama by April. Oxenham with 4 others are executed in Lima (Peru) some time afterward.

SPRING 1577. The Biscayan renegade Pedro de la Cruz raids Chagres and the coastline of Veragua (northwestern Panama) with 80 Huguenot followers, establishing a base camp offshore.

APRIL 1577. After being pursued off Cartagena by Vice Adm. Miguel de Eraso's galleon and two frigates, Barker captures another Spanish frigate three days later off Tolú (Colombia), reputedly casting 28 soldiers overboard and holding an important passenger—Judge Juan Rodríguez de Mora—for ransom before being chased again by de Eraso. He escapes toward Nombre de Dios (Panama).

AUGUST 1, 1577. Having pillaged the coast of Veragua (Panama), scuttled the Ragged Staff in favor of a captured Spanish frigate, then coasted up eastern Honduras, Barker reaches Roatán Island. Two days later, his second-in-command, Cox, mutinies, setting Barker ashore with a few loyal hands.

Less than two weeks afterward, López quits the mainland port of Trujillo with a demi-galley and brigantine to rid this island of interlopers. Disembarking stealthily on its north coast, he leads 23 Spaniards in a dawn attack on Saturday, August 17, against the 30 Englishmen then ashore, killing Barker and a dozen others. The 30 men aboard Cox's ships open fire, covering their survivors' retreat, before retiring to another island three miles away. López then carries the heads and hands of the 13 dead Englishmen back into Trujillo.

OCTOBER 1577. Florida's new governor Pedro Menéndez Márquez arrives with a small expedition to reestablish the Spanish outpost at Santa Elena, abandoned the previous year. A prefabricated stockade is disembarked and assembled within six days on what is today the southern tip of Parris Island (South Carolina), becoming known as Fort San Marcos. Its 53-man garrison will successfully deter attacks by the surrounding Indian nomads. As the threat of hostilities gradually diminish, the Spanish civilian population grows over the next three years to some 400 residents, inhabiting some 60 houses.

JANUARY 1578. Two French corsair vessels occupy Manzanillo (Cuba), dispatching two boatloads of marauders up its Cauto River toward Bayamo. Its governor, Lic. Diego de Santiestéban, ambushes these raiders with 30 harquebusiers as they come upriver, inflicting heavy losses and sinking both boats.

LATE FEBRUARY 1578. After one of his two small vessels has capsized off Cape San Antonio (western Cuba), drowning 14 crew members, Cox returns to Honduras with 35 men for one final raid. Despite carrying Trujillo in a nocturnal assault, the English boats are then chased off by superior Spanish forces, suffering 1 killed and 7 captured—of whom almost all are subsequently executed, only a young cabin boy being spared.

APRIL 5, 1578. Francis Drake appears near Porto Alegre (Brazil) from West Africa on a secret and ostensibly peaceful mission to round the Strait of Magellan, with 164 men aboard five vessels, and explore the Pacific coast of South America for England. (His sixth ship rejoins on April 14 at the Cape Saint Mary rendezvous.) Drake also brings along the Portuguese pilot Nuño da Silva, captured amid the

Sir Francis Drake, as he appeared in 1591. He was slightly more than five feet tall. (Library of Congress)

Francis Drake

This great mariner was born in the parish of Crowndale, a mile southwest of Tavistock in Devonshire, England. The exact date is unknown, but it may have occurred around February or March 1541. He was the eldest of 12 children born to Edmund Drake, a tenant farmer working part of his parents' 180 acres of land, leased from the Earl of Bedford. During a Catholic outburst in 1549, the family was forced to flee.

Young Francis apparently was left at the household of their wealthier kinsmen in Plymouth, the Hawkins family, until his family could relocate. Edmund Drake moved on to the seaport of Chatham, at the mouth of the Thames, to become a Protestant preacher among its sailors. His reunited family lived in poverty aboard a laid-up ship. His son Francis remained an ardent Protestant throughout his life.

While barely a teenager, Francis went to sea under the elderly master of a small trading vessel. Drake learned seamanship in voyages from Chatham to the North Sea and into the Bay of Biscay. His old captain later willed the little ship to Drake, at the age of 20. In 1564, Drake sold this vessel to ship out from Plymouth as an ordinary seaman on the second slaving voyage to the West Indies of his second cousin, John Hawkins.

Drake distinguished himself on the third voyage by sailing home the Judith after the San Juan de Ulúa battle of September 1568. The next year, he married a Cornish woman named Mary Newman and returned into the Caribbean by 1570 to raid. After several strikes, he regained Plymouth with a fortune from the Panamanian silver train in August 1573. His enhanced status from this exploit secured backing for Drake's next venture, his voyage around the world. At the peak of his powers, Drake was described by the captured Portuguese pilot Nuno da Silva before the Mexican Inquisition in May 1579 as "low in stature, thick-set, and very robust. He has a fine countenance, is ruddy of complexion, and has a fine beard."

Drake returned rich and famous to be knighted by Queen Elizabeth I in April 1581. He bought Buckland Abbey, an estate halfway between his childhood home of Tavistock and Plymouth. The next year, he also was appointed mayor of Plymouth. After his first wife, Mary, died in 1583, he married Elizabeth Sydenham two years later. She was 20 years his junior and the daughter of the influential Devonshire magnate, Sir George Sydenham. Eager backers and volunteers flocked to support Drake's West Indian foray in 1585 and the Cadiz raid two years later.

Drake had no children; his lands in Devonshire, therefore, were inherited by his brother Thomas. An annual celebration has been held ever since, called the "Fishing Feast," to commemorate Drake's bringing fresh water into Plymouth.

DRAKE'S FLEET

Ship Name	Guns	Tons	Commander
Pelican	18	150	Drake
Elizabeth	16	80	John Winter
Marigold	10	30	John Thomas
Swan	—	50	—
Benedict	—	40	—

After four months spent exploring Brazil and Argentina as far south as San Julián—plus executing his subordinate Thomas Doughty for mutiny on July 2—Drake replenishes his supplies and sets sail on August 17 with only the Pelican, the Elizabeth (now under Capt. John Winter), and the Marigold, standing into the eastern entrance of the Strait of Magellan three days later.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1578. Drake in the Pacific. Favored by good weather, Drake's squadron traverses the Strait of Magellan in 14 days, emerging into Spain's closed Pacific waters—only to be greeted by storms, which sink the Marigold with all 31 hands on the night of September 30 and oblige the Elizabeth to turn back on October 11. Although he is driven as far as 57° south latitude by October 20, Drake claws his way northward to Mocha Island by November 25. Upon attempting to go ashore, however, his 11-man boat crew is attacked by local tribesmen, who kill 2 Englishmen, capture another pair, and wound Drake with an arrow below his right eye.

DECEMBER 4–5, 1578. Overnight, Drake enters the harbor at Valparaíso and seizes the 120-ton anchored ship of Hernando Lamero, who plunges into the water and swims ashore, leaving behind seven crewmen and three slaves. His vessel is laden for departure to Peru with wine and 24,000 pesos in gold, plus charts of the Pacific coast to be used by his Greek-born pilot, Juan Griego.

Drake also ventures ashore and sacks the abandoned, impoverished hamlet of Valparaíso, looting its adobe warehouse and even its thatched-roof church, before weighing anchor on December 8. After pausing at 30° south latitude in the vain hope of having his two missing consorts rejoin, Drake loses a man when his 14-man watering party is attacked by the Spanish residents of Coquimbo in Herradura Bay near La Serena. He finally resumes his northerly heading on January 19, 1579.

Drake's cruise up the Pacific coast of Spanish America.

FEBRUARY 5, 1579. Drake arrives off Arica (Chile) and the next day boards three unmanned barks anchored in its harbor. He burns one and makes off with another owned by Felipe Corso as well as secures 37 bars of silver.

FEBRUARY 13, 1579. Drake's Pelican—renamed Golden Hind since gaining the Pacific in honor of one of the expedition's financial backers, Sir Christopher Hatton—enters the harbor at Callao, boarding and pillaging about a dozen vessels lying in its roadstead before cutting their cables so that they drift ashore and are destroyed. Having learned from some captive Spaniards that the merchantman Nuestra Señora de la Concepción (nicknamed Cacafuego) has recently departed northwestward for Paita and Panama, bearing a valuable cargo of silver, Drake instantly sets off in pursuit.

MARCH 1, 1579. After taking a few minor prizes, Drake overhauls the unsuspecting Cacafuego near Cape San Francisco (south of Punta Galera, Ecuador), drawing along both sides of this lumbering, unarmed galleon at 9:00 p.m. with his Golden Hind and a large pinnace and challenging its master, San Juan de Antón, to lower his flag. The Spaniard refuses, but his ship is nonetheless quickly subdued after only three shots are fired. Reversing course to what is today Plata or “Silver” Island, Drake transfers 360,000 pesos in gold and silver aboard his flagship before releasing the Cacafuego.

APRIL 4, 1579. Off Nicaragua, Drake captures the bark of Francisco de Zárate, securing two veteran pilots of transpacific crossings aboard the Acapulco-Manila galleons—along with their charts—as well as stripping it of a few chests of Chinese porcelains and silks.

APRIL 13, 1579. Drake enters the port of Huatulco (alternate spelling, “Guatulco,” Mexico) so unexpectedly that he captures the town judge sitting inside his courtroom, holding him hostage while ransacking the few dwellings for water and food supplies. He also steals the town’s church bell before releasing all the Spanish captives, along with da Silva. The Golden Hind continues northwestward, perhaps reaching as high as 42° north latitude before reversing course, eventually careening outside San Francisco harbor—presumably in Drake’s Bay—from June 17 to July 23. The English dub this region “Nova Albion” and leave behind a commemorative plaque, which has never been found. By late July, the Golden Hind quits the Americas, sailing toward Mindanao.

OCTOBER 11, 1579. Believing Drake might retrace his course into the Atlantic via the Strait of

Manila Galleons

Ever since Columbus’s time, Spaniards had dreamed of tapping the riches of the Orient. Once Mexico was conquered, such a project was revived. In November 1564, an expedition under Miguel López de Legaspi struck out across the Pacific wastes from Puerto de la Navidad (near modern Manzanillo). His galleon San Pedro returned by October 1, 1565, piloted by Fr. Andrés de Urdaneta. It brought word that the expedition had established a precarious foothold in what soon became known as the Philippine Islands, in honor of King Philip II. The Mexican authorities were under Crown orders to sustain this outpost with men and funds.

The first scheduled galleon to arrive back in Acapulco from Asia was the San Juan of the master Rodrigo de la Isla, which entered the Mexican bay in November 1567. Because of the troubles in conveying equipment and provisions down from the viceregal capital over 200 miles of precipitous Sierra Madre del Sur mountain trails, this vessel did not clear port for its return passage until 14 months later. However, regular transpacific traffic soon sprang up, because the fledgling Philippine colony was utterly dependent on its annual subsidies from the treasury in Mexico City as well as this flow of supplies.

Settlers at Manila also were allowed space in the cargo holds to export Asian goods. To maximize their profits, they crammed the galleons with luxury wares, including spices, Chinese silks, and ivories. Such products commanded fantastic prices in silver-rich Mexico. A system soon evolved in which two pairs of vessels—each consisting of a galleon flagship and a smaller patache or auxiliary—took turns sailing between Manila and Acapulco. Departures from the Philippines normally occurred in summer, with vessels touching at the Marianas before continuing along the North Pacific currents to emerge off uninhabited California by Christmas. Coasting southeastward, a courier known as the gentilhombre de los pliegos or “gentleman of the dispatches” was set ashore near Cabo Corrientes to hasten toward Mexico City with news of the galleon’s imminent arrival at Acapulco. A great commercial fair was then held over in that port several weeks.

Eventually, the refurbished vessels received their Mexican passengers, mostly conscripted soldiers and convicts. Wooden chests containing hundreds of thousands of silver pesos then arrived from the viceregal mint, signaling an imminent departure. With the addition of the traders’ profits, galleons routinely departed with millions aboard. Ideally, they set sail southward in late March or early April to catch the prevailing winds and currents that wafted them back across the Pacific. And because of the absence of hostile ships along their remote route, they often cruised unarmed. As a result, enemy seamen dreamed of meeting one of these rich, easy prizes on the high seas.

Magellan, Peru's viceroy Francisco de Toledo dispatches two ships southward from Callao: the flagship Nuestra Señora de Esperanza under 47-year-old Capt. Pedro Sarmiento de Gamboa and the vice-flagship San Francisco of Juan de Villalobos, each armed with two guns and a combined total of 112 men. After a protracted reconnaissance, they arrive off the strait's western mouth, and Sarmiento de Gamboa steps ashore on Friday, December 11, to ensure that no English garrison has been left behind and to begin mapping the entire length of the strait, with the aid of the Sevillian pilot Antón de Pablos, for potential fortification. (An avid mathematician and astronomer, Sarmiento de Gamboa has been twice previously charged by the Inquisition in Peru for—among other things—averring that “when it is midday in Lima, it is already night in Spain,” which is regarded as heresy.)

JANUARY 21, 1580. Inside the Strait of Magellan, Sarmiento de Gamboa loses contact with Villalobos's San Francisco during a storm that drives the San Francisco far south before it regains Valdivia (Chile) in mid-February; it then returns toward Peru. Sarmiento de Gamboa's Esperanza meanwhile emerges into the South Atlantic on February 24, sailing across to Africa, where he and his emaciated crew capture a French privateer. Reaching Cape Verde by May 23, the Azores on July 18, and Spain by August 19, Sarmiento de Gamboa joins the royal court at Badajoz and advises Philip II on how best to fortify and colonize this vital waterway to prevent future incursions into the Pacific.

JANUARY 31, 1580. In Europe, the death of the epileptic cardinal-king, Henry of Portugal, leaves Philip II of Spain as the nearest claimant to this throne. His succession is disputed by the Portuguese people. Philip II recalls 72-year-old Gen. Fernando Alvarez de Toledo, Duque de Alba, from enforced retirement; he crosses the frontier between both nations at the head of an army late in June. Aided by a Spanish fleet under 54-year-old Adm. Alvaro de Bazán, Marqués de Santa Cruz, Alba wins a smashing victory at Alcántara and compels Lisbon to surrender by August 25.

Philip II is officially proclaimed Portugal's king by the Cortes (Portuguese parliament) on April 15, 1581, thereby adding a million subjects, a strong fleet, and more overseas possessions to his already vast empire. (Despite minor resistance headed by a rival claimant—the Prior Dom Antônio de Crato—

Portugal will remain under Spanish domination until December 1640, when it revolts and regains its independence.

MAY 29, 1580. On this Sunday, feast day of the Most Holy Trinity on the Church calendar, the veteran conquistador Juan de Garay returns 1,000 miles back down the Paraguay River from Asunción and Santa Fe with 64 mixed-heritage mestizo families aboard his caravel San Cristóbal de Buena Ventura, plus two brigantines and a flotilla of canoes. He anchors in the muddy, shallow waters at the Riachuelo River mouth to reclaim Buenos Aires as a Spanish settlement. Over the next few days, his followers will reconnoiter the landscape before selecting a new site, three-quarters of a mile northwest of its original ruins and atop one of the few pieces of high ground on an otherwise flat alluvial plain, to afford some protection against floods or attacks. It also lies adjacent to a pozo or “deep-water anchorage” suitable for receiving small ocean-going vessels.

By June 11, sufficient space is cleared to formally assign lots and constitute a new community, dubbed the Ciudad de la Santísima Trinidad y Puerto de Santa María de Buenos Aires or “City of the Most Holy Trinity and Port of Saint Mary of the Fair Breezes.” Blocks are to radiate out from a central square (modern Plaza de Mayo), which is to be lined with a fort, church, and municipal hall, while outlying plots are assigned to each of the founding families to plant crops, as well as pasturelands for quintas or “farms” to graze livestock. Soon, some of these 300 inhabitants will begin to quit this primitive outpost in discouragement, yet enough remain to ensure its survival.

MARCH 24, 1582. Sarmiento's Counterexpedition. After an initial departure from Cadiz is turned back on account of a storm that costs some 800 lives, Sarmiento de Gamboa—now governor designate for the Strait of Magellan—reaches Rio de Janeiro with a depleted fleet under the veteran admiral Diego Flores de Valdés, Knight of the Order of Santiago (see “September 4, 1565” entry), and Vice Adm. Diego de la Rivera.

The expedition consists of the 700-ton galleass San Cristóbal as flagship under Capt. Juan de Garay; the 500-ton vice-flagships San Juan Bautista under Alonso de las Alas and San Esteban de Arriola under Juan Gutiérrez de Palomar; the 1,100-ton, French-built Jesús María under Juan de Aguirre; the 450-ton María de Jesús of Gutierre de Solís; the 400-ton Concepción under Gregorio de las Alas, Sancti Spiritus under Villaviciosa Unzueta, María under Francisco de Nevares, Trinidad under Martín de Zubieta, Santa Marta under Gonzalo Meléndez, and an unknown Galician ship under Martín de Quirós; the 360-ton San Nicolás under Captain Vargas; the 300-ton Santa Catalina (alias “Corza”) under Diego de Olavarri; the 260-ton Santa María de San Vicente under Hernando Morejón and San Esteban under Esteban de las Alas; the 230-ton Santa María de Begonia under Pedro de Elguino or Aquino; the 180-ton, Peruvian-built Nuestra Señora de Esperanza under Pedro Esteban de las Alas; plus the 80-ton frigates María Magdalena under Diego de Ovalle, Santa Isabel under Suero Queipo, and Santa Catalina under Francisco de Cuellar.

Their 672 sailors and 1,330 soldiers are accompanied by 670 settlers destined for southern Chile under Gov. Alonso de Sotomayor y Andía, Marqués de Villahermosa, plus another 206 workmen to fortify the strait. However, 153 men have succumbed during this second transatlantic crossing, while another 200 are ferried ashore sick, and Sarmiento de Gamboa and Admiral Flores are openly feuding.

AUGUST 12, 1582. The Spanish galley Leona and galliot Santiago reach the West Indian island of Dominica under Ruy Díaz de Mendoza, Knight of the Order of Saint John, to take up station six days later as coast-guard vessels operating out of Santo Domingo.

NOVEMBER 2, 1582. After a miserable layover in Rio de Janeiro, during which Sarmiento de Gamboa and Admiral Flores have another falling-out, their expedition resumes its voyage to colonize the Strait of Magellan. Santa María de San Vicente is left behind as useless, and on the night of November 29–30—after several days of heavy weather—Gutiérrez de Palomar’s San Esteban sinks with 300–350 hands off the mouth of the River Plate estuary. Flores thereupon reverses course to struggle back to Santa Catarina Island (Brazil) to regroup. The Santa Marta runs aground and becomes lost at Port Don Rodrigo (near modern Santa María Point), while the store-ship San Nicolás will be abandoned as a derelict.

DECEMBER 11, 1582. An English squadron under Edward Fenton appears off Brazil, at roughly 28° south latitude, consisting of the 400-ton flagship Leicester (formerly the galleon Bear) under Capt. William Hawkins Jr., a nephew of Sir Francis Drake; the 300-ton vice-flagship Edward Bonaventure under Luke Ward; the 40-ton bark Francis under John Drake, another of Sir Francis’s nephews; and the 50-ton small frigate or pinnace Elizabeth of Thomas Skevington.

Having reached Sierra Leone in West Africa too late in the season to round the Cape of Good Hope for the Moluccas, Fenton has instead chosen to traverse the Atlantic so as to enter the Pacific and emulate Sir Francis Drake’s exploits before eventually gaining China. However, he first hopes to refresh provisions and effect repairs, so he steers northward and, on the morning of December 16, materializes outside the small port city of Santos, flying false colors to discreetly establish contacts ashore among the Portuguese inhabitants. He finds a welcome ally in a compatriot and former ship’s gunner named John Withall, who is now managing the local mill.

Adoption of the Modern Calendar

By the late 1500s, European scholars realized that their old Julian calendar—so named in honor of its ancient Roman reviser, Julius Caesar—no longer coincided with the seasons or new moons, being 10 days out of sync. Therefore, after lengthy studies by the Neapolitan astronomer Aloysius Lilius and many others, Pope Gregory XIII issued a bull on February 24, 1582, declaring that a new calendar was to be introduced. The day following the feast of Saint Francis on October 4, rather than being reckoned as October 5, instead became designated as October 15, to restore all subsequent equinoxes to their proper cycle.

This change was adopted throughout most of Italy, Spain, Portugal, and their American colonies on this date, and in France two months afterward—calendars there passed from December 9 to December 20, 1582—while the Netherlands and Germany introduced it as of 1583. Protestant England, though—being opposed to any hint of Catholic suzerainty—refused to comply. Consequently, for the 170 years from 1582 through 1752 their “Old Style” Julian calendars lagged at least 10 days behind the “New Style” Gregorian calendars used by the Spanish, French, Dutch, and Portuguese. Sometimes, international treaties and correspondence even bore a double date, such as “December 12/22, 1635,” so as to be properly observed by different nations.

It was not until the English finally, in September 1752, accepted the modern Gregorian calendar, still in use today, that all major European powers were once more synchronized. For purposes of this book, all dates are given in Gregorian Style, unless specifically marked “(O.S.)” for “Old Style.”

On the morning of December 17, Withall hastens aboard the anchored English vessels to warn them that the suspicious Portuguese authorities have sent their noncombatants inland and mustered their militia. Fenton, therefore, stands back out of the bay. The next day, he intercepts the 46-ton bark Nuestra Señora de Piedad under the Argentine settler Alonso Francisco de Vera y Aragón, bound from Rio de Janeiro for the River Plate with a score of Franciscan missionaries freshly arrived from Spain under Fr. Juan de Rivadeneira. The English strip this prize of its pilot, Juan Pinto, wine, church bells, and correspondence, as well as learn of Sarmiento de Gamboa's recent departure to fortify the Strait of Magellan. Therefore, when the rovers release the Piedad three days later and continue southward on December 22, they are prey to uncertainty.

DECEMBER 31, 1582. Unsure of being able to win past Sarmiento de Gamboa's purported new settlement in the Strait of Magellan, Fenton reverses course this evening and returns north toward the Brazilian bay of São Vicente, hoping to temporarily find sanctuary. That same night, John Drake's 18-man Francis parts company, eventually becoming wrecked, with Drake himself marooned for 15 months amid the Charrúa Indians of the River Plate before finally escaping to the tiny Spanish settlement at Buenos Aires.

JANUARY 7, 1583. Having left his three largest ships with 600 men at Santa Catarina Island (Brazil) to return north toward São Vicente and Rio de Janeiro in quest of Fenton, Admiral Flores strikes out southward once more with Sarmiento de Gamboa's colonists, their fleet now reduced to only nine vessels. They hope to finally install an outpost within the Strait of Magellan. Three vessels bearing 700–800 men are directed to break off on January 17 for Buenos Aires to search for the English intruders. Sotomayor's Chilean colonists are then deposited to travel overland, leaving only five Spanish ships to proceed to the eastern mouth of the strait with Flores and Sarmiento.

JANUARY 26, 1583. After wrecking the galleon Santa Catalina or "Corza" on a sandbank in the River Plate estuary, Sotomayor anchors off San Gabriel Island (Uruguay) with his two surviving ships. He then proceeds in a small boat to Buenos Aires to request help from Gov. Juan de Garay. Sotomayor's expedition will be assisted up the Paraná River as far as Santa Fe, where an encampment is installed under his brother Luis de Sotomayor, in anticipation of proceeding to Mendoza to traverse the Andes. However, so many prefer deserting into Buenos Aires that the Chilean enterprise is effectively doomed to failure.

JANUARY 30, 1583. Fenton returns into São Vicente Bay (Brazil) with the Leicester, the Edward Bonaventure, and the Elizabeth, hospitably entertaining the wealthiest Portuguese residents from nearby Santos—José Adorno, Estevan Raposo, and Paulo de Vera—aboard his ships and sending presents to the regional Capitão-mor or Capt. Gen. Jerônimo Leitão, which are sent back unopened.

FEBRUARY 1, 1583. Flores appears off the eastern entrance of the Strait of Magellan with his five vessels, bearing Sarmiento's shrunken contingent. Discouraged by its contrary winds and daunting shoreline, the Spanish naval commander—after failing to effect a disembarkation despite repeated attempts—instead reverses course 16 days later and steers north for Brazil, over Sarmiento's heated protests.

FEBRUARY 3, 1583. Fenton at São Vicente. At 4:00 p.m., the Spanish galleons San Juan Bautista, Concepción, and Santa María de Begonia appear outside this bay, having been detached from Flores's fleet at Santa Catarina Island to return under Commo. Andrés de Elguino or Aquino, bearing the many sick and injured from Sarmiento's expedition (see "January 7, 1583" entry). Having stumbled upon the English intruders—of whom the Spaniards are aware because of the released bark Piedad (see "December 11, 1582" entry) as well as a message sent by the Portuguese coastal watchers at Monte Serrate—Elguino clears for battle and stands in at 11:00 p.m., bearing down upon the anchored English trio and initiating a moonlit exchange that lasts until 4:00 a.m., when a rainstorm interrupts the battle.

The dawn of February 4 reveals the Begonia sunk in shallow water, the attackers having suffered 32 killed and many wounded, as opposed to 8 Englishmen slain and 20 injured. Elguino's remaining pair of galleons nonetheless defend themselves vigorously when action resumes at 10:00 a.m., until Fenton finally breaks off the fight and stands out to sea four hours later.

Ward's Edward Bonaventure eventually becomes separated from its consorts on February 8, sailing alone and touching at Fernando de Noronha Island before reaching England in May, while Fenton visits Salvador before regaining Ireland by June. His actions off Santos prompt King Philip II to authorize the construction in 1584 of Fort Santo Amador da Barra Grande at Góes Beach on Guarujá Island to protect against future incursions into São Vicente Bay.

FEBRUARY 27, 1583. Flores and his squadron rejoin Elguino's battle-scarred San Juan Bautista and Concepción at São Vicente (Brazil), learning of the destruction of the Begonia by Fenton. To strengthen Santos's harbor defenses, the Spanish admiral helps erect a redoubt named Fort San Antonio to guard its entrance, installing a 100-man garrison before his departure with Sarmiento de Gamboa's followers.

MAY 9, 1583. Flores reenters the bay at Rio de Janeiro, where his morale is further dampened when he learns that two of the three ships that he has earlier detached for Buenos Aires with Sotomayor have also been wrecked. Even the presence at Rio de Janeiro of Adm. Diego de Alcega or Alzaga with four additional caravels—bearing supplies and reinforcements for a colony that the Crown already believes established in the strait—cannot revive his spirits.

JUNE 2, 1583. Having delegated Vice Adm. Diego de la Rivera and the 34-year-old, Asturian-born Commo. Gregorio de las Alas to remain at Rio de Janeiro with six ships and 538 men to mount a second attempt at establishing Sarmiento de Gamboa's colony in the Strait of Magellan, Admiral Flores sails northward for Salvador (Bahia) with his flagship San Cristóbal, the San Juan Bautista, the Concepción, the frigate Santa Isabel, and Alcega's galleons Santa María and Santa Cruz.

JUNE 3, 1583. After reconnoitering and bartering their way up the Brazilian coast, an English expedition appears off Margarita Island (Venezuela) under William and Richard Hawkins, pausing for a few weeks to gather pearls from their 300-ton flagship Primrose, 180-ton vice-flagship Minion, 100-ton bark Hastings, two 100-ton ships owned by Sir Francis Drake, an 80-ton pinnace, plus one other smaller consort. Despite such peaceful conduct, this formation also bears a privateering commission from Dom Antônio de Crato—pretender to the Portuguese throne (see “January 31, 1580” entry)—to attack Spanish interests.

JULY 5, 1583. While working its way inshore to anchor overnight nine miles west of La Isabela on northern Hispaniola, the Spanish galliot Santiago of Capt. Diego Osorio strikes a shoal an hour and a half after darkness and breaks up, although its crew and several hundred slaves are all rescued the next day by Ruy Díaz's consort Leona.

JULY 13, 1583. Admiral Flores reaches the city of Salvador (Bahia, Brazil) from Rio de Janeiro, detaching his second-in-command, Alcega, toward Spain with the galleon Santa Cruz, while laying his other five warships up in ordinary.

JULY 20, 1583. Before dawn, slave oarsmen mutiny aboard the coast-guard galley Leona, anchored for the night off Cape Engaño (eastern Santo Domingo), and kill Commo. Ruy Díaz and three loyal hands, as well as wounding a dozen more Spaniards, before reversing course northwestward with the commandeered vessel.

Led by the convict Pedro de Vargas and numerous French prisoners, the mutineers attempt to stand into Puerto Plata the next day, only to be discouraged by its alerted defenses under Capt. Pedro Rengifo de Angulo. Instead, 60 armed rebels go ashore at La Isabela, slaughtering beef cattle; they release their captives before steering toward Bayahá. There, they lure its unsuspecting Crown official aboard, then destroy its harbor castle and pillage the town along with its outlying district for four days before departing toward La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti), with a prize in tow.

JULY 22, 1583. William and Richard Hawkins appear off Puerto Vargas (near modern Guayanilla in western Puerto Rico), anchoring so as to repair one of their vessels. They take on wood and water before departing by the morning of July 30 for the Mona Passage, in company with three other recently arrived English ships. While reembarking, one of their shore parties is ambushed by a half-dozen Spaniards under Diego Rodríguez de Castellanos, who captures two interlopers and puts them to death.

AUGUST 1, 1583. After being repelled at La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti)—its mutinous crew suffering one killed and another seriously injured—the rebel galley Leona anchors 25 miles farther west at Guava (Petit Goâve) to begin gathering provisions so that Vargas's followers might burn their prize and sail the captive ship brought from Bayahá toward Europe. On August 9, they also intercept a second merchantman arriving from the Spanish Main, incorporating it into their flotilla.

The next day, Captain Osorio reaches La Yaguana after a forced march overland to attempt to recapture the galley. Outnumbered, he fails to persuade the local militia to help; instead, he visits the mutineers' 50-man fortified camp at Guava on August 13 to offer pardons to anyone willing to surrender. The rebels become divided, shifting the galley to La Yaguana on August 20 while retaining their camp and two other vessels at Guava.

Eventually, the Leona departs north on August 26, pausing at Atibonico (modern Artibonite) two days later to rustle cattle, then proceeding to Guanahibes (modern Gonaïves) on September 6 to rejoin its two companion ships. Some 90 mutineers then go aboard the latter to sail for France, having marooned another 60 unwilling colleagues ashore. Osorio arrives the evening of September 7 and recaptures the stripped galley before it can be burned by its 50 remaining crew members, but he is otherwise powerless to pursue the escaping pair out to Tortuga Island, or into the Atlantic.

AUGUST 15, 1583. Humphrey Gilbert lays claim to Newfoundland (Canada) for Elizabeth I of England.

DECEMBER 8, 1583. Sarmiento and the Spanish vice admiral de la Rivera depart Rio de Janeiro with the galleons Santa María de Castro and Trinidad, as well as the frigates Santa Catalina, María Magdalena, and María de Villaviciosa, to again attempt to create an outpost in the Strait of Magellan. Sarmiento de Gamboa recognizes that his colonists are setting sail with their "morale flattened and in great fear." After two months of battling contrary winds, they sight the waterway on February 1, 1584, feast day of the Purification on the Church calendar.

Three days later, 245 people—116 soldiers, 48 sailors, 58 colonists, 13 women, and 10 children—struggle ashore in the lee of Cape Once Mil Vírgenes near its eastern entrance, wrecking the galleon Trinidad in the process. After sketching out an initial fort dubbed La Purificación, Sarmiento considers its placement too windswept and so relocates his settlement on February 11 to another nearby site, which he names Nombre de Jesús and where he installs his artillery. He is now supported by only the Santa María de Castro, de la Rivera having retired for Brazil with the frigates because of the ceaseless storms. Undaunted, Sarmiento de Gamboa leads 94 of his healthiest men on a 200-mile trek, suffering 1 killed and 10 wounded in skirmishes against Patagonian natives before establishing another outpost called Rey don Felipe at the narrowest point of the strait, which he arms with eight guns and supplies with provisions ferried aboard the Santa María de Castro.

Repressing a mutiny by beheading its four ring-leaders, Sarmiento de Gamboa maintains his foothold through sheer strength of will, despite the 15 continuous days of snow that threaten his wretched colonists. On May 25, 1584, he goes aboard the Santa María de Castro at Rey don Felipe to once again visit his original eastern encampment at Nombre de Jesús, but a fierce winter storm sweeps him past it the next day and out into the South Atlantic. After vainly beating about for 20 days, the Santa María stands away from the strait, reaching Santos on June 29 and Rio de Janeiro by July 7.

JANUARY 1584. In London, Elizabeth expels Spain's ambassador Bernardino de Mendoza for his role in the Throckmorton assassination plot against her, effectively severing diplomatic relations between the nations.

JANUARY 3, 1584. Antonio de Berrio leads a Spanish expedition eastward down the Casanare and Meta rivers in central Venezuela in quest of Manoa, the legendary city of El Dorado or "The Golden Man." Before reaching the Atures River, however, the exhausted Spaniards are compelled to turn back.

MARCH 1, 1584. French Paraíba. The Spanish admiral Flores quits the anchorage of Salvador in Baía de Todos os Santos (Brazil), sailing north toward Pernambuco (Recife) to await the arrival of a Portuguese expedition of 100 cavalymen, 300 infantrymen, and 3,000 native auxiliaries who are marching overland under Felipe de Moura to expel some French trespassers from Paraíba Bay.

After numerous delays, Flores circles round from Pernambuco with his five galleons, appearing before the Paraíba River mouth. One French vessel escapes past his warships out to sea, but Spanish boat parties discover another four careening three or four miles inside. The largest—200 tons—is captured, although 150 Frenchmen torch the other three and the dwellings on land before disappearing upriver with their Potiguar allies. To prevent any return, the victors, in May, establish Fort São Felipe upon this site—its town later being dubbed “Filipeia” in honor of Philip II—and garrison it with Portuguese governor Fructuoso Barbosa’s 50 Brazilian militiamen, plus a company of 110 Spanish harquebusiers under Captain Castrejón.

However, an attempt to advance farther upriver is defeated by the Potiguar, with the death of 40 Hispano-Portuguese and 400 native allies, the survivors being chased back to within range of Fort São Felipe’s guns.

JUNE 10, 1584. In France, the death of the king’s younger brother François, Duc d’Anjou, leaves the Huguenot prince Henri de Navarre next in line for the throne of the childless Henri III, prompting the revival of the Catholic League as an oppositionist force under Henri, Duc de Guise. The latter secretly signs the Treaty of Joinville with Spain in December of this same year, with Philip promising to aid his coreligionists in supporting Charles, Cardinal de Bourbon, as a rival claimant against the Protestant contender Henri de Navarre; whereas Elizabeth of England backs the Huguenot cause.

JANUARY 13, 1585. Having lost his flagship Santa María de Castro, Sarmiento de Gamboa instead dispatches a 40-ton relief bark from Pernambuco (Brazil) for his starving Spanish colonists in the Strait of Magellan. This ship is also wrecked, so Sarmiento de Gamboa follows with a 50-ton vessel, only to turn back into Rio de Janeiro because of foul weather. There, he represses a mutiny by its demoralized crew with his sword—killing one sailor and wounding others—when they refuse to put to sea again.

Desperate to obtain assistance for his isolated outpost, Sarmiento sets sail in June 1585 for Spain aboard a Portuguese caravel to beseech Philip II’s assistance, but he is intercepted off Tercera in the Azores on August 11 by three of Sir Walter Raleigh’s privateers and held captive in England until late October 1586. Released after an interview with Elizabeth I, he enters France and is again seized that same December by Huguenots, who will hold him until he is finally ransomed for 6,000 ducats and four fine horses in August 1590.

MARCH 1585. In France, the eighth “War of Religion” erupts between the Huguenot faction led by Henri de Navarre, the Catholic League under Henri, Duc de Guise, and royalist forces under King Henri III (thus becoming known as the “War of the Three Henries”). For the next four and a half years, the nation will be wracked by strife, with foreign mercenaries joining in on all sides.

MAY 17, 1585. The 42-year-old adventurer Sir Richard Grenville reaches Dominica with his 160-ton flagship Tiger and a smaller consort, plus several Spanish prizes. He is part of a seven-ship convoy bearing colonists for Raleigh’s projected new colony at Roanoke (North Carolina).

Three days later, Grenville approaches Las Boquillas—30 miles east of modern Guayanilla in southern Puerto Rico, dubbed “Mosquito Bay” by the English—setting 400 men ashore on May 25 to build a temporary fort and a pinnacle. Four days later, he is rejoined by his 50-ton consort Elizabeth under Capt. Thomas Cavendish, then departs on the morning of June 3 after burning his fort and the surrounding countryside.

Grenville’s second-in-command, Ralph Lane, lands 20 men from his 140-ton Roebuck at Cape Rojo on June 6 to poach salt, despite the presence of several Spanish cavalry patrols. Lane pauses next off Mona Island, intercepting a passing Spanish bark on the evening of June 8 and a frigate the next morning. He holds both so as to extort fresh food, water, and mounts from the residents of nearby San Germán before steering northwestward.

JUNE 11, 1585. Grenville and Cavendish’s five ships and prizes reach La Isabela (northern Hispaniola), receiving such a friendly welcome from its local Spanish officials and those of nearby Puerto Plata that they remain until June 17 before continuing their voyage toward North America.

JUNE 26, 1585 (O.S.). Grenville reaches Wococon Inlet, somewhere near modern Ocracoke Inlet on North Carolina’s Outer Banks. Three days later, his flagship Tiger runs aground, losing most of the supplies that it carries. The English nonetheless come ashore and establish the small Roanoke colony in Raleigh’s name, under the direction of Ralph Lane. Grenville sets sail on August 25 (O.S.), returning into Plymouth in England by September 18 (O.S.).

JULY 1585. In Europe, Henri III of France signs the Treaty of Nemours, aligning himself with the Catholic League and its Spanish backers.

AUGUST 20, 1585. Elizabeth I signs the Treaty of Nonsuch, committing England to send 6,000 troops under her favorite, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, to aid the Protestant Dutch in their revolt against Spain this same December.

SEPTEMBER 10, 1585. While homeward-bound from Virginia toward England, Grenville's Tiger intercepts the 300-ton Spanish ship Santa María de San Vicente of the master Alonso de Cornieles near Bermuda, a rich prize that is sailed into Plymouth on October 28.

JANUARY 10, 1586. Sack of Santo Domingo. At 8:00 a.m., Drake resumes his West Indian depredations by materializing off Hispaniola with 23 vessels, including two on loan from Queen Elizabeth—his 600-ton flagship Elizabeth Bonaventure and the 250-ton Aid—plus Martin Frobisher's private merchantman Primrose serving as fleet vice-flagship, and the 400-ton galleons Leicester, Tiger, Minion, and Swallow; his whole fleet bears 2,300 men. Having captured a Spanish bark with a Greek pilot, Drake learns that the best disembarkation point is 10 miles west of the city of Santo Domingo at the Jaina River mouth, so he proceeds there this same evening to begin landing 800 troops under Christopher Carleill.

The next day, Drake's fleet menaces Santo Domingo's seaward defenses, precipitating the Spaniards into scuttling two ships in a vain attempt to block up its harbor entrance. When Carleill's small army unexpectedly approaches overland at noon, Spanish will collapses, leading to a wholesale flight of its tiny garrison, led by the governor Lic. Cristóbal de Ovalle. The English seize and hold Santo Domingo for a month, during which time they pillage the city. They then begin torching its buildings so as to extort ransoms from its inhabitants who are hiding in the interior; they eventually raise 25,000 ducats, and Drake departs on February 11.

FEBRUARY 19, 1586. Drake at Cartagena. As the English fleet gathers before this port, plainly visible from Santo Domingo Beach (also known as Playa Grande or "Big Beach"), Gov. Pedro Fernández de Bustos—having had ample warning of their approach—orders all civilians evacuated inland. He meanwhile masses 54 riders, 450 harquebusiers, 100 spearmen, 20 armed black slaves, plus 400 Indian archers to defend the city; furthermore, out in its harbor lie two well-acquainted galleys, recently arrived from Spain under the veteran commander Drake's assault on Cartagena.

Pedro Vique Manrique. Still, rumors as to the unprecedented size and armament of this enemy fleet sap the defenders' morale.

Drake leads his 23 ships directly into Cartagena's outer harbor, landing 600 men under Carleill this same evening. While they march northward, Frobisher with his pinnaces probes the Boquerón fortress held by Pedro Mexía de Mirabal after nightfall, until being obliged to withdraw. The next morning, Carleill's column pushes past a line of trenches, spreading panic through Cartagena's garrison. Vique's galleys are run ashore, their crews abandoning ship as the slaves revolt. By February 21, all resistance ceases. Only 7 or 8 Spaniards lose their lives during this fighting, as opposed to 30 Englishmen. The hapless city is thereupon ransacked, its vacant buildings being ransomed by Bishop Juan de Montalvo and other leading citizens for 107,000 ducats—against which Drake extends a receipt. With sickness weakening his men, he remains until May 4 before setting sail for Cuba.

(Madrid will hasten out a battle fleet of 20 ships and 4,500 men this same year under Adm. Alvaro Flores de Quiñones to help resurrect the devastated city; 2 new coast-guard galleys are also received, with a combined complement of 233 troops and 384 slaves.)

APRIL 10, 1586. The French corsair Captain Richard approaches the vicinity of Bayamo in southern Cuba with two vessels, intending to sell the merchant frigate of Hernando Casanova—which he holds captive—back to the Spaniards. Apparently unaware of the heightened alert caused by Drake’s presence in West Indian waters, Richard is surprised by Cuban militiamen under Capt. Alvaro Pérez de Maya, who kills eight Frenchmen and captures numerous others (including Richard, along with his flagship) while liberating the Spanish frigate. Only the second French vessel, commanded by Richard’s son, succeeds in escaping, his father being carried into Bayamo to face execution.

APRIL 30, 1586. In Roanoke (North Carolina), the death of the local werowance or chieftain Ensensore soon leads to hostilities between the natives and its surviving English colonists under Lane.

MAY 21, 1586. Richard’s ship returns to Santiago de Cuba with three other French corsair vessels to avenge his father’s capture. Two of them deposit 80 rovers at Juragua Beach, who fight their way inland against local Cuban militiamen under Capt. Gómez Patiño. Meanwhile, the other pair of French ships penetrate Santiago’s roadstead and disembark men who torch the town’s main church, plus several lesser buildings. Unable to carry the entire town, though, the French are driven off by Spanish reinforcements from Bayamo under Capt. Hernán Manrique de Rojas, who allegedly kill 50 invaders and wound another 30.

MAY 29, 1586. Drake’s fleet bypasses Havana, watched by more than 1,000 militiamen marshaled ashore under Gov. Gabriel de Luján. The English are shadowed until they pass Matanzas and steer northward into the Straits of Florida.

JUNE 6, 1586. Annihilation of St. Augustine. This evening, Drake’s 23 large ships and 19 lesser consorts anchor off the entry into St. Augustine Bay. Apprised from the beacon station maintained at its mouth, Gov. Pedro Menéndez Márquez musters 80 troops inside Fort San Juan del Pinillo, a 14-gun redoubt of cedar logs directly opposite the entry channel, while sending the town’s 200–250 non-combatants fleeing inland by boat.

More than a thousand British rovers forge ashore the next day under Drake and General Carleill, advancing across the half-mile breadth of Santa Anastasia Island to install a battery amid the dunes near Fort San Juan by nightfall. Outnumbered and distrustful of their native vassals, who had begun pillaging empty Spanish homes, the defenders abandon their stronghold once British boat parties steal across the harbor under cover of darkness; both the empty fort and town are taken without opposition by June 8.

When the invaders withdraw four days later, they systematically sack and torch the town, even chopping down its fruit trees, while Fort San Juan is stripped of its artillery and everything else of value before being set ablaze. Menéndez Márquez and his fellow colonists return out of their hiding places to find smoldering ruins; they are left with nothing more than six hogsheads of flour, a little powder, plus “the clothes we stood in.” A boat is immediately sent to Havana to beg for help.

Meanwhile, the English admiral continues northward up the coast to ravage the Spanish outpost of Santa Elena on Parris Island (South Carolina); however, he cannot spot its entrance at Port Royal Sound, so he proceeds instead to visit Raleigh’s fledgling colony at Roanoke (North Carolina).

JUNE 19, 1586. Drake pauses at Roanoke, offering its distressed settlers the 70-ton bark Francis and two pinnaces, along with food and equipment. Unfortunately, a storm disperses the English fleet shortly thereafter, the Francis and numerous boats being lost. Discouraged, the 109 remaining colonists opt to return to England with Drake, abandoning their settlement by June 28. (Approximately one week later, a 100-ton relief ship sent out by Raleigh arrives, followed 10 days later by three more ships under Grenville, who leaves 15 men behind as a second holding party upon departing.)

After touching at Newfoundland, Drake returns into Portsmouth by early August, having lost 750 men during his New World campaign—three-quarters due to disease. Despite having seized a considerable amount of booty, it does not cover his expedition’s costs.

NOVEMBER 4, 1586. Cavendish appears off Brazil from West Africa with his 140-ton flagship Desire, the 60-ton Content, and the 40-ton bark Hugh Gallant, now manned by slightly more than 100 men. Like Drake and Fenton before him, it is his intent to round the Strait of Magellan into the Pacific and raid Spain’s American empire before crossing to Asia. One week later, his squadron anchors off São Sebastião Island, east of Santos, refreshing provisions until December 3.

Thomas Cavendish

Thomas Cavendish is believed to have been born at Grimston Hall, near the port of Harwich in Suffolk, England. His birth date is uncertain, but records indicate that he was baptized on September 19, 1560, at Trimley St. Martin, near Ipswich. The son of a prosperous gentleman, he inherited the family fortune at the age of 12 upon his father's death. In 1575, the teenage Thomas was enrolled in Corpus Christi College at Cambridge University, but he left two years later without a degree. He then moved to London, spending lavishly as a courtier of Queen Elizabeth I. In 1584, he was elected to Parliament for the seat of Shaftesbury in Devon.

His fortune now considerably depleted, Cavendish hoped to recuperate it at sea. He bought the 50-ton Elizabeth in 1585 to take part in Sir Richard Grenville's colonizing expedition to Virginia. On regaining England that autumn, Cavendish decided to copy Sir Francis Drake's famous feat of sailing around the world. He built the Desire as his flagship and set sail from London with two smaller consorts and a total of 123 men on June 10, 1586 (O.S.).

After a brief stop at his home port of Harwich, Cavendish put into Plymouth and then struck out on his epic voyage by July 21, 1586 (O.S.). Five days later, his trio skirmished against five Biscayan vessels off Cape Finisterre. The vessels Desire, Content, and Hugh Gallant continued past the Canary Islands and reached Sierra Leone by August 21 (O.S.). Here, Cavendish seized a Portuguese ship and tried to burn a native village. He then set sail across the South Atlantic in September, bound for Brazil.

Over the ensuing year, Cavendish penetrated the Strait of Magellan and swept the Spanish American coastline as far north as Baja California. His Pacific incursion climaxed with the capture of the Manila galleon Santa Ana in November 1587, after which Cavendish steered westward across the ocean. He reached the Philippines by January 15, 1588 (O.S.), and departed Indonesia for South Africa two months later. Rounding the Cape of Good Hope by March 19 (O.S.), he passed St. Helena three months later and sighted the English coast again on September 3 (O.S.).

Cavendish entered Plymouth one week later to a hero's welcome, the second English commander to circle the globe. Legend has it that his sailors arrived dressed in silks, with damasks and cloth of gold for sails. Rich and famous because of this exploit, he lived splendidly and soon squandered his second fortune as well. Necessity obliged him to try another voyage, departing Plymouth in August 1591 for Brazil. Luck at last deserted him—fierce storms prevented him from entering the Pacific. Cavendish died aboard his flagship on May 20, 1592 (O.S.), and was cast into the sea.

DECEMBER 27, 1586. Cavendish's formation pauses in a large uninhabited bay—dubbed “Port Desire” (modern Puerto Deseado, Argentina) in honor of his flagship—before resuming its southerly course toward the Strait of Magellan. A few days later, the English rescue several “poore starved Spanyards” who are walking northward from Sarmiento's failed settlement of Nombre de Jesús (see “December 8, 1583” entry) and learn that only a total of 23 defenders still remain alive; they are rescued once the English enter the eastern entrance of that waterway on January 7, 1587.

JANUARY 11, 1587. Cavendish in the Pacific. Penetrating deeper into the Strait of Magellan, Cavendish's three English vessels reach Sarmiento's ruined western settlement of Rey don Felipe by January 19—dubbing it “Port Famine” upon finding only cadavers inside its huts—and remove six buried cannons. The rovers then emerge into the South Pacific by March 5, steering north for Mocha Island, which they sight 19 days later. Cavendish disembarks farther to its north at Santa María with 80 heavily armed men, only to be peaceably received by the local inhabitants.

JANUARY 20, 1587. An English squadron arrives off the River Plate from Sierra Leone—dispatched by George Clifford, 3rd Earl of Cumberland—consisting of the 130-man, 260-ton flagship Red Dragon under Robert Withrington; the 70-man, 130-ton bark Clifford under Christopher Lister; as well as the Roe under Captain Hawes and the pinnace Dorothy, on loan from Raleigh.

They capture a pair of small Portuguese slavers that same day, then—although intending to round the Strait of Magellan into the Pacific like Drake, Fenton, and Cavendish before them—decide to reverse course northward on March 6 so as to attack Brazil.

APRIL 1587. In central Venezuela, de Berrio leads a second Spanish expedition eastward across the Casanare and Meta plains, searching for Manoa—home of the legendary El Dorado. Despite reaching the eastern shores of the Orinoco River, his column is obliged to turn back one year later because of weakness and ill health.

APRIL 9, 1587. Cavendish's three vessels put into Quintero Bay, north of Valparaíso (Chile), and one of their shore parties is ambushed two days later by the local Spaniards, who kill seven Englishmen and a Spanish interpreter as well as capturing another nine rovers. Still, the interlopers linger until April 15 before standing back out into the Pacific.

APRIL 21, 1587. Salvador. Withrington and Lister's small English squadron enters Baía de Todos os Santos (Salvador, Brazil), despite fire from its batteries and the eight ships and one caravel anchored inside. Four of these vessels are cut out by the raiders on the moonlit night of April 23–24, a 24-gun, 250-ton Flushing providing most of the opposition.

After riding out a storm, Withrington and Lister take their prizes nine days later to a bay northwest of Baía, where their shore parties are repeatedly attacked by several hundred local militiamen on both May 12 and 16. Tiring of their subsequent blockade

Drake at Cadiz

Although war was not yet openly declared between England and Spain in the spring of 1587, tensions were mounting. Elizabeth and her advisors had grown worried over the past winter about the large number of ships and stockpiles being massed in Spanish ports. It was said that these were intended for a campaign against England, even though the exact details were not yet revealed.

The more aggressive English counselors suggested a preemptive strike. The queen guardedly agreed, so Drake was unleashed from Plymouth with 27 vessels on April 12, 1587. His secret instructions were to “impeach the provisions of Spain.” Although his flagship Elizabeth Bonaventure and three others were royal warships, his expedition was designated as a privateering venture.

Drake's fleet appeared outside Cadiz by April 29, 1587. With typical boldness and skill, Drake sailed directly inside the harbor late that same afternoon. Its surprised defenders replied ineffectually, while the English swarmed down on 37 anchored vessels. Boarding parties stripped many of these vessels before torching them. The raiders remained inside Cadiz Bay for the next two days and nights; the only effective opposition was offered by a dozen Spanish galleys. Yet Drake wrote the following to a Protestant friend a few days later: “We sunk two of them and one great argosy, and still avoided them, with very small hurt.”

When the English fleet slipped out of the harbor on the morning of May 2, 1587, they left behind 23 destroyed ships and carried off four prizes. The shocked Spaniards immediately cancelled that year's plate fleet for Mexico, fearing that Drake intended to make another West Indian sweep. Instead, his fleet prowled between Lisbon and Cape Saint Vincent for a month, intercepting every ship they met. (In the process, Drake estimated that he also destroyed 1,600 to 1,700 tons of seasoned barrel staves. These would have been enough to make barrels for 25,000 to 30,000 tons of water or provisions. Their loss caused serious shortfalls in the Invincible Armada of the next year.)

On June 1, 1587, Drake stood away for the Azores. Although he failed to meet an unwary, homeward-bound plate fleet, he did catch a great prize: The Portuguese carrack São Felipe—bound from Goa in the Far East toward Lisbon—was taken. Its exotic cargo was valued at £114,000, of which the queen received more than £40,000 and Drake, £14,000. More importantly, his Cadiz raid did not immediately trigger a war. When asked about it later, he said that it was merely “singeing the beard” of the king of Spain.

of Baía, the English finally sail away on June 1 and, after seizing several more inconsequential prizes off the coast, lay in a course for England by August 3—reaching home on September 29 (O.S.) with scant profit.

MAY 3, 1587. Cavendish captures a large Spanish ship and four barks at Arica (Chile), sacking and burning all except one, which is incorporated into his squadron and renamed George—its seizure having occurred on Saint George's Day (April 23, O.S.). He resumes his progression northwestward two days later.

MAY 14, 1587. Cavendish reaches Pisco (Peru), intercepting two Spanish merchantmen three days later, which he pillages and burns. The English then descend upon Paita at dawn of May 29, capturing a bark in its harbor. They set 60 men ashore to occupy the town, whose 300 inhabitants have fled inland. When the latter refuse to raise any ransoms, the rovers set the dwellings ablaze before sailing northward.

JUNE 12, 1587. While resting his crews and careening his vessels at Machola on Puná Island (Ecuador), 15 or 16 of Cavendish's men are surprised by several score Spaniards and Indians out of Guayaquil under Capt. Juan de Galarza, who kill 5 or 6 Englishmen and carry 2 or 3 more off as prisoners. In retaliation, Cavendish orders all of Puná's buildings, ships, and crops burned before departing on June 21.

JUNE 29, 1587. The 120-ton flagship Lion reaches Dominica from England, accompanied by a flyboat and pinnace bearing 150–160 new settlers under the governor designate John White for Raleigh's colony at Roanoke (North Carolina). Three days later, they go ashore at Saint Croix to refresh and, by July 8, sight Puerto Rico, which they skirt without incident before proceeding northwest toward the Caicos Islands and their final destination.

AUGUST 2, 1587. White's expedition reaches Roanoke, setting him ashore with 40 armed men who find no trace of the 15 men left behind that previous year (see "June 19, 1586" entry). Nevertheless, all 120 remaining settlers disembark and are joined two days later by their flyboat under Edward Spicer, which had become separated from the main party. White returns to England shortly thereafter aboard the latter vessel to hasten out fresh provisions and reinforcements that following spring (although unexpectedly prevented by the Armada embargo).

AUGUST 7, 1587. Cavendish surprises Huatulco (Mexico), looting it over the course of a week before setting its dwellings ablaze, along with a merchantman in the harbor, then departing.

AUGUST 16, 1587. As a result of Drake's devastating attack the previous year against St. Augustine (Florida) and his subsequent sweep up the Atlantic Seaboard, Pedro Menéndez Márques reaches the advance Spanish outpost of Santa Elena on what is today Parris Island (South Carolina). He has Crown orders for its Fort San Marcos and town to be abandoned so as to reconcentrate all Spanish settlers farther to the south. By the end of this same month, Santa Elena's garrison, artillery, supplies, and civilians are taken aboard the ships San Juan and San Pedro; the buildings are torched before they depart for St. Augustine.

AUGUST 24, 1587. Puerto de la Navidad (west of Manzanillo, Mexico) is visited by Cavendish, who imprisons its Spanish lookout, then torches a pair of 200-ton ships being built in its yards. Compostela is sighted by September 18, and Mazatlán is sighted nine days later, after which the Englishmen cross to the southwestern tip of Baja California to await the annual Manila galleon.

NOVEMBER 14, 1587. This morning, Cavendish's lookouts spot a large ship approaching out of the northwest, which proves to be the 700-ton Philippine galleon Santa Ana of Capt. Tomás de Alzola. The Desire and the Content chase it until noon, at which time they come within range and open fire. The galleon has no guns mounted—never expecting to encounter enemies upon this lonely route—nonetheless, it repels the first two English boarding attempts before finally being pounded into submission. Approximately a dozen Spaniards are killed during these exchanges, along with two Englishmen.

Cavendish works his prize back to Cabo San Lucas by November 16, depositing 180 captives ashore while looting the Santa Ana nearby. Eventually, 40 tons of the richest Asian goods are transshipped before the raiders torch the galleon; they strike out westward across the Pacific on November 30.

Meanwhile, the Spanish survivors build a raft from their ship's wreckage, paddling to summon help from Santiago (Colima). They are rescued and carried into Acapulco by December 7.

ELIZABETHAN WARS (1588–1603)

By the spring of 1588, frictions between Philip and Elizabeth become so intense that hostilities blaze forth openly. The “Invincible Armada”—130 Spanish ships bearing 2,400 guns, plus 22,000 sailors and soldiers—appears off southwestern England on July 29, bent upon running up the Channel to transfer the veteran army of Alejandro Farnesio, Duque de Parma, out of the Low Countries to invade Kent. Persistent English counterattacks and lack of proper Spanish coordination, plus heavy weather, doom this enterprise—less than two-thirds of its vessels and half its men ever reach home again.

Although all of England’s seamen are initially concentrated in home waters to resist this menace, victory soon permits them to switch over to the offensive. During the course of the ensuing 15 years of conflict, an average of 100–200 privateering ventures will set sail every year, bringing in £150,000–£200,000 per annum in prizes. While most of these expeditions operate in the North Atlantic, a number also raid Spain’s New World empire.

LATE JUNE 1588. The English privateer ships Drake, Examiner, Hope, and Chance—raised by the merchant John Watts and dispatched out of London early in March prior to the Armada scare—hover in the Old Bahama Channel for two weeks, vainly hoping to intercept Spanish ships arriving at Havana. After scanty results, the Drake steers toward the Azores, while the latter three vessels visit Newfoundland, then set a course for England by mid-August with a single French prize.

LATE APRIL 1589. The 70-ton, 40-man privateer Black Dog of Capt. William Michelson appears off Hispaniola, driving a Spanish frigate ashore and pillaging it before doing the same to another coaster. Michelson subsequently roams southern Cuba as far west as Cape San Antonio, looting several more vessels before parting company on May 14 with 10 men aboard a captured Spanish frigate to reconnoiter the approaches to Havana. He joins three other English ships there in mounting a blockade, which intercepts two Spanish merchantmen arriving from the Canaries. One runs aground and is partially stripped before troops can push out from shore and drive the rovers away.

Meanwhile, the Black Dog under its pilot Roger Kingson and the master William Mace weighs anchor from Cape San Antonio on May 18 to chase a passing Spanish ship of 120 tons, bearing a cargo of wrought iron and wine. Contrary winds and currents carry the privateers and their prize into the Gulf of Mexico, where they attack a large Spanish merchantman loading in Campeche’s harbor 20 days later. This assault is beaten off, but when Kingson and Mace attempt to extort a ransom of 5,000 ducats to depart, they are lured aboard by the Spaniards and stabbed, Mace managing to swim away with two or three others. The Black Dog then captures another wine-bearing Spanish ship while returning toward Cuba, and although unable to find Michelson, eventually returns into Plymouth by September 20 with three Spanish prizes.

AUGUST 2, 1589. At Saint Cloud (France), King Henri III—now openly backing the Protestant cause—is assassinated by the fanatical young Dominican friar Jacques Clément, thus clearing the way for the Huguenot champion Henri de Navarre to claim the throne. Fighting escalates as Catholic forces redouble their efforts to impede his succession.

SEPTEMBER 1589. Chidley’s Failure. The 120-ton, 90-man Robin (formerly Delight) of Capt. Andrew Merrick and the master Robert Burnet arrives off Brazil from Cape Blanco (West Africa), having become separated from an English expedition intended to round the Strait of Magellan into the Pacific. The expedition’s 24-year-old leader, John Chidley, sights South America shortly thereafter, with his 300-ton, 180-man flagship Wildman (ex-Susan) under Master John Ellis; the 340-ton, 140-man White Lion (ex-Elizabeth Bonaventure) under Capt. Thomas Polwhele and the master Benjamin Wood; the 15-ton pinnace Wildman’s Club (ex-Susan’s Handmaid) under Capt. Richard Glover; plus another similar-sized pinnace.

Sickness is ravaging his crews, though; Chidley himself dies on November 16 near the equator, followed by Polwhele. Demoralized, Wood deserts with the White Lion, returning into Weymouth by the end of January 1590, while the Wildman and the Wildman's Club make for the West Indian island of Trinidad to recuperate before recrossing the Atlantic.

Only the Robin succeeds in gaining Puerto Deseado (Argentina), from where it attempts to enter the Strait of Magellan on January 10, 1590. A 15-man boat party is lost off “Penguin Island,” and another 5 Englishmen are slaughtered near the derelict Spanish outpost of Rey don Felipe by Patagonian natives. By February 22, the disheartened survivors refuse to go any farther, so the Robin reverses course out of the Strait two days later, sailing back up Brazil toward Europe and eventually being wrecked off Cherbourg (France).

MARCH 19, 1590. De Berrio heads east down the Casanare River in central Venezuela with a third Spanish expedition, determined to explore the Orinoco and discover the legendary city of El Dorado. One year later, he reaches the Caroní confluence, leaving a garrison six miles downstream at Carapana (opposite Tórtola Island in modern Morequito Province) before reaching the Atlantic coast and visiting the offshore island of Trinidad on September 1, 1591. He then proceeds westward to Margarita for reinforcements.

MAY 5, 1590. The 6-gun, 30-man, 60-ton bark Young, captained by William Irish (a 29-year-old gentleman of the retinue of Sir George Carey, later Lord Hunsdon), arrives off southern Puerto Rico, then 10 days later captures a 40-ton Spanish merchantman bound from Santo Domingo toward Havana with sugar and hides. Irish subsequently unites with the ship Falcon's Flight off Cape Tiburón (southwestern Haiti), capturing another Spanish vessel before steering north toward Newfoundland, accompanied by his first prize.

MAY 10, 1590. A privateering expedition, which was raised by the London merchant John Watts Sr. and consists of the 22-gun, 160-ton flagship Hopewell (alias Harry and John) under Capt. Abraham Cocke, the 160-ton Little John under Christopher Newport, and the 35-ton pinnace John Evangelist under William Lane, reaches Dominica. Two days later, the flagship and pinnace steer northwestward for Puerto Rico, leaving Little John temporarily off Dominica to intercept arriving Spanish vessels, before all three rendezvous at Saona Island.

MAY 29, 1590. Cocke's reunited trio of vessels blockade the southern coast of Santo Domingo for two weeks, capturing the 60-ton Spanish merchantman Trinidad, plus two smaller island frigates on June 17 and 24, respectively.

JULY 12, 1590. Cape Tiburón. This morning off southwestern Haiti, Cocke's formation is joined by Edward Spicer's 80-ton Moonlight (also called Mary Terlaney) and the 30-ton pinnace Conclude of Joseph Harris (alias “Master Harps”). Around noon, 14 Spanish sail approach out of the east, being five days out of Santo Domingo and bound toward the plate-fleet assembly point at Havana, escorted by Capt. Vicente González's galleon. Most of this Spanish convoy scatters southwestward, pursued until nightfall by the eight English privateers, who take a single small prize.

The next dawn, the Hopewell, the Moonlight, and the Conclude find the 350-ton, 9-gun Spanish vice-flagship Buen Jesús of Capt. Manuel Fernández Correa and the master Leonardo Doria anchored nearby, securing it after a stout four-hour resistance, during which 4 of the 68-man Spanish crew are killed and 6 wounded by long-range fire. Meanwhile, the Little John and the John Evangelist chase González's main body toward Jamaica, exchanging broadsides with his flagship and driving two merchantmen aground before its surviving six or seven Spanish vessels safely reach Santiago de la Vega (modern Kingston). English boat parties then refloat both beached vessels, one of which sinks; the other is sailed northwest toward Cape Corrientes (western Cuba) when Newport's triumphant pair of privateers quit Jamaica's coastline on the morning of July 14.

JULY 18, 1590. Toward sunset, Newport's Little John and John Evangelist sight three Spanish merchantmen off Los Órganos Keys west of Havana, which prove to be stragglers from Commo. Rodrigo de Rada's Mexican convoy that had entered the Cuban capital five days previously. The English open fire in the darkness, compelling one of this trio to reverse course toward Veracruz.

The next morning, the rovers close in upon the remaining pair: the master Miguel de Acosta's Nuestra Señora del Rosario and Juan de Borda's 60-ton pinnace Nuestra Señora de la Victoria. The Spaniards lash their vessels together, and after a long-range artillery exchange, the English fight their way aboard the Victoria. In hand-to-hand combat, Newport has his right arm struck off, while 5 of his men are killed and 16 wounded, before the Spanish can be driven from this vessel. The victors thereupon discover that the Victoria is badly holed, and it sinks within 15 minutes. The Rosario meanwhile retreats inshore, suffering 2 killed and 8 injured, before running aground at the western end of Los Órganos, allowing its crew to escape ashore.

JULY 21, 1590. Cocke arrives off Cape San Antonio (southwestern Cuba) with the Hopewell, the Moonlight, the Conclude, and his prize Buen Jesús, only to become becalmed and thus watch impotently as the Cartagena treasure fleet of Adm. Juan de Uribe Apallua passes by farther out at sea, entering Havana safely on July 29.

AUGUST 4, 1590. Cocke's squadron enters Matanzas and blockades Havana for a few days before the Hopewell and the Moonlight proceed toward Virginia to search for Raleigh's lost colonists. The Conclude and the Buen Jesús strike out across the Atlantic directly toward England.

AUGUST 16, 1590. While at Notre Dame Bay in northern Newfoundland with his captive Spanish consort, Irish's bark Young is attacked by 7 French fishing ships and 15 pinnaces of the Catholic League under Jean Blondel, his prize being wrested away after a long struggle.

MAY 13, 1591. To cover the anticipated arrival from Veracruz of the homeward-bound plate fleet of Antonio Navarro de Prado, plus the Tierra Firme fleet out of Cartagena under Pedro Méndez Marques, Adm. Diego de la Rivera sorties from Havana with seven galleons, two galleys, and two pinnaces bearing 2,000 men, sweeping English rovers from Cuba's western approaches.

LATE MAY 1591. The 150-ton Spanish merchantman Nuestra Señora del Rosario of the master Francisco González is captured off La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti) by the 60-ton Margaret of one-armed Capt. Christopher Newport and the master Cuthbert Grippe, the 50-ton Prudence of Capt. John Brough and the master Thomas Harding, the 120-ton Centaur of Capt. William Lane and the master John Gall, the 80-ton Pegasus of Capt. Stephen Michell and the master Abicocke Perry, and the 150-ton Little John of Capt. Michael Geare and the master William Bendes, as well as the pinnace Fifth Part.

The first pair and the latter foursome have only recently, and separately, arrived in the West Indies, meeting and agreeing to unite forces for attacks against the Spaniards. The Rosario's crew is released, their vessel being pillaged.

JUNE 9, 1591. Having earlier become separated from Lane's quartet of English privateers, the 200-ton Hopewell (alias Harry and John) of Capt. William Craston and the master George Kennell meets up, between Saint Kitts and Puerto Rico, with the 130-ton bark Burr of Capt. William Irish, the 35-ton Swallow of Capt. Ralph Lee and the master Anthony Daniel, and the 30-ton Content of Capt. Nicholas Lisle and the master William King. The latter have been sent by Sir George Carey to raid Spanish targets in the Caribbean, so steer westward together with the Hopewell for Cuba.

JUNE 23, 1591. Corrientes. At 5:00 a.m., the Burr, the Hopewell, the Swallow, and the Content arrive between Capes Corrientes and San Antonio off southwestern Cuba, sighting six sail. Believing that these might be treasure ships from Cartagena, the English close, only to discover this force to be Admiral de la Rivera's 700-ton flagship Nuestra Señora del Rosario, Vice Adm. Aparicio de Arteaga's 650-ton Magdalena, two other large galleons, plus a pair of galleys, bent upon giving battle.

A long-range exchange erupts at 7:00 a.m. and lasts over the next three hours, after which the English formation scatters. The Burr explodes from a fire in her magazine, and Captain Irish and 16 survivors are rescued by the Swallow. The 100-ton galleys San Agustín and Brava chase the smaller English vessels into the shallows before the latter finally slip away at nightfall.

JUNE 29, 1591. The Hopewell and the Swallow return to Cape Corrientes (Cuba), finding de la Rivera gone. Instead, they meet and unite with the vessels Centaur, Pegasus, Little John, Prudence, Fifth Part, and Capt. John Oker's Lion out of Southampton. Three days later, while part of this formation is watering inshore, the Pegasus and the Centaur intercept the passing 150-ton Spanish merchantmen Santa Catalina of the master Martín Francisco de Armendáriz and the 100-ton Gift of God, while the Lion and the Swallow take another prize, all three being bound from Santo Domingo toward Havana.

The English then agree on July 5 to sail together with their prizes until they are past the Cuban capital. After reaching Matanzas, the Prudence and the Lion continue up the Old Bahama Channel toward England five days later with the prizes, while the vessels Centaur, Pegasus, Hopewell, Little John, Swallow, and Fifth Part reverse course to take up station west of Havana and await incoming ships.

JULY 15, 1591. Early this morning, the English privateers Pegasus and Little John intercept the 300-ton Spanish merchantman San Juan of the master Agustín de Paz, as it approaches Havana from Veracruz. The latter vessel is pillaged and burned, and another four smaller coasters are also captured by other ships in this squadron as they arrive from Santo Domingo.

Early the next day, the first elements of the main Spanish convoy arrive from Mexico under Admiral Navarro, and because the 240-ton merchantman Santa Trinidad of the master Alonso Hidalgo is far ahead, away from the protection of the galleons, it is taken at 1:00 p.m. by the Centaur and the Little John. It proves such a rich prize that the rovers decide to quit their watch outside Havana and sail for home before the rest of the Spanish plate fleet sorties on its homeward leg.

DECEMBER 24, 1591. After enduring difficulties from calms during his transatlantic crossing to Brazil, Cavendish nears the city of Santos with his 400-ton galleon Dudley (formerly Leicester), the 240-ton Roebuck under John Cocke, the 140-ton Desire under John Davis or Davys, and the “Black pinnace” under Capt. Toby Stafford (a bark called Dainty under Captain Parker having previously turned back). Taking advantage of the Christmas Eve celebrations being observed by the unwary Portuguese defenders, as well as the rainy night, the Roebuck, the Desire, and the pinnace succeed in stealing across the bar guarded by Fort Santo Amaro and materialize off the city of Santos by the next dawn.

Taken by surprise, the tiny citadel of Nossa Senhora do Monte Serrate, which covers the landing spot at Enguaguaçu Beach, is obliged to surrender without firing a shot, after which the English occupy the city; Cavendish arrives on December 26 with his other pair of vessels. Seven or 8 prominent citizens are seized as hostages against the good behavior of the 300 Portuguese inhabitants. The raiders will spend the next month and a half anchored off Santos before finally weighing anchor in late January 1592 to attempt another penetration through the Strait of Magellan into the South Pacific.

MARCH 28, 1592. After being battered by a storm off the River Plate estuary, Cavendish reaches “Port Desire” (modern Puerto Deseado, Argentina) and is reunited with his scattered squadron.

APRIL 14, 1592. Newport’s Sweep. Christopher Newport arrives from the Canaries at Dominica with his 150-ton flagship Golden Dragon under the master Robert Keble, the 70-ton Prudence under Capt. Hugh Merrick and the master John Paul, the 50-ton flyboat Margaret under Capt. Robert Thread and the master James Bragge, and the 30-ton pinnace Virgin under Capt. Henry Kedgell and the master Cuthbert Grippe. Despite only commanding 200 men, the English privateer commander intends to use this force for more than seaborne interceptions—his aim being to make amphibious descents as well as to conquer and hold a place such as La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti) as an advance English base.

After refreshing provisions, the rovers seize a 300-ton Portuguese slaver bound for Cartagena, diverting it to San Juan de Puerto Rico, where they land two wealthy prisoners on April 18 to raise funds to buy the slaves. Tired of waiting, however, Newport coasts westward to Aguada, selling his captives and scuttling his prize before standing away for Mona Island.

APRIL 18, 1592. After recuperating at Port Desire, Cavendish makes a late-season attempt to enter the Strait of Magellan into the South Pacific with his flagship Dudley, the Roebuck, the Desire, and the pinnace Black. Fierce winter weather and contrary winds oblige him to reverse course one month later. While sailing back toward Port Desire, Cavendish changes his mind again and veers around, losing contact with his other vessels. He dies on May 20 (O.S.), after accusing his subordinate Davis of desertion. But Davis actually leads the Desire and the pinnace Black into the agreed rendezvous at Port Desire by the night of May 21–22 (O.S.).

Cavendish’s Dudley and Cocke’s Roebuck meanwhile return northward alone to São Vicente Bay (Brazil). Upon arriving, they are unable to traverse its bar past the alerted fortress, and a 25-man English boat party is attacked and repelled with losses by the local Portuguese militia forces. The Dudley and the Roebuck proceed farther east-northeast to

Christopher Newport

This Elizabethan rover was born sometime in 1560 and was baptized on December 29, 1561, at St. Nicholas Church in the English seaport of Harwich. He was given the same name as his father, who was a local shipmaster. Young Christopher went to sea as a boy and, in 1581, jumped ship at Bahia (Brazil) from the Minion of London after a dispute with Capt. Stephen Hare. Four years later, Newport returned to England and lived at Limehouse, a hamlet of Stepney in Middlesex. On October 19, 1584 (O.S.), he married Katherine Procter.

Growing tension with Spain revived his seafaring career. In April 1587, Newport served as master's mate aboard John Watts's Drake in the raid against Cadiz. Two years later, he was master of Robert Cobb's Margaret of London. Newport made his first independent Caribbean cruise as a privateer captain in 1590 aboard Watts's Little John. He lost his right arm while storming Nuestra Señora del Rosario off the Cuban coast that same July.

Unfazed, Newport took Ellen Ade as his second wife on January 29, 1591 (O.S.). He also sailed that same year on a Barbary trading voyage and back into the Caribbean to raid. As of 1592, he prowled aboard the Golden Dragon of Cobb's partner, John More, enjoying even greater success. That same August, Newport was one of six commanders under Sir John Burgh who captured the 32-gun, 1,600-ton Portuguese carrack Madre de Deus after a hard-fought battle off the Azores. Newport would be chosen to sail it to Dartmouth. Upon arriving, it was found to contain 500 tons of exotic spices, silks, gems, and treasure, making it one of the richest prizes ever taken.

Until 1595, Newport continued to sail ships owned by London merchants. But his circumstances changed after he was married for a third time on October 1, 1595 (O.S.), to Elizabeth Glanfield, a London goldsmith's daughter. Such resources allowed Newport to fit out the powerful privateer Neptune as one-sixth owner and raid the West Indies repeatedly until 1603. Even when peace with Spain was restored the next year, Newport continued to visit the Caribbean. In 1605, he presented the new king, James I, with two young crocodiles and a wild boar that he had brought from Hispaniola.

Newport's fame as a veteran New World sailor led to his appointment as "one of the principal masters of the Royal Navy" in January 1606. On December 10 of that same year, he was hired to command the colonizing expedition to Virginia. Nine days later, Newport set sail with his flagship Susan Constant, accompanied by the Godspeed and the Discovery. After helping to establish Jamestown, he returned to England and brought out reinforcements on four more occasions. On his third voyage in 1609, he was wrecked on Bermuda.

Newport then entered the service of the East India Company in 1612 and made his first voyage to Persia the next year. On his third Far Eastern voyage, he died at Bantam on the island of Java in late August 1617.

Espirito Santo, where they suffer 55 men killed or captured in an attempted capture of two anchored ships. That same night, the Roebuck's master, Robert Tharleton, parts company with the Dudley and lays in a course for England, while the latter returns southwestward in one last desperate bid to refit. The Dudley again meets with hostility off São Sebastião Island, maroons some sick crew members, and then steers for England.

Davis will remain and make three more attempts to penetrate the Strait of Magellan, exploring the Falkland Islands before finally staggering into Ireland on June 11, 1593 (O.S.), with only 15 crewmen still alive.

APRIL 20, 1592. After raiding the Canary Islands during their transatlantic passage, a pair of English ships—the 26-gun, 200-ton, 100-man Salomon of Capt. William King and the master John Wildes and the 6-gun, 35-ton, 26-man Jane Bonaventure of Capt.

William Richards and the master James Perryman—reach Dominica. Having refreshed their provisions, these rovers thereupon seize a 100-ton slaver with 270 blacks from Guinea (West Africa), which they carry to Puerto Rico. Arriving off its capital of San Juan, a 70-ton English merchant prize is cut out from its harbor during a nocturnal penetration, after which most of the slaves are sold on the western half of the island.

The recaptured 70-ton merchantman is then scuttled, and the 100-ton slaver is detached for England under the prize master George Simson. King subsequently visits Mona and Saona islands, Cape Tiburón (southwestern Haiti), Jamaica, Grand Cayman, Cape Corrientes, and the Tortuga Keys off Florida, intercepting a handful of small coastal craft.

APRIL 25, 1592. After touching at Mona and Saona islands, plus intercepting three small Spanish coasters, Newport makes a nocturnal descent upon Ocoa (in the modern Dominican Republic). Its inhabitants, having sighted his ships at dusk, disappear inland, so little booty is found either in the town or aboard the two frigates in its harbor.

MAY 1592. De Berrio's lieutenant Domingo de Vera Ibargüen (or Ibargoyen) reaches the Antillean island of Trinidad with a Spanish contingent from Margarita, founding an inland settlement called San José de Oruña by May 19. De Berrio arrives some time later, delegating de Vera to continue exploring up the Orinoco on the mainland for El Dorado, while he rebuffs attempts by the rival Spanish governor Francisco de Vides of Cumaná to lay claim to Trinidad.

MAY 3, 1592. Having rounded Cape Tiburón (southwestern Haiti) and anchored off Grande Gonâve Island, Newport transfers 150 men into his boats and then strikes out to surprise La Yaguana (modern Léogâne) on the mainland. Two hours before sunrise of May 27, the English steal upon this harbor, only to be detected by a 35-ton frigate anchored offshore, which raises the alarm. Two of the 110 invaders are consequently killed fighting their way ashore. The party is further delayed by 150 Spanish riders who—despite seeing their governor slain—stampede a herd of cattle in the rovers' direction before retreating inland with all their goods. Thus frustrated in his hopes of subduing the garrison and securely holding the town, Newport sets fire to its 150 empty buildings before rejoining his ships and sailing away for Honduras.

MAY 19, 1592. Newport's squadron intercepts a Spanish coaster outside the Honduran port of Trujillo, then sends boat parties inside its harbor to attack another three or four anchored vessels, despite fire from its batteries.

MAY 25, 1592. Newport makes a descent upon Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés, Honduras), occupying the town without opposition, as its inhabitants have fled inland upon learning of the raiders' approach. Its 200 empty buildings are pillaged until the next evening, after which the English reembark and reverse course eastward.

They subsequently sight a 200-ton Spanish merchantman anchored offshore, which is set ablaze and abandoned by its crew before the English can board.

JUNE 4, 1592. After refreshing provisions on Trinidad Island following their transatlantic crossing, an English expedition comprising the 120-ton Challenger of Capt. Benjamin Wood and its master, John Tomlyn, the 100-ton Mineral of Capt. Richard Vassour and its master, Richard Cawson, the 90-ton Pilgrim of Capt. Thomas Coche and its master, William Elsemore, and the 50-ton Flight (formerly the French Florissant) of Capt. Thomas Turner and its master, Robert Abraham reaches Margarita Island (Venezuela). They coast westward and touch at Cape de la Vela, Ríohacha (Colombia), and Santa Marta without taking any prizes. Eventually, the Mineral and the Flight lose contact during a storm.

JUNE 16, 1592. Newport's three privateering vessels make a second assault upon Trujillo (Honduras), only to be repelled by its now fully alerted defenses. A storm then scatters the English squadron and its prizes, so each commander makes his best way toward England, by circling Cuba and touching at Florida.

JUNE 22, 1592. Wood's Challenger and Pilgrim meet the 50-ton privateer Moonshine of Capt. John Myddelton and the master John Hore off Hicacos Point, northeast of Cartagena (Colombia), accompanied by a 30-ton Spanish prize under Robert Barrett (alias "Frost"). Together, these rovers attempt to capture a beached frigate that same day, but they suffer numerous men drowned or killed during a Spanish counterattack, plus another 13 captured—including Barrett. The English thereupon stand away for Cuba.

EARLY JULY 1592. King's pair of privateers appears outside Havana, being fired upon for an hour by its batteries, then chased away westward an hour later by the galleys San Agustín and Brava ("having 27 banks on a side," according to an English eyewitness). The rovers then coast to Cabañas, which they pillage before besting the pursuing galleys in a three-hour, long-range exchange on June 11.

JULY 15, 1592. King's Salomon and Jane Bonaventure are joined 20 miles north of Cabañas (Cuba) by Wood's Challenger, Pilgrim, Mineral, and—perhaps—Flight; Lane's Centaur, Affection, and Little John (having returned for another West Indian campaign; see "July 15, 1591" entry); Henry Roberts's 140-ton Exchange out of Bristol; plus Capt. George Kennell and the master Thomas Smith's 60-ton bark Randall (alias Canter). Together they run down and pillage a 50-ton Spanish ship, whose crew flees ashore, then steer toward Havana to mount a close blockade.

JULY 23, 1592. When news of the impending imposition of an alcabala or “sales tax” reaches Quito (Ecuador), popular outrage coalesces around a spokesman, Alonso Moreno Bellido. His incarceration on orders from the audiencia president Dr. Manuel Barros de San Millán on September 28 is breached by an angry mob of citizens and garrison soldiers, so the Peruvian viceroy García Hurtado de Mendoza, Marqués de Cañete, dispatches 60 troops under Capt. Pedro de Arana from Callao to Guayaquil, to advance up into the Andes and quell this rebellion.

Excitement grips Quito upon this expedition’s approach that December. Moreno Bellido is murdered, and a mob hunts down and imprisons the audiencia president in retaliation. After negotiations via the royal visitador or “inspector” Esteban Marañón, an agreement is finally reached by March 1593, whereby the city accepts the new tax and peacefully receives Arana’s troops in exchange for a general pardon; yet when this force enters on April 10, it conducts a dozen summary executions by the next dawn.

JULY 28, 1592. This morning, the English privateers blockading Havana sight a vessel approaching out of the west, which they pursue. It proves to be a 60-ton merchantman arriving from Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés, Honduras), which puts into Chorrera Inlet—three miles short of the Cuban capital—in a desperate bid to gain sanctuary.

As nine privateer pinnaces close in upon this prey, 50 Spanish harquebusiers and musketeers under Capt. Francisco de Rojas race from Havana along the beach to its rescue, seconded by the galleys San Agustín and Brava under Capt. Cristóbal Pantoja. These troops succeed in fending off the English encroachments with long-range volleys until 4:00 p.m., by which time all valuables have been removed from the ship. The raiders then carry off the empty vessel, sending it toward England under the prize master, Lawrence Cocke.

AUGUST 1592. After refitting the Desire and the pinnacle Black at Port Desire (Argentina), plus suppressing a mutiny, Davis makes a second attempt to round the Strait of Magellan. The pinnacle is lost with all hands, and the Desire eventually returns to its original starting place.

JUNE 1593. The 31-gun ship Edward Bonaventure of Capt. James Lancaster, homeward bound after a trading venture to the Far East, reaches the Gulf of Paria in eastern Venezuela, where the captain hopes to refresh provisions before continuing his Atlantic voyage. After pausing for eight days, the English sail northwest toward Mona Island to refit.

AUGUST 1593. An English expedition raised by the Earl of Cumberland sights Saint Lucia. The expedition comprises the 70-man, 120-ton Anthony of Capt. James Langton, the 55-man, 100-ton Pilgrim of Capt. Francis Slingsby, and the 12-ton pinnacle Discovery. They refresh provisions on Martinique for three days and capture the Portuguese caravel of Domingo Díaz before steering toward Margarita Island (Venezuela), where one night, 38 men are set ashore on its eastern coast to raid its pearl fisheries. They succeed in overrunning the town of El Macanao and receive 2,000 ducats to spare its buildings; they reembark five days later and coast westward.

EARLY SEPTEMBER 1593. After several months exploring Guiana and Trinidad for Raleigh, Sir John Burgh arrives off Margarita Island (Venezuela) with his 300-ton flagship Roebuck under its master, John Bedford, the 150-ton Golden Dragon under Capt. Christopher Newport and its master, Andrew Shillinge, the 100-ton Prudence under Capt. Thomas Wally and its master, Thomas Warne, and the 50-ton Virgin under Capt. Henry Kedgell and its master, Cuthbert Grippe.

Burgh—a 31-year-old veteran of military campaigns in the Low Countries—disembarks 100 men before dawn at Pueblo del Mar, striking inland to occupy the island’s principal town of Asunción. However, he is ambushed en route by Gov. Juan Sarmiento de Villandrado, who (on alert ever since Langton’s August raid) has mustered a militia force at nearby Pampatar just to repel such attacks. The grassland is ignited behind these latest invaders, so they are obliged to retreat to their boats; they suffer 16 casualties.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1593. This Saturday afternoon, Langton’s three English privateers appear off Punta de Araya (Venezuela) with their small Portuguese prize, refraining from a disembarkation because of the Spanish militiamen gathered farther south at Cumaná under Lt. Gov. Francisco Gutiérrez Flores. The next morning, Langton attempts leading a boat party inside Cariaco Gulf to raid Ostias, but he is intercepted by a piragua bearing 20 Spanish soldiers and obliged to retire after a long-range exchange with the rest of the town’s defenders. After stripping and releasing their prize, the English subsequently stand away westward.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1593. Having refreshed on Aruba and Curaçao, Langton appears outside Ríohacha (Colombia), only to find its defenders alerted and all valuables and noncombatants sent inland. Rather than storm its beaches for little profit, the English loose off a few rounds, implement a desultory blockade, then depart northward by the evening of September 27.

OCTOBER 28, 1593. Richard Hawkins—the illegitimate, 33-year-old son of Sir John—arrives at 6° south latitude off Brazil with his 300-ton, 20-gun flagship Dainty (ex-Repentance), 100-ton, 8-gun store-ship Hawk, and 60-ton pinnace Fancy, intending to round the Strait of Magellan into the Pacific.

NOVEMBER 1593. Governor Sarmiento of Margarita Island (Venezuela) is killed in an engagement between a Spanish galley and an English or Flemish interloper.

NOVEMBER 10, 1593. Richard Hawkins's flotilla approaches Santos (Brazil), pausing to refresh provisions before anchoring off Santa Ana Island five days later to set up a camp ashore. Half of Hawkins's original 200 men have died of disease, so he scuttles his store ship and redistributes its crew among his remaining two vessels. Native Portuguese militiamen also attack his encampment, while a few passing coasters are intercepted.

NOVEMBER 30, 1593. Battered by a storm in his unsuccessful bid to reach Newfoundland from northwestern Hispaniola (Haiti), Lancaster's Edvard Bonaventure returns to Mona Island. Two or three days later, its 5-man anchor watch cuts the cable—leaving 19 companions ashore—only to be wrecked shortly thereafter at Azua on the north side of Ocoa Bay (modern Dominican Republic), then captured by the Spaniards.

DECEMBER 1593. After refreshing at Cape Tiburón (southwestern Haiti) and slowly coasting clockwise around Hispaniola, Langton appears at the Soco River mouth and leads a boat party 12–15 miles upstream to plunder Spanish ranches. The English then return to their ships and shift operations to Caucedo Point at the eastern side of Santo Domingo Bay, mounting a two-and-a-half-month blockade that nets nine small prizes.

DECEMBER 28, 1593. Richard Hawkins quits his anchorage off Brazil to attempt the Strait of Magellan. Four days later, his pair of privateers intercept a 100-ton Portuguese ship bearing the new governor designate and 50 soldiers for Angola, which the English strip of all its provisions before releasing it on January 4, 1594.

JANUARY 11, 1594. While sailing south from Brazil toward the Strait of Magellan, Richard Hawkins's flagship Dainty loses contact with the pinnace Fancy, with its master, Robert Tharlton, in the vicinity of the River Plate, the latter subsequently reversing course for England.

FEBRUARY 1594. Tiring of his Santo Domingo blockade, Langton proceeds to Jamaica, where he seizes two Spanish barks and combines their cargoes aboard one before detaching it toward England with a nine-man crew. (Near Europe, this 40-ton prize is pillaged by an 80-ton French Catholic League privateer out of Le Havre.)

FEBRUARY 4, 1594. This Friday afternoon off Pedernales Point near Ocoa (modern Dominican Republic), the Spanish frigates of captains Juan Montero and Juan Fernández de Santana—having sortied from Santo Domingo—surprise an English pinnace that had been detached from Langton's squadron to sweep westward along that coastline.

The next morning, Langton's flagship Anthony and a second English pinnace intercept the victorious Spaniards as they are returning toward Ocoa, capturing Fernández de Santana's frigate after a bloody struggle, then compelling Montero to strike.

FEBRUARY 20, 1594. Richard Hawkins's Dainty stands into the Strait of Magellan, emerging into the Pacific by April 8, then steering northward. On April 25, the English interlopers pass Valdivia (Chile), anchoring off Mocha Island four days later.

MARCH 16, 1594. Langton at Puerto Caballos. Having separated from his consort Pilgrim off southwestern Cuba, Langton appears before the Honduran port of Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés) with his flagship Anthony and a captured Spanish frigate. Flying false colors, the English seize the harbor pilot's boat, then demand the surrender of the seven merchantmen under Diego Ramírez awaiting cargoes inside the harbor. Rebuffed, Langton stands in the next morning and engages in a day-long gun duel with the Spanish anchor watches, finally launching a blazing, 20-ton prize against Ramírez's flagship on March 18, which breaks the defenders' will and convinces them to abandon ship.

The rovers subsequently board Ramírez's 250-ton San Diego (whose master, Luis de Sevilla, lies slain), Andrés del Corro's 200-ton Espíritu Santo, Benito González Urrazo's 120-ton San Antón de la Magdalena, Baltasar de Riberol's 140-ton Presentación, plus three lesser vessels, and hold all for ransom. When the Spaniards ashore refuse to pay, Langton burns a couple of these merchantmen, then concentrates all his booty aboard Ramírez's former flagship and departs with this prize. The English return into Plymouth "amid great rejoicings and excitement" by May 25—one day after Slingsby.

APRIL 17, 1594. Having earlier joined forces off Cape Verde in West Africa, William Parker of Plymouth and Jérémie Raymond of Cherbourg capture the Spanish bark Nuestra Señora de Loreto off Saona Island, sending the prize toward England.

APRIL 25, 1594. The English privateers Golden Dragon of Christopher Newport and Prudence of John Brough shoot their way into Puerto Caballos (Honduras), seizing the four deserted Spanish vessels in its roadstead, then venturing ashore briefly at 6:00 p.m. before retiring back aboard ship and submitting a ransom demand. When this is rejected the next day by Gov. Gerónimo Sánchez de Carranza, Newport sets fire to two of the empty prizes, then sails off with the other pair.

MAY 2, 1594. Hawkins in the Pacific. Having refreshed provisions at Mocha Island (Chile), Richard Hawkins stands out to sea once more and weathers a 10-day storm. He then penetrates the roadstead at Valparaíso, pillaging four anchored merchantmen while Spanish militiamen watch impotently from shore under Gov. Alonso de Sotomayor y Andía, Knight of the Order of Santiago. The English furthermore seize a fifth coaster as it arrives from Concepción, restoring all their prizes to the Spaniards in exchange for a ransom of 25,000 ducats, before departing northward a few days later toward Coquimbo and Arica.

Word of this depredation reaches García Hurtado de Mendoza, Marqués de Cañete and viceroy of Peru, by May 17. Having already been forewarned of the Englishmen's presence off South America, he instantly orders his brother-in-law Beltrán de Castro y de la Cueva, Knight of the Order of Alcántara, and veteran admiral Alonso de Vargas to prepare to sortie from Callao with their 26-gun, 500-ton flagship San Pedro y San Pablo, the 28-gun, 600-ton vice-flagship San Francisco y Nuestra Señora del Rosario, a smaller galleon San Justo, plus three lesser consorts, manned by 500 men.

Shortly after sailing, these Spaniards sight their opponents at 9:00 a.m. of May 31 between Chincha Alta and San Vicente de Cañete, but are unable to close before nightfall because of high winds, which damage their vessels aloft. The Dainty thus slips through under cover of darkness, proceeding still farther northwest toward Puná Island (Ecuador), while the dismasted Spanish flagship, the galleon San Justo, and the pinnace San Juan limp back into port for repairs.

Realizing that his enemies only have one ship and a pinnace with 75 crewmen between them, de Castro soon puts back to sea with the San Francisco y Nuestra Señora del Rosario and a 14-gun galley-zabra under Miguel Angel Felipón to continue his pursuit.

MAY 3, 1594. After a two-hour exchange of gunfire off Cape Saint Nicholas Môle (Haiti), the English privateer Centauro of Capt. William Lane captures the French Catholic League traders Espérance and Princesse out of Le Havre.

MAY 15, 1594. This dawn, four privateer ships, two frigates, and three pinnaces under Parker and Raymond materialize outside the Honduran port of Trujillo, intercepting the dispatch vessel of Francisco Rodríguez as it departs. The latter not only reveals information about the weakness of nearby Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés) but also yields a young black slave named Diego de los Reyes, who is willing to turn against his Spanish masters.

MAY 17, 1594. Parker and Raymond's Coup. Shortly after midnight, guided by Diego de los Reyes, this Anglo-French formation deposits 55 men from two pinnaces near the sleeping Honduran port of Puerto Caballos and silently secures its outposts. Parker and Raymond thereupon divide their landing party into two columns, surrounding the houses of Governor Sánchez de Carranza and naval commander Ramírez before any resistance can be mounted.

The Spaniards flee into the jungle, leaving the town in enemy hands for the next two weeks, during which time its buildings are ransacked and plunder is loaded aboard four barks in its harbor. Parker and Raymond then set sail with their prizes, becoming separated 10 nights later. One of Parker's barks subsequently founders at sea, and the other loses contact with his flagship Richard off Newfoundland on July 11. Nevertheless, both of Parker's ships regain Britain by the end of that same month.

SUMMER 1594. A French vessel under Capt. François Riffault arrives off northern Brazil, having become separated from two other consorts. The expedition was intending to found a colony in this region. Discouraged, Riffault returns home, leaving a small group of settlers on Maranhão Island (near modern São Luis) under Charles des Vaux. The latter befriends its local Tupinambá natives and resides among them for several years, helping them fight their Tobajare neighbors—who consequently become allies of the Portuguese.

(A decade later, des Vaux returns to France and persuades Henri IV that this foothold might be expanded into France Equinoxiale or “Equinoctial France,” prompting the king to assign this task to the Huguenot sea captain Daniel de la Touche, Sieur de la Ravardière. The latter makes two reconnaissances of this area in 1604 and 1609, followed by a major colonization effort in 1612.)

EARLY JUNE 1594. Newport's Golden Dragon unites with John Myddelton's Affection off western Cuba to jointly waylay Spanish vessels making toward Havana.

JUNE 24, 1594. After refreshing provisions for four days in Atacames Bay near Esmeraldas (Ecuador), Richard Hawkins spots a vessel out at sea and detaches his pinnace to investigate. At 9:00 the next morning, he weighs anchor with his flagship Dainty and takes up station farther west off Cape San Francisco for two days, before returning and discovering his dismasted consort in nearby San Mateo Bay.

The English duo are preparing to stand back out into the Pacific by the morning of June 29, when another two sails come around Cape San Francisco. Believing them to be Peruvian treasure ships, Hawkins sends his repaired pinnace out to reconnoiter, only to have it chased back by Felipón's 14-gun galley-zabra. De Castro's San Francisco y Nuestra Señora del Rosario follows close astern and attempts to run aboard the Dainty, but is checked by a heavy broadside. The pinnace's crew meanwhile strives to regain their flagship and concentrate forces but is intercepted by the galley-zabra; only a few survivors managing to clamber aboard over their bowsprit.

Both sides then exchange long-range salvos for the next couple of days; the English toppling Felipón's mainmast on June 30 before finally surrendering to the Spaniards by the afternoon of July 1. Hawkins has suffered a half-dozen personal wounds, plus 27 killed, 17 wounded, and 29 captured among his crew; Spanish losses total 28 dead and 22 injured out of 300. De Castro installs Felipón as prize master and tows the badly damaged Dainty to the Pearl Islands, reaching Perico (west-northwest of Panama City) to a jubilant reception on July 19. Despite having been promised honorable terms, most of the English captives are tried by the Inquisition and condemned as galley slaves. Hawkins recuperates and eventually regains England. The Dainty is renamed Nuestra Señora de la Visitación and incorporated into the Peruvian squadron.

JUNE 30, 1594. Myddelton's Affection intercepts a small Spanish caravel approaching Havana, seconded by the 130-ton English privateer Jewel of Capt. Richard Best and the master Edward Farrier.

JULY 1, 1594. Between Cuba's Órganos Keys and Havana, Lane's Centaur captures the Mexican merchantman Nuestra Señora de la Soledad, outward bound from Trujillo (Honduras). Despite the sickness ravaging this Spanish crew, Lane sails his prize home to England, arriving by August.

JULY 6, 1594. Myddelton's Affection sights a 100-ton Spanish merchantman 35 miles west of Havana, whose crew beaches their vessel to escape ashore. The English then refloat the prize and send it to England.

MID-JULY 1594. Myddelton makes another interception outside Havana, only to subsequently be captured himself when two Spanish pinnaces push out of its harbor and overwhelm his seven-man boat party. (The English captain is eventually sent as a prisoner to Spain aboard the next year's plate fleet.)

JULY 28, 1594. Best's Jewel finds a 1,100-ton Spanish merchantman adrift in the Gulf of Mexico, without foremast or bowsprit and abandoned by its crew. The English board this derelict, strip it of its remaining goods, then set it ablaze.

JANUARY 1595. Near Puerto Rico, Geare's flagship Michael and John (possibly formerly the Little John) and pinnace Handmaid under Thomas Stokes intercept the 40-ton, 14-man Spanish supply ship Nuestra

Tupinambá warrior, by Albert Eckhout. (Etnografisk Samling, National Museum of Denmark)

Señora de la Concepción of its master Juan Camacho, which is conveying building materials and supplies from Seville to the plate fleets wintering at Havana. Its Spanish captain Nicolás Lafora ransoms this vessel and cargo by raising £200 in pearls and silver at Santo Domingo, which he presents to his captors.

The English also pillage a small Spanish frigate off Santo Domingo as it arrives from San Juan de Puerto Rico before they steer westward to blockade Cuba.

JANUARY 16, 1595. In Europe, France officially declares war against Spain.

FEBRUARY 9, 1595. The 20-year-old English nobleman Robert Dudley sights the West Indian island of Trinidad with his 200-ton, 140-man flagship Bear (formerly Peregrine), plus a pair of captured Spanish caravels from the Canaries, renamed Intent and Regard, commanded by Benjamin Wood and Captain Wentworth, respectively. The illegitimate son and impoverished heir of Elizabeth's former favorite, the Earl of Leicester—as well as inheritor of the deceased Cavendish's Dudley and Roebuck (see “April 18, 1592” entry)—Dudley has originally intended to round the Strait of Magellan into the Pacific, but has been dissuaded by his queen.

He therefore aims to chart Trinidad and the Orinoco River mouth for the establishment of an English colony. Anchoring off Cedros Bay, the young adventurer refreshes provisions and explores Trinidad's shoreline for two weeks; he then detaches his prizes toward England on February 24. By March 2, he sends a 13-man boat party under his cousin Thomas Jobson to explore the mainland around the Orinoco, who returns 16 days afterward with a partial report. Having been joined on March 13 by an English pinnace under George Popham, Dudley and his new consort then set sail northward on March 22.

MARCH 1595. The large English privateer Rose Lion of Capt. Thomas West captures the hired Dutch ship Fortuin, “with smale fight” near Santo Domingo, for transporting Spanish cargo from Seville. West carries this prize into Plymouth by June, where a protracted—and eventually unsuccessful—legal action ensues, brought by its Dutch owners.

MARCH 23, 1595. Shortly after midnight, Dudley captures a small Spanish merchantman 75 miles north of Grenada, after a chase.

MARCH 28, 1595. Dudley arrives off Puerto Rico. He circles this island before anchoring off Cape Rojo three days later to set his Spanish prisoners ashore in hopes of raising ransom for their captive vessel. When this is not forthcoming, the English strip their prize on April 3, then burn it before standing away northeast toward Bermuda the next day.

APRIL 1595. John Riddlesden arrives in the West Indies with his 60-ton bark Bond and pinnaces Scorpion and Violet (alias Why Not I?), intercepting a small Spanish coaster. Having plundered this prize, the Bond sails toward England, leaving both pinnaces to remain patrolling in the Caribbean until the end of July, when they too depart for the Azores and home.

The Antonellis

The first member of this Italian engineering family to serve the Spanish Crown was Giovanni Bautista Antonelli. He worked for the emperor Charles V in the Mediterranean before being hired to come to Spain in 1559. He arrived the next year to start revitalizing defenses along the coast of Valencia. He engaged in these labors for the better part of two decades. Late in 1580, he also was consulted about Pedro Sarmiento de Gamboa's plan to erect forts in the Strait of Magellan. Antonelli submitted some designs but did not accompany this ill-fated expedition. Instead, he convinced Philip II to allow him to pursue his own project of opening river traffic into central Spain. Antonelli sailed up the Tagus from Lisbon, reaching Madrid by 1582. Known by the Hispanicized names Juan Bautista, he died in Toledo on March 17, 1588.

His younger brother Batista Antonelli was born at Gatteo di Romagna in west-central Italy in 1550. He studied military architecture under Niccolo Tartaglia. At 20 years of age, he, too, joined Philip II's service, working under his older brother from 1576 on the fortification of Peñíscola in Valencia. Ten years later, the younger Antonelli was chosen to accompany Juan de Tejada on an inspection of the Spanish Antilles. He drew up plans for various new harbor castles, which were presented in mid-1588 to the king's senior engineer, Tiburcio Spannochi.

With royal approval, Tejada and Antonelli returned into Havana by February 1589 to start work on El Morro and La Punta forts, as well as a city aqueduct. Antonelli's nephew Cristóbal de Rodas joined him two years later. Whenever Antonelli had to visit other sites, he left his young relation in charge. This change became official after Antonelli was permanently transferred to Panama at Christmas 1594 to build major new defenses at Chagres and Portobelo. His nephew remained in charge of the Havana works until 1609.

Antonelli finally returned to Spain in 1599. After taking part in the conquest of the Moroccan foothold at Larrache, he helped fortify it as well as defenses in the Strait of Gibraltar. He came back to the Americas for one last time in 1604 with his 19-year-old son Juan Bautista Antonelli. After examining the question of the possible fortification of Araya in Venezuela, they visited Margarita Island and Brazil. When Antonelli sailed for Spain in 1608, his son stayed behind to work on the defenses of Cartagena (Colombia). The second Antonelli brother, Batista, died in Madrid on February 11, 1616.

Antonelli's son Juan Bautista also enjoyed a lengthy career in the New World. After helping to plan Fort Santiago at Araya in 1623, this youngest Antonelli toiled on it for the next seven years. Traveling to report to the Council of Indies in Madrid, he was promoted on October 23, 1630, to senior engineer for the Indies. On departing Cadiz in May 1633, he also participated in attacks against the Dutch outposts of Saint Martin, Unare, and Salt Tortuga. In 1637, Antonelli sailed to Puerto Rico and, the next year, helped to refortify Santiago de Cuba. He also started the Cojimar and La Chorrera fortresses outside Havana in 1639, before regaining Cartagena. He died in that Colombian seaport on December 1, 1649.

APRIL 1, 1595. Raleigh's Adventure. In a bid to restore his influence with Elizabeth, the disgraced courtier Raleigh arrives at Trinidad with a ship under Capt. James Whiddon and its master John Douglas, plus a small bark under Captain Cross, having lost contact with two other consorts during his transatlantic crossing (as well as failing to rendezvous with either Dudley or Popham, recently departed from this same coastline; see "February 9, 1595" entry). On April 4, Raleigh disembarks 100 soldiers and captures Trinidad's principal Spanish settlement of San José de Oruña, along with Gov. Antonio de Berrio.

After refreshing provisions and exploring these shores for a fortnight, the English are rejoined by their two missing ships—the Lion's Whelp of George Gifford and another under Lawrence Keymis—thus raising their total numbers to 300–350 men. Steering southward to the mainland opposite, Raleigh probes the numerous streams of the Orinoco Delta.

He then leaves his ships anchored offshore late in May and leads 100 men upriver aboard a small galley, barge, two wherries, and a boat to make a more detailed exploration. After roaming through myriad waterways and establishing peaceful relations with its natives, the English return to their vessels a few weeks later, circling westward to unsuccessfully attack Cumaná (Venezuela) on June 22. They then deposit de Berrio and depart empty-handed two days later.

(Upon returning to England, Raleigh exaggerates the wealth of this new land in hopes of being commissioned by the queen to lead a military expedition for its conquest, or raising private capital toward this same end. Neither prospect succeeds.)

APRIL 3, 1595. Spanish vice admiral Sebastián de Arencibia sorties from Havana with a galleon, caravel, and two shallops to patrol its coastline in anticipation of the arrival of the Mexican plate fleet.

APRIL 9, 1595. The 973-ton galleon Nuestra Señora de Begonia, flagship of the Tierra Firme plate fleet bound toward Spain, staggers into San Juan de Puerto Rico almost a month after departing Havana, damaged by a hurricane. Aboard are 2–3 million pesos in silver, which Adm. Sancho Pardo y Osorio transfers into the city citadel under the protection of Gov. Pedro Suarez. An aviso is then dispatched across the Atlantic to request that Philip II send a squadron to its rescue—but word of this treasure also reaches the English court via a privateer, prompting Elizabeth I to instruct Drake and Hawkins to attempt its capture.

APRIL 14, 1595. Having prowled past Havana and commandeered an abandoned Spanish coaster, Geare is lying off Cabañas with his flagship Michael and John, Stokes's Handmaid, and their prize, when they sight Vice Adm. de Arencibia's squadron at dawn. Because of faint breezes, the Spaniards have difficulty closing the six miles separating both formations, but they eventually manage to row at least their caravel and two shallops into action.

Geare's flagship repels the attack of the caravel and shallop Coloma, killing 13 of the 30 soldiers aboard this latter craft under Ensign Guerrero, plus wounding another 7 or 8 others while fighting their way aboard. Nevertheless, the English are compelled to forsake this vessel and retreat out to sea once Rencibia's heavy galleon is finally towed into range by its two boats, leaving Stokes's Handmaid and Raleigh's destruction of San José de Oruña and capture of Gov. Antonio de Berrio of Trinidad. Stylized contemporary engraving by Theodore de Bry. (Author's Collection)

Geare's first prize to fall into enemy hands. The English suffer 8 killed and 17 captured during this fray, including Stokes, compared to 16–18 killed and numerous injured among the Spaniards.

After vainly pursuing Geare's Michael and John along the coast, Rencibia's galleon returns into Havana by April 21 to refit, followed two days later by the rest of his formation. The English flagship meanwhile departs alone across the Atlantic.

MAY 4, 1595. Wood and Wentworth's caravels appear outside Ríoacha (Colombia), requesting permission to trade from its governor Lic. Francisco Manso de Contreras. The latter refuses, and the English depart.

MAY 16, 1595. Parker returns to again raid Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés, Honduras) with a 200-ton flagship, three 40-ton consorts, plus two pinnaces. Finding the town abandoned by its residents, the English detach their two pinnaces farther west the next day to probe "Golfo Dulce" (Lake Izabal and El Golfete, Guatemala). They reverse course nine days later, having secured little plunder.

Parker subsequently retires offshore to Guanaja Island, where he meets Wood's and Wentworth's vessels. The rovers then sail north together to take up station off Cuba's Cape San Antonio.

MAY 18, 1595. Captains Amyas Preston and George Somers reach Dominica with their privateer ships Ascension and Gift, Captain Jones's Darling (owned by Raleigh), William Prowse's Angel, and a pinnace to make amphibious descents throughout the Spanish West Indies. For this purpose, they are bearing a disembarkation force of 300 men—many of them professional soldiers—as well as being further accompanied by Capt. Moses Willis's Archangel and two other vessels out of Southampton, which they have met at sea.

After refreshing for six days, the English steer south to Los Testigos Islands (Venezuela), celebrating a muster ashore on May 28 before pressing southwest toward Margarita.

MAY 29, 1595. Preston and Somers's expedition sights Margarita Island (Venezuela), exploring nearby Coche Island the next day, plus capturing a Puerto Rican caravel and a few Spanish pearl fishermen.

JUNE 1, 1595. Preston and Somers's eight English privateer vessels and small prize appear before Cu-maná (Venezuela), seizing three caravels in its bay but otherwise finding its residents alerted as to their presence off the coast. Having lost the element of surprise, the English accept a modest ransom of foodstuffs to depart in peace the next evening.

JUNE 6, 1595. Caracas. After anchoring off Guicamacuto, a mile and a half east of La Guaira (Venezuela), Preston and Somers lead a 300-man force overland and surprise the small, mostly empty fortress of La Guaira, occupying it without opposition. The next afternoon, a patrol of 40–50 Spanish riders descends out of the mountains from Caracas (full name: Santiago de León de Caracas), but withdraw when a like number of English musketeers emerge from this keep, under Captain Roberts, to offer battle.

Convinced that the rovers must soon depart without attempting anything further, the Spanish concentrate their strength along the main road leading up to Caracas, yet fail to maintain close watch upon their enemies' movements. This allows Preston and Somers to march a column undetected through the rain this same night, up a little-known track high into the mountain range, and to appear unexpectedly outside Caracas by the afternoon of June 8. Again—because most of this city's militia is gathered along the main road—little resistance is encountered, the noncombatants fleeing inland, while only one elderly Spanish rider named Alonso Andrea de Ledesma bravely attempts to check their progress with his lance and shield before being shot dead. The invaders thereupon enter the city by 3:00 p.m., remaining in possession for five days before finally (having failed to secure any ransom) setting it ablaze and returning into La Guaira by noon of June 14 with some booty. The next day, Preston and Somers also set this fortress afire, then depart west.

JUNE 16, 1595. This morning, Preston and Somers's squadron appears outside Chichiriviche (Venezuela), Somers leading in a boat party that burns three anchored Spanish vessels.

JUNE 20, 1595. Coro. Having groped his way along the coast, Preston leads his formation into Coro Bay (Venezuela) this morning and ferries all his troops ashore by 11:00 p.m. The English then attempt a nocturnal approach to the town, only to be checked at a roadside barricade, which the Spaniards defend "very strongly." Still, the invaders fight their way through, gaining Coro by the next morning with relatively few casualties.

Coro's buildings stand empty, however, the residents having received ample warning of their advance and already fled inland with their valuables. Around that same time, Preston learns that a storm has struck the English anchorage, which causes the cables of Somers's 50-man pinnace to part, and it has been driven out to sea. Preston therefore orders Coro torched and hastens his column back to the coast by June 22 to set sail in search of his colleague. Somers is located the next evening, and after gingerly probing the Laguna de Maracaibo's entrance, the discouraged raiders steer away toward Hispaniola on June 26.

JUNE 30, 1595. Preston and Somers's squadron sights Hispaniola and the next day anchors off Cape Tiburón (southwestern Haiti) to refresh provisions. Dysentery rages throughout the vessels, killing 80 men and destroying morale. When this formation resumes its cruise on July 8, Preston's Ascension and Somers's Gift are forsaken by all their consorts, except a pinnace.

JULY 12, 1595. Preston and Somers's trio of privateer vessels anchor off Jamaica, remaining four days before proceeding toward the Caymans, then reaching Cape Corrientes (southwestern Cuba) by July 22.

JULY 16, 1595. Raymond materializes before Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés, Honduras) with three French privateer ships, a pinnace, and a galliot. After attacking and burning this unhappy town, he passes on toward "Golfo Dulce" (Lake Izabal and El Golfete, Guatemala) before eventually retiring east to Utila Island. Here he is surprised by a Spanish force out of Trujillo and killed.

JULY 23, 1595. Raleigh's trio of vessels sights Preston and Somers's three privateers off Cape San Antonio (western Cuba), remaining in company for a week and chasing a couple of Spanish frigates before finally losing contact with each other one night.

AUGUST 4, 1595. Preston and Somers quit their blockade outside Havana, steering for England.

NOVEMBER 7, 1595. Off Guadeloupe, five Spanish frigates under Commo. Pedro Tello de Guzmán—sent to retrieve the silver bullion from Puerto Rico—spot two small sail and give chase. One is overtaken, while the other (a small English vessel called the Delight) is pursued to within sight of a much larger fleet, compelling the Spaniards to sheer off. Their lone prize proves to be the 35-ton Francis of Captain Wignol, with 24 crew members. The sailing instructions found aboard reveal that the nearby fleet is under Drake and Hawkins, bound to attack the silver galleon at San Juan de Puerto Rico. Tello de Guzmán therefore hastens on to his destination, arriving six days later.

NOVEMBER 13, 1595. Tello de Guzmán warns Admiral Pardo of Drake and Hawkins's approach, and at a general conference attended by all senior Spanish commanders and Bishop Antonio Calderón, it is decided to resist the English within port rather than out at sea. San Juan's garrison of 400 troops is augmented by the galleon's 300 seamen, 500 from Tello de Guzmán's frigates, plus 300 Puerto Rican militiamen. A log boom is stretched between its harbor castle or morro and Cañuelo Key, while the galleon and frigates are anchored close to the entrance, ready to be sunk as blockships.

The English meanwhile pause at the Virgin Islands for three days, holding a muster before action. Hawkins has fallen ill on November 8, his condition deteriorating so rapidly that Drake assumes overall command of the royal warships Garland, Defiance (flag), Elizabeth Bonaventure (vice-flag), Hope, Adventure, Foresight, plus a score of lesser auxiliaries. His original 2,500 men are now much reduced by disease.

NOVEMBER 22, 1595. Drake's Defeat. At dawn, the English fleet comes within sight of Escambrón Point, standing in so close as to be fired upon by its four-gun Boquerón battery under Ens. Pedro Vásquez. The English then proceed west toward the capital, with a flotilla of boats before them taking soundings and arriving opposite San Juan early this same afternoon, to anchor near Cabrón Inlet just as Hawkins dies. At 5:00 p.m., the five-gun Cabrón battery under Capt. Alonso Vargas opens fire, sending one round directly into the cabin of Drake's Defiant, narrowly missing the commander in chief but killing Sir Nicholas Clifford and seriously wounding three other officers. Drake consequently moves his fleet out to sea, returning under cover of darkness to anchor farther away off Cabras Island.

The raiders then spend November 23 reconnoitering the shoreline for a nocturnal assault. At 10:00 p.m., 25 boats crammed with several hundred men row around Cabras and Cañuelo islands into San Juan's harbor, attacking the anchored Spanish ships with incendiary devices. The shore batteries and anchor watches blaze away blindly, unable to prevent the English boats from reaching and igniting the frigates Santa Isabel, Santa Magdalena, and Santa Clara. However, as they burst into flames, they illuminate the attackers' craft, facilitating a counterfire that compels the English to draw off with 50 dead or missing, plus a similar number wounded. Spanish casualties total 40 dead, plus the frigate Santa Magdalena burns to its waterline.

The next morning, Drake's fleet gets under way at 8:00 a.m., circling out to sea and returning toward San Juan's harbor mouth by 4:00 p.m., prompting the defenders to scuttle a large merchantman and two lesser vessels as blockships; but the English instead heave to, anchoring halfway between Cabras Island and the mainland. The morning of November 25, seven or eight English boats probe as far east as Boquerón before withdrawing. That afternoon, several blockaders pursue an arriving Spanish caravel, until it runs aground at Cangrejos Beach and its crew escapes ashore.

Discouraged, Drake and Col. Gen. Thomas Baskerville (second-in-command since Hawkins's death) decide to sail away in search of easier prey at Panama. The Spanish are left exultant at this unexpected success, and on December 20 dispatch a pair of frigates and two smaller escorts with the silver, which reaches Spain safely.

DECEMBER 14, 1595. Baskerville overruns Río-hacha (Colombia) by disembarking his troops from boats, then is joined by Drake's main fleet from Cape de la Vela. The Spaniards have already withdrawn inland, so the English spend two weeks vainly attempting to extort a ransom from Gov. Manso de Contreras to spare its empty buildings. Eventually, the city is set ablaze on December 29, along with nearby La Ranchería and Tapia, after which the raiders proceed southwestward.

DECEMBER 21, 1595. Concerned by Trinidad's vulnerability to seaborne raiders (see "April 1, 1595" entry), de Berrio transfers his regional government up the Orinoco River by creating a new capital six miles below the Caroní confluence at Santo Tomé de la Guayana.

DECEMBER 30, 1595. Drake and Baskerville capture Lt. Gov. Francisco Ordóñez Flores of Santa Marta (Colombia) but find his city abandoned, so they burn it and depart. Too weak to assault Cartagena because of the diseases raging throughout their ships, the English then press on toward the Panamanian coast.

JANUARY 6, 1596. Defense of Panama. Drake and Baskerville anchor in Nombre de Dios harbor without opposition, its outnumbered Spanish defenders retreating into the jungle. Baskerville quickly pursues with 600–700 men and occupies the way station of Venta de la Quebrada two days later. At 8:00 a.m. on January 9, however, they encounter 70 Spanish troops under Capt. Juan Enríquez Conabut dug in atop Capirilla Hill to bar their advance across the Isthmus.

This terrain is well chosen, the English suffering heavy casualties while vainly attempting for three hours to dislodge the defenders from this narrow pass. When the Spaniards are reinforced by an additional 50 harquebusiers under Capt. Hernando de Lierno Agüero, Baskerville orders a retirement. Sick and demoralized, his contingent rejoins Drake at Nombre de Dios by January 22, and three days later the invaders lay waste the town and depart westward.

JANUARY 20, 1596. Drake and Baskerville's expedition anchors off Escudo de Veragua Island (Panama), ravaged by disease. A 37-man party is massacred five days later by the Spanish residents of Santiago del Príncipe when the English attempt to draw water from the Fator River on the mainland opposite.

Eventually, Drake orders his fleet to reverse course and sail east toward Portobelo on February 2, to assail its emergent installations. However, he dies of dysentery aboard his flagship Defiance off Buenaventura Island on the night of January 28, 1596 (O.S.). His body is placed in a lead casket and dropped into the sea the next morning, off an island that is still remembered today as the Isla de Draque. Two Spanish prizes are scuttled to mark the spot.

Baskerville then assumes command of the fleet, which easily pushes past Portobelo's incomplete defenses and occupies the fledgling town for 11 days. The rovers note that it consists of only 8–10 dwellings, “besides a great new house” that is being erected as a government palace. The compound is protected by a very strong battery, “with flankers of great trees and stones filled with earth.” The English throw down or burn everything before departing on February 18. After contemplating an attack against Santa Marta, Baskerville steers his disheartened followers for Jamaica.

FEBRUARY 28, 1596. After relieving San Juan de Puerto Rico, 13 Spanish galleons sortie from Cartagena under Adm. Bernardino Delgadillo y Avellaneda. On March 11, they sight 14 of Drake's surviving ships taking on wood and water in Guaniguanicos Cove on Pinos Island (Cuba). The Spaniards immediately attack and scatter their opponents, Vice Adm. Juan Gutiérrez de Garibay's three-ship vanguard capturing a 300-man English prize, of which the men are put to work on Havana's fortifications. The Spaniards suffer 80 casualties and a sunken ship.

SPRING 1596. Attracted by the tobacco and rare produce readily available from native barterers all along the untamed Wilde Cust or “Wild Coast” between the Maranhão and Orinoco river mouths, some pioneering Dutch traders build a fort called Ter Hooge or the “Tall One” 20 miles up the Essequibo River, on a small island at the confluence of the Cuyuni

Portobelo

As the volume of Spain's transatlantic traffic swelled during the 16th century, so did the size of its galleons. Soon, they could not cross Nombre de Dios's shallow and reef-lined bar without first offloading part of their cargoes. And once inside the harbor, its exposed anchorage offered little protection against storms, and the tiny town flooded during any tropical cloudburst.

When the king's Italian-born engineer Bautista Antonelli made an inspection of the West Indies in 1585–1587, he recommended that plate-fleet operations be shifted from Nombre de Dios around Manzanillo Point into Portobelo. The latter's attributes included a deep, safe anchorage with “clean ground or sand” at bottom, free of dangerous rocks or reefs. It also had a protective headland, abundant fresh water from a dozen streams, plus large stands of trees for ship repairs.

Authorization and the allocation of necessary funds (initially estimated at 100,000 ducats, to be raised out of new taxes) weren't forthcoming from Madrid until late December 1593. A “commission of constructions and fortifications” was then created at Panama City. Its officials traveled to the site to plan and execute all labors. The defenses were to be erected at both Portobelo and Chagres. A new trans-Isthmian highway was also cut, and a new city built, which the Crown indicated was to be named San Felipe de Portobelo or “Saint Philip of Fair Port.”

Some work started by 1594, the rich merchants Juan de Magán and Melchor Suárez privately hiring 100 black slaves because no official money had as yet been issued. Antonelli did not reappear from his other fortification project at Havana until that Christmas, then fell ill two days later. More problematic still, many other Panamanian merchants proved reluctant to support these efforts, unhappy at losing the properties that they had so painstakingly nurtured at Nombre de Dios.

Ironically, it was Sir Francis Drake who decided matters by razing the latter port in January 1596. Because of this disaster, the Spaniards decided on January 26 to concentrate all reconstruction efforts at Portobelo. A decree was proclaimed at Panama City, ordering all merchants to erect a new dwelling there, “with a tiled roof and not of straw,” within 15 days of being assigned a plot. Anyone who rebuilt at Nombre de Dios would have the structure torched and be fined 500 pesos. Not even the arrival of that year's plate fleet under Adm. Juan Escalante de Mendoza at Nombre de Dios on April 23 could rescind the relocation order.

Antonelli resumed work on Portobelo's defenses and laid out a street grid. Nombre de Dios's old cabildo or “town council” was reconstituted at Portobelo as of March 20, 1597, leaving the jungle to reclaim Nombre de Dios's ruins. That same September, a fortress was started atop Portobelo's northern headland and named San Felipe de Sotomayor in honor of Philip II and the youthful governor of Panama, Alonso de Sotomayor y Andía, Knight of the Order of Santiago. To build it, coral was raised from the water, being easy to cut while fresh; however, once set with lime and baked by the sun, it dried so solidly that the fort was nicknamed Todo Fierro or “All Iron” Castle.

and Mazaruni rivers (near present-day Bartica, Guyana). However, a Hispano-Portuguese counter-expedition destroys this stronghold that same year.

MARCH 22, 1596. John Crosse's English pinnace Little Exchange is captured near Havana by elements from Delgadillo's Spanish fleet.

MAY 1596. Capt. Anthony Hippon's pinnace Scorpion captures a Portuguese ship, bound from La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti) toward Cartagena.

AUTUMN 1596. Newport arrives at Dominica with his new privateer ship Neptune, accompanied by Michael Geare's pinnace. Despite cruising off Hispaniola and Honduras, they fail to take many prizes, and when both vessels subsequently part company while en route from Cape Corrientes toward "the Crown" (near Havana), Newport is left without his auxiliary so must return to England largely empty-handed.

OCTOBER 17, 1596 (O.S.). Sherley's Cruise. After having his expedition bloodied, suffering at least 80 casualties, during a brief occupation of Santiago

After reconnoitering as far west as Point Negril, Sherley reverses course and, on February 4, 1597, anchors his squadron opposite Jamaica's principal town of Santiago de la Vega (later Spanish Town, near modern Kingston), sending 230 armed men ashore. The Spanish governor, Lic. Francisco de Nabeda Alvarado, initially considers opposing their disembarkation with his few militiamen, but upon perceiving the invaders' overwhelming strength, retreats instead into the jungle with all the residents.

The English consequently remain in undisputed possession of the harbor for 40 days, being joined there by the Dutch Maen of Middelburg and Geare's English pinnace, departing west-southwestward together at the end of this interlude to attack Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés, Honduras). Although this assault, too, proves successful, pickings continue to be sparse, so that by the time Sherley appears off Havana on May 23, he has been abandoned by all his other consorts. (Geare, for example, steers for Campeche, where he captures 12 tons of logwood and at least one prize.)

Reaching Newfoundland by June 25, Sherley returns into England the next month, "alive but poor."

MARCH 1597. Ríohacha (Colombia) is raided by English rovers.

SUMMER 1597. After exploring the coast of Guyana, 37-year-old John Ley captures a Spanish frigate off Cumaná (Venezuela) with his bark John, renaming ing his prize Black Ley and sailing it to England by late August.

EARLY JUNE 1597. Ransom of Ríohacha. After a chance meeting in the West Indies, the 120-ton Centaur of John Watts Jr., the Affection of Henry Middleton, the 80-ton Pegasus of Richard Knottesford, the 150-ton Golden Dragon of Anthony Hippon, as well as the pinnace Mosquito and auxiliary Little David unite for a combined assault against the Colombian port of Ríohacha. Accompanied by three or four other vessels—possibly prizes—this flotilla takes and sacks the town, subsequently holding it for ransom.

Part of this payment is intercepted while on its way to Watts by Humphrey Reynolds's 90-ton Lion's Whelp, who is compelled shortly thereafter to surrender it to his more powerful colleague, Watts. At this juncture, the Mosquito loses contact with Watts's formation, taking a prize near Havana before returning home to England by August. The next month, Reynolds's Whelp also reaches London, with another Spanish prize.

SEPTEMBER 1597. Watts's Centaur takes a Spanish vessel off the north coast of Hispaniola, sending it home to Bristol as a prize.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1597. Parker at Campeche. Having separated from Sherley, Parker appears before this Mexican port with his 120-ton flagship Prudence, the 25-ton Adventure under Capt. Richard Henne, and a pinnace. After examining the city's shoreline from a distance, the English feint a retirement out to sea that same evening, only to return under cover of darkness—guided by a Spanish turncoat named Juan Venturate. The raiders stealthily set a landing party ashore, which penetrates the San Román suburb and surprises Campeche's sleeping residents. The landing party stampedes the frightened survivors into San Francisco Convent and general looting erupts.

The next dawn, the local alderman Francisco Sánchez assembles numerous volunteers at his country estate farther inland, marching to the rescue. Upon approaching the town, he is joined by other Spaniards sallying from the beleaguered convent under fellow alderman Pedro de Iterián. Together they oblige the raiders to retreat back aboard their ships, after two hours of heavy fighting in the main square during which Parker (among many others) is wounded. Among the prisoners left behind in Spanish hands is Venturate, who, after a swift trial, is put to death by red-hot tongs.

The defenders then sortie aboard a commandeered merchant frigate to pursue Parker farther out into the Gulf of Mexico. Soon, the Spaniards are unexpectedly joined by a coast-guard frigate under Capt. Alonso de Vargas Machuca, sent from Caucel by the provincial governor at Mérida de Yucatán. Both vessels succeed in cornering the Adventure, subduing it after a ferocious exchange during which 11 of 16 crew members are killed. The Spanish frigates return triumphantly into Campeche with their prize, followed by Parker, who remains outside the harbor over the next 17 days, vainly attempting to ransom his colleagues.

FEBRUARY 9, 1598. The 26-year-old Dutch explorer Abraham Cabeliau arrives northwest of the Amazon River mouth at 5° north latitude aboard the 160-ton Zeeridder of its master Jacob Corneliszoon (alias “Oom”), having been dispatched to reconnoiter the Wild Coast as far as the Orinoco River mouth on behalf of the States-General. Establishing friendly contacts with natives ashore six days later, Cabeliau charts the inland waterways around Cayenne over the next four months.

JUNE 1, 1598. Cumberland arrives off Dominica with his 600-ton flagship Malice Scourge captained by Watts, plus the 400-ton vice-flagships Merchant Royal of Sir John Berkeley and Ascension of Robert Flick, the 400-ton merchantmen Alcedo of Thomas Coche (later John Ley) and Prosperous of John Langton, the 350-ton Consent of Francis Slingsby, the 300-ton Centurion of Henry Palmer and Sampson of Henry Clifford, the 250-ton galleon Constance of Hercules Fulgham or Foljambe, the 210-ton Guyana of Christopher Colthurst, the 200-ton Margaret and John of Edward Dixon, the 190-ton Royal Defence of Henry Bromley, the 120-ton Affection of William Fleming and Anthony of Robert Careless, the 80-ton Pegasus of Edward Goodwin, the “old frigate” Discovery of William Harper, the pinnace Scout of Henry Jolliffe, the bark Ley of John Ley, plus two unnamed barks.

They bear 1,700 men, whom Cumberland intends to lead in the conquest of Puerto Rico, thereby securing a major English stronghold in the West Indies. After refreshing his fleet for a week, the earl transfers to the Virgin Islands on June 11, celebrating a final muster three days later before laying in a course for San Juan.

JUNE 3, 1598. The Dutch explorer Cabeliau is joined near Cayenne by two Amsterdam ships, the Grote Sphera Mundi of Capt. Jan Corneliszoon van Leijen and the Kleine Sphera Mundi of Adriaen Reijndertsen, who agree to reconnoiter together the coastal regions as far as the Orinoco River.

JUNE 16, 1598. Seizure of Puerto Rico. This morning, Cumberland disembarks 700 men in Canegrejos Bay, 12–14 miles east of San Juan, then marches toward the capital until nightfall, when he is checked at a bridge a mile short of his destination by 10 Spanish regulars and 80 Puerto Rican militiamen under Capt. Bernabé de Sierra Alta. The first English assault is repelled with 20 deaths and a like number wounded, the Spaniards suffering only 4 fatalities—among them, though, Sierra Alta himself.

The next morning, the English use their boats to outflank this Spanish position, disembarking at Escambrón Point, while simultaneously bombarding Boquerón redoubt (nicknamed “Red Fort” by the invaders). By evening, all the Spanish defenders have been obliged to retreat, and on June 18, Cumberland sweeps unopposed into San Juan’s streets, finding its citizenry fled and 250 soldiers ensconced within the El Morro citadel under Gov. Antonio de Mosquera.

A formal siege is instituted, with artillery ferried ashore from the English fleet, until the Spaniards request terms on June 30. The next day, the surrender is consummated, Mosquera and his followers being repatriated to Cartagena de Indias several weeks later. However, disease sweeps through the English ranks, causing so many deaths that within a month and a half Cumberland relinquishes his conquest, sailing for England with some ships on August 14,

The Duke of Cumberland's capture of San Juan de Puerto Rico.

Fortification of San Juan

When the citizenry crept back into the Puerto Rican capital in late September 1598, they found it cruelly ransacked. The English had carried away 80 cannon, plus a great deal of other booty, including the cathedral bells. No rebuilding could start until a relief force arrived from Spain the next year, led by the new governor Alonso de Mercado. And he concentrated only on making El Morro Castle stronger by adding ramparts, cisterns, magazines, storerooms, and so on. The gutted city below did not receive any official attention until the term of de Mercado's successor, Sancho Ochoa de Castro, Conde de Salvatierra. He reinvigorated a few civilian projects, such as a new cabildo or "municipal building" in 1602, which was completed six years later.

Royal attention, however, remained fixated on San Juan's defensive capabilities. King Philip III referred to it as the "vanguard of all my West Indies" against the foreign interlopers who were pushing into the Antilles. As a result, Gov. Gabriel de Torres expanded El Morro during his tenure from 1608 to 1614. His successor, Felipe de Beaumont y Navarra, completed a small, square battery called Fort San Juan de la Cruz on Cañuelo Key opposite, plus a stone watchtower at the eastern end of San Antonio Bridge.

Such improvements were tested when 17 Dutch ships under Adm. Boudewijn Hendricksz burst into the harbor on the afternoon of September 24, 1625 (see "September 24, 1625" entry in "Holland's 'Great Design'"). Although San Juan was occupied and torched, El Morro successfully resisted. Once the Dutch withdrew in defeat, Madrid made the castle even stronger. By 1630, it boasted "one hundred artillery pieces, eighty-six of bronze and fourteen of iron."

And the Crown also grudgingly agreed to enclose the city of San Juan with stone ramparts, despite the expense. Foreigners seized ever more Antillean bases, so the Puerto Rican capital was viewed by Madrid as a regional stronghold. Its most vulnerable southern section between Santa Catalina Inlet and La Fortaleza was fortified as of July 1634 by Gov. Enrique Enríquez de Sotomayor. The plans were drawn up by the Italian-born royal engineer, Juan Bautista Antonelli. A second stretch of walls between La Fortaleza and the San Pedro Bastion at La Marina or Puntilla was erected from 1636 to 1638 by Gov. Iñigo de la Mota Sarmiento, Knight of the Order of Santiago. A third section ran toward a new northern redoubt called San Cristóbal.

These city ramparts were massive, averaging 24 feet in height by almost 20 feet in thickness at the bottom. Despite such large-scale efforts, San Juan continued to languish from commercial neglect. Not a single Spanish merchantman visited its harbor between 1651 and 1662, adding to the 1,600 residents' sense of isolation. The Lesser Antilles were already entirely occupied by foreign powers, as was Jamaica and half of Hispaniola. The only thing that spared San Juan from sharing this same fate was its fortifications.

followed by his main body under Berkeley on September 23. This campaign has cost 700 English lives: 60 due to battle, 40 from accidents, the remainder because of illness.

JULY 27, 1598. Cabeliau's Zeeridder, van Leijen's 72-ton Grote Sphera Mundi, and Reijndertsen's sloop Kleine Sphera Mundi penetrate the Orinoco River mouth, coming to anchor two miles inside and striking upriver two days afterward with 50 men aboard the two smaller ships, as well as the Zeeridder's 18-ton auxiliary yacht. Twenty days later, the Dutch explorers reach the Spanish frontier outpost of Santo Tomé de la Guayana, only recently relocated near Baratillo and Ceiba lagoons, where the visitors are peacefully greeted by Gov. Fernando de Berrio (son and heir of Antonio de Berrio, who has died in 1597). The Dutch are allowed to reconnoiter this district with Spanish guides, then return to their anchorage by August 30, having promised to meet their isolated Spanish hosts for some clandestine trade off the island of Trinidad.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1598. Cabeliau's trio of ships weigh anchor from the Orinoco, arriving off the western coast of Trinidad six days later. There they barter with Spanish callers until September 21, when van Leijen and Reijndertsen part company to sail on to Margarita Island, after which Cabeliau strikes across the Atlantic on October 31 with the Zeeridder, reaching Middleburg in Zeeland by December 28. His detailed report on the geography and economic potential of the Wild Coast greatly augments Dutch interest.

JANUARY 1599. The English ship Neptune of Capt. John Paul, accompanied by the pinnace Triton, captures a Spanish vessel near Puerto Rico.

FEBRUARY 9, 1599. Olivier van Noort arrives from Guinea at Rio de Janeiro with his 24-gun, 250-ton flagship Mauritius, the 28-gun, 300-ton Hendrik Frederick under Jacob Claeszoon van Ilpendam, plus the 50-ton yachts Hoop under Jacob Janszoon Huydecoper and Eendracht under Pieter Esaiszoon de Lint. The Dutch wish to buy fresh provisions, but the Brazilian residents—Portuguese vassals of the Spanish king—offer only token assistance.

Van Noort therefore slips a party ashore, which is ambushed, seven men being slain and several captured. This expedition's objective is to round the Strait of Magellan, trading or fighting with residents along the South American coast before continuing toward the Dutch commercial outposts in the Far East. Feeling that the season is too far advanced for such an attempt, van Noort scuttles the Eendracht and sails off to winter at Saint Helena or Ascension island. Failing to discover either, he instead puts into a bay near Puerto Deseado and Cape Vírgenes in southern Argentina, his crews subsisting upon penguins and fish.

APRIL 6, 1599. Simon de Cordes arrives from West Africa off the eastern approaches to the Strait of Magellan with his 28-gun, 130-man, 550-ton flagship Hoop; the 26-gun, 110-man, 300-ton vice-flagship Liefde of Gerard van Beuningen; the 20-gun, 109-man, 320-ton Geloof of Sebald de Weert; the 18-gun, 96-man, 220-ton Trouw of Jurien van Bockholt; and the 16-gun, 56-man, 150-ton Blijde Boedschap of Dirck Gerritszoon Pomp (alias "Dirck China"). Jacob Mahu, this expedition's original leader, has succumbed during the transatlantic crossing.

Like van Noort's plans, Cordes's enterprise is intended to penetrate the Pacific, to trade with South America, then to sail on to the Far East. The Dutch commander ignores his English pilots' advice to immediately make an attempt upon the Strait, preferring to winter in Great Bay (subsequently renamed Cordes Bay), where 120 members of his crews will die over the next few months—including van Bockholt, who is succeeded in command of the Trouw by Baltasar de Cordes, the admiral's younger brother.

JUNE 1599. The English ships Golden Phoenix of Capt. John Adey and Flying Hope of Capt. William Cabreth, plus the pinnace Handmaid, intercept a Spanish vessel near Havana, sending it home to London.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1599. Pacific Penetrations by the Dutch. After quitting their Patagonian anchorage on August 23, Cordes's squadron stands into the Strait of Magellan, becoming scattered by high seas and mist. The flagship Hoop and vice-flag Liefde press on separately toward their agreed rendezvous at Santa María Island (opposite Concepción, Chile), while the Geloof and the Trouw turn back to aid the damaged Blijde Boedschap. Five days later, they lose sight of Blijde Boedschap, being driven south by strong contrary winds. On the 26th, the Geloof and the Trouw seek refuge in a bay nine miles north of the western mouth of the Strait, remaining anchored until December 2.

NOVEMBER 4, 1599. The Liefde reaches the Santa María rendezvous, Captain van Beuningen and 27 men having earlier been slaughtered while attempting to trade on Mocha Island.

NOVEMBER 7, 1599. Having been accorded a friendly reception by the natives of the Chonos Archipelago, Cordes steps unwarily ashore at Lavapié Point with 23 men, only to be set upon and massacred by its Indians. The flagship's survivors sail on to Santa María the next day, where they meet the vice-flag Liefde.

NOVEMBER 13, 1599. Having departed his haven near Puerto Deseado, van Noort's trio of ships begin its own separate attempt to penetrate the Strait, taking three and a half months because of unfavorable weather.

NOVEMBER 17, 1599. After being driven far south by fierce winds, Gerritszoon and 22 survivors aboard the Blijde Boedschap surrender to the Spanish at Valparaíso, their vessel being sailed to Callao as a prize.

NOVEMBER 24, 1599. The Spanish inhabitants of Valdivia (Chile) are massacred by an Indian uprising.

NOVEMBER 27, 1599. Unable to achieve anything more off South America, the Hoop and the Liefde strike out westward into the central Pacific, the latter being lost with all hands. (The flagship eventually reaches Japan, where its English pilot, William Adams, lives and prospers for about 20 years, providing the inspiration for James Clavell's later novel, Shogun.)

DECEMBER 1599. The 100-ton, 77-man English ship Trial of Capt. Thomas Cowper prowls off Margarita Island (Venezuela), making several captures before returning to Bristol by May 1600.

DECEMBER 2, 1599. News of these Dutch penetrations into the Pacific reaches the Peruvian viceroy Luis de Velasco at Lima. Six days later, the captive Blijde Boodschap (see “November 17, 1599” entry) is sailed into Callao, prompting this official to prepare eight armed vessels and a launch bearing 1,119 men to protect the coast against the remaining enemies.

DECEMBER 11, 1599. After putting out into the South Pacific once more, de Weert’s Geloof becomes separated from the Trouw, compelling the former to reverse course, in despair, so as to regain the Atlantic via the Strait.

DECEMBER 16, 1599. While traversing the Strait from west to east, de Weert’s Geloof encounters van Noort’s trio beating in the opposite direction. Neither group is able to offer succor to the other, so de Weert reluctantly continues his passage and exits into the Atlantic by January 21, 1600. The Geloof will be the only one of Cordes’s five vessels to regain Holland, with 36 crewmen still alive.

DECEMBER 28, 1599. Morale on van Noort’s struggling vessels reaches such a low point that Vice Admiral Claeszoon is tried for mutiny and marooned. This squadron does not gain the Pacific until February 29, 1600.

JANUARY 1, 1600. Two Spanish galleons and a patache bearing 300 men are sent from Peru to locate the Dutch intruders off Chile, while another half-dozen warships remain off Pisco under Juan de Velasco—the viceroy’s nephew.

FEBRUARY 1600. The English ships Golden Phoenix of John Adey and Flying Hope of William Cabreth, plus the pinnace Handmaid, intercept a 25-ton Spanish bark near Barbados, bound from Guiana toward Cartagena with 120–130 black slaves. The captors then sell these prisoners at Margarita Island (Venezuela) for 60 ounces of pearls before venturing farther west and raiding Riohacha (Colombia).

SPRING 1600. Two Dutch forts, called Nassau and Orange, are built by Zeeland settlers on the eastern banks of the Xingu River, deep within the Amazon Delta (near modern Porto de Moz, Brazil).

MARCH 1600. Baltasar de Cordes of the Trouw, after becoming separated from de Weert and seeing his crew reduced to about 50 men, receives a friendly reception from the natives of Carelmapu (overlooking Chiloé Island).

Meanwhile, Juan de Velasco escorts the annual Peruvian treasure convoy from Callao to Panama without encountering any Dutch; he is eventually shipwrecked and drowned off California.

MARCH 21, 1600. Having become separated from the Hendrik Frederick, van Noort’s Mauritius and Hoop arrive off Mocha Island, where the admiral goes ashore and trades peaceably with its natives. Four days later, while sailing between Mocha and Santa María, the Dutch sight the Spanish ship Buen Jesús of Francisco de Ibarra, capturing it the next day. On March 28, van Noort burns another two vessels and captures a third off Valparaíso. At Huasco on April 1, he scuttles his two Spanish prizes, then releases most captives. Shortly thereafter, van Noort strikes out into the Pacific, eventually becoming the fourth commander—and first Dutchman—to circumnavigate the globe.

APRIL 1600. Baltasar de Cordes occupies the Spanish settlement of Castro by deceiving its commander, Baltasar Ruiz del Pliego—convincing him that it is about to be attacked by a horde of hostile natives.

MAY 2, 1600. The Hendrik Frederick intercepts a Spanish vessel off Concepción (Chile).

JUNE 4, 1600. After occupying Castro for a few weeks, Baltasar de Cordes’s men are routed by a company of Spaniards led across from Osorno by Capt. Francisco del Campo. The Dutch suffer 26 killed, their 23 survivors hastening back aboard the Trouw to stand out into the Pacific, eventually reaching Tidore in the Far East. Meanwhile, del Campo executes almost 50 Indians at Castro for aiding the Dutch intruders.

JUNE 18, 1600. The Hendrik Frederick captures a Spanish vessel off Arica (Chile).

AUGUST 11, 1600. The Hendrik Frederick seizes a becalmed Spanish vessel in the Gulf of Panama before proceeding west-northwestward past Costa Rica and Nicaragua, to eventually strike out across the Pacific.

AUGUST 22, 1600. On the southeastern shores of Lake Maracaibo (near modern Bobures, Venezuela), a flotilla of Quiriquire canoes from the Zulua and Catatumbo rivers surprises the recently established Spanish settlement of San Antonio de Gibraltar at dawn. Lt. Gov. Rodrigo de Argüelles receives multiple wounds yet escapes, although his wife Juana de Ulloa is murdered and his daughters Leonor, Paula, and Inés are captured. The triumphant natives then torch the empty dwellings before retiring.

FEBRUARY 1601. Portobelo Strike. After raiding Cubagua Island (Venezuela) and capturing a Portuguese slaver off Cape de la Vela (Colombia), Parker appears off Portobelo (Panama) with his flagship Prudence, accompanied by the 60-ton Pearl of Capt. Robert Rawlins and a 20-ton pinnace. They slip past its harbor castle and surprise the city, driving its 100 defenders inland under the command of Gov. Pedro Meléndez before setting fire to its Triana suburb, then standing out to sea with 10,000 ducats' worth of booty.

JULY 1601. The English ship Archangel of Capt. Michael Geare and pinnace James of David Middleton roam the Venezuelan coast.

OCTOBER 1601. A Spanish coast-guard galley from Cartagena (Colombia) sights an English pinnace with two prizes near Ríoacha, capturing Capt. Simon Bourman and 38 of his crew members.

(Born of a Spanish mother, this officer is eventually released upon the official cessation of hostilities three years later.)

JANUARY 1602. Geare's Archangel and Middleton's James operate off Cuba, taking three prizes before sailing for England.

MAY 1602. Newport returns into the Caribbean with his flagship Neptune, accompanied by the Diana of Capt. Edward Glanvill, taking prizes off Guava and near Havana before recrossing the Atlantic for England.

NOVEMBER 1602. While lying at the smuggling outpost of Guanahibes in northern Hispaniola, three English vessels—Geare's Archangel, Newport's Neptune, and Hippon's Phoenix—form a partnership with five French slavers to attack a pair of Spanish galleons expected soon at Puerto Caballos (modern Puerto Cortés, Honduras).

JANUARY 24, 1603. While making toward Puerto Caballos (Honduras), the combined Anglo-French flotilla of Geare and Newport raids Jamaica for supplies, only to be repelled with some losses.

FEBRUARY 17, 1603. Raid on Puerto Caballos. Eight Anglo-French ships of 300–350 tons apiece stand into this Honduran port, detaching seven boats with 200 men and light artillery to board two partially laden Spanish galleons at anchor in its roadstead: Capt. Juan de Monasterios's 600-ton Nuestra Señora del Rosario and Francisco Ferrufino's 400-ton San Juan Bautista. The pair put up a stout resistance, repelling their attackers for eight hours before finally surrendering after having suffered 11 killed and 16 wounded.

The triumphant rovers thereupon loot the vessels and buildings ashore over the next 18 days before falling out along national lines over their captives' fate. (Spanish eyewitnesses later declare that the French wished to kill them all, the English refusing.) Eventually, both groups depart with the San Juan Bautista as their sole prize, the stripped hulk of the Rosario being left behind. The French tack upwind to Guanahibes in Hispaniola, while the English steer downwind toward Cuba.

LATE FEBRUARY 1603. Capt. William Fisher's John and Francis captures nine Spanish pearling vessels off Ríohacha (Colombia), holding them for ransom.

LATE MARCH 1603. Fisher's John and Francis takes a Spanish prize off Cuba.

APRIL 30, 1603. Fisher captures another Spanish vessel off Cuba.

MAY 1603. Geare, Newport, and Hippon take an additional pair of Spanish prizes near Havana before standing out through the Straits of Florida into the North Atlantic for England.

This same month, the ship Elizabeth and Cleeve and a smaller pinnace under Capt. Christopher Cleeve—recently arrived in the West Indies from London—briefly occupy Santiago de Cuba, relieving its church of assorted booty. They subsequently make an unprofitable descent upon Jamaica before seizing a prize off Cape San Antonio.

AUGUST 1, 1603. Spanish admiral Fulgencio de Meneses arrives from across the Atlantic at Guadeloupe with a 30-vessel plate fleet—most bound toward Mexico. However, his wood and watering parties are unexpectedly attacked ashore by Carib warriors, suffering 20 killed and 30 wounded. In the resultant confusion, Meneses's 700-ton flagship San Juan Bautista and two other galleons run aground; they are set ablaze by their panic-stricken crews and consumed down to their waterlines.

AUGUST 28, 1603. Cleeve's pair of English vessels, in company with Capt. Andrew Miller's ship Nephtune and pinnace Dispatch, take two Spanish prizes in the Old Bahama Channel north of Cuba. The latter have been detached from Admiral Meneses's plate fleet at Guadeloupe to convey the new governor designate of Florida, plus other passengers and cargo, into Havana. The rovers deposit their captives instead at Baracoa before standing away with these prizes—now renamed Christopher and Andrew—toward the smuggling port of Guanahibes on the northern coast of Hispaniola.

(Upon his eventual return to Plymouth in May 1604, Cleeve is forced to restore much of this booty when the Spanish ambassador brings a lawsuit through the courts of King James I.)

AUGUST 29, 1604. The death of Queen Elizabeth I on March 24, 1603 (O.S.), leads to the succession on the English throne of Scottish-born James I. He makes peace with Spain by signing the Treaty of London. Both nations are in effect drained by their exertions, and their treasuries are bankrupt, so for a brief interlude, only minor frictions will plague the New World.

Rival Outposts (1604–1659)

It is no good to fight the pirates and rebels in Indies by honest means; they must be intimidated by bloody war.

—Philip IV's instructions to the Spanish admiral the Marqués de Cadereyta (1633)

EARLY FOOTHOLDS (1604–1619)

At the beginning of the 1600s, the West European powers lay spent following the previous century's closing exertions—the rebellious United Provinces having fought Spain to a standstill, as England did before them, while France remains racked by religious turmoil. For the New World there ensues a brief interlude of calm, as war-weary Europe begins rebuilding its economies and shaking off the horrors of war. However, this truce also inaugurates a somewhat more subtle form of aggression in the Americas as the seaborne interlopers who previously visited Spanish America to smuggle or raid are now joined by law-abiding immigrants hoping to establish permanent settlements ashore. In time, these colonies will prove infinitely more lethal to Spain's claims upon the continent than any military or naval ventures.

APRIL 8, 1604. Daniel de la Touche, Sieur de la Ravardière, appears off the Amazon River mouth with a ship and a smaller auxiliary, anchoring the next evening opposite Yapoco (modern Saint-Georges de l'Oyapock in eastern French Guiana). He explores this region in the direction of what will later become known as Cayenne until May 18, then visits the pearl fisheries of Margarita Island (Venezuela) while on his homeward passage to Europe.

APRIL 29, 1604. At dawn, two-dozen armed Frenchmen slip ashore near Manzanillo (Cuba) from the ship and smaller auxiliary of Gilbert Giron to seize hostages in reprisal for money and goods owed to Giron by local Spanish traders. (The previous year, Lt. Gov. and Lic. Melchor Suárez de Poago used a company of troops to arrest almost 100 Spaniards in and around Bayamo, thus discouraging the region's traffic with foreign seamen. Consequently, Giron now finds himself unable to collect because of this new climate of fear, so resorts to more drastic methods.)

At Yara Hacienda, he captures Bishop Juan de las Cabezas y Altamirano, the canon Francisco Puebla, the friar Diego Sánchez, plus several other Spaniards and carries them back aboard his ship. Eight days later, the bishop is released, but when Giron comes ashore with 10 musketeers and 8 pikemen to claim his ransom, he is set upon by 27 Spaniards under Gregorio Ramos and killed along with most of his landing party. (Giron also leaves his name to Playa Girón or "Giron Beach," where the "Bay of Pigs" invasion is halted; see "April 17, 1961" entry in "Latin American Troubles," Volume 2.)

JULY 1605. In Madrid, the Spanish Crown issues a real cédula or "royal decree" ordering its American officials to execute any foreign corsairs or smugglers found in the New World, without appeal.

AUGUST 2, 1605. Gov. Antonio Osorio of Santo Domingo unexpectedly materializes with 150 soldiers at Bayahá, a town on the northwestern coast of Hispaniola, to read aloud a year-old secret proclamation from King Philip III complaining of the "pernicious and inveterate traffic" of that region's Spanish inhabitants with foreign smugglers; they are

French harquebusier in Canada. (Canadian Department of National Defense)

The Salt War

As of the 16th century, the Netherlands began experiencing a growing demand for salt. A major fishing nation, the Netherlands had always used this commodity to cure its catches, which were swelling in volume. The number of Dutch herring boats, for example, boomed from 150 in 1550 to more than 4,000 a century later. Salt was also needed to cure meats, as well as to produce butter and cheese. It had industrial applications as well, such as in the manufacture of glass.

For decades, Dutch traders had obtained salt from Setubal in Portugal or from the Portuguese colonists on the Cape Verde Islands off West Africa. But shortly after King Philip II of Spain absorbed Portugal into his empire in 1580, he moved to cut off this supply because the Netherlands was so hostile to his rule.

Dutch salters therefore ventured across the Atlantic to tap the great natural pans enclosed by the Araya Peninsula in Venezuela. Its salt proved to be excellent and could be gathered without charge along this uninhabited shoreline. By 1599, it was estimated that 100 Dutch ships visited every year. Realizing that this free resource allowed “the rebels to live and grow in wealth,” the new king Philip III proposed in 1602 that a coast-guard squadron be created in the Windward Isles. Eight or nine lateen-rigged vessels with shallow drafts could patrol Araya. Instead, his chief naval adviser suggested annual sweeps by passing plate fleets.

The next year, governors Diego Suárez Amaya of nearby Cumaná and Felipe Cáncer of Margarita Island proposed that a fort be erected to guard Araya’s entrance. The Crown authorized an inspection, which was made in June 1604 by Suárez Amaya and the Italian-born royal engineer Bautista Antonelli, who was accompanied by his 19-year-old son and heir, Juan Bautista Antonelli, and Capt. Pedro Suárez Coronel. Before any construction could begin, however, Admiral Fajardo made a surprise descent in November 1605, butchering hundreds of Dutch salters. Instead of deterring future visits, though, this act only made the Dutch return in greater numbers and more heavily armed.

The Dutch would exploit the Araya salt pans until Fort Santiago was finally installed in 1623. And even then, they merely shifted their operations to nearby Tortuga Island, to the Unare River mouth, to Curaçao, and to the Antillean isle of Saint Martin. The Spanish vainly tried to pursue and dislodge these stubborn salters over the next two decades.

therefore to be immediately transferred over to the south side of the island. Soon, troops begin torching edifices to hasten the evacuation, then visit a like treatment upon Puerto Plata, Monte Cristi, and La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti), while residents attempt to save whatever they can and abandon tens of thousands of their cattle and pigs to roam wild.

Once complete, this “scorched-earth” policy will have the opposite effect intended by Madrid, for rather than deny European traders contacts ashore, it will instead present them with empty, beckoning havens. Because the Spanish residents are obliged to leave behind planted crops and livestock, visiting ships will find easy means for refreshing their provisions, as well as a tempting stretch of coastline for permanent occupation.

AUGUST 20, 1605. The Olive Blossom of Capt. Nicholas St. John sights Saint Lucia, having been blown off course during its attempt to reach Sir Olive and Charles Leigh’s fledgling English colony in Guyana. Rather than continue beating southward against contrary winds and currents, St. John steps ashore three days later with 67 settlers, and they remain behind on Saint Lucia.

Its natives initially prove friendly, but after three weeks, the English endure a massive attack by Carib raiders from nearby Saint Vincent under their chief, Augramert. Only 19 settlers survive the 10-day onslaught, cowering behind a barricade of sea chests, after which they slip away at midnight on September 26 aboard a tiny craft.

NOVEMBER 6, 1605. Araya Massacre. Fourteen Spanish galleons, four lesser vessels, and 2,500 men under Adm. Luis Fajardo appear off the Araya Peninsula (Venezuela), having been dispatched from Lisbon to help sweep foreign interlopers from the Caribbean, as Madrid has grown so concerned about Dutch trespassers.

Fajardo’s fleet sights 11 Dutch ships anchored within Ancón de Refriegas, 8 being salters from Hoorn and 3 smugglers from Zeeland under Daniel de Moucheron. Two of the latter vessels succeed in escaping, but because most of the salters are working ashore, they are trapped when Spanish troops storm the beaches. Most of these interlopers are either shot down by nightfall or drown while attempting to escape from this one-sided bloodbath. The victors then separate all masters and pilots from among the survivors and hang them prominently on seaside gallows; the rest of the prisoners are condemned to the galleys. Some 400 Dutchmen perish this day.

The Spanish expedition remains offshore for another month, making seven more captures, one being a 100-ton Dutch ship with 26 crewmen, who slay 14 Spaniards in a desperate resistance before finally being overwhelmed and slaughtered (except for one young man from Antwerp). Satisfied with his exemplary display of ruthlessness, intended to scare away future trespassers, Fajardo then weighs anchor for Santo Domingo and the north coast of Hispaniola.

JANUARY 1606. Fajardo's fleet arrives off Manzanilla on the north shore of Hispaniola. He sets a large contingent of troops ashore to help the island's royal officials round up and relocate the last recalcitrant Spanish settlers over to the south coast, in accordance with Madrid's depopulation plan, so that they come under direct supervision from the capital (see "August 2, 1605" entry). While at anchor, the admiral learns of a large gathering of foreign smugglers farther west at the Cuban bay of Manzanillo in the Gulf of Guacanayabo. Fajardo therefore detaches his vice admiral Juan Álvarez de Avilés with six galleons and some support craft to deal with these interlopers.

FEBRUARY 7, 1606. Vice Admiral Álvarez's galleons come upon two-dozen Dutch, six French, and one English vessel riding off Cabo Cruz (Cuba), which the Spanish ships immediately pursue. The interlopers scatter, but a large Dutch ship commanded by Abraham du Verne is grappled by a galleon, and both vessels sink when du Verne's magazine suddenly explodes. The other smugglers escape in the confusion, after which Álvarez limps on toward Havana, wrecking his flagship and a flyboat

Vengeance at Gibraltar

When news of Fajardo's massacre of the Dutch salters at Araya reached the Netherlands in the spring of 1606, it stirred passionate anger. Although many cruelties were inflicted in the long struggle for independence, the salters were regarded as harmless noncombatants. Their pitiless fate sparked such a thirst for revenge that a Dutch observer noted it would turn "many to raiding who otherwise would never have thought of doing so."

At the end of March 1607, a fleet of 34 Dutch vessels swept down the English Channel. Sailing abreast in four squadrons, they stopped every vessel that they saw for information. Although Adm. Jacob van Heemskerck's mission was to blockade the coast of Spain and defend Dutch shipping, he and his crews also hoped to meet Fajardo's fleet. It had now returned from the New World, wintered at Seville, and was patrolling the Andalusian coast as far down as Gibraltar. The Spanish admiral was no longer in charge, having turned over command to his vice admiral, Juan Álvarez de Avilés.

On April 24, 1607, the Dutch fleet prowled past Seville and Cadiz, eager to burst inside if their enemy should be at anchor. Finding both empty, they neared the Strait of Gibraltar the next day. Capt. Joris van Spilbergen of Zeeland later recorded how, at the council meeting held aboard Heemskerck's flagship, it was resolved, "In God's name, to attack the Spanish Armada if the latter were in the Bay of Gibraltar, we being well determined, even if they were in their own harbor, under the guns of the town and castle."

Although Álvarez was warned of the Dutch approach and positioned his five heavy galleons in a line to protect his seven smaller ships and nine other vessels, the Spaniards were surprised at how boldly the Dutch stood into their fortified bay that same afternoon. "They did not fire a gun," one noted, "nor waver in their movements."

Instead, Heemskerck closed on the Spanish line, and a murderous four-hour firefight ensued until nightfall. Álvarez was killed along with most of his officers and men, his flagship San Agustín being beached and boarded. Vice Adm. Tomás Guerrero de la Fuente's Nuestra Señora del Buen Viaje burned to the waterline, only 11 of 450 crewmen swimming to safety. The Madre de Dios, the Santa Ana, and the Nuestra Señora de Regla shared much the same fate. The Dutch showed no mercy, even killing survivors struggling in the water.

They then stripped their prizes overnight and set them ablaze the next dawn. The Spaniards also burned any of their own vessels that drifted aground. In all, 12 Spanish ships were destroyed, and 2,000 or more casualties were suffered. As the Dutch exited under fire from the forts, onlookers ashore even saw Spanish captives being tossed into the water with their hands and feet tied. Although only 356 bodies were later buried, most were swallowed up by the bay. Heemskerck and perhaps 200 Dutchmen were also slain in avenging the salters of Araya.

amid the Jardines de la Reina Archipelago. He is eventually rejoined by Fajardo at the Cuban capital, and they return together to Spain.

SUMMER 1606. Along the western banks of Lake Maracaibo (Venezuela), a native confederacy forms to drive the Spaniards out of the district. Isolated plantations are attacked by fleets of Quiriquire war canoes, while the city of Maracaibo—then called Nueva Zamora—suffers from sporadic blockades and encirclements, prompting its citizens to erect a stockade and request outside assistance that September. Early in 1607, Capt. Juan Pacheco Maldonado of Trujillo leads a 50-man counterexpedition across the lake from Moporo, which smashes the Indian alliance through a series of destructive sweeps.

JUNE 1606. A small Dutch force attempts to capture a pair of Honduran galleons at anchor off Santo Tomás de Castilla (northern Guatemala). The Dutch lose a ship in their first attempt and are defeated again a few days later, during a second try.

APRIL 26, 1607 (O.S.). First Anglo-Powhatan War.

The 100-ton ship Susan Constant of veteran explorer Christopher Newport, the 40-ton Godspeed of Bartholomew Gosnold, and the 20-ton Discovery of John Ratcliffe arrive on the Atlantic Seaboard of North America from London, bearing 100 men and 4 boys to establish a new colony in Virginia. It takes them 17 days to work up a river they christen the James in honor of their monarch, founding a settlement called Jamestown, with a triangular fort for defense. Wilderness conditions prove harsh, though, and the 60-year-old regional overlord Powhatan and his 30 Algonquian vassal tribes are hostile, so before too long only 38 Englishmen remain. One of them is the 28-year-old captain John Smith, whose emergence as a leader will eventually ensure this colony's survival.

The First Anglo-Powhatan War erupts in 1609 as the settlers—further reinforced from England—gradually skirmish their way up the James River, gaining control from Chesapeake Bay to the fall line, thanks to their superior weaponry and body armor. One of the few English defeats occurs in November 1609, when a force bent upon stealing corn is decimated by the Pamunkey subchief Opechancanough. The next year, Governor Thomas West, Lord de la War orders harsher tactics employed, and on August 9, 1610 (O.S.), Capt. George Percy and 70 men descend upon the town of Paspahegh, killing or wounding 50 people and capturing the wife and children of the local werowance or chieftain Wowinchopunch, casting them into the river to drown. Such cruelty shakes native resolve, so by the time Powhatan's favorite daughter Pocahontas is lured aboard Samuel Argall's ship and kidnapped in the summer of 1613, their cause is essentially lost. Because tribal descent is matrilineal, Powhatan agrees to a truce with the English colonists the next spring, after his daughter converts to Anglicanism and prepares to marry the planter John Rolfe. The aged Indian leader dies three years later, heartbroken by news of Pocahontas's death while visiting England in 1617.

OCTOBER 1607. To enforce its claim to the Caribbean and discourage the growing number of foreign interlopers prowling into these waters, Madrid has decided to create and permanently station a new Armada de Barlovento or "Windward Fleet" in the region. Adm. Juan Enríquez de Borja and Vice Adm. Martín de Vallecillas therefore depart Cadiz in October 1607 with several hundred seamen and 120 soldiers to help build six galleons at Havana. However, by the time these vessels are completed in March 1610, they are instead sailed to Spain for other duties, while the 120 soldiers are assigned to St. Augustine (Florida).

JANUARY 1609. Yanga's Revolt. In Mexico, raids by cimarrones or "runaway slaves" become a serious nuisance in the region between Córdoba and Orizaba, where they burn farms, rob travelers, and kidnap wealthy citizens. Their leader is a fat, intelligent, aged Dinka from Gabon in West Africa named Gaspar Yanga or N'Yanga, who was brought to New Spain as long ago as 1579. Having escaped his master and created an autonomous fiefdom in the jungles around Orizaba's volcano, Yanga's ranks are being fed by a steady stream of other runaways and delinquents.

By January 1609, their activities are becoming so notorious that they attract the attention of the reform-minded viceroy, Luis de Velasco "the Younger," in Mexico City, who orders Pedro González de Herrera to lead a military contingent of 100 troops and 450 auxiliaries from Puebla against the rebel hideouts. Although overmatched by the Spaniards' weaponry and armor, the 500 cimarrones nonetheless put up a spirited resistance when the two forces meet early in February. Yanga's principal lieutenant, an Angolan named Francisco de la Matosa, is finally captured and leads the Spanish army into the rebels' camp at night. Yanga escapes deeper into the jungle, only to be taken with his few remaining followers a short time afterward.

Impressed by the tenacity and fighting ability of the cimarrones, de Velasco decides to spare the rebels, resettling them into a new town atop Mount Totutla, on condition that they will hereafter serve His Catholic Majesty during wartime. Two decades later, they are transferred to another site called San Lorenzo de los Negros (literally, "Saint Lawrence of the Blacks"), 12 miles southeast of Córdoba.

JULY 28, 1609. After three days of being battered by a heavy storm, the Virginia Company's flagship Sea Venture under veteran Adm. George Somers of Dorsetshire (see "May 18, 1595" in "Elizabethan Wars"), part of a nine-ship convoy bearing 600 reinforcements for the new English colony at Jamestown, staggers aground on the east end of Bermuda. Its survivors spend the next 10 months building two ships, the Patience and the Deliverance, to carry them on to their destination; yet when they finally reach Virginia in late May 1610, they find conditions so harsh that they quickly return to Bermuda.

Somers dies shortly thereafter, and his body is carried home to England, along with glowing accounts of this new island—the survivors' adventures furthermore inspiring William Shakespeare to write his play The Tempest. Such favorable reports lead other settlers to immigrate to Bermuda, this island becoming known for a while as "Somers Island."

JULY 30, 1609. The French settler Samuel de Champlain and a band of men, along with his Algonquin and Montagnais allies, defeat an Iroquois war party near Crown Point (modern Ticonderoga on the banks of Lake Champlain, between Vermont

Shakespeare and Bermuda

The discovery and conquest of the New World fascinated Europeans for more than a century. There was much interest in each new colonizing expedition that set sail. One such convoy of nine ships left England under Adm. George Somers in early June 1609, bound for Virginia with 600 settlers under its new governor, Sir Thomas Gates. By autumn, word came back that the flagship Sea Venture had been lost in a storm, without a trace.

Miraculously, Gates returned to England a year later with a remarkable tale to tell. His flagship had become separated in a storm and ran aground on Bermuda. It even wedged upright between two rocks, and no lives or goods were lost. Until then, this unexplored island was believed to be “given over to devils and wicked spirits.” Instead, Gates and his survivors found its climate so wonderfully temperate, and its landscape so “abundantly fruitful,” that they chose to settle there.

The accounts published in October 1610 of this shipwreck on an enchanted isle thrilled English readers, and evidently inspired William Shakespeare to write The Tempest. The playwright almost certainly had friends and business associates who were involved with the Virginia Company, and the story was widespread. Somers’s description of St. Elmo’s fire dancing on the Sea Venture’s rigging seems to have provided the idea for Ariel’s supernatural boarding of the king’s ship in the play:

... now on the beak,
Now in the waist, the deck, in every cabin,
I flam’d amazement. Sometimes I’d divide,
And burn in many places ...

(I.ii.196–200)

The survivors, both in reality and on stage, formed two factions. They were then delivered by the magical resurrection of their ship. When first performed in November 1611, The Tempest must have won smiles of recognition among London audiences.

and New York states). Champlain slays two Iroquois chieftains with his harquebus, prompting the other warriors—who have never before experienced gunfire—to flee.

AUGUST 1609. The English brothers Robert and Michael Harcourt reach the Guianas, the latter remaining behind with a few colonists, while Robert Harcourt sails for England to petition the Crown for permission to develop this private colony. Their fledgling settlement will not prosper.

JUNE 19, 1610. Champlain and his Huron and Algonquian allies defeat an Iroquois war band near the mouth of the Richelieu River.

JULY 8, 1610. A Spanish vessel is intercepted off Cuba’s Cape San Antonio by English rovers, being stripped of money, hides, and other merchandise before the Spanish crew is released ashore.

JULY 29, 1610. In Costa Rica, the natives of the five-year-old settlement of Santiago de Talamanca rise up against their cruel governor, Diego de Sojo, eradicating its church and all Spanish dwellings.

AUGUST 1610. The 55-ton Discovery of Capt. Henry Hudson arrives off Labrador, rounding the Ungava Peninsula in hopes of discovering the Northwest Passage. After steering southward, he becomes embayed and winters there, beginning his homeward voyage on June 28, 1611, only to have his crew mutiny and set him adrift in a small boat along with his 18-year-old son John or “Jack” and four loyal hands. None survive, while only 5 of the 11 mutineers regain England.

FEBRUARY 8, 1612. After a six-week royal inquiry assigned to the visiting governor Sancho de Alquiza of Margarita Island (Venezuela), the few-score Spanish inhabitants on Trinidad are reprimanded for illegally trading with French, Dutch, and English smugglers. De Alquiza then proceeds with 40 Spanish troops and 60 paddlers up the Orinoco River to Santo Tomé de la Guayana, chasing off two Dutch smugglers before issuing a similar verdict in late April against the regional governor, Fernando de Berrio.

JULY 1612. Some 60 British settlers are sent aboard the Virginia Company’s Plough to help expand Bermuda, this island becoming a thriving English colony over the next few years.

JULY 26, 1612. Equinoctial France. The ships Régente, Charlotte, and Sainte Anne arrive at Upaonimirim Island (modern Guyavas, Brazil—although temporarily renamed “Sainte Anne” by these French settlers, as they make landfall upon this particular Church feast day). The expedition consists of 500 men under captains Daniel de la Touche, Sieur de la Ravardière; Nicolas de Harley; François, Sieur de Rasily (also spelt Razilly or Rassily); Jacques de Riffault; and Charles des Vaux. Eighteen years previously, des Vaux has established a foothold in this region (see “Summer 1594” in “Elizabethan Wars”), which the French Crown now hopes to transform into a permanent colony.

Des Vaux reconnoiters upstream, reestablishing friendly relations with the natives. A landing is made, and a stronghold named Fort Saint Louis is erected 50 miles from the sea on Maranhão Island (near the modern city of São Luis). This region is designated as France Équinoxiale or “Equinoctial France,” after which Rasilly departs toward France for more colonists. When word of this intruder settlement reaches Madrid, King Philip III orders his Portuguese subordinates to drive the trespassers out. It will not be until two years later, though, that the Brazilian capitão-mor Jerônimo de Albuquerque can assemble sufficient men and ships to challenge the French.

JULY 1613. The French settlements at Saint Sauveur and Port Royal (modern Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia) are attacked, sacked, and burned by 60 men under Capt. Samuel Argall, on orders from Gov. Sir Thomas Dale of Virginia.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1613. The French leader Champlain departs Huronia with a native war party for an expedition against the Iroquois. On October 10, they are ambushed by the Onondagas, Champlain being wounded and his Franco-Huron contingent compelled to retire into their home base by December 23.

APRIL 1614. The English explorer John Smith arrives off Maine with two ships from London, surveying from Penobscot to Cape Cod during July and August and naming this particular stretch of shoreline “New England.”

LATE AUGUST 1614. Portuguese Retaliation. The 66-year-old Jerônimo de Albuquerque, designated as capitão-mor for northern Brazil, disembarks 300 Portuguese militiamen and 230 native warriors from eight ships at the mouth of the Maranhão estuary near modern São Luis to begin operations against the intruder settlement called France Équinoxiale, 50 miles upstream. A few months previously, Albuquerque has reconnoitered this region, installing a 40-man garrison at Rosário under Capt. Manuel de Sousa Dessa. The governor now rallies 1,000 Tobajara auxiliaries from around this base, then advances as far as Guaxinguba by October 26, entrenching his army at a place that he dubs Fort Santa Maria del Maranhão—directly opposite the French fortification of Saint Joseph d’Itapary.

On the night of November 11, the first French counterattack occurs when four barks glide downstream; three Portuguese craft are boarded before any alarm can be given. Two hours before dawn on November 19, a much larger assault follows when la Ravardière leads 200 French soldiers and 1,500 Tupinambá allies aboard four ships, three gunboats, and a host of canoes to attack Albuquerque’s camp. La Ravardière succeeds in destroying many Portuguese vessels but loses 115 Frenchmen killed and 9 captured. A truce is therefore arranged two days later, whereby both sides agree to allow this territorial dispute to be decided by their respective governments back in Europe.

The 400 French Huguenot settlers in this district, however, are effectively doomed, being cut off from the sea by Albuquerque’s forts; moreover, Paris is loath to antagonize Madrid early the next year because Queen Regent Marie de Médici is arranging the marriage of her 13-year-old son Louis XIII to the Spanish princess Anne of Austria, so very little diplomatic pressure is exerted on la Ravardière’s behalf.

OCTOBER 12, 1615. South of Lake Ontario, in the Oswego region (modern New York State), Champlain unsuccessfully besieges a Seneca fort with a band of French, Huron, Algonquian, and Montagnais followers.

OCTOBER 31, 1615. Nine more Portuguese ships bearing 600 troops arrive at Maranhão from Pernambuco under Capt. Gen. Alejandro de Moura, who quickly breaks the truce with the French by advancing upriver on November 3 and obliging these interlopers to surrender their last remaining stronghold of Fort Saint Louis 12 days afterward. On November 20, la Ravardière signs a capitulation whereby he agrees to be transported to Lisbon as a prisoner, while his followers are evacuated toward France. More than 400 settlers sail away aboard three ships, leaving their properties to the Portuguese, thus marking an end to France Équinoxiale.

NOVEMBER 16, 1616. Tepehuán Revolt. In Mexico’s northern province of Nueva Vizcaya, 2,000 Tepehuán Indians rise up in a concerted rebellion, slaughtering 270 Spanish settlers at the missions of Santa Catalina, Atotonilco, Guatimape, Santiago Papsquiario, and Zape. This insurrection soon spreads among the neighboring Xixime, Acaxee, Tarahumara, and other lesser tribes of the Topia Range, who unite and march—allegedly 25,000 strong—against the capital of La Guadiana (the modern city of Durango). Gov. Gaspar de Alvear y Salazar scatters this host and executes 65 of its leaders, yet Indian rebels continue to resist in the mountainous terrain for the next couple of years.

NOVEMBER 17, 1617. Raleigh's Last Venture. Fifteen sickly English vessels appear off the Orinoco River under 65-year-old Sir Walter Raleigh, who has been released from 13 years' incarceration in the Tower of London by King James I on the understanding that he will secure the El Dorado mines for England—without antagonizing Spain. Having contracted a sickness during a stopover at the Canaries, Raleigh anchors his 36-gun, 400-ton flagship Destiny at Galeota Point (Trinidad) before detaching his second-in-command Lawrence Keymis with five vessels—the largest being the 160-ton, 18-gun Encounter of Captain Whitney—to advance up the Orinoco with several hundred men, including Raleigh's 25-year-old son Walter and his nephew George.

Keymis reaches this river mouth by December 31 (O.S.), working his way upstream until Santo Tomé is sighted three weeks later, near Jaya Island between the Caroní confluence and Atamaya Point (six miles west of Los Castillos). Its recently installed Spanish governor Diego Palomeque de Acuña has been forewarned of this English approach by native scouts, so Santo Tomé's citizenry flees while 37 militiamen prepare to resist, supported by two small cannon and four swivel-guns, plus some Indian auxiliaries. This force is easily brushed aside by Keymis, Palomeque and several others being killed—among them Raleigh's son, slain in hand-to-hand combat with a Spanish captain named Erineta. Finding the town empty, the English then press farther upriver until they are ambushed near Ceiba by 10 Spanish harquebusiers and a similar number of native archers under Capt. Jerónimo Grado, who are hidden on the river's embankments.

Retiring into Santo Tomé, the English suffer disease and a counterassault by 23 Spaniards and 60 Indians on the 27th day of their occupation, obliging Keymis to retreat. He reports to Raleigh at Trinidad, who, in his anguish at facing ruin and the loss of his son, reproves his subordinate so harshly that the latter commits suicide. Raleigh's expedition quickly disintegrates, at least five captains parting company to prowl the Caribbean, while Raleigh returns to England to meet his fate (being executed on October 29, 1618 [O.S.]).

DECEMBER 25, 1618. Having departed Dieppe on June 20 with a letter of reprisal against the Spanish and Portuguese, Capt. Charles Fleury—a former colleague of the renowned privateer Jacques Barc—arrives off the coast of Brazil. His expedition consists of his 120-ton flagship Espérance; the same-sized Saint-Louis of Nicolas Le Grand de Fécamp; the 30-ton bark Sainte-Suzanne of Nicolas Leroy, Sieur Dumé; and the bark Robinette of Du Buisson. They are accompanied by the prize Sainte-Marie, with slightly more than 300 Huguenot rovers spread among all five vessels.

Fleury decides to assault the Brazilian port of Porto Seguro, but this effort fails. Demoralized, the French sail for the Antilles, Fleury being forsaken by his subordinates—he is left in command of less than 100 followers aboard his lone ship.

SPRING 1619. Five of Raleigh's former vessels—three large and two small ones—are lying near Santo Domingo when they are attacked by a like number

Thirty Years' War

Europe had long been rent by dynastic rivalries, as well as struggles between kings and powerful aristocrats. In the early 17th century, religion further complicated matters. The ideological rift between Catholicism and Lutheranism was temporarily halted by a truce in 1555. However, Calvinism then emerged, and tensions continued to rise, especially in the 225 German principalities that made up the "Holy Roman Empire." That region's Calvinist minority formed a "League of Evangelical Union" in 1608, which was countered the next year by the "Catholic League."

The tolerant Holy Roman emperor Matthias tried to ensure an orderly succession by having his cousin Ferdinand elected as crown prince of Bohemia in 1617. Yet some Protestant Bohemians feared for their rights under Ferdinand's militant Catholicism. Therefore, when he sent two of his representatives to Hradčany Castle in Prague to rule on his behalf, they were seized by Hussite extremists on May 23, 1618. After a mock trial, the Catholics were flung from the palace windows. Although they miraculously survived the 70-foot plunge, the Bohemian Revolt had begun.

This rebellion enjoyed success at first, thanks to support from neighboring Protestant territories. By August 17, 1619, Ferdinand was deposed as king of Bohemia in favor of the Protestant Frederick V, Elector of the Palatinate. The hard-pressed Ferdinand, now crowned as Holy Roman emperor, called for help from Spain. An army under Gen. Ambrosio Spinola marched from Brussels in the Spanish Netherlands and reversed Catholic losses.

Yet resistance persisted, so that over the next three decades most Continental powers became embroiled as this conflict spread out from Germany and Austria. And although its underlying impetus would remain a religious struggle, the Thirty Years' War was also exacerbated by diplomatic maneuvers in every major capital. Madrid, for example, supported Ferdinand in his absolutist efforts, while Holland and Sweden favored their Protestant coreligionists for strategic reasons. Paris weighed in against its traditional Spanish foes, while London was distracted by internal divisions. Generations of soldiers would learn campaigning, most especially in the Low Countries, and this warfare indirectly affected developments in the New World as well.

of Spanish ships under Capt. Alonso de Contreras, a knight of the Order of San Juan. This officer has recently arrived from Seville with two royal galleons and 200 troops to reinforce San Juan de Puerto Rico's garrison, having then continued to Santo Domingo with two additional Spanish coasters and been joined by a slaver from Cape Verde (West Africa). De Contreras exits that harbor and engages the five English vessels, chasing them away.

Next, the Spanish officer calls at Santiago de Cuba with only a single ship (possibly the Buen Jesús) and, while proceeding along that island's southern shore toward Cape San Antonio, chances upon another of Raleigh's consorts anchored off Isla de Pinos. De Contreras captures this vessel along with 21 crew members, carrying them into Havana. He concludes his Caribbean foray by incorporating his galleon into the plate fleet of Adm. Carlos de Ibarra, a knight of the Order of Alcántara, which sails for Spain on July 28.

APRIL 21, 1619. With his ship now disintegrating and his crew facing starvation, Fleury reaches Martinique, where his men will be warmly received and recuperate over the next several months thanks to Carib hospitality. In order to proceed, they will repair a 25-ton bark brought with their ship. During their sojourn, the Frenchmen will also be visited by the rovers Jean de Montreuil and Georges de Naguet, Sieur de Saint-Georges.

HOLLAND'S "GREAT DESIGN" (1613–1649)

One of the few nations to rise above the destructive cycle of the Thirty Years' War will be the Netherlands, which emerges as the world's greatest maritime power during the first half of the 17th century. The seven united provinces of Holland, Zeeland, Utrecht, Gelderland, Overijssel, Groningen, and Friesland have already won their independence from Spain by compelling Madrid to sign the Twelve Years' Truce in the spring of 1609. Now, Dutch overseas ambitions also rise, their vessels arriving in the New World in ever-increasing numbers, their merchants proving themselves tenacious and resourceful traders, anxious to acquire ever more outlets.

Eventually, this commercial interest persuades the Dutch to allow their truce with the joint kingdoms of Spain and Portugal to lapse on March 31, 1621, officially resuming hostilities the next day. Both sides have grown increasingly restive under this arrangement, the Dutch wishing to develop the lucrative American market (which they realize Madrid will oppose), while also fearing the Spanish armies massed in the neighboring Palatinate under marshals Ambrosio de Spinola and Johann Tzerclaes, Graf von Tilly. Therefore, both for strategic and philosophical reasons, the Dutch opt to intervene in the Thirty Years' War on the Protestant side.

This decision will have profound effects in the New World, as Dutch expeditions begin crossing the Atlantic to attack Spanish traffic and conquer new colonies. These efforts are greatly abetted by the West-Indische Compagnie or "West Indian Company" (abbreviated as the WIC), created in May 1621 to inflict losses upon Spain, while at the same time seeking commercial gain.

SPRING 1613. Some 50 Zeelander colonists found a private settlement called Nieuw Nickerie up the Corantin River (the modern boundary between Guyana and Suriname) and erect a stronghouse armed with two brass pieces and four swivel-guns; they also plant tobacco crops. That same June, Lt. Gov. Antonio de Mújica Buitrón of Santo Tomé de la Guayana in eastern Venezuela, while sailing along the Wild Coast, learns of the presence of these interlopers and requests assistance from the island of Trinidad to help expunge this outpost.

Twelve Spaniards consequently depart Trinidad late in August under the 32-year-old captain Melchor Cortés, taking two months to reach the Vauruma River mouth, where they await the arrival from Santo Tomé of 34 more musketeers and 300 native auxiliaries under Mújica Buitrón. Once united, the Spanish force paddles for another two months through jungly wilderness until at last they disembark a mile from the Dutch base on the Corantin, creeping upon its sleeping lodgment at night. Upon being detected, an exchange of shots rings out, and the Spaniards call upon its defenders to surrender. When the Dutch refuse, the attackers ignite the lodgement's palm-thatched roof, and everyone inside perishes in the flames. The Spaniards then gather up much booty and two prisoners from a nearby plantation and burn two boats and all the tobacco fields before returning into Trinidad and Santo Tomé by mid-February 1614.

Despite their victory, Spanish reports indicate that the Dutch still maintain "three or four more settlements, very flourishing, from which they derive many benefits and very great profit" along the Wild Coast. The Spanish also report various English outposts as well.

DECEMBER 13, 1614. At dawn, the 600-ton flagship Groote Zon under the master Reinier Janszoon, the 500-ton vice-flagship Groote Maan under the master Reinier Lambrechtszoon, the smaller Æolus of Zeeland and Morgenster of Rotterdam, plus the yachts Jager and Meeuw or Meeuwte of Amsterdam appear off Brazil under the veteran explorer of the East Indies, 46-year-old Commo. Joris van Spilbergen. His orders are to penetrate the Strait of Magellan, reconnoiter Spain's American empire, then cross the Pacific in the wake of the Acapulco-Manila galleons to link up with new Dutch trading outposts in the Moluccas.

One week later, his formation drops anchor before Rio de Janeiro Bay, spending almost a month refreshing provisions from among its uninhabited Jaguanon and Itacuruçá islands, while the 700–750 Dutch crewmen tend to their sick. On December 30, a watering party that ventures up the Guandu River to Marambaia Bay is captured by 300 native irregulars sent from São Barnabé by the regional governor, Martim de Sá, while two of the Meeuw's seamen are executed for mutiny on January 6, 1615.

JANUARY 15, 1615. Van Spilbergen's expedition sets sail from Rio de Janeiro Bay and three days later arrives near Santos to trade. Fighting erupts here on January 20 against Portuguese militia contingents marched across from São Paulo by Amador Bueno da Ribeira and Lourenço Castanho Taques, who place their forces under the command of the regional capitão-mor, Paulo da Rocha Siqueira. The defenders install artillery into Fort Santo Amaro and along Embaré Beach, and after four Dutchmen are injured attempting a disembarkation, van Spilbergen retaliates by burning the church at Nossa Senhora das Naus and the nearby sugar mill of Jerônimo Leitão, as well as intercepting a bark on January 26 as it arrives from Rio de Janeiro. By February 4, van Spilbergen gets under way again for the Strait of Magellan.

SPRING 1615. A group of 280 Dutch colonists under Theodore Claessen of Amsterdam arrives aboard two small ships to initially settle in the vicinity of what will later become known as Cayenne (the modern capital of French Guiana) before transferring into Suriname shortly thereafter.

APRIL 16, 1615. Van Spilbergen Enters the Pacific. After beating against contrary winds, this Dutch squadron—except the Meeuw, which has mutinied and parted company under Gerard Hermanszoon to return toward Europe—emerges into the Pacific and begins working its way up the South American coastline. Because of the Twelve Years' Truce, its progression is a blend of aggressiveness and good will;

in some places, the Dutch fight pitched battles against the Spaniards, in others they trade peaceably with local residents. By May 29, van Spilbergen's five vessels arrive between Punta Lavapié (Chile) and Santa María Island. After a guarded reception from the Spanish residents at this latter place, hostilities erupt two days later when van Spilbergen leads three companies of soldiers and sailors ashore at dawn to sack the town. Four Spaniards are killed, and two Dutchmen wounded.

Getting under way again on June 1, van Spilbergen enters Valparaíso 11 days later at sunup, prompting the Spaniards to scuttle their lone merchantman while firing upon the advancing Dutch boats. Van Spilbergen forges ashore with 200 troops, but the Spanish militia cavalymen melt away, obliging the Dutch to reembark that evening and proceed farther north. After watering at Quintero from June 13–17, the commodore continues slowly, arriving opposite San Vicente de Cañete (Peru) one month later, to a hostile reception from its fortified militia.

JULY 17, 1615. Cañete. The 44-year-old Peruvian viceroy Juan Manuel de Mendoza y Luna, 3rd Marqués de Montesclaros and Knight Grand Cross of the Order of Santiago—alarmed by van Spilbergen’s progression up South America—has earlier dispatched four men-of-war and a hired storeship under his nephew Rodrigo de Mendoza, Knight of the Order of Santiago (plus the veteran vice admiral Pedro Fernández del Pulgar), to intercept these intruders; however, this formation probes as far south as Valdivia and reverses course without sighting the Dutch.

The viceroy therefore dispatches Peru’s annual bullion shipment toward Panama aboard the 32-gun, 400-ton San José and the 20-gun, 250-ton Nuestra Señora de la Visitación (formerly Hawkins’s Dainty), leaving only two men-of-war at Callao. When word subsequently arrives that van Spilbergen is at Cañete, the Spaniards must sortie with their 600-ton flagship Jesús María—pierced for 30 guns but only mounting 22—and manned by 400 men under Captain Delgado, plus the 350-ton vice-flagship Santa Ana—pierced for 30 but bearing just 12 cannon—manned by 200 men under Captain Bustinza. This small force is supplemented by the private merchantmen Carmen of Captain Coba, with 8 guns and 150 men; the San Diego of Capt. Juan de Nájera, with no guns and 80 men; the Santiago of maestre de campo Pedraza, with 4 swivels and 80 men; and the auxiliary Rosario of Capt. Juan de Alberdín, with 50 men. Overall command is held by the viceroy’s nephew de Mendoza, with Fernández del Pulgar as his vice admiral and maestre de campo Diego de Sarabia as third-in-command.

The Spaniards exit Callao at dawn of July 17, coming upon the enemy squadron at 4:00 p.m., 15 miles off Cañete in a light breeze (having scuttled a coastal trader and the shallop of Juan Bautista González, which they intercepted arriving from Arica). Although advised to engage the next day, de Mendoza closes with van Spilbergen that same evening, his Jesús María accompanied by the vice-flagship Santa Ana and the tender Rosario. Around 9:00–10:00 p.m., the five Dutch ships hoist lanterns and fire a blank signal-gun to call for a parley, yet after a brief exchange of hails, de Mendoza replies with two shotted guns, and the battle is joined. Several hours’ gunplay ensues, during which the Rosario is sunk (Captain de Alberdín and a few other survivors being rescued by the Jesús María), while all the combatants receive damage, because scanty winds prevent them from maneuvering out of harm’s way.

The next morning—Saturday, July 18—the action resumes, and after another prolonged exchange, the Spanish flagship staggers out of the engagement with 60 dead and 80 wounded. Fighting now rages around Fernández del Pulgar’s vice-flagship Santa Ana, which resists until 8:00 p.m., when it surrenders and shortly thereafter plunges beneath the waves, a 12-man Dutch prize crew still aboard. Only a half-dozen survivors are plucked from the waters the next dawn (another 60 being left to their fate by the Dutch, among them a woman named Catalina de Erauso, dressed as a man and known to the Spaniards as the Monja Alférez or “Nun Ensign”). Van Spilbergen has suffered 40 killed and 48–60 wounded, principally aboard the Groote Maan and the Morgenster. On July 20, he appears off Callao to exchange a few shots with its batteries, then coasts northward one week later with a small prize. Meanwhile, de Mendoza’s Jesús María—fearful of encountering the Dutch squadron—limps toward Pisco to deposit its wounded, then continues to Panama City for repairs.

AUGUST 8, 1615. After refreshing at Huarmey (Peru), van Spilbergen appears off Paita this evening, disembarking four companies—300 musketeers—the next morning to forage for provisions. Paita’s defenders are commanded by Paula Piraldo, wife of the absent Piura corregidor Juan de Andrade y Colmenero; their sole defensework is a trench parallel to the beach, which the Dutch probe at the cost of one ensign killed and three soldiers wounded before retiring to their waiting ships. On the morning of August 10, van Spilbergen sends greater numbers ashore to resume his attack, supported by close bombardment from the Æolus, the Morgenster, and the Jager. Outnumbered and outflanked, the Spanish flee to an adjacent hill, watching as the raiders ransack and burn Paita. The Dutch then remain at anchor for another fortnight.

OCTOBER 10, 1615. This evening, van Spilbergen’s squadron arrives outside Acapulco, hoping to stand in the next day. Light winds slow their entry until the afternoon, when the Spanish battery inside opens up a desultory fire. Rather than reply, the Dutch commodore sends a boat inshore under a flag of truce, requesting permission to buy supplies. The surprised Spanish governor Gregorio de Porres agrees, and van Spilbergen’s crews spend a week refreshing and visiting ashore.

The rovers eventually depart on October 18, prowling farther up the Mexican coast toward California in hopes of intercepting the Manila galleon. They capture a small Spanish pearling frigate on October 26 and skirmish with Mexican militiamen at Salagua Bay on the morning of November 11, while attempting to forage ashore. Discouraged and tired, van Spilbergen gives up his watch on November 20, steering out across the Pacific.

DECEMBER 6, 1615. At daybreak, the 220-ton Eendracht of 19 guns and 12 swivels, manned by 65 men under Capt. Willem Corneliszoon Schouten of Hoorn, and the 110-ton yacht Hoorn of 8 guns, 4 swivels, and 22 sailors, under his brother Jan Corneliszoon Schouten, reach the Atlantic coast of South America. This Dutch expedition's leader is Jacob le Maire of Amsterdam, who—because both the Strait of Magellan and Cape of Good Hope are claimed by competing Dutch monopolies, thereby barring all other firms from commercial access to Asia—has been commissioned to discover a third passage into the Pacific. The next midday, the Eendracht and the Hoorn anchor in Olivier van Noort's former haven of Puerto Deseado (Argentina), refreshing for more than a month before striking out on January 13, 1616, to sail around Tierra del Fuego. By January 26, they reach a latitude of 57° S, successfully passing an island they name "Cape Hoorn" and entering the Pacific via this new route. Le Maire reaches the Juan Fernández Islands by March 1, pausing briefly before continuing out into the central Pacific toward New Guinea.

DECEMBER 25, 1615. Having successfully eradicated the French settlements around São Luis de Maranhão (see "October 31, 1615" entry in "Early Footholds"), the newly designated capitão-mor or senior commander Francisco Caldeira Castelo Branco sets sail to extend Portuguese control still farther westward, into the Amazon Delta. He departs São Luis with 150 troops in three companies distributed among the flagship Santa Maria de Candelária, piloted by Antônio Vicente Cochado and the veteran French explorer Charles des Vaux (see "July 26, 1612" entry in "Early Footholds"); the Santa Maria de Graça of Capt. Álvaro Neto, piloted by Pedro Favela; and the auxiliary Assunção of Lt. Pedro de Freitas, piloted by Fr. Manoel Figueira de Mendonça.

Arriving off the Pará River mouth, this trio of vessels pushes 86 miles up the river until they come within sight of a point of land called Mauri, at the confluence of the Guamá River, overlooking a 20-mile-wide estuary called Guajurá Bay, whose anchorage is partially sheltered from the powerful tidal bore sweeping upriver by several islands. Caldeira Castelo Branco steps ashore on January 12, 1616, being greeted by the local Tupinambá chieftains Guaimiaba, Acayaçu, and Marauaçu, and a midday Mass is celebrated. The next day, the Portuguese, under the direction of their engineer, Francisco de Frias, begin construction of a stockade that is initially dubbed Fort São José but later renamed Fort Presépio in honor of their departure on Christmas Day (and eventually evolves into modern Castelo do Santo Cristo). A Carmelite chapel and thatched-roof dwellings for the troops are added, the city of Nossa Senhora Santa Maria de Belém do Grão-Pará thus being officially constituted (becoming known more simply as Belém).

On March 7, 1616, the 30-year-old ensign Pedro Teixeira is sent eastward from this outpost with a small detachment of troops and natives to discover a new overland route and to report to the regional captain general de Moura. After a grueling two-month trek through steamy jungles, beset by hostile Tupinambá ambushes, Teixeira staggers into São Luis, where he is promoted to lieutenant. He then sails back to Belém aboard the vessel Estarreja with reinforcements: 30 harquebusiers under Salvador de Melo.

SPRING 1616. The Zeeland ship Goude Haan of Pieter Adriaanszoon Ita arrives on South America's Wild Coast, depositing 150 Dutch settlers at the Ginipape River who build a fort and remain there for six years, bartering for tobacco with the natives.

Also in the spring of 1616, another two Zeeland ships and a smaller auxiliary under Aert Adriaanszoon Groenewegen—confusingly rendered as "Cromwegle" by the English, and "Llanes" or "Yanes" by the Spanish—sail up the Essequibo River to re-occupy Fort Ter Hooze (see "Spring 1596" entry in "Elizabethan Wars"). Finding it abandoned by the Portuguese, Groenewegen builds a new fort called Kijkoveral (literally, "See Overall") on the same site. An experienced South American hand, having previously served the Spaniards as a factor on the Orinoco River, the Catholic Groenewegen establishes excellent relations with the regional natives by marrying a chieftain's daughter, thereby helping his establishment to flourish until his death on August 19, 1664.

AUGUST 7, 1616. Learning of a Dutch ship anchored at the Xingu confluence in the Amazon Delta, Lieutenant Teixeira and Ens. Gaspar de Freitas are sent from Belém with two canoes, capturing this interloper two nights later after a fierce nocturnal struggle that only a single Dutchman survives. The prize is burned after removing its guns, which are brought back to be installed in Fort Presépio, and Teixeira is promoted to captain.

JANUARY 7, 1619. Disillusioned by heavy-handed Portuguese occupation, the Tupinambá chief Guaimiaba leads a tribal uprising at Belém (Brazil), unsuccessfully storming Fort Presépio. Some 1,500 natives are massacred, and their power is broken.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1619. At Belém, the unpopular new capitão-mor Matias de Albuquerque—in office scarcely seven months following the death of his father Jerônimo—is deposed and replaced by a junta comprising Fr. Antônio Marciano, as well as captains Custódio Valente and Teixeira. With the departure of these first two members the next year, Teixeira remains as de facto governor until the arrival of the newly appointed capitão-mor Bento Maciel Parente on June 18, 1621.

FEBRUARY 1620. After painstakingly constructing a bark on the island of Martinique, the Huguenot privateer Fleury and 30 of his crewmen join the Dutch privateer Hendrick Jacobszoon Lucifer and the Englishman Arthur Guy, prowling along the northern coast of Santo Domingo with their two large ships. They then circle around to careen their vessels at Les Cayemites, near the abandoned Spanish town of La Yaguana (modern Léogâne, Haiti), purchasing cured beef and hides from the few Carib or runaway black residents that they find living ashore.

APRIL 1620. Refreshed, Lucifer and his colleagues disperse from Léogâne (Haiti), Guy and Fleury pushing into the Gulf of Mexico to eventually capture seven coastal frigates off the coast of Campeche before returning toward Europe. Fleury will touch at Florida, Newfoundland, and Ireland before regaining Dieppe on September 10.

JANUARY 2, 1621. After a lengthy pursuit, two Spanish caravels under captains Martín Vázquez de Montiel and Benito Arias Montano—patrolling on orders from Capt. Gen. Juan de Borja of Cartagena—overtake a Dutch, an English, and two French ships off Tortuga Island (Haiti), capturing three of them and slaughtering 300 crew members at a cost of 5 Spanish dead and 25 wounded.

Dutch West India Company

The Dutch West India Company (WIC) was modeled on the successful VOC or Vereenigde Oostindische Compagnie ("United East India Company"), formed in 1602. Prior to its creation, Dutch traders usually operated alone. Sometimes, investors at a single seaport might pool their resources, but all others were seen as competitors. Conflicts could arise, and profits would be withdrawn at the end of any given voyage. To improve on these local efforts, the States-General encouraged the formation of one large company. The VOC was created with contributions from six major seaports and was granted a monopoly over all Far Eastern trade. A board directed operations and managed a common pool of funds. Stocks were sold to shareholders, and privateering licenses were issued to fight Portuguese and English rivals.

As soon as the Twelve Years' Truce lapsed with Spain and Portugal on March 31, 1621, the States-General moved to create a similar West-Indische Compagnie or "West India Company." This WIC comprised five Kamers or "Chambers." Eight members were chosen from Amsterdam, five from Zeeland, two from Maeze, plus one each from the Stad en Landen and the Noorderkwartier centered on Hoorn, Enkhuizen, and Medemblik. Its directors became known as the Heren XIX or "Nineteen Lords."

When the WIC was chartered on June 3, 1621, its monopoly included all of the Americas from Newfoundland to the Strait of Magellan, plus the West African coast from the Tropic of Cancer to the Cape of Good Hope.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1621. A lookout atop Mount Maurica advises Gov. Diego de Arroyo y Daza of Nueva Andalucía at Cumaná (Venezuela) that a half-dozen Dutch vessels are anchored at the nearby Ancón de Refriegas, intending to take on water before proceeding into the Araya pans to gather salt. The governor, a veteran of numerous European and Atlantic campaigns, sends Capt. Pedro Merchan down the Bordonos River with 46 harquebusiers and musketeers to ambush any Dutch watering parties. Undaunted, the poachers nonetheless establish a six-gun shore camp on the edge of the Araya pans to protect their salting operations against any surprise attack. Five days after they have withdrawn, Governor de Arroyo visits the site with 30 harquebusiers and native archers aboard four piraguas, ordering that the abandoned Dutch emplacement be razed and examining more than 20 graves that the interlopers have left behind (the deaths mostly due to disease).

While thus engaged, the governor learns that another 10 Dutch ships have been sighted, so he returns to Cumaná and dispatches sargento mayor Juan Rangel de Serpa down the Bordonos River with 50 harquebusiers and musketeers to prevent this second band of intruders from watering. Three or four days afterward, a trio of Dutch ships anchors off the mouth of that river and attempts to send boats inshore, but Spanish fire causes them to cut their cables and slip away under cover of darkness. A subsequent Dutch attempt to water two-dozen miles farther away at the mouth of the Santa Fe River is also repulsed by Captain Merchan with 25 men.

JANUARY 22, 1622. Two large Dutch merchantmen are sighted as they approach the Araya Peninsula to gather salt, so Governor de Arroyo hastens out of Cumaná with 40 Spanish militiamen and some native archers, who ambush the landing parties—killing 13 interlopers and capturing 9. However, when another 27 Dutch sail appear the next day and set almost 500 men ashore, erecting two small redoubts of five and three cannon apiece, as well as a five-gun coastal emplacement, de Arroyo's 120 men are powerless to act and instead remain on the defensive at Cumaná.

MARCH 13, 1622. Madrid authorizes Governor de Arroyo to begin construction of a new coastal keep to impede Dutch access to the Araya salt pans.

NOVEMBER 24, 1622. Two Dutch ships appear off Araya to poach salt, so Governor de Arroyo dispatches a band of militiamen under Lt. Juan de Vargas Machuca to ambush any parties who come ashore. However, more than 40 other Dutch vessels join three days afterward, followed by 15 more on December 2; they together disgorge more than 1,000 men and begin to gather salt, while simultaneously mounting a joint land-sea assault against the Spanish fortification being erected by de Arroyo at Ancón de Refriegas. Over the next three days, the interlopers cannonade the Spanish entrenchments and test its defenses, but after suffering several fatalities, the Dutch break off their attack and reembark two weeks later, running the gauntlet of the Spanish fort's artillery to escape back out to sea.

JANUARY 11, 1623. Some 41 Dutch merchantmen reappear off Araya, landing men and the next day commencing a combined land-sea assault against the fort being erected by Governor de Arroyo at Ancón de Refriegas. Failing to dislodge its defenders, the interlopers shift two days later to another disembarkation point five miles away on the far side of the bay, disgorging several hundred men who begin gathering salt under the protection of a screen of harquebusiers. De Arroyo—his garrison now reinforced from Margarita Island by a company of Spanish soldiers and native archers under Capt. Jorge Gómez—dispatches 50 men to harry these poachers, eventually succeeding in driving them away in discouragement on January 24. When another seven Dutch ships appear in two flotillas a few days afterward, they do not attempt any disembarkation.

MAY 20, 1623. The Portuguese naval captain Luís Aranha de Vasconcelos reaches Belém (Brazil) from Lisbon and Pernambuco with a dozen soldiers aboard his 8-gun, 60-ton caravel, accompanied by other reinforcements from São Luís do Maranhão aboard a launch, to spearhead a joint expedition with Capt. Pedro Teixeira, which is aimed at pushing foreign settlers out of the nearby Amazon Delta. With a total of 70 Portuguese and 400 native allies crammed aboard the caravel, launch, and 40 canoes, Aranha de Vasconcelos sets out again on June 11, circling northwestward around Joannes Island to surprise the twin Dutch outposts called Forts Oranje and Nassau, situated southeast of the Xingu River mouth, five days later. The victors subsequently retire with 36 Dutch captives, plus 100 local Indians and Angolan slaves; meanwhile, Belém's senior commander Bento Maciel Parente arrives off the delta with yet another force.

This second Portuguese expedition gradually sweeps over Tucujus Island and along the Amazon's western shoreline toward the English settlement at the Okiari River confluence—established three years previously by Roger North's Amazon Company—where the surviving Dutch, English, and Irish residents rally under captains Ita of Flushing and Charles Parker. On August 22, Aranha de Vasconcelos returns with his caravel from depositing his prisoners at Belém, joining Maciel Parente at Sapanapoco. Both Portuguese contingents then attack the foreigners at Okiari, failing to overwhelm Ita and Parker's combined units, despite compelling the former to torch his 2-gun, 32-man Dutch flagship when it runs aground.

Aranha de Vasconcelos concludes this campaign by standing away for Europe—being intercepted before arriving by two Moroccan vessels out of Salé, in concert with a Dutch warship—while Maciel Parente retires to Mariocai or Mariocay to build the 50-man Fort Santo Antônio do Gurupá atop the vestiges of the Dutch outpost on the eastern banks of the Amazon, before eventually regaining Belém.

FEBRUARY 27, 1624. “Nassau Fleet.” A Dutch squadron emerges around Cape Horn into the South Pacific, intent upon reconnoitering Spain’s American empire and possibly gaining a foothold in this region. This expedition has been assembled by Prince Maurice of Nassau, with financial backing from the Dutch East India Company and States-General, so it is commonly referred to as the “Nassau Fleet.” Its commanders are the 42-year-old Huguenot Jacques L’Hermite “the Younger” of Antwerp and 24-year-old Gheen Huygen Schapenham of Rotterdam.

After weathering a storm in the Le Maire Strait, during which a yacht and Portuguese prize sink, this formation proceeds up the South American coast out of sight of land, in hopes of intercepting the annual convoy bearing Peru’s silver toward Panama.

MARCH 15, 1624. After a seven-week transatlantic voyage, the Dutch privateer Pieter Schouten of Vlissingen arrives at Barbados, having been dispatched by the WIC to conduct an extensive Caribbean reconnaissance with the 24-gun Hoop of Capt. Willem Jacobszoon, the 14-gun Eendracht of Capt. Hillebrandt Janszoon, and the 8-gun yacht Trouwe of Capt. Hendrik Worst. Over the next three months, Schouten—a veteran of previous West Indian cruises—explores the Spanish mainland as far west as the Gulf of Maracaibo, plus all of Santo Domingo and southern Jamaica, gathering valuable intelligence and establishing friendly relations with local natives.

EARLY MAY 1624. The Dutch ship Nieuw Nederland arrives at Manhattan (New York) with 30 Protestant Walloon families to establish a colony under Gov. Cornelis Jacobszoon Mey. Only 8 of these individuals remain on the island, more than half the families choosing to continue up the Hudson River to found Fort Orange (Albany).

MAY 7, 1624. Callao Blockade. The “Nassau Fleet” is spotted bearing down upon Lima’s port, alarming its residents. The Spanish silver convoy—comprising the private galleon Santiago; the 400-ton, 32-gun San José, vice-flagship of the Armada del Mar del Sur or “South Sea Fleet”; and the 16-gun San Felipe y Santiago—has departed Callao for Panama four days previously, bearing 8 million pesos in treasure. The only men-of-war left on station are the damaged, 900-ton armada flagship Nuestra Señora de Loreto—none of its 44 guns being mounted—plus the 150-ton, 8-gun auxiliary San Bartolomé. Hastily summoned from a bullfight only the previous day, the viceroy Diego Fernández de Córdoba, Marqués de Guadalcazar and Conde de las Posadas, has ordered every able-bodied militiaman called out.

Not realizing that they have already missed their chance at the bullion, several hundred Dutchmen attempt to disembark on the morning of May 9 between Márquez and Bocanegra beaches to march upon Lima, being discouraged by the waiting presence of three Peruvian infantry and two cavalry companies. The Spaniards meanwhile strengthen Callao’s defenses, so when the Dutch try to penetrate its harbor in boats two days later and set fire to some of its 40–45 anchored vessels, they find its garrison alert and are repelled with some losses. The attackers now settle down to blockade the port from offshore San Lorenzo Island, prompting the Spaniards to build a number of armed launches and floating batteries. Eventually, L’Hermite dies of disease on June 2, being succeeded by the more youthful and inexperienced Schapenham.

MAY 8, 1624. Capture of São Salvador. Adm. Jacob Willekens of Amsterdam and Vice Adm. Pieter Pieterszoon Heyn of Rotterdam materialize off Brazil with a large invasion fleet. The Amsterdam squadron consists of the 28-gun, 180-man, 300-ton flagship Hollandia; the 36-gun, 130-man, 300-ton Zeelandia; and the 20-gun, 89-man, 250-ton Provincie van Utrecht, each bearing 100 soldiers. The WIC contingent is comprised of the 20-gun, 40-man, 250-ton Eendracht; the 18-gun, 40-man, 250-ton Sint Christowfel; the 18-gun, 40-man, 200-ton Hoop; the 16-gun, 40-man, 190-ton Nassau; the 17-gun, 40-man, 240-ton Vier Heems Kinderen; a 16-gun, 40-man, 180-ton unnamed ship; the 16-gun, 40-man, 200-ton Overijssel; as well as the 18-gun, 40-man, 250-ton Haan, all of them carrying 50 soldiers apiece.

The Zeeland squadron is made up of the 26-gun, 100-man, 350-ton vice-flagship Tijger, with 150 soldiers aboard; the 18-gun, 50-man, 300-ton Gulden Zeepaard with 125 soldiers; and the 8-gun, 40-man, 60-ton Postpaard with 25 soldiers. The Rotterdam or Maeze squadron includes the 28-gun, 187-man, 240-ton Neptunus; the 20-gun, 93-man, 200-ton Oranjeboom; the 10-gun, 52-man, 70-ton yacht Zeejager; and the 10-gun, 41-man, 65-ton yacht Hazewind. The Noorderkwartier squadron from Hoorn is represented by the 34-gun, 110-man, 300-ton Sampson with 110 soldiers; as well as the 18-gun, 42-man, 300-ton Oude Roode Leeuw and the 14-gun, 42-man, 250-ton Oranjeboom bearing 50 soldiers each. The Stad en Landen squadron consists of the 24-gun, 98-man, 300-ton Groningen with 150 soldiers aboard; the 20-gun, 40-man Ster and 12-gun, 35-man, 120-ton yacht Vos, each carrying 50 soldiers; and the auxiliary Sint Martien.

The landing force is to be directed by the 38-year-old colonel Johan van Dorth, Lord of der Horst and Pesch, who is furthermore to assume office as governor of any newly conquered territories. This WIC expedition has been sent out to secure a permanent trading outpost in the New World, Brazil having been chosen because its Portuguese inhabitants are resentful of Spanish rule and have shown themselves to be friendly toward Dutch smugglers. Among the invaders is Dierick Ruyters, a captain captured by the Portuguese at Sergipe in 1618 and who spent two and a half years imprisoned at São Salvador—the capital city of Baía de Todos os Santos—before escaping.

The Spanish governor Diego de Mendoza Hurtado has had four months' advance warning of a possible invasion attempt, yet local concern has dissipated with the passage of time, so he can now muster only a token defense. São Salvador is protected by the octagonal, four-gun Fort San Antônio da Barra to its east and the four-gun Fort San Filipe to its west, while a temporary six-gun battery covers its beach and other guns dot its ramparts. Civilians begin fleeing into the interior, and the 3,000 Portuguese militiamen supposedly available to de Mendoza—mostly reluctant peasant levees and black slaves—either fail to muster or desert in droves. The Dutch fleet sweeps into the bay on May 9, dividing into two squadrons: one, comprising 16 ships under Heyn, anchors opposite the city and opens fire, while another of five ships proceeds toward San Antônio Beach—some distance from São Salvador's walls—to begin disembarking 1,500 troops. A land assault against the São Bento Gate is checked, but the seaward defenses are neutralized overnight by Heyn's efforts. The next morning, more than 1,000 Dutch soldiers begin circling above the city, dragging two fieldpieces and probing for a weak spot. As the Spanish governor is now left with only 60 loyal troops, the walls are soon breached, and at a cost of 50 Dutch casualties São Salvador is easily overrun and de Mendoza Hurtado captured.

Willekens and Heyn immediately install a new garrison, planning to leave the city under van Dorth, while they depart on further missions in accordance with their instructions from Holland. Four ships are therefore detached to carry news of this victory, as well as booty and de Mendoza Hurtado, to the Netherlands, while São Salvador's defenses are improved by the Dutch occupiers—by deepening its Tororó Moat between the São Bento and Carmo gates plus erecting additional ramparts—after which numerous Portuguese slaves are enticed to switch allegiance with promises of freedom and land.

Nevertheless, Brazilian resistance coalesces west of the city along the Vermelho River banks, so the hinterland remains hostile to the invaders—guerrilla warfare springing up at the urging of Bishop Marcos Teixeira, who has escaped from the capital. On July 17, van Dorth is killed near Água de Meninos by one such Tupinambá band under Francisco Padilha, while the Dutch commander is leading 200 men on a reconnaissance toward Fort São Felipe. His successor, Col. Albert Schouten, soon meets a similar fate. When Willekens finally departs for home on July 28, and Heyn sails for West Africa on August 5, São Salvador seems secure, its garrison enjoying improved defenses, three to four months' provisions, plus the promise of timely relief from Holland—yet morale is low.

Portuguese reinforcements under Francisco Nunes Marinho reach the besiegers overland by September, assuming military command from Bishop Teixeira, who dies of disease the next month.

JUNE 1624. In the Gulf of Mexico, Schouten raids and destroys Zilam and Sisal (Yucatán) before striking out toward Cuba and hovering off its approaches until August.

JUNE 6, 1624. Schapenham decides to detach two contingents from his squadron to raid other points along the Pacific coast, while his main body maintains its blockade of Callao. The first of these forces—the Mauritius and the Hoop, under Vice Adm. Jan Willemszoon—arrives undetected off Guayaquil, sweeping up three frigates, two brigantines, and four lesser craft in the estuary before falling upon the mainland towns of Guarmey, Cherrepe, and Santa Fe. Caught by surprise, local corregidor Diego de Portugal and his 200 ill-prepared militiamen can do little more than cover their civilians' flight. Having ransacked the dwellings, the Dutch retirement toward their boats is harried by Spanish riders, resulting in some losses. After plundering nearby Puná Island and burning most of his prizes, Willemszoon withdraws southeastward to rejoin the main body.

JUNE 11, 1624. Schapenham's other detachment—the Eendracht, the Koning David, the Griffioen, and the Hazewind, under Cornelis Jacobszoon—reaches Paracas to fall upon Pisco but enjoys less success as its boat parties are sighted before they can disembark, the initial landing being repulsed from the beaches by Capt. Diego de Carvajal y Vargas's 600 men. The next dawn, seven boatloads of Dutchmen slip ashore nearby and begin marching upon Pisco. Cavalry shadow their advance, and the attackers are unable to fight their way through Pisco's trenches, so they retreat back to their ships a few days later after losing five men, finally sailing away by June 15.

JULY 1624. Captain Janszoon's Eendracht, having become separated from Schouten's small formation, intercepts the annual pair of Honduran galleons off western Cuba's Cape San Antonio, capturing the San Juan Bautista of Francisco Hernández y Moreno. The exultant Janszoon begins towing his prize home, only to wreck his own ship on Florida's Dry Tortugas Bank shortly thereafter. Transferring aboard the galleon, he continues his voyage and eventually reaches Vlissingen on September 13, with a booty comprising 1,600 chests of sugar, 3,000 hides, a large amount of sasparilla, and several chests of silver.

AUGUST 5, 1624. Having forsaken his blockade of Callao, Schapenham attempts a second assault against Guayaquil with four ships and 600 men. They penetrate as far as the Ataranza shipyards before dawn and burn two brigantines upon the stocks, plus other vessels anchored close inshore. The ensuing conflagration helps illuminate the Dutch assault (while also consuming the Santo Domingo and San Agustín churches, plus many other wooden structures along the city waterfront); however, Schapenham's disembarkation is repelled in the streets by Ecuadorian militiamen under the city corregidor José Castro y Grijuela. Schapenham tries more disembarkations on August 25, again without success, and suffers 28 men taken captive. He then sails away toward New Spain.

OCTOBER 28, 1624. Schapenham's squadron makes its way into Acapulco Bay without opposition. The Spanish garrison commander, Pedro de Legorreta, is without ammunition and leaves the Dutch undisturbed for a week, after which time they depart northwestward in hopes of intercepting the annual Manila galleon. Failing to find it, Schapenham quits the Mexican coast a few weeks later, striking out across the Pacific.

DECEMBER 1624. Francisco de Moura reaches Baía de Todos os Santos (Brazil) as its new capitão-mor, inspiring the Portuguese besiegers of the Dutch garrison holding São Salvador with news that a counterexpedition will sail to their relief in the spring.

JANUARY 1625. The first full stone bastion is completed on the coastal keep that Governor de Arroyo is erecting at Ancón de Refriegas (Venezuela), and he christens the emergent edifice as Fort Santiago de Arroyo de Araya—later changed to Santiago de León de Araya.

MID-MARCH 1625. Lucifer's Zwarte Arend deposits a new Dutch colony—including 80 soldiers under Capt. Nicolas Oudaen—at Wiapoco (modern Oya-pock) in the Amazon Delta, followed a few weeks later by Geleyn van Stapels's 8-gun, 90-ton Vliegende Draak.

MARCH 29 (EASTER SATURDAY), 1625. Reconquest of São Salvador. A joint Hispano-Portuguese fleet appears off Padrão Point outside Baía de Todos os Santos (Brazil), comprising six squadrons. The Spanish Armada del Mar Océano includes the 55-gun, 120-man flagship Nuestra Señora del Pilar y Santiago with 368 soldiers on board; the 36-gun, 60-man

Fort Santiago de Araya

On July 22, 1619, King Philip III named Capt. Diego de Arroyo y Daza as his new governor for Nueva Andalucía, with headquarters at Cumaná (Venezuela). The son and grandson of Spanish military officers, de Arroyo had already served the Crown for 34 years. He had fought aboard galleons and galleys in Italy and on transatlantic voyages. A veteran officer was needed to deny the nearby Araya salt pans to Dutch interlopers. Within a year of assuming office as Cumaná's governor, de Arroyo reported that it was impossible to defend the pans without a coastal keep to guard the Ancón de Refriegas anchorage.

Madrid approved the construction of this new fort on March 13, 1622. A force of 100 Spanish troops would also be sent out, along with 10 guns and an artillery company supplied with powder and 500 cannonballs, to man its garrison. That same November, the royal ministers further instructed the military engineers Cristóbal de Rodas and Juan Bautista Antonelli to travel from Cartagena to choose the best site. On April 24, 1623, de Arroyo held a joint meeting with them and Gov. Andrés Rodríguez de Villegas of Margarita. It was decided to erect the new fort atop Daniel Hill. When work started under Antonelli, de Arroyo took part despite the scorching heat to set "an example for the rest."

Even during the earliest phases of its construction, the fort's position made Dutch access more difficult. Once its first stone bastion was completed in January 1625, the keep became nearly impregnable. The proud governor named it after himself, Fort Santiago de Arroyo de Araya. The next spring, he defended it so well against the Dutch fleet of Admiral Hendricksz that he was commended by the king. To offset his personal expenses, the Crown promised de Arroyo more than 2,000 ducats (although it appears he was never paid).

In the coming decades, more bastions were added and improvements made. Fort Santiago was damaged by an earthquake in 1684 and repaired. Then the Araya salt pans were flooded by a hurricane in 1725, rendering them useless. It wasn't until another governor of Cumaná, José Diguja, finally suggested, in 1761, that Fort Santiago be abandoned that its garrison was withdrawn. Its ramparts were blasted the next year.

and 60 soldiers; San Miguel (alias Turquillo or “Little Turk”) of 20 guns, 62 men, and 80 soldiers; Puerto Cristiano of 16 guns, 70 men, and 100 soldiers; and Esperanza of 18 guns, 70 men, and 80 soldiers.

The Spanish squadron from the Strait of Gibraltar consists of the 60-gun, 110-man vice-flagship Santiago de Oliste with 380 soldiers aboard; the 32-gun, 80-man Nuestra Señora del Rosario with 216 soldiers; the 26-gun, 80-man San Juan Bautista with 144 soldiers; the 20-gun, 70-man San Miguel with 150 soldiers; and the 20-gun, 60-man San Pablo with 200 soldiers.

The Biscayan squadron is made up of the 40-gun, 90-man San Juan Bautista with 319 soldiers aboard; the 24-gun, 60-man Santa Teresa with 338 soldiers; the 20-gun, 80-man San José with 124 soldiers; and the 22-gun, 60-man Nuestra Señora de la Atalaya with 210 soldiers.

The Spanish squadron from the Cuatro Villas or “Four Towns” is comprised of the 40-gun, 90-man Nuestra Señora de Atocha with 264 soldiers aboard; the 26-gun, 70-man Santa Ana la Real with 250 soldiers; the 20-gun, 60-man San Juan de la Veracruz with 220 soldiers; the 22-gun, 64-man San Pedro with 159 soldiers; the 24-gun, 55-man San Francisco with 348 soldiers; and the 22-gun, 65-man Santa Catalina with 210 soldiers.

The Spanish squadron from Naples includes the 60-gun, 120-man Concepción de la Siempre Virgen María with 415 soldiers aboard; the 54-gun, 80-man Nuestra Señora de la Anunciación with 352 soldiers; plus the tenders Carmen of 14 guns, 40 men, and 60 soldiers; and San Jorge of 16 guns, 46 men, and 70 soldiers.

The Portuguese squadron consists of the 60-gun, 150-man São Martinho with 390 soldiers aboard; the 30-gun, 128-man Santana with 338 soldiers; the 26-gun, 80-man São José with 256 soldiers; the 16-gun, 30-man São Pedro with 186 soldiers; the hired transports Sul Dourado of 18 guns and 40 men, with 140 soldiers; São Martinho of 12 guns and 16 men, with 196 soldiers; São João of 14 guns and 20 men, with 100 soldiers; São Luís of 12 guns and 30 men, with 108 soldiers; São António of 14 guns and 25 men, with 124 soldiers; São Roque of 16 guns and 20 men, with 110 soldiers; São Sebastião of 10 guns and 20 men, with 104 soldiers; São Bartolomeu of 12 guns and 16 men, with 136 soldiers; São Alberto of 14 guns and 20 men, with 154 soldiers; Caridade of 16 guns and 30 men, with 126 soldiers; Santa Isabel of 14 guns and 18 men, with 131 soldiers; São Mateus of 12 guns and 20 men, with 70 soldiers; Varejão of 10 guns and 20 men, with 180 soldiers; as well as São Estêvão of 12 guns and 16 men, with 154 soldiers; plus the storeships Cão Caçador of 14 guns, 26 men, and 60 soldiers; Grifo of 12 guns, 30 men, and 80 soldiers; and São João of 16 guns, 34 men, and 80 soldiers. There are furthermore five caravels, two Marseillan tartans, and four Biscayan pinnaces in company.

The entire fleet is under the command of the 45-year-old admiral Fadrique de Toledo y Osorio, Marqués de Villanueva de Valdueza and Knight of the Order of Santiago. His Spanish vice admiral is Juan Fajardo de Güevara, Knight of the Order of Calatrava, and his rear admiral is Martín de Vallecilla, Knight of the Order of Santiago. The Portuguese contingent is led by Adm. Manoel de Menezes, Knight of the Order of Cristo, while military forces are commanded by Pedro Rodríguez de Santiestéban, Marqués de Cropani and Knight of the Order of Calatrava, and seconded by the veteran sargento mayor Diego Ruiz. This huge formation is Madrid's response to the fall of São Salvador, which has been reported to the Spanish capital earlier than at The Hague.

Forming into a huge crescent on March 30 to prevent any escape out to sea, de Toledo anchors his fleet the next afternoon and lands 4,000 troops at São Antônio Beach, three miles outside the city, to join up with local guerrillas under Francisco de Moura and occupy the São Pedro high ground. The Dutch are forced back within their walls, warping their 18 ships beneath the protection of the water-front batteries. Siege batteries open fire on April 6, and a protracted bombardment ensues; the Spaniards drive sap-lines toward the Dutch ramparts, while the defenders launch sporadic counterattacks. During one of these sallies, maestre de campo Pedro Osorio and 71 Spanish officers and soldiers are killed and another 64 seriously wounded—yet the besiegers' progress continues unabated. One night, the Dutch also launch two fireships against the anchored Spanish fleet, without success. Heyn's squadron reappears from West Africa during the siege on April 18; however, the squadron is now reduced to only five ships and is powerless to assist the beleaguered garrison, so it stands away for Espírito Santo.

When the siege-lines finally reach São Salvador's moat on April 30, the Dutch request terms, and a capitulation is signed whereby 1,912 Dutch, English, German, and French defenders surrender to the Spaniards on May 9, being allowed to exit the next day with their baggage and personal weapons intact, to be transported back to Holland. The triumphant de Toledo enters the city and takes possession of 18 flags, 260 cannon, 500 quintales or “hundredweight” of gunpowder, 600 black slaves, plus considerable amounts of money and merchandise.

MAY 2, 1625. At Belém (Brazil), Governor Maciel Parente delegates the veteran captain Pedro Teixeira to attack Oudaen’s new Dutch outpost at Mandiutuba on the eastern bank of the Xingu River in the Amazon Delta with 50 soldiers and 700 native auxiliaries. After a stealthy approach, two Portuguese columns surprise the Dutch defenders at dawn on May 23 and slay seven or eight men, the survivors fleeing downriver that night in hope of uniting with English and Irish settlers at the Okiari River mouth.

Teixeira sets off in pursuit and overtakes some 80 foreigners in open country near the Felipe River on Tucujus Island, slaying 60 and capturing the rest, including Capt. James Purcell. Another 20-man stronghold some 40 miles away is also invested and surrenders without a fight.

MAY 22, 1625. Some 33 Dutch ships bear down upon Baía de Todos os Santos in two columns, being a belated relief force under Adm. Boudewijn Hendricksz and Vice Adm. Andries Veron. The Spanish commander de Toledo, having advance warning of their approach, is prepared to receive them. The population of the surrendered Dutch garrison is being held aboard 5 German storeships in the harbor, and all shore batteries are fully manned.

Six Spanish men-of-war exit, hoping to lure these latest Dutch arrivals into a murderous cross-fire. Hendricksz refuses to be drawn into the trap once he perceives the huge Spanish fleet anchored inside the bay, instead veering back out to sea. Spanish warships attempt a half-hearted pursuit, which ends abruptly when the galleon Santa Teresa runs aground. No further action is taken, the Dutch sailing away northeastward to refresh their supplies at Traição Bay in Pernambuco, leaving the Spaniards in uncontested possession of São Salvador. Both the Dutch and Spanish leaders are later criticized for not taking sufficient action—Hendricksz faulted for abandoning São Salvador without a fight, de Toledo, for suffering a major enemy fleet to roam unchallenged up Brazil’s coast.

When the Spanish admiral subsequently departs the city with his fleet, a 1,000-man Portuguese terço or “regiment” is left behind as a permanent garrison; and when the veteran mestre de campo Diogo Luíz de Oliveira arrives the next year as governor general for Brazil, he will continue to improve São Salvador’s defenses.

JULY 1625. Hendricksz implements the second part of his instructions by dividing his fleet and quitting Brazil. His vice admiral, Veron, heads toward Africa with a dozen sail, a convoy of prizes is detached for Holland, and Hendricksz himself steers his 18 remaining vessels northward on August 4 to assail the Puerto Rican capital of San Juan. He arrives at the island of Saint Vincent by late August, pausing two weeks to refresh and attend to his many sick, then continues his voyage—weathering a hurricane with the loss of the Geele Sonne before gaining Puerto Rico.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1625. Hendricksz’s Defeat. This afternoon, 17 Dutch ships bear down upon San Juan de Puerto Rico, whose Spanish governor—naval and military veteran Juan de Haro—has been in office less than a month. Nevertheless, he prepares to receive this enemy as best he can, sending his predecessor Juan de Vargas to nearby Boquerón with militiamen to hinder any landings in Escambrón Inlet.

Hendricksz, however, implements a much bolder plan: the next day at 1:00 p.m., the entire Dutch fleet—consisting of the Roode Leeuw, the Witte Leeuw, the Leyden, the Blauwe Leeuw, the Goude Valck, the Utrecht, the Nieuw Nederlandt, the Hoop van Dordrecht, the Kleyne Tijger, the Hoorn, the Medemblik, the Gouden Molen, the Vlissingen, the West Kappel, the Goude Sonne, the Koningin Hester, and the Jonas—sails directly into San Juan's harbor. They exchange shots with the harbor castle, inflicting superficial damage and slaying four Spaniards before gaining a safe anchorage within the roadstead off Puntilla Point, beyond the range of de Haro's artillery. However, shoals then prevent an immediate disembarkation by Dutch landing parties, allowing Spanish noncombatants time to flee inland, while the governor marshals his slender strength within San Felipe del Morro Citadel. Six additional bronze 12-pounders are installed in its embrasures, 330 men gathering inside (only 220 being effective, but with abundant supplies).

On September 26, Hendricksz leads 700–800 men ashore and occupies the empty city, plus its smaller Cañuela fortress two days later; yet the main citadel proves impossible to storm, so the Dutch begin digging sap-lines and installing a six-gun battery atop the Calvario heights by September 29. The next morning at 9:00 a.m., Hendricksz calls upon de Haro to surrender, which is rejected, so action resumes. Capt. Jan Jasperz de Laet of the West Kappel exits on October 1 to chase away a Spanish ship arriving with supplies. On the night of Friday, October 3–4, the Spaniards sally out of their citadel in two companies of 40 men apiece under captains Sebastián de Ávila and Andrés Botello, accomplishing little. But they enjoy better fortune at noon of October 5, when 50 men under Capt. Juan de Amezcuita y Quijano destroy the advance Dutch works, killing a captain, a sergeant, and eight sappers.

Guerrillas from the interior under Capt. Andrés Vázquez Botello de Carrera also begin plaguing the besiegers; on the night of October 5, they slay the Nieuw Nederlandt's captain and a 20-man boat party in the harbor, then 10 days later destroy another similar force up Bayamón River. By October 16, the guerrillas have grown so bold as to reconquer Cañuela fortress, using two launches and 30 men to kill two of its Dutch occupiers, capturing another 14. Faced with this increased pressure, Hendricksz finds himself trapped inside the harbor. He once more calls upon de Haro to capitulate on October 21, threatening to burn his city, yet is rebuffed.

San Juan is therefore put to the torch, and the Dutch reembark at 10:00 the next morning, hotly pursued by Puerto Rican units. The invaders must now run the gauntlet of Spanish artillery in order to escape, hesitating for a full fortnight before finally dashing past on November 2. The 30-gun, 450-ton Medemblik runs aground and is left behind for the exultant Spanish, Juan de Amezcuita boarding and extinguishing the slow fuse burning toward its magazine. De Haro is unable to savor this victory because a cannon explodes near him during these final exchanges, spraying him with two dozen fragments, which eventually cause his death.

Hendricksz, meanwhile, retires into San Francisco Bay for a month to recover from this setback. In addition to the lost Medemblik, numerous other Dutch vessels have sustained damage, and 200 men have perished (as opposed to 17 Spanish fatalities during the siege). Hendricksz nonetheless detaches his five best vessels on a privateering cruise toward Santo Domingo before attempting to lead his entire fleet west again in late November. Driven back by storms, he cruises south toward Margarita (Venezuela), despite advance warnings preceding him.

FEBRUARY 22, 1626. Hendricksz bears down upon Margarita's port of Pampatar, dividing his fleet so that one squadron approaches its fortress of Santiago de La Caranta and opens fire, while another deposits 500 men in nearby Lance de los Burros inlet. After an hour-and-a-half exchange, a chance Dutch shot explodes the fort's only bronze cannon, putting an end to stout Spanish opposition. Hendricksz's arrival overland with his landing party breaks the last of the defenders' will, forcing them to flee under Gov. Andrés Rodríguez de Villegas, after which this elevated keep is stripped of its ordinance and razed, along with the tiny town nearby.

Yet when the Dutch press on into the southern harbor of Puerto del Mar (modern Porlamar), two miles south of the island capital of Asunción, they are again checked by Spanish soldiers and native archers. Discouraged by this resistance, the shallow harbor approaches, and the island's poverty, Hendricksz withdraws in quest of better targets.

Over the next few weeks, he raids such minor places as Coche and Cubagua islands, Mochima, and Santa Fe, before his 16 warships materialize off Araya on March 4, leaving 4 at anchor off the partially completed Fort Santiago de Araya and a like number at the mouth of Cumaná's main harbor, while the remainder raid that island's coastal villages. Governor de Arroyo leads 30 troops from Fort Santiago to shadow the pillagers at Cumaná, killing 11, while his garrison at Araya under Lt. Juan de Arroyo also mounts a 25-man sally that slays 12 Dutchmen and captures 6. Hendricksz finally stands away from the Spanish Main on April 5, intercepting a frigate three days later bearing dispatches, then lays in a course for Bonaire.

APRIL 10 (EASTER SUNDAY), 1626. Hendricksz arrives at Bonaire, there rustling many sheep and gathering wood. The Dutch admiral now decides to attempt the third part of his instructions by attacking the Spanish plate fleet as it traverses the Gulf of Mexico between Veracruz and Havana. He begins working northwestward, timing his movements so as to arrive off Cuba by midsummer when the silver convoys traditionally depart. During this advance, his fleet splits into units of three to four vessels apiece, so as to sweep the Caribbean. Numerous captures are made, and in the Mona Passage, the Dutch are reinforced by two men-of-war under Lucifer, who has come north after provisioning a new small Zeeland colony in the Amazon. After rendezvousing off San Felipe Key near Isla de Pinos, the entire fleet rounds Cape San Antonio at the western tip of Cuba.

JUNE 14, 1626. At 8:00 on this Sunday morning, Hendricksz's 15 large and 8 small vessels enter the port of Cabañas in northwestern Cuba, encountering no resistance. Its few Spanish residents are supervising construction of a new galleon for Juan Pérez de Oporto and flee inland. The Dutch spend three days refurbishing their supplies before burning this half-built galleon and standing back out to sea.

JUNE 19, 1626. Hendricksz arrives before Havana and institutes a close blockade. The plate fleet has not yet appeared from Veracruz, yet Dutch hopes are dashed when their commander suddenly dies on July 2 from illness. His successor, Adriaen Claeszoon, is unable to maintain the weary fleet intact, most captains opting to return to Europe. After pausing at Matanzas to deposit more than 50 prisoners, refresh their provisions, and burn prizes they do not want, the Dutch disperse into the Florida Strait.

JULY 6, 1626. A fresh Dutch fleet arrives at Barbados, having been sent out to relieve Hendricksz. The recently promoted Heyn commands from aboard his 40-gun, 140-man, 300-ton flagship Amsterdam, bearing 64 soldiers. His vice admiral, Cornelis Claeszoon Oele, sails the 30-gun, 150-man, 280-ton vice-flagship Walcheren, with 25 soldiers. Rear Adm. Pieter Stoffelszoon van Eyken (Cromeijk) has the 20-gun, 107-man, 230-ton Neptunus, with 37 soldiers.

The rest of Heyn's ships consist of the 34-gun, 130-man, 300-ton Geldria of Jan Karstenszoon (Christiaenszoon), with 50 soldiers; the 33-gun, 152-man, 300-ton Oranjeboom of Gerrit Janszoon Eisens; the 30-gun, 134-man, 300-ton Hollandia of Jan Janszoon Zuyl and the 28-gun, 111-man, 170-ton Zutphen of Pieter Gerritszoon Roodt, each carrying 44 soldiers; the 28-gun, 119-man, 250-ton Gouden Leeuw of Hendrik Best, with 71 soldiers; and the 18-gun, 66-man, 100-ton Pinas of Laurens Simonszoon van der Graft. Also in company are the following yachts: the 12-gun, 60-man, 80-ton Arend under Claes Pieterszoon Wittebaerd; the 16-gun, 80-man, 70-ton Vos of Jan de Braam; the 14-gun, 58-man, 60-ton David of Thomas Cornelis Cond; the 5-gun, 14-man, 15-ton Raaf of Willem Joosten; and the 4-gun, 19-man, 15-man Spenver of Jan Coenraedszoon.

Heyn quickly resupplies, then sails to join Hendricksz off Cuba. In late August, he learns from a Spanish coaster taken near Cape San Antonio of the latter's death, then receives word that the Mexican plate fleet has already entered Havana. Heyn therefore takes up station off Florida's Dry Tortugas Bank in hopes of snaring some Spanish stragglers.

under Adm. Tomás de Larraspuru. Despite being tempted, the Dutch must suffer this rich Spanish convoy to pass. Frustrated, Heyn waters his ships at Cape Canaveral before striking out into the Atlantic to fulfill the next phase of his instructions: a descent upon Brazil. Contrary winds and currents force him to circle as far eastward as the Azores and Africa before finally steering back toward South America.

MARCH 1, 1627. Heyn at Salvador. The Dutch admiral appears off Brazil, and two days later his nine ships and five yachts stand boldly into Baía de Todos os Santos, where he anchors his flagship Amsterdam between the Portuguese flagship and vice-flagship of a 26-vessel convoy anchored under the protection of Salvador's city batteries. Within 10 minutes of launching his boats, both Portuguese galleons fall to Heyn, whose ships continue exchanging fire with the forts as Heyn's cohorts continue boarding and then removing 22 Iberian ships out of range by nightfall. Jan Zuyl's vice-flagship Hollandia is so riddled with shots during this action that 37 of its crewmen lie dead and another 77 are wounded,

Piet Heyn

Piet Pieterszoon Heijn was born on November 25, 1577, in the port of Delft, today part of Rotterdam. The modern spelling of his last name is "Heyn" or "Hein." He was the eldest of four sons of a herring-ship owner. Little is known about Heyn's early life beyond the fact that he went to sea as a teenager. He was captured by the Spaniards late in 1598 and toiled as a galley slave at Sluis until he was exchanged in 1602.

Heyn had been free for scarcely a year when he sailed to the West Indies in 1603 as master of the Kleine Neptunus and was again imprisoned at Havana. Two years later, the merchant Jan Gerritszoon Meerman learned of Heyn's fate while on a trading voyage to Cuba with his Wassende Maen and made it possible to secure Heyn's release by 1607.

Unfazed, Heyn shipped out from Texel on December 22, 1607, as a junior officer aboard the 600-ton Indiaman Hollandia. Its convoy rounded the Cape of Good Hope to Goa by September 18, 1608, and spent the next three years trading for spices in the Moluccas. Because of the death of his captain, Heyn assumed command of the Hollandia. He left Bantam with a rich cargo of cloves on October 13, 1611, and returned into Texel by July 19, 1612. Two months later, he married the wealthy widow Anneke Claesdochter de Reus at Rotterdam.

Now a prosperous merchant, Heyn bought his own ship and a fine home in Leuven by May 1614. Four years later, he sailed the Neptunus to Venice, only to be pressed into service in their war against Naples. Heyn sold his ship to the Venetians in 1621 to be able to return home overland. Through the influence of his wife's cousin, he was appointed the next year as one of three burgermeesters at Rotterdam. As such, Heyn also became involved in the WIC preparations for the war against Spain.

At a robust 45 years of age, he was named vice admiral for Rotterdam on November 2, 1623. A gifted seaman and veteran of war, Heyn was trusted by superiors and admired by his sailors, for he never lost the common touch. Although the WIC expedition against São Salvador was reversed, Heyn did well in its initial landing, as well as in the later blockading of the Portuguese slaving station of Luanda in West Africa. The WIC promoted him to full admiral and captain-general on March 28, 1626, sending him in relief of Hendricksz.

Heyn shone during this Brazilian campaign, yet achieved his greatest glory by intercepting the Mexican plate fleet in 1628. The next March, he was elevated to the highest rank of Lieutenant Admiral of Holland, with Maarten Tromp as his flag captain. But in a chance encounter with three Ostend privateers on June 17, 1629, Heyn was struck in the left shoulder by a cannonball and killed.

and it is abandoned and torched at midnight. Another 100 Dutchmen have been slain among the other ships, and Heyn himself is slightly wounded.

Nevertheless, their booty totals more than 2 million florins' worth of gold, silver, hides, tobacco, rare woods, cotton, and 2,500 chests of sugar. The Dutch fleet remains inside the bay for another 20 days before exiting out into the South Atlantic. Heyn's bold strike marks the beginning of a brilliant, summer-long privateering campaign during which he will terrorize the Brazilian coast and seize countless prizes, some of which are used to augment his own fleet.

MARCH 3, 1627. Having departed Zeeland on January 22, Lucifer arrives off the Amazon Delta with his 20-gun, 180-ton, 73-man flagship Ter Veere; the 20-gun, 200-ton, 69-man Leeuwine under Capt. Jan Pieterszoon; and the 14-gun, 90-ton, 42-man Vliegende Draak under Capt. Geleijn Stapels. Together, they are bearing Jan van Ryen and 35 colonists to reinforce the recently created WIC outpost at Wia-poco or Oyapock (see "Mid-March 1625" entry). Heavy weather prevents the vessels from reaching this site until four days later, only to find it abandoned.

Two ships are detached to locate some local Galibi Indians and discover what has happened. The vessels return the next day with two natives, who guide them to the nearest village. Its inhabitants flee, having attacked the original colonists when they tried to disembark nearby. The Dutch retrieve the only three survivors the next day.

A small new fort is erected, and van Ryen takes up residence with his colonists before Lucifer proceeds for Barbados. Native attacks will soon resume, and the Dutch will forsake this outpost before the year is out.

MARCH 25, 1627. Lucifer arrives at Barbados with his three ships. After refreshing, the Dutch touch at Grenada and Blanquilla Island before reaching the vicinity of La Guaira by late April. Lucifer helps an English ship, which is desperately short of supplies.

MAY 4, 1627. Lucifer's trio of vessels encounters the Dutch ships Kater and Bruijnvis, and they join forces. Six days later, they find a Spanish ship adrift. Having been plundered and abandoned by an English privateer, the Dutch strip it of a few useful items, then torch the remains.

Shortly thereafter, a Portuguese slaver is intercepted with 225 captives from West Africa. The Dutch claim 22 before letting the ship go.

MAY 26, 1627. Lucifer and his five ships sight Haiti; they hover off its coast for 15 days before deciding to split up to increase their chances of sighting a Spanish vessel. Three of the Dutch ships sail along the south coast of Jamaica, while the other two do the same along the south coast of Cuba. They meet again soon afterward.

A frigate out of Mexico is then captured off Cape San Antonio at the west end of Cuba, being relieved of 26 bales of silk and then added to the Dutch formation.

JUNE 10, 1627. Heyn penetrates into Baía de Todos os Santos once again, snapping up a few more vessels and two days later attacking a new Portuguese anchorage up the Pitanga River, defended by musketeers behind a parapet under Governor de Oliveira. The Dutch crews line their bulwarks with bundles of captured hides so that they are able to move within point-blank range and inflict numerous casualties—including the Portuguese captain Francisco Padilha—before withdrawing.

Heyn then dispatches four ships back to the Netherlands in July with booty. He finally quits Brazilian waters altogether by October, sailing home to a hero's welcome.

JULY 8, 1627. Lucifer's formation sights two large Spanish galleons from Honduras as they are approaching Havana. After catching up to them, the Kater and the Ter Veere attack the Spaniards opposite Cojimar, soon followed by Lucifer aboard the Leeuwinne. The Spanish galleons are so fast that the Dutch have difficulty closing, and their smaller vessels will make it hard to board. However, the Honduran almiranta or "vice-flagship" San Antonio of Capt. Miguel Ramírez lags behind, so its Spanish companion must slow down to help.

The Leeuwinne becomes caught between both galleons and suffers considerably before winning free. Grenades tossed aboard the San Antonio start a fire, though, therefore it is boarded and seized after a heated fight, during which Lucifer receives a wound. The prisoners are set aboard the Mexican prize and released, while the Dutch examine their booty: 1,404 chests of indigo, 4,280 hides, and assorted other items of merchandise. The Honduran flagship escapes and enters Havana on Monday, July 12.

By then, the Dutch are homeward bound across the Atlantic. Lucifer will die of his wound before his squadron can arrive on September 5. The value of his Honduran prize is so great that it will net the expedition's shareholders a profit of 1.2 million guilders. Lucifer's mulatto son Jacob Hendrickszoon Lucifer, a rover who will become better known among the Spaniards as "Diego the Mulatto," succeeds his father in command of the Ter Veere that December.

LATE JULY–EARLY AUGUST 1627. Lt. Diego Vázquez de Hinestrosa (also Hinostrosa or Hinostroza), commander of three Cuban coast-guard vessels and 150 men, guides some Honduran merchant ships into Havana through the Dutch blockade. Skirmishes are reportedly fought all the way from Cape San Antonio to the Cuban capital's entrance.

AUTUMN 1627. While homeward bound to Zeeland from Brazil, the Dutch captain Joachim Gitszoon touches at Tobago and discovers this island to be uninhabited. His report will inspire Jan de Moor, the burgemeester or "mayor" of the seaport of Vlissingen or "Flushing," to authorize Jacob Moersby or Maerszoon to establish a foothold there the next spring.

MARCH 15, 1628. The first of what is supposed to be a joint WIC fleet of a dozen men-of-war begins gathering off the Caribbean island of Saint Vincent, having departed from various ports around the Netherlands to unite under the veteran Admiral Ita to conduct a privateering sweep through the West Indies. The Zeeland contingent will comprise the 30-gun, 160-man, 280-ton flagship Walcheren under Capt. Jan Mast; the 16-gun, 79-man, 100-ton Leeuwin of Jan Pieterszoon; the 8-gun, 40-man, 30-ton Nordsterre of Cornelis Huygens; the 20-gun, 103-man, 160-ton Fortuin of Geleyn van Stapels; and the 8-gun, 46-man, 30-ton Zuidsterre of Adriaen Adriaenszoon. The Amsterdam squadron is supposed to consist of the 30-gun, 107-man, 130-ton Dolfijn; the 24-gun, 202-man, 250-ton Roode Leeuw of Albert Hendrikszoon; the 16-gun, 65-man, 90-ton Kater of Joachim Gitszoon; and the 18-gun, 86-man, 100-ton Pinas of Claes Franszoon de Vries. The Maeze or Rotterdam will contribute the 20-gun, 80-man, 100-ton Eendracht of Anthonius Corneliszoon Condé, while the Stad en Lande is to send the 18-gun, 74-man, 140-ton Vriessche Jager of Jan Braems. The auxiliary Cuba will complete the fleet.

Ita and Heyn's campaign through the Caribbean.

However, without waiting for all these vessels to assemble, Ita allows the first few to disperse and cruise independently through the Antilles before rendezvousing again at Cape Tiburón (southwestern Haiti).

LATE APRIL 1628. Having set sail from Vlissingen on March 3, the laggard ships Fortuin and Zuidsterre reach the island of Tobago, depositing 68 colonists under Jacob Moersby or Maerszoon to claim it as Nieuw Walcheren. A stronghold named Fort Vlissingen will soon be erected near modern Plymouth in Great Courland Bay, and the fledgling settlement will be reinforced by more than 100 settlers the next year, and again in 1632, eventually coming to total 200 permanent inhabitants—despite many deaths due to illness.

JUNE 4, 1628. Having captured four substantial Spanish prizes during their Antillean sweep, Ita's re-assembled squadron is overtaken at the Cape Tiburón rendezvous by the last ship Fortuin, and together they continue westward, contemplating an assault against Santiago de Cuba. This plan is discarded, though, after some Portuguese vessels are taken and reveal to the Dutch that a pair of rich Spanish treasure galleons is preparing to depart Honduras for Havana. Ita therefore rounds Cape San Antonio and takes up station off Florida's Dry Tortugas Bank, hoping to intercept.

JULY 12, 1628. Another powerful Dutch fleet arrives at Saint Vincent under 51-year-old Piet Heyn, now the WIC's senior admiral. This huge force (which includes some of Ita's missing ships) is also intended to intercept Spanish plate fleets before arriving in Havana. Heyn begins stealthily working his way westward, with stops only at Blanquilla Island and Isla de Pinos, refraining from any overt hostilities that might forewarn the Spaniards of his presence.

Ita's flotilla of small Dutch ships intercepting de la Cerda's pair of Honduran galleons near Havana. (Atlas van Stolk, Rotterdam)

AUGUST 1, 1628. Off Mariel, Ita's ships intercept a small Honduran patache or "tender" at dawn, learning that the 20-gun, 400-ton treasure galleons San Onofre and Santiago are following close astern, bound into Havana. The Spanish pair appears shortly thereafter, and the Dutch give chase. The galleons' commander, Álvaro de la Cerda—having been forewarned of these blockaders before departing—has reinforced his vessels with 100 additional musketeers under Ens. Juan de las Herrerías. Fleeing toward Havana, the Spaniards are overtaken around noon by Ita's faster ships, and a fight erupts when the tiny Leeuwin opens fire against the vice-flagship Santiago, while the Fortuin and the Dolfijn close in upon de la Cerda's flagship San Onofre.

Hard-pressed, the Spanish work close inshore by late afternoon and run aground on a sandbank two or three miles short of Havana's La Punta fortress in a desperate bid to at least save their cargoes. The Leeuwin also runs aground and, despite losing its mainmast, continues exchanging shots with both galleons, while the Fortuin and the Dolfijn sheer off and continue firing from a distance. Two Cuban coast-guard frigates and another smaller vessel—bearing a total of 180 men under the sargento mayor Diego Vázquez de Hinestrosa—sally from Havana, only to be driven back by Ita, whose Walcheren then bears down upon the stranded San Onofre.

Already wounded three times, de la Cerda orders his flagship set ablaze and abandoned by its crew, yet Ita's boarders manage to extinguish the flames and tow it off the sandbank with its indigo, ginger, silver, and hides still intact. The Kater, the Eendracht, and the Vriessche Jager also seize the grounded vice-flagship, yet the Santiago cannot be worked free, so it is stripped of booty before being torched. The triumphant Dutch then depart into the Florida Strait, having suffered 13 killed and about 50 wounded, mostly aboard the dead Pieterszoon's Leeuwin.

As their prize proves to be leaky, the victors empty the San Onofre on August 15 and set it ablaze a mile off the coast of Florida before proceeding toward the Netherlands with a haul worth 1.2 million guilders. Behind them, their dramatic attack and retirement from before Havana convinces many Spaniards ashore that Cuban waters are now safe—little realizing that on that same August 1, Heyn's much more powerful fleet has been sliding into position off the Dry Tortugas.

AUGUST 22, 1628. After three weeks out of sight of land, Heyn's fleet closes upon Havana and institutes a blockade, anticipating the arrival of a plate fleet. The Spanish governor—the mariscal de campo Lorenzo de Cabrera y Corvera, Knight of the Order of Santiago—attempts to send warnings across the Gulf of Mexico to the plate-fleet commander at Veracruz, but at least nine boats are either intercepted or arrive there too late. The Dutch, meanwhile, struggle to remain on station, being driven almost 60 miles east to the vicinity of Matanzas by the evening of September 7 due to contrary winds and currents.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1628. Capture of the Mexican Plate Fleet. Early this Friday morning, Heyn learns that one of his outlying ships has captured a Spanish vessel, which is an advance unit from an approaching bullion fleet. Veering northeastward, the Dutch admiral sights 12 more sail, capturing 9 of them over the course of the morning. Around noon, he spots another 9 or 10 vessels to the southeast, a half-dozen looming so large that they are doubtless the Spanish flagship and its consorts—the only ships authorized to carry bullion. In fact, they are the flagship Santa Ana María of Adm. Juan de Benavides y Bazán, Knight of the Order of Santiago, the vice-flagship Santa Gertrudis of Baltasar de Amezquita, plus the galleons San Juan Bautista of Alonso de Ayspuru and Nuestra Señora de la Antigua of Francisco Ortuño de Olano, as well as a couple of lesser craft. They have departed Veracruz a month previously, only to be scattered by a storm, which causes them to blunder past the proper longitude for Havana.

Heyn immediately orders a pursuit, his vice admiral Joost van Trappen (alias Banckert) hastening ahead of the Spaniards with nine sail to prevent any flight eastward, while Heyn's main body steers southwestward to cut off any retreat into Havana. Toward evening, the encircled Benavides leads his galleons into the open bay of Matanzas, hoping to make a stand inside until the king's bullion can be off-loaded. Unfortunately, his heavy galleons run aground on uncharted shoals inside the bay, their broadsides not bearing upon Matanzas's entrance. Panic spreads among the Spanish crews as numerous Dutch ships gather in the moonlight, firing upon the Spaniards' boats as they ply to and from shore. Discipline dissolves, and the four Spanish galleons and two smaller ships are boarded the next morning without a fight. More than 300 Spaniards die overnight, and another 600 are wounded, against negligible Dutch losses. Heyn takes a full year's Mexican silver shipment, plus countless private hoards. All captives are released ashore, while the Dutch occupy themselves over the next eight days transferring riches aboard their vessels for the return home. Eventually, all except the four large Spanish galleons and another prize are burned. Heyn weighs anchor from Matanzas by September 17.

(He and his vice admiral, Hendrick Corneliszoon Loncq, are given a joyous reception upon regaining Holland, the gross profits from their coup totaling 11.5 million guilders. Spain is plunged into a commensurate financial crisis by the loss of its entire Mexican fleet. Benavides and his second-in-command Juan de Leoz, Knight of the Order of Santiago, are court-martialed upon returning; the admiral is eventually executed in Seville on Thursday, May 18, 1634, while Leoz is banished to an African garrison for the remainder of his life.)

APRIL 1629. A mixed colonizing expedition of Dutch, Irish, English, and French settlers reaches the Amazon Delta from Holland, erecting a stockade known as Fort Tauregue (Forte Torrêgo to the Portuguese) on the banks of the Tareíú River, near the Maracapucu confluence. Some 40 Portuguese soldiers and 800 Indians under Capt. Pedro da Costa Favela are dispatched one month later out of Belém by Gov. Manuel de Sousa d'Eca, arriving to dig siege-trenches in June. The defenders under Capt. James Purcell resist successfully, though, obliging the Portuguese to withdraw into Fort Santo Antônio do Gurupá to recuperate and await reinforcements.

APRIL 1, 1629. A Dutch fleet under Adriaen Janszoon Pater arrives off Grenada, dividing into two smaller squadrons to raid Spanish America. Having once served three years as a galley slave at Cartagena (arrested for poaching salt at Araya by Adm. Luis de Fajardo), Pater bears the Spaniards little love. For more than two months, his contingents—reinforced by numerous foreign mercenaries living in the Antilles—roam unchecked, until a rendezvous of the fleet is effected off southwestern Cuba.

JUNE 1629. His command reunited and further augmented by two Zeeland ships, plus other reinforcements from Holland under Vice Adm. Jan Janszoon van Hoorn, Pater rounds Cape San Antonio and takes up station off Florida's Dry Tortugas Bank, in hopes of intercepting another treasure fleet. The Spaniards—fully aware that 26 Dutch ships are hovering near Havana—refuse to budge from Portobelo, Cartagena, or Veracruz. Nevertheless, this blockade helps deepen Spain's financial crisis by preventing any silver bullion from crossing the Atlantic this year.

SEPTEMBER 1629. Tired of blockading Havana, Pater sends nine ships and prizes home from the Bahamas while leading the remainder of his fleet southeast to Barbados, arriving by early November. He thereupon detaches van Hoorn to investigate conditions on Saint Kitts and Nevis following de Toledo's campaign (see "September 16, 1629," entry in "Other Colonial Struggles"), while he proceeds with his 20 other ships under the alternate vice admiral Maarten Thijssen to probe the nearby Orinoco.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1629. Having departed Belém on September 1, Teixeira appears a half mile from the new Anglo-Dutch outpost of Fort Tauregue, on the Tareíú River in the Amazon Delta, with 120 Portuguese soldiers and 1,600 native auxiliaries aboard 100 boats. After disembarking, they advance the next day, completely encircling the outnumbered garrison by September 30. Numerous sallies and counter-sallies ensue, until Purcell requests terms on October 17. Teixeira proves generous, and an armistice is arranged two days later, with the actual surrender to take place on October 22 and the interlopers being allowed to evacuate with their goods for Lisbon.

At the last moment, though, Purcell asks for a three-day extension, having secretly learned that a relief ship has arrived off the coast from Zeeland, accompanied by 100 new English colonists under William Clovell aboard the 90-ton Amazon of Capt. Francis Neville and the 50-ton Sea Nymph of the master John Ellinger. When the Portuguese also discover this fact, they immediately compel the 80 defenders to capitulate on October 25, razing their fort before withdrawing the next day into Fort Santo Antônio do Gurupá.

The Amazon and the Sea Nymph appear off this latter place on October 29 with a captured pinnace, suffering four men killed by native archers when they attempt a disembarkation, then stand away.

OCTOBER 18, 1629. Learning of projected Dutch invasion plans, a small reinforcement of 327 soldiers arrives from across the Atlantic at Olinda, capital of the Brazilian Captaincy of Pernambuco, followed a couple of months later by its 32-year-old native son Matias de Albuquerque Coelho, Knight of the Ordem de Cristo (and later Conde de Alegrete), who has been appointed by Madrid as "war superintendent" for Brazil's northern region.

DECEMBER 1629. It takes Pater and Thijssen three weeks to work up the Orinoco to Santo Tomé, which they attack with a landing force several hundred strong and with 14 siege-guns. Gov. Luis de Monsalve is absent (he is visiting the island of Trinidad), so Spanish resistance quickly collapses. The Dutch occupy this town for three days before disease and harassing counterattacks—which together will eventually claim 200 lives—compel them to torch its 100 shacks and return into the Caribbean to visit a like treatment upon Blanquilla Island, Bonaire, and Puerto Rico.

FEBRUARY 14, 1630. Pernambuco Occupation. A Dutch colonizing expedition of 52 ships and 15 sloops under Hendrick Loncq (Heyn's former vice admiral; see "September 8, 1628" entry) appears off Cape Santo Agostinho in the Brazilian province of Pernambuco, bearing a total of 1,170 guns, 3,780 sailors, and 3,500 soldiers under Col. Diedrick van Waerdenburgh. The next day, this host bears down upon the harbor of Recife below its capital city of Olinda, advance elements dueling against the two recently refurbished strongholds that guard the parallel reefs leading into its sheltered anchorage: an outer "sea fort" known as Forte São Francisco da Barra, nicknamed Picão, and the inner "land fort" called Forte São Jorge.

Having been forewarned eight days previously by a vessel arriving from Cape Verde of the approach of this Dutch force, Matias de Albuquerque successfully counters their initial bombardment by joining his gunners inside Forte São Jorge and preventing an immediate Dutch penetration into the bay. However, while the Portuguese defenders are thus distracted, 16 enemy ships sail still farther northward to Pau Amarelo Beach and disembark the bulk of van Waerdenburgh's invasion army; 3,000 soldiers advance in three regiments on the morning of February 16 down the coast toward Olinda (population 4,800). Albuquerque consequently hurries 850 men back into his threatened hilltop capital but is too late to check the enemy advance upon Olinda by manning the trenches that he has interposed at the Doce and Tapado river mouths.

Immediately upon gaining the heights outside the capital, Lt. Col. Adolph van Elst's vanguard regiment drives against Olinda's fortified Jesuit convent, while van Waerdenburgh's main body also carries Misericórdia Church atop Sé Height, despite heroic resistance from captains André Pereira Temudo and Salvador de Azevedo. The Portuguese will evaporate once it is learned that a few hundred more Dutch troops are also disembarking south of the city; Albuquerque is therefore compelled to retreat across the inner bay with his few-score regular troops into the tiny harbor town of Recife on Antônio Vaz Island, while his Brazilian militia volunteers and civilians flee inland. To deny entry to the enemy fleet, however, the Spanish governor scuttles eight ships in its narrow channel. After the Dutch ships unsuccessfully bombard both harbor forts again on February 18 and 19, a land column under van Waerdenburgh advances down the peninsula from Olinda to besiege Fort São Jorge. Its 37 defenders under Capt. Antonio Lima resist bravely until March 2, but upon their capitulation, the Dutch are able to move across the harbor the next day to take Recife without opposition, installing van Waerdenburgh as governor and optimistically renaming Pernambuco Nieuw Holland.

Albuquerque has meanwhile torched two-dozen anchored merchantmen, then retreated only three or four miles westward to begin construction on March 4 of a new stockaded, earthen, moated headquarters called Forte, or Arraial, do Bom Jesus—located atop a hillock on the banks of the Capibaribe River (in the modern Casa Amarela neighborhood of Recife's suburb of Torreões). From here, he hopes to organize a guerrilla campaign aimed at impeding a permanent Dutch occupation.

A thrust inland two weeks later by 2,000 Dutch troops is repulsed, as is a counterattack by Albuquerque against the Dutch enclave at Recife. Afterward, Recife's occupiers—now becoming diseased and worried about a possible Hispano-Portuguese counter-expedition out of Europe—decide on March 19 to concentrate all their strength around the anchorage, for van Waerdenburgh believes that the larger hill-top city of Olinda can "only be defended through great expense and a very considerable military force."

The Dutch therefore dig in at Recife, adding a new redoubt called Fort Bruijn or Brum on the Lingueta Peninsula. They also enclose the 20-year-old Franciscan convent of Santo Antônio on Antônio Vaz Island with a stockade, to become Fort Ernestus, and start a new pentagonal fort farther south that same autumn to guarantee access to the cacimbas or "water wells" on the mainland and prevent shallow-draught vessels from sneaking across Afogados Bar. (When completed, its moat being flooded with seawater in December 1630, this stronghold is christened Fort Frederik Hendrik in honor of the Prince of Orange, although it is soon nicknamed Vijfhoek or "Five-Point" by its Dutch garrison and Cinco Pontas by the Portuguese.) To resist river-borne descents out of the interior, a small water fort dubbed Fort Waerdenburgh is initiated at the confluence of the Capibaribe and Beberibe rivers, while lesser defenses are also scattered along both banks.

FEBRUARY 26, 1630. Pater's 20 sails descend upon Santa Marta (Colombia) at 3:00 this Tuesday afternoon, having learned from intercepted letters of its weakened condition. Their initial bombardment silences the Spaniards' only four bronze cannon and kills the ancient gunner, after which 1,000 Dutchmen disembark from 18 swivel-armed boats and overrun both this fortress and town within the next few hours. Spanish governor Gerónimo de Quero flees up the Mamatoco River with 50 loyal militiamen, leaving Santa Marta to its fate. Pater remains a week, wreaking much destruction—although allegedly sparing a few dwellings in exchange for a ransom of 5,500 reales, raised by the local clergy—before retiring out to sea on March 5.

Shortly thereafter, Pater sails for home in late April, despairing of further reinforcements reaching him from the Netherlands or of intercepting the Spanish treasure fleets. He arrives to a hero's welcome in June.

MAY 5, 1630. Six Dutch ships with 655 men quit Recife under Commo. Dierick Ruyters as belated reinforcement for Pater in the Caribbean, followed shortly thereafter by another eight with 545 men under Admiral Ita (leaving only 17 Dutch ships stationed at Pernambuco).

Both squadrons arrive in the Antilles to find Pater already departed, so they cruise independently. On August 17, they unite with a small fleet under Jan Gijsbertszoon Booneter, which has also been prowling the Caribbean, to blockade Havana. Learning of this deployment, the Spanish admiral de Larraspuru—commanding this year's Tierra Firme plate fleet—resorts to the extraordinary expedient of sailing his vessels directly out of the Caribbean via the Windward and Caicos passages rather than touch at Cuba. This gamble pays off when he reaches Spain safely with 7 million pesos in silver.

APRIL 14, 1631. Pater returns to the Americas, arriving at Recife with 17 ships to bolster its occupying garrison by almost 1,000 men. (Other vessels have earlier preceded him out of Holland under his vice admiral Thijssen.)

guerrillas who are bedeviling them by sending an expedition, under the recently promoted German-born colonel Sigmund von Schoppe and the 38-year-old Polish-born colonel Christoffel d'Artischau Arcisweski, 35 miles northward with 20–30 sail to land in the Captaincy of Itamaracá by May 22. Upon withdrawing from this raid a few days later, the Dutch decide to leave behind a small offshore citadel on the southern face of Santa Cruz Channel to impede Portuguese traffic. The engineer Pieter van Bueren designs a square, four-pointed fort of earthen ramparts and a wooden stockade, which is initially christened as Geduld or “Patience” and later renamed Fort Oranje. A garrison of 366 men is installed under Arcisweski.

Upon regaining Recife, Pater then allows seven or eight of his largest ships to cruise southward as far as Baía de Todos os Santos in search of prizes.

APRIL 17, 1631. A Dutch squadron materializes off Havana under Booneter, who maintains a close blockade until May 18, then stands away the next day to refresh provisions at Matanzas. He then steers out into the Florida Strait on June 4 for Holland.

APRIL 26, 1631. Commo. Jonathan de Neckere departs Recife to reinforce Booneter in the Caribbean with his 22-gun, 260-ton, 105-man flagship Domburg; the 16-gun, 180-ton, 60-man vice-flagship Otter under Cornelis Corneliszoon Jol; and the 12-gun, 120-ton, 50-man Phoenix under Reynier Pieterszoon. Jol, already a veteran of three previous New World cruises, is better known to the Dutch as Houtebeen or “Peg Leg”—the Spaniards calling him Pie de Palo—and he will further burnish his reputation during this forthcoming campaign.

De Neckere reaches Barbados by May 12, visits adjacent Saint Vincent, then arrives at Ile à Vache by mid-June, missing Booneter by three days (who has gone on ahead to blockade Havana). De Neckere therefore prowls south toward Santa Marta, taking several prizes. He then sails for Europe, leaving Jol to continue hunting independently.

JULY 10, 1631. Six piraguas arrive at Tortuga Island (also known as Salt Tortuga Island, Venezuela), disembarking 40 Spanish militiamen and 117 native auxiliaries under veteran captain Benito Arias Montano. They have been dispatched by Gov. Francisco Núñez Melián to chastise Dutch interlopers in these waters. After concealing themselves throughout the day, a small platoon under Pedro Lobera reconnoiters two Dutch merchantmen anchored offshore—one of 600 tons and 20 guns, the other of 300 tons and 6 guns—which have set landing parties ashore to load water and salt.

After nightfall, Arias divides his company in two, sending one contingent under his subordinate Felipe Gómez de León to ambush the Dutch shore parties, while he himself leads the remainder to attack the anchored vessels with boats. He approaches quite close before being discovered and carries the larger ship by storm, killing its captain, sailing master, quartermaster, and several crew members. Its smaller Dutch consort attempts to flee but is likewise subdued; Gómez de León also wins his encounter on land. The interlopers' huts are burned and their craft carried triumphantly into La Guaira by Arias six days later.

JULY 11, 1631. This night, a score of Hispano-Portuguese men-of-war and 35 transports under Adm. Antonio de Oquendo, Vice Adm. Francisco de Vallecilla, and Rear Adm. Nicolás de Massibradi begin entering Baía de Todos os Santos over the next couple of days, depositing 2,000 troop reinforcements conveyed from Lisbon. This fleet is to return shortly for Europe, escorting the homeward-bound Brazilian sugar convoy.

AUGUST 19, 1631. Word reaches Pater and the authorities at Recife of the arrival of de Oquendo's fleet farther to the south, so the Dutch admiral prepares to sortie when it reemerges on its homeward leg. Because of a shortage of crews, Pater does not actually quit port until August 31, then steers southward with only 18 ships, reinforced by troops from Recife's garrison.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1631. De Oquendo exits Baía de Todos os Santos with a combined Hispano-Portuguese fleet. They are protecting 10 unarmed Brazilian caravels bearing 1,200 troops under the veteran Neapolitan-born commander Giovanni Vincenzo de San Felice, Conde de Bagnuoli (often rendered as Bagnoli or Bagnuolo in the New World); 1,000 are intended to reinforce the resistance movement in Pernambuco, and 200 are for the Captaincy of Paraíba. The fleet is furthermore protecting 20 Lisbon-bound sugar merchantmen.

Standing away from the coast, this entire formation is driven southeastward by contrary winds and currents into the vicinity of the Abrolhos (a rocky agglomeration 200 miles off Brazil at a latitude

Admiral de Oquendo, about 1626, with the red sash and baton of a Spanish captain-general. (Museo Naval, Madrid)

At first light, he summons his captains for final instructions and then drinks a toast with Brunswick beer to their success. The Dutch bear down on faint east-northeasterly breezes against de Oquendo, who is six miles distant and has ordered his 17 Spanish and Portuguese galleons to interpose themselves in a half-moon crescent between the enemy formation and their own convoy. The Anunciada, the Buenaventura, the San Carlos, and the San Bartolomé lag astern.

Fighting erupts around midmorning when Vice Admiral de Vallecilla's San Antonio opens fire against Thijssen's advancing Geunieerde Provintien, which closes in along with the Provincie Utrecht to board. Ten or fifteen minutes later, de Oquendo's galleon and four others open fire against Pater's flagship, which steers directly toward the Santiago de Oliste, along with the Walcheren. The Dutch hold their opening broadsides until coming within point-blank range, then fire and grapple. A murderous engagement ensues around each flagship and vice-flagship, both sides firing repeatedly into their opponents yet proving unable to board. The smallest Portuguese

Antonio de Oquendo

Antonio de Oquendo de Zandátegui was born in the Guipuzcoan seaport of San Sebastián (Donostia) in October 1577. He was the second son, and third child out of six children, born to the recently promoted Spanish admiral Miguel de Oquendo de Segura. His father died 11 years later when his flagship exploded just as it was reentering his home port after the “Invincible Armada” campaign. Of 400 men aboard, only an African slave boy was thrown clear and survived.

Young Antonio apparently first went to sea in December 1593 to serve aboard Neapolitan galleys under Adm. Pedro de Toledo against the Turks in the Mediterranean. De Oquendo received his first commission in the Royal Spanish Navy on June 10, 1600, and the next year sailed under Adm. Luis Fajardo. De Oquendo first gained distinction by exiting Lisbon with his Dobladilla and Delfin de Escocia on July 15, 1604, to pursue some English privateers. He chased them down near Cadiz on August 7, capturing one and scattering the rest. This action earned him the thanks of Spain’s new monarch, King Philip III.

In June 1607, de Oquendo succeeded Martín de Bertendona as commander of the Vizcaya Squadron, a post his father had once held. (On appointing him, the king even agreed that de Oquendo’s formation should be renamed the “Guipúzcoa Squadron,” but because of protests from Biscay, it was changed to the “Cantabria Squadron.”) De Oquendo patrolled against Dutch threats to homeward-bound plate fleets. Then, four years later, he was entrusted with his first plate-fleet command. He departed Cadiz on July 31, 1611, to escort 36 merchantmen across to Veracruz with his two 600-ton galleons. A second crossing in 1613–1614 was rewarded with membership in the Order of Santiago.

But de Oquendo’s third transatlantic voyage proved more difficult. Before departing Seville on March 15, 1623, he launched the 600-ton galleon Santiago in his home port, which proved a poor flagship. His orders were to rush a cargo of mercury to Cartagena and Portobelo (Panama), then hurry back with the king’s silver, as the Treasury was bankrupt. Instead, his vice-flagship Santísima Trinidad and the galleon Espíritu Santo rolled over in calm weather that autumn, taking down their bullion. De Oquendo decided to winter over in Havana, so did not regain Seville until late May 1624.

He therefore was jailed and tried in the castle at Sanlúcar de Barrameda. The secrecy of these proceedings sparked many rumors. Although cleared of the most serious charges by June 1625, de Oquendo was banned from commanding any more plate fleets and fined 12,000 ducats. Yet the verdict had also called for leniency, and he had gained a full knighthood in the Order of Santiago by December 29, 1626. And the next year, he was once more entrusted with a sea command.

After vainly waiting at the Azores for the plate fleet of 1628, which the Dutch admiral Piet Heyn intercepted off Cuba, de Oquendo relieved the Spanish outpost of Mármora on his passage home. In 1627, he was promoted to Almirante General de la Armada del Mar Océano. In 1637, he was named to the Consejo de Guerra. He died on June 7, 1640, at La Coruña.

galleon, the Nossa Senhora dos Prazeres (Menor) of Capt. Cosme do Couto Barbosa attempts to support the Santiago de Oliste, only to drift helplessly beneath the combined guns of the Prins Willem and the Walcheren and be sunk. Its place is taken by the much larger Concepción of Capt. Juan de Prado.

Eventually, at about 4:00 p.m., a chance shot from de Oquendo’s flagship starts a blaze aboard the Prins Willem, which the Spanish admiral cleverly directs his musketeers to fire at so as to hamper Dutch fire-fighting efforts. The flames gain hold and finally drive Pater into the water with a few survivors, where he drowns. About that same time, de Vallecilla’s vice-flag San Antonio breaks up and goes down by its stern, taking most of the complement, while its Dutch foe Provincie Utrecht sheers off in flames, to later sink. Thijssen’s Geunieerde Provintien is battered, yet in possession of a single prize—the Buenaventura of Capt. Alonso de Alarcón y Molina, who has sailed to the San Antonio’s side during the fighting, only to lose both his life and his ship. The remaining Dutch vessels content themselves with long-range firing—the Hollandia, the Amersfoort, and the Fortuijn being the only others to become closely engaged—while the Spaniards respond in kind.

The day ends in a Spanish victory, although their losses prove somewhat greater, a vice-flagship and a galleon being sunk, plus another taken, for a total of 585 dead and missing (240 aboard the captured Buenaventura) and 201 wounded. The Dutch flagship and another man-of-war disappear beneath the waves, leaving 350 dead and missing, plus more than 80 crewmen seriously wounded. However, Thijssen shows no inclination to renew action the next day, preferring to limp back into Recife with his mauled fleet on September 21–22. De Oquendo meanwhile deposits Bagnuoli’s reinforcements at Barra Grande of Porto Calvo—only 700 of whom actually reach the Portuguese forces that are holding Fort Arraial do Bom Jesus—before continuing toward Europe with his sugar convoy. The Dutch garrison subsequently abandons and torches Pernambuco’s former hilltop capital of Olinda on November 25 so as to concentrate their strength around more-defensible Recife, located down beside the anchorage.

DECEMBER 5, 1631. Five boats from three large Dutch ships attempt a cutting-out operation at La Guaira, only to be repelled by Gov. Francisco Núñez Melián.

APRIL 20, 1632. The disgruntled, youthful Brazilian mestizo Maj. Domingo Fernandes, nicknamed "O Calabar"—a landowner and proprietor of three sugar mills, as well as a brave militia officer—switches allegiance from the Portuguese cause. He will prove a knowledgeable and invaluable adviser to the Dutch occupiers of Recife.

APRIL 30, 1632. A trio of Dutch ships is spotted at sundown, stealing upon La Guaira again. The next morning, they are engaged and driven off by Governor Núñez Melián as their boats attempt to tow them into the harbor.

MAY 15, 1632. Having stabilized the situation at Recife by depositing more Dutch troops and leaving behind a squadron under Commo. Jan Mast of the Walcheren, Admiral Thijssen arrives at Barbados with 22 ships to cruise against Spanish possessions in the Antilles. His summer-long campaign proves uninspired, failing to surprise any significant target. After vainly blockading Havana throughout August in hopes of intercepting a plate fleet, Thijssen departs for the Low Countries by early September.

NOVEMBER 1632. After residing on the uninhabited island of Sint Maarten for more than a year under WIC representative Jan Claesoon van Campen, a group of Dutch settlers completes a 34-gun fortress capable of sustaining a 100-man garrison.

DECEMBER 10, 1632. After a year spent recruiting some 300 men on Margarita Island and at Caracas, a Catalan-born doctor of laws named Juan de Orpín or Urpín leads an advance party of 100 out of San Sebastián to establish Spanish control over

Calabar

It is believed that Domingo Fernandes, nicknamed "O Calabar," was born near Porto Calvo in the Captaincy of Alagoas early in the 17th century. The son of an unknown Portuguese man and an Indian woman named Ângela Álvares, his racial mixture was known as a mameluco. Although as an infant Fernandes may have been baptized in Porto Calvo's parish church, he and his cousin Antônio were baptized again on March 15, 1610, at the hermitage of Nossa Senhora da Ajuda near Olinda. Young Domingo also received a good education from the Jesuits and prospered.

By the time the Dutch invaded Pernambuco in February 1630, Calabar was a minor landholder and owned three sugar mills. He had also risen to the militia rank of major. Two years later, however, he switched to the invaders' side. Contemporary letters indicate that he acted out of patriotism, believing Brazilians would fare better under the Dutch. He proved his value to the Dutch within 10 days by leading a column in a raid against Igaraçu. Over the next two and a half years, Calabar won the trust, admiration, and friendship of commanders such as von Schoppe and Lichthart.

The Portuguese authorities were determined to punish his treason. In March 1634, Captain-General de Albuquerque promised Calabar's cousin Antônio "any grant he wished, if he should kill him." Yet all such attempts failed. On September 20 of that same year, Calabar baptized his son in the Dutch Reformed Church at Recife. Von Schoppe, Lichthart, and many other high-ranking officials were present as witnesses.

Early the next year, Calabar helped guide the Dutch offensive that seized Porto Calvo. But on July 19, 1635, he had the misfortune to still be inside when Albuquerque's retreating army appeared. The Dutch garrison commander tried to have him spared, but Calabar insisted that he was "a Brazilian who would die for the freedom of his country." On surrendering, he fell subject to "the mercy of the King." He received none. After a quick trial, Calabar was cruelly executed, drawn, and quartered on the evening of July 22.

Two days later, von Schoppe and Arcisweski entered the empty town with their pursuing army. They were furious to find their friend's remains still dangling from its walls. These were lowered, and Calabar was buried with full military honors. His wife, three children, and mother also received generous pensions. Even before the Dutch were driven from Brazil 20 years later, Portuguese authors were already deriding the turncoat as a former smuggler and criminal who had met his just end for treason. Throughout the colonial era, Calabar was remembered as a traitor. Modern Brazilian historians, however, would prove more generous. Today, he is regarded as an early patriot who refused to accept the racial restrictions imposed by Portugal.

the stretch of Venezuelan coastline around Cumaná, inhabited by the Cumanagoto Indians. Eight days later, he establishes the town of Santa María de la O de Manapire, but after pressing on to the Urinare River, he is checked for three days by hostile Palenque Indians. His efforts at conquest being deemed a failure, de Orpín's commission is revoked by the Audiencia of Santo Domingo on December 5, 1633, and instead temporarily granted to the wealthy Caracan maestre de campo Domingo Vázquez de Rojas.

FEBRUARY 7, 1633. As part of the Dutch push out of their confinement at Recife toward the São Francisco River, a column of 600 troops under von Schoppe assaults the newly erected, two-gun Brazilian fort, which is located a mile from the Formoso River mouth. They carry it on the fourth attempt, after suffering 80 casualties. Eighteen of the twenty-one defenders lay dead, only Capt. Pedro de Almeida Albuquerque and two others surviving.

MARCH 24, 1633. Guided by the mestizo turncoat Calabar, 1,200 Dutch troops slip out of Recife under Col. Laurens van Rembach and launch a surprise attack against the nearby Portuguese earthen stockade known as Arraial do Bom Jesus, defended by 200 men and four guns. However, native guerrillas under the 33-year-old Luís Barbalho Bezerra and other chieftains so bedevil the Dutch with counterattacks outside its ramparts that their column is obliged to retreat, van Rembach emerging mortally wounded.

APRIL 26, 1633. Veteran commodore van Hoorn quits Recife with four ships, three yachts, and three sloops, manned by 500 sailors and 400 soldiers (among them the gifted captain “Peg Leg” Jol). Van Hoorn's original instructions have been to attack the coastal fortress guarding the Brazilian province of Ceará, visit the two-year-old Dutch base of Sint Maarten in the Windward Islands, and then raid Trujillo, staging port for the Honduras galleons. Instead, though, with the consent of the Dutch authorities at Recife, he reconnoiters the Brazilian port of Maranhão before proceeding directly for Barbados to commence his West Indian campaign.

MAY 14, 1633. The free black leader Henrique Dias of the Captaincy of Rio Grande do Norte arrives at Arraial do Bom Jesus with a contingent of followers to join the Luso-Brazilian resistance.

JUNE 22, 1633. Some 55 Spanish sail—24 of them being men-of-war—appear off Saint Barthélemy under Adm. Lope Díez de Aux y Armendáriz, Marqués de Cadereyta, and his veteran vice admiral Carlos de Ibarra, Knight of the Order of Alcántara. This force is comprised of three distinct fleets: the annual Tierra Firme convoy under Adm. Luis Fernández de Córdoba; the Mexican convoy under Adm. Lope de Hoces y Córdoba, Knight of the Order of Santiago; and Cadereyta's own battle group. In addition to fetching Spain's American silver, this expedition is intended to eradicate the newest Dutch settlement in the Antilles: Sint Maarten.

Arriving by mistake off neighboring Saint Barthélemy, the next day the Spaniards sight five interloper vessels anchored off its southern coast, four of which immediately get under way, abandoning the fifth (a 10-gun vessel) to its fate. Cadereyta then learns from his sargento mayor Juan de Irrazaga that this is Saint Barthélemy, so he lays in a course overnight for Sint Maarten.

JUNE 24, 1633. Reconquest of Sint Maarten. At noon, a Spanish reconnaissance reveals that the Dutch settlers have a 22-gun fortress covering Sint Maarten's approaches, so Cadereyta sends an emissary ashore from his flagship, the Nuestra Señora de Aranzazu, to demand the garrison's surrender. (This officer is Capt. Benito Arias Montano [see “July 10, 1631” entry], recently created governor of Araya and Cumaná, who is returning to Venezuela aboard the Tierra Firme fleet to take up his new post.) Approximately 150 Dutch defenders and 40 black auxiliaries under “Lambert Franchrisperi” (perhaps a Spanish misspelling of Jan Claesz van Campen) reject Cadereyta's overture.

Several Spanish galleons therefore bear down, engaging this fortress in a heated exchange during which seven Spanish crew members perish, while smaller boats seek a disembarkation point. At 2:00 the next morning, 1,000 troops and 300 sailors are set ashore under Vice Admiral de Hoces and the maestre de campo Luis de Rojas y Borgia, Duque de Granja, with two small fieldpieces. They make an arduous march through the jungle, suffering at least six deaths from heat exhaustion, before finally emerging behind the Dutch fortress and storming its walls on June 26. Musket fire halts them, and many receive crippling wounds, including de Hoces, who is shot in his left elbow and side. The Spaniards consequently inaugurate a formal siege, bringing four heavier guns ashore to install in a battery. They then launch another 100-man assault on the night of June 28, during which the veteran naval captain Tiburcio Redín is injured.

By July 1, a badly wounded van Campen and his 62 Dutch and 15 black survivors request terms, which are granted. Cadereyta occupies the fortress the next day. He decides to keep it for Spain, therefore strengthening its works by adding four 24-pounders, four 18-pound demiculverins, and five 10- to 12-pounders to its armament plus a permanent garrison of 250 Spanish soldiers and 50 auxiliaries under Capt. Cebrián de Lizarazu, Knight of the Order of Santiago. The Spanish fleet then clears for San Juan de Puerto Rico, arriving with its prisoners and three Dutch prizes by July 13.

JULY 15, 1633. Van Hoorn's 10 vessels steal upon Trujillo (Honduras), surprising this port and battering it into submission within two hours, at a cost of seven Dutch lives. However, most of its Spanish inhabitants succeed in fleeing inland, leaving van Hoorn with a few cannon, plus some hides, as booty. Subsequent ransom demands also produce meager results—20 pounds of silver—so that van Hoorn sails away six days later, intending to attack Campeche.

No Dutch raider has yet penetrated this deep into the Gulf of Mexico, but van Hoorn is encouraged by an accompanying mulatto rover named Diego de los Reyes (or Diego Grillo, born a slave at Havana and better known to his Spanish American victims as Diego the Mulatto, or Diego Lucifer). Having once resided at Campeche, Diego is familiar with its roadstead and defenses, so he leads the way.

AUGUST 4, 1633. Off Los Órganos Keys (northwestern Cuba), the Spanish galleon Triunfo de la Cruz of Capt. Miguel de Redín—separated from Adm. Lope de Hoces's convoy bound toward Veracruz—is engaged from dawn until 10:00 a.m. in a brutal exchange with a 46-gun Dutch ship. De Redín's leg is blown off by the second Dutch broadside, killing him along with 15 of his crew plus wounding many more. The two battered antagonists eventually drift apart, leaving de Redín's second-in-command, Juan de Llano, to pilot the Triunfo into Havana 10 days later.

AUGUST 11, 1633. Van Hoorn's Sack of Campeche.

Thirteen sail bear down this Friday noon on Campeche. More than 500 Dutch, English, French, and Portuguese raiders under Diego the Mulatto and peg-legged Cornelis Jol land on its outskirts the next morning to advance against the defenses. Although a cluster of armed boats cover their approach from offshore, the attackers' initial assault is repelled by 50 harquebusiers under Capt. Domingo Galván Romero, who is entrenched along its western circuit with three artillery pieces.

When this assault recedes, however, the defenders rise from their trenches and set off in pursuit, only to be trapped out in open countryside. Galván and 10 or 12 others are shot down, the way into Campeche lying open. The invaders pour into the city streets, unchecked until they encounter another 300 Spaniards drawn up in its main square. A ferocious firefight ensues, ending with more than three dozen Spanish dead and many more captured, while terrified survivors flee toward San Francisco Campechuelo.

Van Hoorn, Jol, and Diego remain in Campeche over the next two days, and although they strip it of everything of value and seize 22 vessels lying in its roads, they are unable to extort ransoms from the interior. They therefore spike its guns and sail a dozen miles up the coast before releasing their captives, retaining nine prizes and selling another four back to the Spaniards; they burn the rest. Van Hoorn departs for Holland on August 24, leaving Jol and Diego to continue operations.

AUGUST 25, 1633. At Cumaná, the new governor,

Bernardo Arias Montano, inaugurates his rule by organizing an expedition of 95 Spanish militiamen and 200 native archers to sail westward aboard 14 piraguas to investigate reports of an intruder colony at the Unare River mouth in central Venezuela—one of the few openings along its coastal mountain range that leads into a vast fertile basin. During this voyage, he is reinforced by 25 natives from Borracha Island, plus another 30 from Cumanagoto.

On August 28, Arias's flotilla reaches Uchire Beach and disembarks, dispatching two scouts inland at noon. They return early that same afternoon with news of a Dutch fortress and 10 ships at the nearby Unare salt pans, prompting Arias to leave 2 Spaniards and 50 natives behind to guard his piraguas while he marches overland with his main body. Arias comes within sight of his objective at 8:00 p.m., causing a stir within the Dutch stronghold.

The next dawn, the Spaniards storm its walls despite fire from eight cannon and the ships offshore, slaughtering 80 Dutch defenders and capturing another 36—among them Capt. Wybrand Corneliszoon—at a cost of only 5 or 6 badly wounded attackers. The vessels in its roadstead flee out to sea, leaving the Spaniards victorious. Later this same afternoon, some Spanish soldiers are attacked by native allies of the Dutch, suffering a number of casualties. The next day, August 30, Arias orders the fortress razed, then retires with his captives and booty.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1633. Shortly after returning to Cumaná, Arias leads 12 piraguas on a second foray, 75 miles west-northwestward, against the Dutch salting operation on Salt Tortuga Island. The operation is easily overrun—a few Dutchmen being slain ashore and five anchored vessels chased away—before the intruders' huts are burned and the salt pans flooded.

DECEMBER 8, 1633. Having failed in previous attempts to subdue the neighboring Brazilian province of Paraíba, a Dutch expedition of four ships and seven yachts out of Recife, under the 32-year-old admiral Jan Corneliszoon Lichthart, materializes this morning off Negra Point, disembarking 800 troops who march overland under the supervision of Councillor Mathijs van Ceulen to secure the hapless town of Natal—capital of Rio Grande do Norte Province—by nightfall. The Dutch also take two Portuguese caravels under Francisco de Vasconcelos da Cunha that are anchored in the Potengi River estuary.

The next day, a column of troops furthermore proceeds to the nine-gun Três Reis Magos harbor castle at the northern extremity of Meio Beach, which guards the Potengi River entrance. Its 86-man garrison resists under the regional capitão-mor Pero Mendes Gouveia; the Dutch, therefore, ferry siege-artillery ashore and install batteries amid the surrounding dunes, pounding this fortress into submission by sunup of December 12. Eight days afterward, it is renamed Castle Ceulen and entrusted to the new garrison commander, Maj. Joris Garstman.

MARCH 1–2, 1634. Overnight, the veteran Brazilian militia captain Martim Soares Moreno advances from Arraial do Bom Jesus with 500 men, attacking the Dutch defenses at various points around Recife before retiring.

MID-MARCH 1634. Seizure of Pontal. With Portuguese attention diverted northeast of Recife, a sudden seaborne descent 20 miles to its south by a dozen Dutch ships under Lichthart, bearing 1,500 troops under von Schoppe, surprises the 350 Brazilian militiamen—mostly local fishermen—who have been left behind under Pedro Correia da Gama to man the defenses around the five-gun Fort Nazaré, guarding the bar at the southern extremity of Cape Santo Agostinho. Despite losing three vessels, the Dutch force their way past, bombarding and seizing the town of Pontal at the cape's northern tip.

Lichthart's nine remaining ships are apparently trapped inside the bay, but the Brazilian turncoat Calabar shows the Dutch a low stretch of land in mid-peninsula where they are able to cut a passage through at low tide and exit. The belated arrival of Portuguese reinforcements under Albuquerque and Bagnuoli proves unable to dislodge the Dutch garrison ensconced within Pontal or adjacent Bordges Island, thereby effectively denying them the use of Cape Santo Agostinho as a strategic port.

MARCH 30, 1634. A Dutch column advances out of Recife and assaults the Portuguese garrison at Arraial do Bom Jesus, being repelled.

MAY 1634. Capt. João da Silva sends a force of 150 Brazilian militiamen and 300 native auxiliaries on a sweep from Cunhaú and Paraíba into the neighboring territories of the Tapuia Indians, who are allies of the Dutch.

JUNE 1634. The battle fleet of Admiral de Oquendo, escorting the Tierra Firme treasure convoy of Vice Adm. Nicolás de Judice y Fiesco across the Atlantic from Spain, pauses during its outward-bound passage at Sint Maarten to resupply this Spanish garrison.

JUNE 23, 1634. The Dutch ships Groot Hoorn of 40 guns, Eenhoorn, Brack, Engel Gabriel, and two Biscayan sloops arrive at Barbados bearing 400 men—225 of them soldiers—to secure a new WIC base in the Antilles, now that Sint Maarten has been lost. Their commanders are Johannes van Walbeeck, an experienced commander in his thirties, and Pierre le Grand, a professional French Huguenot soldier who has distinguished himself in Brazil and is charged with the military contingent. Together, they are to conquer Curaçao and Bonaire, guided by Jan Janszoon Otzen, a man who has visited these islands as a Spanish captive.

The next day, this expedition reaches Saint Vincent, where the yacht Brack is detached to reconnoiter La Guaira. The main body meanwhile proceeds to uninhabited Bonaire, where van Walbeeck awaits his scout's return before finally standing toward Curaçao on July 6. Through Otzen's faulty intelligence, the Dutch sight their objective only to be carried too far west by winds and currents, continuing as far as Santo Domingo before eventually beating back to Bonaire by July 26. During this digression, they capture a Spanish bark and are joined by another Dutch ship, plus the vessel of the mulatto privateer Diego de los Reyes.

JULY 28, 1634. Seizure of Curaçao. Van Walbeeck appears off this island for a second time, this time entering unopposed in single file through narrow Saint Ann Bay, emerging into the spacious harbor he dubs the Schottegat. The only Spanish inhabitants are Lope López de Morla and some 40 men, women, and children, plus several hundred Indians. They are powerless to contest a Dutch disembarkation, although López stations about 50 Indians in a trench opposite the main beach. After two days' reconnaissance, van Walbeeck starts landing his troops with seven boats, while Diego de los Reyes parleys with López from offshore. By the time the Spaniard realizes that this is a full-scale invasion rather than a mere foraging raid, the Dutch are already ashore.

The next day, July 31, López abandons his principal settlement, after setting it ablaze and poisoning its wells. The Dutch press the defenders inland, suffering a brief setback at Santa Bárbara on August 5 when they are attacked in a driving rainstorm by native archers, losing 25 men because their powder is damp. By August 17, however, they have overrun the tiny hamlet of Ascensión in the western part of the island, nailing a surrender demand addressed to López upon a tree. He is at last cornered in the San Cristóbal Hills four days later and compelled to capitulate, being transported to Venezuela along with 32 Spanish followers, plus 402 loyal Indians, aboard two Dutch yachts and a Spanish fishing boat; they are released about 15 miles outside Coro. Van Walbeeck remains in possession of Curaçao, from where the Dutch will eventually occupy Aruba and Bonaire as well.

OCTOBER 1634. A contingent of Dutch troops under Arciswesi, supported by Tapuia allies, seizes a small Portuguese fortress at the Bar of Cunhaú before proceeding up the Mamanguape River and penetrating into the Captaincy of Alagoas. The rich sugar plantation at Cunhaú, which belongs to Paraíba's regional governor, Antônio de Albuquerque Maranhão, is confiscated and sold.

NOVEMBER 25, 1634. Conquest of Paraíba. Lichthart sets sail northward from Recife with 21 ships and 11 yachts in two separate squadrons, the former bearing 940 troops of a Dutch invasion army under von Schoppe, the latter, 409 soldiers, in addition to almost 1,000 sailors manning both formations. Arriving above the Jaguaribe River at the easternmost tip of Brazil by December 3, Lichthart deposits the first 600 soldiers the next day, who scatter the few Portuguese defenders operating under Gov. Antônio de Albuquerque Maranhão. More Dutch troops then disembark, and three companies under Capt. Gaspar van der Ley march up the southern peninsula of the Paraíba River and, at its mouth, invest 24-gun Fort Santa Catarina do Cabedelo, whose defenses have recently been strengthened by the engineer Diogo Paes.

Von Schoppe's main body joins up, formal siege-batteries are installed, and a bombardment ensues during which the elderly garrison commander Capt. João de Mattos Cardoso dies on December 12, being succeeded by Capt. Jerônimo Pereira (who in turn perishes and is followed by Gregório Guedes Souto Maior). Lichthart meanwhile shells the recently completed São Bento bastion on Restinga Island at the river mouth, taking it by storm. When the Dutch besiegers ashore begin lobbing mortar shells directly into Fort Cabedelo, the citadel finally capitulates on December 19, having suffered 82 dead and 103 wounded. The defenders of the nearby bastion known as Santo Antônio request three days' grace before capitulating, and the Dutch find it empty by December 23. They also seize old Fort São Felipe three miles inside the estuary.

The invaders then penetrate another dozen miles unopposed down the bay, until they come to Paraíba's confluence with the Sanhauá. On December 24, they occupy the regional capital of Filipéia de Nossa Senhora das Neves (modern João Pessoa), which lies largely abandoned by its 1,500 inhabitants. It is promptly renamed Frederikstad in honor of the Dutch Stadhouder Frederik Hendrik, Prince of Orange. Fort Cabedelo is to be repaired and expanded, as the Dutch settle in for a permanent occupation, expropriating the province's 18 largest sugar plantations and slowly welcoming back many of its inhabitants.

MARCH 3, 1635. With Dutch strength at Recife augmented to 4,000 troops and 1,500 sailors, thanks to recent reinforcements, it is decided to overwhelm the last few Portuguese strongpoints still resisting throughout northeastern Brazil. Consequently, a 1,200-man army under Arcisweski advances to lay siege to the 547-man garrison under Col. André Marim holding nearby Arraial do Bom Jesus, von Schoppe leads a similar-sized force to invest Fort Nazaré at Cape Santo Agostinho, and Lichthart makes a seaborne descent that takes the newly erected Forte do Bom Sucesso earthwork from its Portuguese defenders under Bagnuoli at the mouth of the Manguaba River at Porto Calvo, strengthening and garrisoning it.

MARCH 15, 1635. Having returned into the West Indies with dispatches from Holland, "Peg Leg" Jol's Otter—now mounting 18 guns—sorties from Curaçao on March 3, accompanied by the Brack of Capt. Cornelis Janszoon van Uytgeest. Twelve days later, they bluff their way past the batteries guarding the narrow channel at Santiago de Cuba's harbor entrance by masquerading as Spanish men-of-war. (In addition to flying false colors, the Dutch captains disguise themselves as members of the Spanish military orders of Cristo and Santiago and hail its harbor castle in Spanish, thus being allowed to pass.)

Once deep inside the bay, they approach the city and prepare to anchor offshore to storm its beaches. At this point, they are approached by Santiago's pilot boat, whose officer belatedly realizes their true identity; but he is already so close that he is fired upon and killed, after which his crew surrenders. This outburst, however, warns the batteries ashore, who open up on the intruders. The Spaniards are caught so unprepared that at first only 14 gunners man their posts, under Gov. Juan de Amezquita y Quijano, before more militiamen can be summoned from the surrounding countryside.

Frustrated in their attempt to take the city by surprise, the Dutch search the half-dozen merchantmen in its roadstead, hoping to find rich cargos of copper ore. Most prove to be empty, though, although during a lull the privateer commander coolly offers to ransom the vessels and his prisoners, which the Spanish governor spurns, and the battle rages on until evening. Getting under way with the land breeze, Jol and van Uytgeest carry out a fully laden Spanish frigate (after vainly attempting to burn the remainder), unloading and torching this lone prize outside the harbor before releasing all their captives two days later and standing away.

APRIL 19, 1635. Last Gasp of Pernambucan Resistance. Arcisweski's besiegers attempt an assault against beleaguered Arraial do Bom Jesus, only to be repelled. Shells are nonetheless lobbed regularly into its interior, while starvation saps the will of its garrison and civilian dependents, thanks to Dutch control over the Capibaribe River. Finally, bereft of supplies or ammunition, as well as having endured 100 dead and 140 wounded, the defenders request terms on June 6. Some 500 surviving troops, 150 mazombo warriors, and 1,250 civilians are marched out two days later for Recife to post ransoms for their release, while Arraial do Bom Jesus is destroyed. The defenders of Fort Nazaré also capitulate on July 2 and are taken to Recife as well, from where Capt. Barbalho Bezerra—among others—is deported to Holland (although he is freed shortly thereafter).

SUMMER 1635. Having prowled past Havana, Jol stations himself off Cartagena with the Otter and another yacht, one day pursuing a pair of Spanish coasters close inshore. Four coast-guard frigates suddenly emerge to give chase, forcing Jol out to sea, where he meets another pair of Dutch vessels under Pieter Janszoon van Domburgh, who joins him to engage this quartet. The Spanish vice-flagship is captured after a hard-fought battle, while the other three Spanish ships escape.

Jol releases his 150 prisoners with a note to Cartagena's governor asking him to reciprocate in kind. When only two Dutchmen, a few hens, and some fruit are returned, Jol burns his prize. After cruising through the Caribbean and making numerous more captures, Jol then sails for Europe by autumn.

JULY 19, 1635. While retreating into the Captaincy of Bahia with his 140 remaining Portuguese troops, as well as the free black companies of Dias and the warriors of the Potiguar Indian chieftain Antônio Filipe Camarão of Paraíba, Gov. Matias de Albuquerque surprises the 360-man Dutch garrison under Maj. Alexandre Picard, which is holding Porto Calvo, taking it after a clash in which Dias loses his left hand.

Among the captives is the mestizo turncoat Calabar, who is tried and garroted three days later. Before Arcisweski and von Schoppe can arrive to retake the town on July 24 with their pursuing forces, Albuquerque resumes his retirement, eventually shepherding 7,000–8,000 civilian refugees into Bahia.

NOVEMBER 26, 1635. Some 30 Spanish and Portuguese ships appear off Jaraguá Point, near the Dutch base of Recife in Pernambuco. The Spanish fleet is led by Adm. Lope de Hoces and Vice Adm. José de Meneses, while the Portuguese are directed by Adm. Rodrigo Lobo da Silveira, Conde da Sazedas, and Vice Adm. João de Sequeira. Together they examine the Dutch defenses and nine vessels anchored in Recife's roadstead from a distance, demurring to launch an attack against its impregnable defenses. Instead, they steer southward to land supplies, artillery, and 2,400 Spanish, Portuguese, and Neapolitan reinforcements at the Lagunas under veteran general Luis de Rojas (see "June 24, 1633" entry), who is to assume command of the guerrilla campaign from Matias de Albuquerque.

This disembarkation requires a fortnight to complete, during which time the Hispano-Portuguese fleet is menaced by 11 small Dutch vessels, which retire on December 5 without pressing home any attack. Two days later, de Hoces's fleet stands back out to sea to continue its voyage toward Baía de Todos os Santos; Albuquerque sails with them, having been recalled to Spain, where he will eventually stand trial for his Pernambucan defeats. De Rojas meanwhile fortifies his camp ashore, divides his army into a Spanish contingent under the maestre de campo Juan Ortiz and a Portuguese one under Soares Moreno, and sends out scouts to assess the Dutch defenses.

JANUARY 6, 1636. Mata Redonda. After a series of conferences during which Bagnuoli recommends against assuming the offensive, de Rojas marches northward from his camp with 1,400 effectives and a host of native warriors under Camarão (now elevated to a knighthood in the Order of Cristo by a grateful king), while Bagnuoli remains behind to guard the base with 700 troops. One week later, the vanguard of de Rojas's army under Capt. Francisco Rebelo reaches Porto Calvo and engages its outnumbered Dutch defenders under von Schoppe, who resist until nightfall before retreating to Barra Grande so as to retire toward Recife.

De Rojas's main army enters Porto Calvo on January 15 and sets off in pursuit of von Schoppe, then returns to the town. He sorties again two days later to confront almost 1,500 approaching Dutch soldiers under Arcisweski. Both armies clash on January 18 at nearby Mata Redonda, the Spanish general being killed early on during this struggle. His defeated and disorganized troops are chased back into Porto Calvo, where Bagnuoli will eventually assume command. Meanwhile, the victorious Dutch regroup at Peripueira, installing a garrison there, before Arcisweski's main body withdraws toward Sirinhaém.

FEBRUARY 14, 1636. De Hoces departs Baía de Todos os Santos with his flagship, vice-flagship, and an auxiliary to assault Curaçao. During his passage up the Brazilian coast, he is attacked by eight smaller Dutch vessels, fighting a running battle on February 19–20 before finally driving them off. At this point, the Spanish admiral decides to turn back into Baía and repair damages incurred. He exits again on Wednesday, March 26, to escort the Brazilian sugar convoy partway out into the Atlantic, before parting company and laying in a course for the Spanish Main.

APRIL 25, 1636. Some 50 Dutch colonists under Pieter van Corselles, sponsored by the Zeeland Chamber of the WIC, disembark from Jan Snouck's vessels to found a settlement on uninhabited Sint Eustatius. They erect Fort Oranje atop the ruins of an abandoned French redoubt installed seven years previously, plant crops of tobacco, and temporarily rechristen the island as Nieuw Zeeland. Meanwhile, Snouck returns to Vlissingen (Flushing) to verify the claim before the WIC. The island settlers soon come to flourish so well that four years later a contingent under Vice Cmdr. Jan Zegers will occupy adjoining Saba as well, building another small fort there.

MAY 9, 1636. De Hoces arrives at Cumaná with his trio of warships, to be joined on May 25 by Sancho de Urdanivia's four storeships and four tartans out of Spain. Together they are to mount a counter-invasion against Dutch Curaçao. However, because de Urdanivia has lost the Spanish siege-train during his passage (his flagship San Salvador having been wrecked on the reefs east of Martinique), and because his remaining four ships are to immediately continue toward Cartagena, this plan is abandoned. Criticism is eventually leveled against de Hoces upon his return to Spain for not having achieved more—either in Brazil or Venezuela.

SUMMER 1636. Juan de Orpín or Urpín resumes his efforts to reestablish Spanish control over the coast inhabited by the Cumanagoto Indians, who have been dealing with visiting Dutch ships. Generally through peaceful means, he resurrects the abandoned town of Santa María de la O de Manapire and founds Nueva Barcelona and Nueva Tarragona, thus preserving this region for Spain.

DECEMBER 1636. Reinforced by a company of 40 Spanish militiamen sent by Margarita's governor, Juan de Eulate, Capt. Martín de Mendoza raises a sizable contingent—allegedly 400 soldiers and 3,000 native auxiliaries—from the towns of Santo Tomé in eastern Venezuela and San José de Oruña on the island of Trinidad to launch a counteroffensive against the foreign establishments on Tobago and in northeastern Trinidad. He takes a fortification at Galera Point, plus two more on Tobago (the main 65-man Dutch stronghold of Fort Vlissingen under Cornelis de Moor and Jacques Onsiel falling by January 1, 1637), gathering 160 captives of diverse nationalities and 42 cannon. Most of these prisoners are subsequently hanged on Margarita, and their leaders are transported to Spain.

JANUARY 23, 1637. Fall of Porto Calvo. An able and energetic new governor general for Netherlandic Brazil—32-year-old Johan Maurits, Graaf or “Count” van Nassau-Siegen—reaches Recife with four ships and 350 men. One week later he sends von Schoppe overland with 3,000 troops to unite with another 800 sailing around by sea under Arcisweski, so as to together oust Bagnuoli's Portuguese guerrillas from their base of operations at Porto Calvo. The two Dutch contingents join up on February 17 at the Uma River mouth, fighting their way past Barra Grande shortly thereafter to besiege the 500-man garrison holding Forte do Bom Sucesso.

When Nassau arrives with heavy siege-guns after a difficult passage along the Pedras River, the defenders are compelled to surrender by March 3, after which the victors lay waste to Alagoas and compel the defeated Bagnuoli to retire into the Captaincy of Sergipe del Rey, south of the São Francisco River. To consolidate this waterway as Netherlandic Brazil's new frontier, Nassau orders the construction of a small fort at the São Francisco River mouth, as well as a much larger border keep, christened Fort Maurits, 18 miles upriver at Penedo, which is completed by the next year. The Dutch now entirely control Brazil's coast from the São Francisco River as far northeast as Paraíba, which the count intends to transform into a stable and prosperous commercial colony.

JULY 22, 1637. At dawn, a small Dutch expedition under Groenewegen from Essequibo (Guyana) bursts upon the newly reconstructed Santo Tomé, which earlier this year has been shifted to a new locale farther up the Orinoco River under the direction of Cristóbal de Vera. Its inhabitants succeed in fleeing inland, along with Gov. Diego López de Escobar and a handful of troops, so the Dutch put its empty buildings to the torch before withdrawing.

JULY 25, 1637. To bolster Portugal's claim over the Amazon, Captain Teixeira departs Belém to chart the enormous river's entire course. Striking upriver from Cameté four months later with 13 officers, 70 soldiers, and 1,000 native auxiliaries aboard 45 boats, he will succeed in reaching the Amazon's distant headwaters, returning almost two years later.

AUGUST 3, 1637. Once more in the Caribbean, "Peg Leg" Jol sights 26 sail of the Tierra Firme treasure fleet as it departs Cartagena under Vice Adm. Francisco de Mexía, escorted by the battle fleet of Adm. Carlos de Ibarra, Knight of the Order of Alcántara. The Dutch are no match for this strength, Jol's new 260-ton, 28-gun flagship Zwolle being accompanied by a gaggle of smaller yachts—mostly independent privateers out of Curaçao, with scant discipline. The rovers scatter when the Spanish men-of-war bear down upon them, re-forming once danger passes to follow in the plate fleet's wake in hopes of snapping up a straggler. But when a Spanish merchantman lags behind during the subsequent crossing to Havana, the pursuers are so jealous of sharing any booty with each other that they allow this victim to escape in their confusion. Disgusted, Jol takes up station off Cuba, hoping for a second chance.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1637. Jol sights 16 Spanish merchantmen standing out of Havana, escorted by 4 men-of-war. The Zwolle and its smaller accompanying privateers fall in astern, but at this moment another 33 Spaniards emerge from port, threatening to trap Jol's vessels between both formations. The Dutch sheer off, Jol taking a single small prize from Puerto Rico. He then returns to Holland, where his complaints about these missed opportunities gain him command of a major WIC expedition, intended to help reconquer Brazil's Baía de Todos os Santos and intercept a Spanish plate fleet in the Caribbean.

OCTOBER 7, 1637. Two hours before sunrise, the Dutch rover Abraham Hendriksz's 17-gun ship overtakes a small Spanish frigate approaching Sint Maarten after a lengthy chase. It proves to be conveying the garrison's annual situado or "payroll" from Veracruz, guarded by Ens. Francisco Fernández Núñez and three soldiers. They resist the Dutch boarding parties as best they can but are quickly overwhelmed and captured, along with the money chests. (Spanish reports indicate Hendriksz also intercepted Puerto Rico's situado the previous year.)

OCTOBER 14, 1637. A small Dutch expedition from the Wild Coast destroys San José de Oruña (modern Saint Joseph, seven miles inland from Trinidad's capital of Port of Spain). Not only are this town's buildings thrown down but, when the Dutch retire and San José's inhabitants attempt to return, they find its local natives hostile as well. It is not until Capt. Martín de Mendoza y Berrio arrives with a small contingent that peace is restored.

NOVEMBER 1637. Von Schoppe advances out of Recife (Brazil) to attack the Portuguese in the neighboring Captaincy of Sergipe del Rey, compelling Bagnuoli to retreat within 40 miles of Baía de Todos os Santos' capital of São Salvador, where the Neapolitan commander furthermore becomes embroiled in disputes with the disappointed governor general, Pedro da Silva. The northern Captaincy of Ceará is also overrun before year's end by two companies of soldiers under Major Garstman, who repair the small, semi-abandoned Portuguese fortress of São Sebastião. They guard its bar and remain in undisputed possession over the next seven years, exploiting the local salt and ambergris deposits.

LATE MARCH 1638. Maurits's Defeat. Learning of the dissension existing between the high command at Salvador and believing Hispano-Portuguese resistance to be on the verge of collapse, the count decides to launch a preemptive strike against this last remaining stronghold, even before Jol can recross the Atlantic to reinforce Recife. Maurits therefore sets sail with 3,600 Dutch troops and 1,000 Brazilian auxiliaries aboard 45 vessels, penetrating Baía de Todos os Santos on April 16 to disembark his army unopposed at São Braz and Escada beaches; they then circle up onto the headland to march upon the city.

The defenders' resolve is stiffened by this threat, Governor-General da Silva deferring all military decisions to Bagnuoli, and the initial Dutch assault on April 20 against São Salvador's northern Carmo Gate is repelled. Denied a quick victory, the attackers instead redeploy to besiege the city, while the garrison feverishly strengthens its walls—Bagnuoli holding the strategic Casa da Torre de Garcia d'Avila on the north side, while mestre de campo Barbalho Bezerra also distinguishes himself by speedily erecting the bastion that will bear his name. Maurits unsuccessfully storms the outer perimeter on May 1, and 17 days afterward mounts a second major effort that fights its way right up to the ramparts before being ejected at nightfall in desperate hand-to-hand combat around Carmo Gate.

Having lost 500 men during his protracted siege, the count feels compelled to withdraw shortly thereafter, abandoning considerable materiel and returning into Recife by May 26.

MAY 8, 1638. At Salt Tortuga Island (Venezuela), 150 Spanish soldiers and a like number of native auxiliaries arrive before dawn aboard 13 piraguas, led by Cumaná's governor, Bernardo Arias Montano and the military engineer Juan Bautista Antonelli (the Younger), to expunge its newly constructed Dutch fortress. After being discovered by an anchored Dutch ship and three guard boats, Arias captures one of the latter and disembarks his forces on the western tip of Tortuga, marching upon the interlopers' wooden stockade.

The stockade boasts eight small artillery pieces, sharpened stakes, and other defenses, so Arias does not attack until sunrise of that following Sunday, fighting his way inside after a four-hour firefight to massacre its 40 defenders, at a cost of seven Spaniards and four natives killed, plus 20 wounded. The eight Dutch ships flee out to sea, after which Arias orders the fort destroyed and its harbor channel obstructed so as to discourage future Dutch encroachments. By early June, he is back at Cumaná installing the eight Dutch cannon into Araya's fortress.

JUNE 8, 1638. Jol arrives at Recife to prepare for another cruise against Spanish plate fleets in the Caribbean, with his 54-gun, 600-ton flagship Salamanca; the 44-gun, 500-ton Hoop; the 34-gun, 500-ton Oranje; the 32-gun, 400-ton Graaf Ernst or Ernestus; the 26-gun, 400-ton Mercurius; the 24-gun, 340-ton

Maurits's City

When the Dutch seized Olinda and its Recife anchorage in February 1630, they judged the hilltop capital to be too exposed. As a result, they concentrated all their strength around the tiny village of Recife. A circuit of defenses was erected to guard its anchorage, while a WIC warehouse and other permanent structures were added. Deserted Olinda was stripped for construction materials before its ruins were torched in late November 1631. Accustomed to river life in the Low Countries, the new Dutch residents were not even fazed when the Capibaribe River overflowed its banks in July 1633.

Soon after the energetic Maurits, Graaf van Nassau-Siegen, arrived as the new governor general, he found Recife's untidy clump of narrow houses on its crowded spit to be unsuitable as a capital. Brazilian natives suggested that Olinda might be rebuilt, while Dutch citizens proposed that an entirely new city be created on Itamaracá Island. Instead, Maurits opted to lay out a new city on the far side of Recife's anchorage, on low-lying Antônio Váz Island.

This marshy terrain was surveyed in 1638 by his personal architect, Pieter Post. An oblong grid of streets resulted, enclosed by ramparts. Locks were included to control river tides, because the ground stood only seven feet above water level. A canal and triangular inner basin were featured to permit boat access. A church was raised at the city core, shade trees were planted against the oppressive heat, and a cross-harbor ferry service was inaugurated with Recife. In honor of its founder, it was named Mauritsstad or "Maurits City," sometimes Latinized as Mauritia.

The count started construction in 1639 on a splendid villa, which became Vrijburg Palace. One of its twin towers served as the harbor lighthouse, the other as an observatory for the scientist Georg Markgraf, a favorite in Maurits's retinue. The villa's gardens eventually boasted thousands of rare trees, botanical specimens, ponds for raising fish and shellfish, a small zoo, and so on. When they learned of such grandiose schemes, the West India Company directors reprimanded Maurits for his extravagance, but took no further action as Vrijburg was paid for out of his private funds.

After Portugal revolted against Spain in December 1640, a truce was arranged in Europe the next June. Lisbon grudgingly recognized Dutch sovereignty over Pernambuco in exchange for assistance against Spain. Mauritsstad and Recife enjoyed another spurt of peaceful growth. In a goodwill gesture, the count allowed some Brazilian residents to resettle at Olinda. But Mauritsstad and Recife already had a combined population of almost 6,000 inhabitants. Bridges between both, and across to the mainland, were completed by early 1644.

Guarda, and Carmen. They are escorting seven merchantmen and a smaller patache or “tender.”

AUGUST 31, 1638. Los Órganos. At sunrise, the Dutch fleet steers in two squadrons toward the Spaniards, who form up in single column to await them near Los Órganos Keys, protecting the more distant convoy. De Ibarra’s San Mateo is soon grappled by Jol’s Salamander—seconded by the Wapen van Rotterdam and the Tholen—while de Ursúa’s San Marcos is attacked by Roosendaal’s vice-flagship and the Dutch rear admiral Jan Mast engages Sancho de Urdanivia’s 20-gun Carmen (which is prominently displaying two pennants, giving the impression that it is another flagship). A fierce eight-hour battle rages in which the huge Spanish men-of-war acquit themselves well, repulsing every attempt at boarding. Both Roosendaal and Mast are killed, after which de Ursúa’s San Marcos moves to the aid of de Ibarra’s flagship, obliging Jol to retire three miles out of range.

The Dutch admiral is furious to learn that many of his ships have not joined but remained in the middle distance viewing the battle. Jol reproves the recalcitrant captains and attempts to renew the engagement an hour later, only to notice the same reluctance, so he abandons his second attack before nightfall. The Dutch suffer approximately 50 dead and 150 wounded this day, as opposed to 82 dead and 134 injured among their Spanish opponents. Both fleets also sustain considerable damage so spend the next two days repairing their ships within sight of each other. Jol tries to resume the fight on September 3 with 13 ships, but the Spaniards now enjoy the wind, and some Dutch commanders remain as laggard as before. Only the crippled Carmen is further damaged before the Dutch draw off at the approach of de Ibarra’s menacing San Mateo. The rescued galleon, with 20 dead and 28 wounded, seeks refuge in nearby Bahía Honda, from where it will eventually be escorted into Havana by two Cuban coast-guard galleys.

De Ibarra persists in trying to gain Havana until the afternoon of September 5, when he reverses course to sail across the Gulf of Mexico and seek sanctuary in Veracruz. Jol’s ships remain off Cuba until September 17, when they cruise as far west as the Órganos, vainly searching for their vanished prey. The Spanish treasure fleet enters Veracruz one week later, amid great rejoicing at their safe delivery. When word of this action reaches Madrid, de Ibarra is elevated to the title of Marqués de Taracena. Jol meanwhile sends one of his squadrons back to Brazil and allows another to prowl through the Caribbean; he returns to Holland with his remaining ships. There he is awarded a gold chain and medal for his efforts, while seven of his captains are court-martialed for cowardice.

JANUARY 1639. Some 46 Hispano-Portuguese ships reach Baía de Todos os Santos under the Portuguese admiral Fernando de Mascarenhas, Conde da Torre, bearing 5,000 reinforcements for Brazil. However, another 3,000 have succumbed during their lengthy transatlantic passage, prompting da Torre to ignore his instructions for an immediate assault against Dutch Recife in favor of recuperating his men’s health at São Salvador and training Brazilian auxiliaries for an offensive the next year.

FEBRUARY 1639. A group of Dutch rovers raid Guanaja Island, north of Trujillo (Honduras).

JULY–AUGUST 1639. Dutch raiders prowl along northern Honduras, landing at Puerto Cabellos or Caballos (today Puerto Cortés) before coasting westward to the Ulúa River and Omoa, clashing briefly against a Spanish landholder and his retainers. The rovers then proceed into Amatique Bay where a 20-man sloop even penetrates Golfo Dulce—Golfete—to forage, until opposed by the merchant bark of Francisco Santillán.

SEPTEMBER 1639. Two Dutch privateers appear off Utila Island (Honduras), landing to set fire to its tiny Spanish settlement. They then visit a like treatment upon Roatán, frightening its few Spanish inhabitants into fleeing across to the mainland. Over the next few years, these uninhabited islands become an increasingly popular haven for poachers, smugglers, and pirates.

LATE 1639. A lone Dutch ship, supported on land by Indian allies, attacks the Portuguese garrison holding Fort Santo Antônio do Gurupá in the Amazon Delta, being repelled by the defenders commanded by João Pedro de Cáceres.

JANUARY 12, 1640. Itamaracá. Having sortied from Baía de Todos os Santos, Admiral Conde da Torre appears this morning off Pau Amarelo Beach with 87 Hispano-Portuguese ships. They steer for the northern point of Itamaracá Island and Goiana to disembark 1,200 troops under mestre de campo

Barbalho Bezerra and challenge the Dutch hold over Pernambuco before proceeding toward Europe with the annual Brazilian sugar convoy. Da Torre's battle fleet is comprised of 23 Portuguese warships under Adm. Francisco de Melo e Castro and Vice Adm. Cosme do Couto Barbosa, plus 18 Spanish men-of-war under Adm. Juan de la Vega y Bazán (soon to be appointed governor of Panama) and Vice Adm. Francisco Díaz Pimienta.

Before any disembarkation can be effected, however, 20 Dutch ships emerge from Recife, under Adm. Willem Corneliszoon Loos and Vice Adm. Jacob Huygens, to engage this formation by 3:00 p.m. that same afternoon as it straggles past Ponta de Pedras Beach. Although the action soon degenerates into a confused melee, with Loos being killed after three hours, his second-in-command continues the pursuit the next day from Goiana as far as Cabo Branco and, on January 14, fights another pitched battle against the Hispano-Portuguese fleet off the Paraíba River mouth, capturing the Portuguese galleon of Capt. Antônio da Cunha Andrade with its 250-man crew. A Spanish vessel runs aground on some reefs and is boarded by the men from the dead Loos's flagship Zwaan, which also sinks. Another Dutch ship is lost, along with a total of 106 men of the Dutch force.

Although these are the only losses incurred on either side, the battles are regarded as a Dutch victory because the Hispano-Portuguese formation is compelled to divide and continue northwestward without touching land. They withstand another pounding off Cunhaú on January 17 before the Portuguese finally deposit their troops at Touros and Pipa bays near Cape São Roque in Rio Grande do Norte province—much too far away to pose any danger to the Dutch colony in Pernambuco—and then stand out into the Atlantic for the Azores and Europe, while some of the Spanish vessels sheer off for Cumaná. Huygens's dispersed Dutch vessels regroup off the Potengi River mouth and return triumphantly into Recife by February 1. The Portuguese admiral da Torre is arrested and stripped of his titles upon reaching Spain, charged with not doing his utmost during this campaign—further embittering Hispano-Portuguese relations. Barbalho Bezerra meanwhile takes four months to trudge back into Salvador with his small army.

FEBRUARY 20, 1640. Dutch raiders from the Wild Coast penetrate the Orinoco River, torching Santo Tomé (Venezuela). The Spaniards reconstruct their town once more and two and a half years later receive veteran captain Martín de Mendoza from Trinidad as its new governor.

MARCH 26, 1640. Some 28 Dutch ships, manned by 2,500 soldiers and sailors, arrive at Recife from Holland under the shared leadership of admirals Jol and Lichthart; the former is to exercise seniority during Caribbean operations, the latter during Brazilian ones, as Lichthart is an experienced officer who speaks fluent Portuguese, having lived for many years in Lisbon as well as having previously been stationed in Pernambuco (see "December 8, 1633" entry).

Shortly thereafter, Lichthart departs with 1,300 men aboard his squadron to cruise southwestward and raid São Salvador, destroying 27 sugar mills throughout its fertile Recôncavo hinterland before returning into Recife by June. Jol then prepares the entire fleet to hunt a Spanish treasure convoy in the Caribbean.

JULY 4, 1640. A small Dutch colonizing expedition returns to the Unare River (see "August 25, 1633" entry) to reestablish the Dutch claim over its salt pans. Although not numerous, this group is well organized, arriving with a prefabricated 22-gun fortress with 60 musket-slits, which they assemble ashore within a week.

JULY 14, 1640. Jol departs Recife with 2,000 sailors and 1,700 soldiers manning his flagship Salamander, Lichthart's flagship Aemilia, Vice Adm. Bartel Wouters's Middelburg, the Witte Leeuw, the Witte Eenhoorn, the Alkmaar, the Goeree, the Utrecht, the Zaaijer, the Tijger van Amsterdam, the Keizerin, the Graaf Ernst (or the Ernestus), the Sint Pieter, the Nassau, the Kampen, the Bol van Hoorn, the Haas, the Maagd van Enkhuizen, the Regenboog, the Schop, the Tijger van Rotterdam, the Leiderdorp, and the Cattenbau. It is Jol's aim to enter the Caribbean and steal upon Cuba, again intercepting a homeward-bound Spanish plate fleet. By August 10, he reaches Ile à Vache (Haiti), pausing a week to refresh provisions before proceeding to his familiar hunting grounds off Havana.

AUGUST 26, 1640. At the Unare River (Venezuela), a Spanish force under Capt. Juan de Orpín or Urpín launches a dawn assault against its newly re-established Dutch fortification. The attackers consist of 80 militiamen from the town of Nueva Barcelona, 40 from Nueva Tarragona, plus numerous native allies. Daunted by its imposing appearance, de Orpín deliberately makes his initial attack with a single weak column, keeping two others in hiding. When this initial force breaks and scatters, the Dutch sally from behind their walls, only to be surprised by the hidden companies and engulfed in a general melee. Francisco Tiquisper, the son of a cacique or Indian chieftain, distinguishes himself during this action by personally slaying five Dutchmen.

Once out in the open, the Dutch cannot disengage and must rush forth reinforcements for an action in which they are heavily outnumbered and beyond the protection of their walls. The day ends with a crushing Spanish victory, 100 Dutchmen being slaughtered compared to 17 dead and 14 wounded among the attackers. De Orpín's men pour into the fort, and the surviving Dutch set it ablaze and flee aboard their ships, standing out to sea. The Spaniards extinguish the flames, then leave a garrison behind to hold the place and prevent future Dutch reoccupations.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1640. Jol arrives off northwestern Cuba with 36 sail, having been reinforced during his Caribbean crossing by two yachts from Curaçao, plus 10 privateers. Detaching three vessels to watch over Cape San Antonio and Florida's Dry Tortugas, Jol reorganizes his remaining fleet into squadrons of 7 ships and 4 yachts apiece under his own flag, plus Lichthart's and Wouters's. The Dutch then send a single vessel two days later to look into Havana, confirming that no plate fleet has yet arrived, before settling down to their blockade.

The new Spanish governor, Álvaro de Luna Sarmiento, Knight of the Order of Alcántara, has already learned of Jol's approach, however, and written to warn the treasure fleet commanders at Veracruz and Cartagena. Thus Jol cruises unavailingly until the afternoon of September 11, when his fleet is struck by a hurricane out of the north-northwest. After it blows itself out four days later, seven of his ships are gone: three being driven deep into the Old Bahama Channel while the Alkmaar, the Bol van Hoorn, the Keizerin, and the Cattenbao lie wrecked on the coast between Havana and Mariel.

The sargento mayor or "garrison commander" Lucas Carvajal is delegated by de Luna to extract salvage from their remains, returning into the capital with 261 Dutch prisoners, 17 bronze cannon, 48 iron guns, and assorted equipment retrieved from around Jarmanita, Bagne, Mosquitos, and Herradura. Jol attempts to ransom his countrymen one week later, on September 20, then quits his blockade altogether by September 28. Pausing at Matanzas to refresh, the Dutch admiral sends foraging parties inland until October 7, when his fleet exits the Florida Strait for Pernambuco.

DECEMBER 1, 1640. Portugal revolts against Spanish rule, proclaiming the 8th Duke of Bragança as King João IV in place of Philip IV. The 60-year-old union with Spain has never been popular with the masses, although some Portuguese nobility and bourgeoisie supported it at first for the security it afforded their empire and the possibilities of tapping into the markets of Mexico and Peru. Spain's decline by 1640 is so palpable, however, that its military support is useless, while Portuguese merchants are systematically being excluded from the Americas. Added to these complaints are the centralizing tendencies of the chief minister at Madrid—Gaspar de Guzmán, Conde-Duque de Olivares—who seeks to subordinate Portugal's administration to that of Castile while steeply elevating taxes to meet Spanish needs.

The Dutch initially greet news of this Portuguese rebellion with enthusiasm, expecting the latter to become their natural allies against Spain; yet this hope soon founders upon the realization that Holland will be expected to restore the Portuguese territories that it has seized during the war.

FEBRUARY 26, 1641. Having sortied from Havana to Cape Corrientes earlier this month to chase away any Dutch interlopers prowling off Cuba's shoreline, the battle fleet of Adms. Gerónimo Gómez de Sandoval and Juan de Vega Bazán has circled around the southern coast to within sight of the port of Cabañas. At 4:00 a.m. the next day, 17 Dutch vessels appear. They pause to form up into battle formation and then charge into the waiting Spaniards five hours later.

The 54-gun Dutch flagship drives its bowsprit straight into the rigging of Gómez de Sandoval's 860-ton flagship San Marcos, and a three-hour exchange ensues. The Spaniards aboard note how their opponent has "many people on deck, a thing not seen on a ship from Holland." The San Marcos suffers 23 killed and 50 wounded, among the latter being its captain, Francisco de Araya. Vega Bazán's vice-flagship also endures 31 casualties, among them its captain, Pedro de Ursúa. The galleon of Capt. Sancho de Urdanivia furthermore displays two flags prominently throughout this engagement, so it is heavily attacked as well.

Action is broken off, and the Spaniards circle back around the island toward Havana. On March 3, they are overtaken off Mariel by 13 of their Dutch pursuers and engaged for a second time at 3:00 p.m. Urdanivia's galleon lags behind and becomes surrounded by five Dutch vessels, obliging the main Spanish force to turn back to its rescue. Gómez de Sandoval's flagship endures another eight dead and four wounded before the Spaniards win free. The vice-flagship suffers another 30 casualties, the galleon of Capt. Jacinto Meléndez, a further 25, and 22 casualties occur aboard the Gallega, including Don Luis de Nava, Knight of the Order of Santiago.

MAY 30, 1641. Despite hospitably receiving Portuguese and Brazilian peace emissaries at his capital of Recife, Governor-General Maurits vigorously continues prosecuting Holland's war effort by dispatching an expedition of 20 ships, manned by 850 sailors and more than 2,000 soldiers (including 240 Indians) under Jol and Vice Admiral Huygens, to seize Portugal's slaving depots in Angola before any treaty can be officially concluded back in Europe—thereby greatly outraging Portuguese sentiment.

JUNE 12, 1641. In Europe, a 10-year truce is arranged between Portugal and the Netherlands, which is to go into effect in Brazil six months after both governments have ratified it.

OCTOBER 15, 1641. Sack of Gibraltar. Four Dutch men-of-war of 20, 14, 8, and 4 guns apiece—plus a Spanish prize sloop, intercepted as it arrives from Jamaica—appear off Maracaibo's bar under Commo. Hendrik Gerritz. This expedition of 250–275 men has been sent by the new governor of Curaçao, Jan Claeszoon van Campen (a prisoner of the Spaniards eight years previously on Sint Maarten; see "June 24, 1633" entry), to raid the Spanish Main because its defenses are seriously weakened following a massive earthquake on June 11. After seizing a tiny vessel performing salvage work, under Vicente Viaña and Mateo Corneles, on a recently wrecked Spanish frigate just inside this bar, Gerritz works his 20-gun flagship Neptune and four consorts across, to approach Maracaibo (then called Nueva Zamora) by Friday, October 18.

Instead of immediately storming its walls, Gerritz bypasses this place the next morning, hurrying across the Laguna in hopes of falling upon the southeastern town of San Antonio de Gibraltar, whose rich tobacco crop has just been harvested.

Two other Spanish boats are intercepted that same afternoon, and another the next day (June 20), which the Dutch incorporate into their flotilla in place of Viaña's prize, which is burned. After landing briefly at Barbacoas de Moporo to plunder, Gerristz presses on toward Gibraltar, encountering Diego Suárez's 6-gun vessel, which has been sent out to reconnoiter. Gerristz chases it into the shallows, where it runs aground and is abandoned, after which the Dutch arrive before Gibraltar. They storm ashore the next morning with 200 men, encountering scant opposition as Gov. Félix Fernández de Guzmán and the citizenry flee inland. Gerristz spends the next five days stripping Gibraltar's outlying districts of tobacco and cacao, as well as refloating Suárez's vessel and incorporating it into his flotilla.

Reversing course after torching Gibraltar, Gerristz visits a like treatment upon the villages of Moporo and Tomocoro before reappearing off Maracaibo the morning of October 31. Its garrison of 230 Spanish militiamen, 120 native auxiliaries, and three artillery pieces is now well prepared to resist under Deputy Gov. Francisco Corneles Briceño, and a heated artillery exchange ensues between 11:00 a.m. and 3:00 p.m., until Gerristz sends a flag-of-truce inshore to propose a ceasefire. The Spaniards refuse, loosing off two more shots, but the battle is effectively over. The Dutch hover out of range until nightfall, when they set their prisoners ashore and sail back out of the Laguna three days later. The provincial governor, Ruy Fernández de Fuenmayor (see "January 4, 1634" in "Other Colonial Struggles"), organizes a belated relief force of 100 Spanish troops and 400 Indian auxiliaries at La Guaira and Coro to be shipped aboard three frigates, although this expedition is soon cancelled.

NOVEMBER 24, 1641. Seizure of Maranhão. Despite the impending Luso-Dutch rapprochement in Europe, an expedition of 13 ships, 3 brigantines, and 3 minor vessels manned by 1,000 sailors under Lichthart—dispatched from Recife by Maurits—stands into São Marcos Bay and disembarks 1,000 troops under Col. Pieter Baas to seize the Captaincy of Maranhão. The next day, these invaders fight their way into its capital of São Luis via the Desterro Gate, which along with Fort São Filipe is completely unprepared and falls easily despite the efforts of Governor Maciel Parente, captains Francisco de Carvalho and Paulo Soares de Avelar, as well as the gunner Matias João. The Dutch thereby gain control over the entire island of São Luis and the fertile lowlands along the Itapicuru River to its southeast, hence now occupying more than 1,000 continuous miles of Brazilian coastline.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1642. The refugee plantation owner and former regional governor Antônio Muniz Barreiros, seconded by the militia officers Antônio Teixeira de Melo and Soares de Avelar, initiate a rural revolt against the Dutch occupiers of the Captaincy of Maranhão, overrunning several plantations along the Itapicuru River banks before surprising and massacring 300 defenders at Fort Monte Calvário.

Colonel Baas checks these insurgents' advance against the capital of São Luis during a clash on November 21 at Outeiro da Cruz on the Cutim River yet nonetheless must retreat inside the city to await reinforcements, which appear in the form of 500 men aboard seven ships from Recife. Muniz Barreiros's forces, meanwhile, are increased by 113 Portuguese soldiers and more than 700 native warriors sent by the governor Pedro de Albuquerque of neighboring Pará.

OCTOBER 5, 1642. Bonaire Counterraid. In retaliation for Gerristz's foray, Governor Fernández raises (with considerable difficulty) a force of 300 reluctant troops—half Spanish militiamen, half native auxiliaries—to venture out of Caracas and attack Bonaire and Curaçao. Arriving off the former island on the night of October 5 in rough seas, his expedition almost ends disastrously when many boats capsize during the disembarkation. An arduous march toward the distant Dutch stronghold follows. Bonaire's 40-man garrison is so frightened, however, that they set fire to their fort and retreat aboard a single ship, sailing away to advise the newly installed governor of Curaçao, Pieter Stuyvesant.

Fernández remains at Bonaire until October 17, wreaking havoc and slaughtering many horses and cattle to hinder future Dutch reoccupation. He then returns into La Guaira without attacking Curaçao, his strength now being enfeebled by drownings and disease, plus having lost the element of surprise.

LATE NOVEMBER 1642. Seeking to avenge the Spanish attack on Bonaire, Stuyvesant sends a pair of Dutch ships under Captain "Jacob" to assault Puerto Cabello, where they sink four Spanish frigates. A second descent farther west against Coro and adjacent Cape San Román during the second week of December proves less successful, because the marauders are checked by 18 Spanish militiamen and 50 Indian allies under the maestre de campo Joaquín de Velgara. Despite this, the Dutch rustle 2,500 cattle, sheep, and goats to help restock Bonaire.

EARLY JANUARY 1643. Muniz Barreiros's Brazilian insurgents advance out of the Itapicuru River lowlands to besiege the outnumbered Dutch occupiers inside Fort São Filipe, the citadel guarding the anchorage at the provincial capital of São Luis do Maranhão. Baas launches a sally with 420 Dutch troops and 160 native allies, which is repelled after two hours of hard fighting, although Muniz Barreiros is wounded during this clash and dies of his injury on January 16. He is succeeded by his second-in-command, Teixeira de Melo, who maintains a close investiture of the Dutch citadel by fortifying São Luis's Carmelite monastery opposite it. Although confined to their shoreline keep, the garrison remains stubbornly in place for another year, as Dutch mastery over the sea keeps them regularly supplied through São Marcos Bay.

MAY 3, 1643. Brouwer's Failed Colony. The WIC ships Amsterdam, Eendracht, Vlissingen, and Dolfijn appear off the Chiloé Archipelago, hoping to establish a base among its Araucan natives. The expedition arrives with several engineers, assorted construction materials, and 92 cannon to erect a stronghold capable of resisting Spanish counterattacks.

Its commander, Hendrik Brouwer, has quit Texel on November 6, 1642, with the Amsterdam, the Eendracht, and the Vlissingen, touching at Pernambuco to refresh supplies and gain another two ships—one of which, the Oranje, then being lost—before putting to sea again on January 15, 1643, to round Cape Horn.

The Dutch begin their South Pacific sojourn by seizing the tiny Spanish outpost at Carelmapu, then on June 6 disembark a force of musketeers and pikemen near Castro in southern Chile. Gov. Francisco de Herrera attempts to resist with a body of horsemen, only to be killed, after which his followers scatter. Brouwer remains in possession of this town until August 17, when he succumbs to disease. His successor, Elias Herckemans, continues the Dutch progression north toward Valdivia, backed by his Araucan allies. Illness and discord, however, drain his forces. The Dutch therefore dig in instead, erecting a small fort and 60 houses near the seashore.

They remain here for almost a year, enduring want and occasional clashes with the natives. Finally its survivors sail away, reaching Recife by October 28, 1644. Shortly thereafter, a Peruvian expedition arrives aboard 13 vessels to occupy the abandoned fortification in Chile, installing a 700-man garrison under the maestre de campo Alfonso de Villanueva Soberal.

NOVEMBER 25, 1643. Charles Poncet, Seigneur de Brétigny, arrives off the Guianese coast with 400 Norman colonists from Rouen, raised by his Compagnie du Cap Nord or "North Cape Company." This expedition disembarks in the estuary called Mahoury or Mahury, finding five Frenchmen already living there, plus a few Dutch settlers occupying the "Mont Cépérou" height farther northwest, which commands the best anchorage.

Legend has it that Cépérou was the name of the local Galibi chieftain who had originally ceded this spot to the Dutch settlers. Poncet soon reaches a like accommodation with his son "Caïenne" or Cayenne and so is allowed to install his own colony. Plots are distributed, and a temporary Capuchin temple is even erected at "Montabo" on modern Conobé Bay.

But the sweltering heat, epidemics, and starvation will lead to a revolt against Brétigny's hard-fisted rule on March 4, 1644, after which some 60 of his disgruntled followers emigrate to join the more promising Anglo-Dutch settlement at Suriname. Freed from incarceration two and a half months later, Brétigny cannot stem the deterioration of his reduced colony and is killed during an Indian insurrection on June 14, 1645. Some 40 survivors eventually flee to the West Indian island of Saint Kitts, leaving behind another 30 scattered members.

FEBRUARY 28, 1644. After being closely besieged by Portuguese guerrilla forces for more than a year within Fort São Filipe on the fringe of the devastated capital of the northern Brazilian province of Maranhão, its Dutch garrison finally decides to withdraw. Some 450 WIC soldiers and personnel therefore set sail from São Luis for Curaçao under David Adam Wiltshut, arriving there during the first week of April. When provisions on that island also begin to run scarce as a consequence of this unexpected influx, many of the soldiers are shipped farther north to New Netherland (modern New York State) to assist its regional director or "governor," Willem Kieft, in his Indian campaigns.

In Brazil, meanwhile, the Portuguese success in Maranhão—coupled with a diminished aura of Dutch invincibility—inspires native unrest in the occupied Captaincy of Ceará, where Gideon Morritz is massacred along with his small garrison.

MARCH 20, 1644. Stuyvesant's Defeat. Gov. Pieter Stuyvesant of Curaçao leads five large Dutch vessels, a pink, and two tenders on a campaign to reconquer the former WIC base of Sint Maarten. After pausing at Saint Kitts to recruit English and French volunteers, he arrives off the eastern shores of Sint Maarten at dawn on March 20. He is accompanied by a half-dozen merchantmen vessels, which continue northward while Stuyvesant's squadron veers inshore to bombard the lone Spanish fortification, then anchor nearby and disembark several hundred troops. The Dutch spend the next two days installing a three-gun battery atop some heights before calling upon the Spanish governor Diego Guajardo Fajardo on March 22 to lay down his arms. Despite low morale, poor equipment, and insufficient rations, the 120-man Spanish garrison refuses to surrender; Stuyvesant, therefore, initiates a long-range bombardment the next dawn.

A chance Spanish countershot destroys the Dutch commander's right leg while he is standing beside his battery, requiring Stuyvesant to be carried back aboard ship for amputation below the knee. This injury leaves his small army leaderless, undermining their resolve. Nevertheless, on the night of March 31–April 1, an assault column steals under cover of darkness toward the Spanish positions—almost escaping the sentinels' detection because all are musketeers (hence carrying no lit cords). Once discovered, however, a firefight erupts and lasts until dawn, during which at least five Dutch attackers are killed as opposed to a single Spaniard. A second, even more half-hearted attempt is made at 9:00 p.m. on April 3, which is easily repelled; no further assaults are made. On the night of April 15–16, a Puerto Rican coaster under the sargento mayor Baltasar de Alfaro lands refreshments for Guajardo's garrison, snapping the besiegers' will. The attackers retire to their ships, and a Dutch rearguard blows up the siege-guns and fires the encampments on April 17, after which the flotilla departs toward Sint Eustatius, then Curaçao. Stuyvesant eventually departs for Holland in August to convalesce from his wound.

On Sint Maarten, meanwhile, the Spaniards— notwithstanding their victory—are more reluctant than ever to remain in such an exposed outpost, being seldom resupplied or reinforced. Consequently, they request evacuation from the Puerto Rican governor, Francisco de la Riva Agüero, Knight of the Order of Santiago, who finally complies three years later.

MAY 23, 1644. Count Maurits departs Recife for Holland, his administration of Netherlandic Brazil ending in economic depression and simmering unrest.

AUGUST 27, 1644. The Portuguese officer André Vidal de Negreiros visits Recife, ostensibly making a courtesy call whilst en route to Bahia but actually bearing secret instructions from King João IV to foment a local uprising. Despite the uneasy accommodation reached three years previously between Lisbon and The Hague—whereby the former has agreed to recognize Dutch sovereignty in Brazil in exchange for supporting Portugal in its rebellion against Spain—sentiment in Brazil is coalescing in favor of expelling the Dutch, an objective that the Portuguese king also desires but cannot openly embrace while still embroiled in hostilities against the Spaniards.

MAY 23, 1645. Eighteen Pernambucan conspirators secretly meet under the leadership of 43-year-old João Fernandes Vieira, a Madeira-born mulatto planter, planning to initiate a revolt against Dutch rule on June 24—São João Day on the Church calendar, feast day of the Portuguese monarch. By inviting top Dutch officials to attend a fake wedding ceremony, they hope to capture the occupiers' high command at a single stroke, after which other rebels under the Tabatinga plantation-owner Amador de Araújo and the black leader Agostinho Domingos Fagundes will draw troops out of Recife by threatening the southern strongholds of Ipojuca and Cape Santo Agostinho, thereby clearing the way for another column under Antônio Dias Cardoso to seize the undefended capital.

JUNE 13, 1645. The plot being hatched is betrayed to the Dutch. When they order his arrest, Fernandes Vieira is compelled to flee prematurely into the interior with 50 companions to begin raising rebel forces. Four days later, de Araújo and Fagundes initiate the actual insurrection by advancing with 400 volunteers and taking the WIC headquarters at Ipojuca, fortifying themselves inside its monastery until chased out by the approach of a 500-man Dutch counterexpedition out of Recife under Lt. Col. Hendrik van Haus (also spelled Hous). Another 300 Dutch troops under Major Blaer are also sweeping through the back-bay area known as the Várzea, while a third 100-man company probes northward under Paul de Linge.

Van Haus vainly pursues the elusive guerrillas of Fagundes and de Araújo from Ipojuca, a diversion that allows some 2,400 undisciplined, ill-armed volunteers to rally over the next month and a half under Fernandes Vieira at Covas, the leaders often bickering over the next course of action.

JUNE 28, 1645. Two Portuguese regiments totaling 800 men under the veteran officers Soares Moreno and Vidal de Negreiros disembark at Tamandaré, having been sent from Bahia by the governor general Antônio Teles da Silva—supposedly to help the Dutch quell the rebellion in the province of Pernambuco but actually to provide the insurrection with covert support.

The escort squadron of eight Portuguese warships under the 51-year-old admiral Salvador Correia de Sá e Benevides remains at anchor until August 11, when it appears outside Recife and calls upon its garrison to surrender. The ships continue two days later toward Lisbon with the annual Brazilian sugar convoy.

JULY 31, 1645. Tabocas. After being visited at Covas by messengers sent by the Petiguar Indian chief-tain Antônio Filipe Camarão of the Captaincy of Paraíba promising that he will soon join them with his small army of native warriors, the main rebel body under Fernandes Vieira and his professional second-in-command Capt. Antônio Dias Cardoso learn that the Dutch column of van Haus is drawing near in pursuit of Fagundes's and de Araújo's guerrillas. The insurgents therefore break camp and proceed to Tabocas Hill—the highest point in the Comocim Range, 30 miles outside Recife—where Dias Cardoso hopes to lure the pursuers into a disadvantageous encounter.

After deploying his 1,600 men into prepared positions, camouflaged behind dense foliage, the Portuguese officer is informed on August 3 that the Dutch are approaching, so he sends skirmishers forward under Capt. João Nunes da Mata to draw the 400–500 pursuers and their 300 Tapuia allies into the trap. As van Haus's column fords the Tapacurá River that afternoon, Fagundes strikes with 40 of his guerrillas and draws them toward the dense vegetation at the foot of Tabocas Hill, where Capt. João Gomes de Melo's 25 concealed musketeers suddenly open fire at point-blank range. When the Dutch charge into the vegetation, they blunder into a second hidden line of two-dozen musketeers under Capt. Jerônimo Cunha do Amaral, and then a third ambushcade of 40 musketeers under Capt. João Paes Cabral.

Stung, the Dutch retreat back out into open country to regroup. Fagundes emerges from the foliage with 80 of his guerrillas and goads them into penetrating the underbrush once more. Unable to use their superior firepower and discipline to full advantage in such confinement, the attackers are defeated after four hours of heavy fighting, leaving behind more than 100 dead. Van Haus withdraws at sundown, sending his wounded back to Recife, while leading his 250 surviving Dutch troops and 200 Tapuia allies to Casa Forte mill. Brazilian losses total only 33 dead and 30 wounded, for Dias Cardoso's strategy has ensured that his 1,350-man reserve—which does not bear firearms and is led by the priest Simão de Figueiredo—remains unengaged throughout this clash.

AUGUST 10, 1645. The victorious army of Fernandes Vieira and Dias Cardoso unites at Gurjaú with the approaching guerrilla contingents of Henrique Dias and Camarão. Six days afterward they meet up with the Portuguese troops of Soares Moreno and Vidal de Negreiros at Cape Santo Agostinho, who have in the interim helped Capt. Paulo da Cunha Souto Maior subdue the Dutch outpost at Sirinhaém.

The next day, this combined host closes in on van Haus's outnumbered survivors at Casa Forte mill, their initial assault nonetheless being checked and resulting in the death of Fagundes and the serious wounding of Henrique Dias. Still, the odds are so prohibitive that the 250 Dutchmen feel compelled to surrender on condition that they will be deported to Europe; their 200 Tapuia allies are slaughtered.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1645. Inspired by the successful revolt in Pernambuco, Brazilians in the occupied Captaincy of Paraíba also rise up against the Dutch. Porto Calvo surrenders on September 17, and Fort Maurits, on the São Francisco River, surrenders the next day; furthermore, the Moradores of Sergipe del Rey revolt on September 22. All of these reverses mean that the Dutch lose control over most of Brazil's sugar-producing lands, and their 7,000 nationals become largely confined to Recife and its immediate vicinity, with only a handful of ships arriving from the Netherlands over the ensuing winter months to keep them supplied.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1645. The garrison holding Fort van der Dussen—formerly Fort Nazaré—at Cape Santo Agostinho surrenders without firing a shot, for its commander, Col. Dirck Hoogstraaten, is now a convert to Catholicism and a planter. He thus switches allegiance to the Brazilian cause.

SEPTEMBER 9, 1645. A Dutch fleet under Licht-hart attacks 14 Portuguese caravels and 2 lesser craft that have returned across the Atlantic into Tamarandá under Vice Adm. Jerônimo Serrão de Paiva, annihilating this formation. Ten caravels are burned and three others carried into Recife as prizes, while only one manages to escape. More importantly, hidden papers are discovered aboard the captive Portuguese flagship, revealing King João IV's complicity in the Pernambucan revolt, which the Dutch angrily publish.

OCTOBER 1645. To counter the revelation of Portugal's secret involvement and to justify their revolt, the Pernambucan rebels circulate a manifesto abroad that luridly complains of atrocities and abuses suffered under the Dutch West India Company and its Tapuia allies.

NOVEMBER 1645. News of the duplicity behind the insurrections in Brazil reaches The Hague, complicating the negotiations of the Portuguese ambassador Francisco de Souza Coutinho, whose house is threatened by Dutch mobs.

JANUARY 1, 1646. The turncoat Colonel Hoogstraaten, having erected a new fort called Arraial do Bom Jesus on the Capibaribe River banks, has the fort's artillery ceremoniously fire its first volley, signaling the imposition of a new siege of the Dutch within nearby Recife.

MAY 1646. Once the long winter in Europe breaks, a fleet of 20 ships bearing 2,000 troops under colonels von Schoppe and James Henderson departs the Netherlands to relieve the beleaguered Dutch outpost at Recife. The city's half-starved citizens are overjoyed to behold the supply ships Goude Valk and Elisabeth finally standing into their bay on June 22, followed by the rest of this straggling convoy over that ensuing month.

FEBRUARY 4, 1647. Some 26 Dutch ships sortie from Recife with 2,400 men under Colonel von Schoppe to occupy Itaparicá Island in Baía de Todos os Santos and raid its rich Recôncavo hinterland, as retaliation for their own lost sugar production in Pernambuco. The initial Dutch disembarkation on February 24 is contained by local Portuguese forces under the governor general Teles da Silva, but an ensuing counterattack by 1,200 Portuguese troops on March 10 is bloodily repulsed, resulting in more than 600 deaths. A second assault on the night of March 17–18 meets the same fate; consequently, the defenders refrain from direct attempts to dislodge von Schoppe's foothold at the island's northern extremity, his anchorage off the Paraguaçu River mouth being well protected by Fortress Sint Laurens (in Portuguese, the Fortaleza de São Lourenço).

MARCH 26, 1647. Appointed by the Portuguese king as mestre de campo general or supreme land commander for the Pernambucan revolt, the 31-year-old Peruvian-born Col. Francisco Barreto de Meneses of the Alentejo Cavalry Regiment sets sail from Salvador with a small force aboard five caravels and two pinnaces. Upon approaching his destination on

The Blauvelts' Cruises

In the spring of 1646, Capt. Willem Albertszoon Blauvelt returned into New Amsterdam (modern New York City) with his 6-gun, 50-man privateer La Garce. Fresh from its latest Caribbean cruise, it brought in the prize San Antonio of Havana, seized with a cargo of sugar and tobacco in the Bay of Campeche. The year before, Blauvelt had returned with two Spanish ships on April 27, 1645, loaded with tobacco, wine, sugar, and ebony. His shipowners profited so nicely that new investors quickly bought shares and sent the La Garce back out in December 1646. Another voyage would also be made in 1647.

The brothers Abraham and Willem Blauvelt, originally from Monnikendam near Amsterdam, had joined the English colony on Providencia Island as early as 1630. Three years later, they shifted over to the Central American coast when Sussex Carnock tried to establish a foothold at Cape Gracias a Dios. Although the Englishman gave up by June 1635, the Blauvelts created a small outpost farther south, at the mouth of the Escondido River. Abraham traveled to England in 1637 in a vain attempt to obtain a license for their new colony.

The next summer, Willem apparently sailed to New Amsterdam and obtained a privateering commission from the WIC. The La Garce cleared from there on its first cruise in September 1638.

May 6, though, they are intercepted by Dutch ships, and the pair of pinnaces is taken. Barreto de Meneses and his second-in-command, Filipe Bandeira de Melo, are both carried into Recife as prisoners.

AUGUST 1, 1647. At dawn, a Portuguese contingent under Capt. Francisco Rebelinho once again attempts to eject von Schoppe's bridgehead from Itaparicá Island in Baía de Todos os Santos, only to retreat in defeat.

AUGUST 10, 1647. After five months of debate, the States-General in Holland agree to finance a 12-ship, 6,000-man expedition to help the WIC retain its outposts in Brazil. Command is offered to the retired Count Nassau, who refuses unless the expedition is doubled in size—which it is not, so the veteran admiral Witte Corneliszoon de With is instead appointed.

OCTOBER 18, 1647. A Portuguese expedition of eight galleons, two frigates, three armed merchantmen, and two caravels sets sail from Lisbon with 1,000 seamen, 2,350 soldiers, and 462 volunteers under Brazil's new governor general designate Antônio Teles de Meneses, Conde de Vila Pouca de Aguiar, followed the next month by seven more ships and 600 men under Salvador de Sá.

NOVEMBER 7, 1647. A new Brazilian fort named Asseca, swiftly erected outside Recife within a span of 23 days, opens fire into the city, prompting its worried Dutch authorities to recall von Schoppe from his lengthy absence at Bahia.

DECEMBER 13–14, 1647. Von Schoppe's expedition demolishes Fortress Sint Laurens and forsakes its occupation of the northern point of Itaparicá Island, sailing out of Bahia to return into threatened Recife. The bombardment from Fort Asseca ceases shortly thereafter, the Portuguese having run out of heavy rounds.

JANUARY 23, 1648. After escaping from confinement in Recife on a dark night with their jailer's aid, Barreto de Meneses and his subordinate Bandeira de Melo reach the main Portuguese encampment at Arraial do Bom Jesus to assume overall command of the rebel forces operating under Vidal de Negreiros, the mulatto leader Fernandes Vieira, the black leader Dias, and the Indian chieftain Camarão.

JANUARY 30, 1648. Peace is officially concluded between the Netherlands and Spain by the signing of the Treaty of Westphalia at Münster. For Madrid, this accord represents the failure of its 80-year quest to subdue the Protestant Dutch rebels. This event is followed in October by the end to the Thirty Years' War in Central Europe—another strategic and religious setback for the Spaniards. Bankrupt and weak, they are left to fight on alone against Cardinal Jules Mazarin's resurgent France, while at the same time being hampered by revolt in Catalonia and hostility emanating from Portugal.

MARCH 18, 1648. Admiral de With reaches Recife with 17 scattered, storm-tossed warships and two-dozen consortships bearing 3,000 sailors and 3,000 soldiers. This reinforcement prompts the Dutch authorities, pent within the enclave, to begin planning on April 4 for a major sally out of their capital, which Barreto de Meneses in turn intends to counter by massing his troops for an all-out counterattack against the Dutch stronghold.

APRIL 16–17, 1648. First Battle of Guararapes. With music blaring and flags fluttering, von Schoppe begins crossing southward from Recife to Afogados shortly after midnight with 4,000 men in five regiments commanded by colonels Johan van de Brinck, Cornelis van den Brande, Adolph van Elst, Willem de Hautyn, and Pieter Heerweer. They are supported by 300 Tapuia auxiliaries and 700 black porters. Von Schoppe's immediate aim is to overrun the 86 men under Capt. Bartolomeu Soares Canhaio who are holding a redoubt at Barreta (the modern city's Boa Viagem suburb), then feint an attack against Arraial do Bom Jesus before proceeding to actually take the supply depot at Muribeca and menace the harbor at Cape Santo Agostinho. They will thereby compel the Portuguese to loosen their encirclement of the capital of Dutch Pernambuco. A sixth 500-man regiment under Col. Hendrik van Haus is to destroy sugar operations throughout the Várzea back-bay area before rejoining the main Dutch army.

The small Portuguese detachment defending Barreta is crushed by von Schoppe's host, suffering 47 dead and 7 captured, after which the Dutch encamp overnight around Nossa Senhora da Boa Viagem Church to await the arrival of their five fieldpieces, being lightered up the Tejió River. Meanwhile, Barreto de Meneses at Arraial do Bom Jesus—learning of this major sortie's true destination after a reconnaissance by Dias Cardoso—responds by leaving detachments to defend his base, then marching his 3,200 troops in four columns under Vidal de Negreiros, Fernandes Vieira, Dias, and Camarão for nine miles to confront von Schoppe amid the three hills directly behind the narrow Guararapes Plain (nine miles south of Recife and three miles short of Muribeca). The first Portuguese units arrive there on the evening of April 18, taking up concealed positions on Outeiro or Oitizeiro Hill by 10 p.m., thus controlling the Guararapes' boqueirão or "pass."

Von Schoppe resumes his advance for Muribeca early on April 19, encountering 200 Portuguese skirmishers under Dias Cardoso an hour later, who lure them into Barreto de Meneses's lines inside the pass by midday. The Dutch nonetheless gain one hilltop and mount a frontal assault with 1,700 men, but a downhill counterattack by Fernandes Vieira and Camarão on the Portuguese right bloodies the regiments of von Schoppe, van Elst, and Heerweer. After this counterattack, Dias engulfs van de Brinck's and Hautyn's regiments in hand-to-hand combat, where the Dutch advantage in musketry and discipline cannot be seen. The latter two regiments therefore break and flee, leaving behind their artillery and baggage trains; these are recovered once Colonel van Haus's reinforcements arrive and advance against Dias's ill-disciplined troops, who are busily ransacking the wagons. Still, van Haus is slain and Colonel van den Brande's follow-up counterattack is blunted by a 500-man detachment sent over from Vidal de Negreiros's command to bolster Dias (although they refuse to serve under this black leader, instead fighting independently to little effect).

After three hours of confused struggle, both armies break off, a wounded von Schoppe discovering upon regrouping that some 1,500 of his men are dead, wounded, or missing. The Dutch therefore begin an orderly retirement after nightfall toward Barreta, their retreat masked by heavy rain. Barreto de Meneses finds himself triumphant and alone upon the field the next dawn, having suffered 84 killed—including Camarão—and more than 400 wounded. After gathering up his stragglers and regaining Recife, von Schoppe calculates his own losses at 515 dead or captured, 523 wounded, and two lost artillery pieces. Colonels van Haus and van Elst are listed among the slain, and Heerweer is a prisoner. This victory allows the Portuguese to encircle the Dutch enclave even more closely, re-occupying the old mainland city of Olinda and shelling Recife from across its riverways. The hard-pressed garrison nonetheless survives thanks to Holland's supremacy at sea, as their supply ships continue to enter the port.

MAY 12, 1648. Having been reinforced by four Portuguese galleons and a transport shifted south-westward from Bahia, an expedition under Salvador de Sá quits Rio de Janeiro to sail across the South Atlantic and recuperate the Portuguese slaving stations of São Paulo de Luanda and São Tomé in Angola from Dutch occupation.

AUGUST 4, 1648. Barreto's forces threatening Recife are reinforced by a 300-man Portuguese infantry regiment from Madeira and the Azores, under the mestre de campo Francisco de Figueiroa.

SEPTEMBER 15–16, 1648. After a successful sweep in May through the Recôncavo district of Baía de Todos os Santos, Admiral de With confers with von Schoppe and other authorities in besieged Recife about possible future sorties. Learning that Portuguese warships are tentatively venturing out of their safe anchorage up the Matuim River north of Baía de Todos os Santos, the admiral hastens to sea again on September 22.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1648. Admiral de With's squadron arrives outside Baía de Todos os Santos and sights the Portuguese galleon São Bartolomeu and the ship Nossa Senhora do Rosário patrolling outside its entrance. He therefore detaches four Dutch warships on a favorable wind to engage them before they can regain their protective batteries. The former is captured by the Overijssel, but Capt. Pedro Carneiro defends the São Bartolomeu against the Utrecht and the Huys van Nassau until the galleon's magazine explodes, taking down both the Portuguese vessel and the Utrecht, while the Huys van Nassau emerges so badly damaged as to be abandoned. Some 400 Portuguese seamen lose their lives this day, compared to 150 Dutchmen.

DECEMBER 15, 1648. Despite failing to seize the Portuguese East Indiaman Santa Catarina, which anchors safely off the city of Salvador, Admiral de With's fleet prowls inside Baía de Todos os Santos virtually unopposed for a month, destroying 23 sugar mills and carrying away 1,500 crates of sugar. Dutch control of the sea is so complete that, although their presence in Brazil is now reduced to the lone, beleaguered enclave of Recife, Portuguese maritime traffic is almost at a standstill—some 220 of their ships having been intercepted upon the high seas between January 1, 1647, and December 31, 1648.

JANUARY 1649. In Europe, Spain offers to ally itself with the Netherlands against Portugal; however, because of Amsterdam and Friesland's reluctance, no joint declaration of war is made, only a few individual provinces issuing a few letters of reprisal.

FEBRUARY 4, 1649. Inspired by Admiral de With's successful sweep of Baía de Todos os Santos, the Dutch defenders of Recife decide to "sally in the name of God" and break the Portuguese encirclement of their city by challenging their besiegers to a pitched battle.

FEBRUARY 17–18, 1649. Second Battle of Guararapes. Because von Schoppe is not yet fully recovered from his wounds, 3,060 Dutch troops in four regiments under colonels Gervase Carpentier, Hautyn, van Elst, and van de Brande; 250 seamen for a half-dozen fieldpieces; 200 Tapuia allies under Chief Pedro Poti; plus 140 black porters begin crossing overnight from Recife into Afogados to march southward under the command of Colonel van de Brinck and confront the Portuguese at Guararapes. Barreto de Meneses learns of this sortie on the morning of February 18. He strikes out from his base camp of Arraial do Bom Jesus for the battlefield with the mestre de campo Francisco de Figueiroa's 300 Portuguese regulars in the van, followed by Vidal de Negreiros with another 300, Chief Diogo Pinheiro Camarão's 320 Indians, Dias's 330 black troops, and Fernandes Vieira's 1,350-man rearguard.

The first cavalry detachment of these 2,600 Portuguese troops crests Outeiro Hill by 4:00 p.m. on February 18, where they behold Brinck's army already deploying on the other two Guararapes hills; a confrontation is therefore deferred until the next morning, the Portuguese instead encamping around Novo, Guararapes, and Barachos sugar mills. The next day, Barreto de Meneses positions his troops under shade trees, yet does not attack the exposed Dutch lines. The latter remain sweltering under a blazing sun with little water until 3:00 p.m., when van de Brinck finally orders a retirement, intending to march his army through the rich Várzea district instead in hopes of provoking a direct challenge from the main Portuguese body.

However, just as the first Dutch regiments are repositioning for their march, two squadrons of cavalry storm across the gap under captains Antônio Silva and Manoel de Araújo, followed by Fernandes Vieira's foot soldiers attacking on the left and Vidal de Negreiros's on the right. Van de Brinck's troops respond well, but in the confusion, a gap appears in the Dutch center through which Barreto de Meneses sends his reserves. Van de Brinck's army disintegrates in confusion, the commander himself falling mortally wounded. After two hours of fierce close-quarter combat, Dutch losses total 927 dead, 89 wounded, and 428 captured, as opposed to 45 Portuguese killed and 245 injured. Abandoning their artillery and baggage trains, the Dutch reel back into Recife, leaving the field to the victorious Barreto de Meneses.

APRIL 3, 1649. A 300-man expedition out of Recife under Matias Beck arrives at Mucuripe Bay aboard five small vessels to reoccupy the coastal outlet for the province of Ceará, abandoned six years previously by its Dutch settlers. Beck's new expedition proceeds to Marajaitiba Creek (modern Pajeú) to reestablish a foothold, and one week later the engineer Richard Carr begins erecting a new fort atop the ruins of its old Portuguese São Sebastião fortress amid the Vila Velha's or "Old Town's" remnants. This new fort is to be named Fort Schonenburgh in honor of Wouter van Schonenburgh, one of Recife's two ruling councilors.

MAY 1649. Admiral de With begins an ineffectual blockade of Rio de Janeiro, returning into beleaguered Recife the next month where many of his long-suffering crewmen begin forsaking this isolated base for the Netherlands. As ship after ship departs, the admiral has no choice but to eventually follow, returning home in discouragement.

A simmering state of Luso-Dutch hostilities will persist for another five years, although with few major confrontations in the New World because of a gradual shift away from conquest in Holland's strategic thinking. Given that the United Provinces only has a population of 1.5 million people at this time, large overseas territories such as Brazil prove a burden that the small nation cannot afford to maintain. Holland therefore prefers to retain a string of trading outposts around the globe for its commercial traffic—now the world's largest. Otherwise, it sheds all extraterritorial ambitions.

When the First Anglo-Dutch War erupts in May 1652, the Portuguese avail themselves of this distraction to finally rid Brazil of its last Dutch occupiers. A fleet of 77 ships appears off Recife on December 20, 1653, under Pedro Jacques de Magalhães and Francisco de Brito Freire, closely besieging its defenders by January 14, 1654. The Dutch capitulate 13 days later, agreeing to surrender not only their capital but all remaining Dutch outposts in Brazil—Itamaracá, Paraíba, Rio Grande do Norte, Fernando de Noronha, and Ceará; they are given three months to depart forever. Many of the 1,200 Dutch colonists, who subsequently evacuate Pernambuco, resettle on Guadeloupe, Martinique, and other West Indian islands, becoming valuable assets. The Hague and Lisbon eventually settle their remaining differences with a treaty signed on August 6, 1661, whereby the latter agrees to pay 4 million cruzados as indemnity for the loss of Dutch Brazil.

OTHER COLONIAL STRUGGLES (1622–1640)

In the shadow of Dutch expansion, other European nations also gain outposts in the New World—first as shore bases for clandestine trade with Spanish America, then expanding into larger plantations for growing cash crops such as tobacco, indigo, logwood, and sugar. Virtually all are owned or operated by private monopolies, which import indentured servants and slaves to work these estates, with little direct involvement from their home governments. These early settlements remain vulnerable to both Spanish and native counterattacks, as well as the vagaries of international politics.

MARCH 22, 1622 (O.S.). Second Anglo-Powhatan War. At dawn this Good Friday, the new Algonquian werowance or "leader" Opechancanough breaks the truce with Virginia's English settlers by leading concerted surprise attacks at numerous locales. Opechancanough and his chief adviser—the mystical medicine man Nemattanew, called "Jack of the Feathers" by the English—have patiently crafted a plan to arm their followers, while at the same time lulling their enemies into a false sense of security. They are helped by tribal resentment against the increasing English landgrabs (spurred by a boom in London tobacco prices), as well as the naive leadership of both the new governor Sir Francis Wyatt and his religious cohort George Thorpe. Opechancanough himself feigns conversion to Anglicanism in late 1621, so when his onslaught begins, the colonists are caught completely unprepared.

The ruthlessness of his attack appalls the English; within the first few days, the Indians butcher 330 people—a third of all the colony's inhabitants—without taking prisoners. Jamestown barely escapes destruction after a friendly Indian gives last-minute warning on the very morning of the attack. Opechancanough's stroke inaugurates the Second Anglo-Powhatan War, and for several weeks the English reel from their losses, which are further exacerbated by famine and disease. Even when they mount some sort of counteroffensive, they find their enemies much more tenacious and skillful than before. In the autumn of 1624, a contingent of Virginia musketeers fights a fierce two-day gun battle with about 800 natives deep within Pamunkey territory, forcing them to retire with the greatest difficulty. Raid and counterraid ensue in which both Indians and colonists are systematically worn down.

A truce is eventually arranged in 1632, yet mutual distrust lingers. While the natives admit defeat, the English remain resentful of their former neighbors, harboring lasting enmity.

JULY 1622. Scottish settlers begin reaching Nova Scotia, authorized by a grant made by James I of Britain to William Alexander, despite prior French claims to this territory.

JANUARY 15, 1624. A feud between the Mexican viceroy Diego Carrillo de Mendoza y Pimentel, Marqués de los Gelves y Conde de Priego, and Archbishop Juan Pérez de la Cerna erupts into rioting when the latter is ordered deported to Spain, halting all religious services. The unpopular Gelves attempts to summon Mexico City's 4,000 militiamen to his aid, but they ignore his repeated calls, leaving him besieged within his palace, protected by only a handful of ceremonial guards. Toward evening, the mob fights its way indoors, and a disguised Gelves flees to a Franciscan monastery. Mexico is subsequently governed until late October by its audiencia or "high tribunal" until the new viceroy, Rodrigo Pacheco y Osorio, Marqués de Cerralvo, can arrive from Spain.

JANUARY 28, 1624. Founding of Saint Kitts. Sixteen English colonists arrive aboard the small ship of Thomas Warner, who—as a member of North's failed colonizing effort in Guyana four years previously—has reconnoitered this West Indian island for several months before returning to England in 1622. Convinced that it will make a safe and profitable tobacco colony, Warner forms a partnership with a London merchant named Ralph Merifield to underwrite this venture.

Warner's settlers erect a fort, build some houses, and begin planting crops. They are soon joined by a group of French colonists who, having been deposited earlier in Guiana by Captain Chantail of Lyon, have been driven out of that territory by its Indians. Because of their small numbers and fears of Carib hostility, both groups agree to share Saint Kitts.

SPRING 1624. In England, the heir to the throne (soon to become Charles I) and his favorite, George Villiers, 1st Duke of Buckingham, persuade Parliament to authorize a naval war against Spain, the government of which is refusing to allow relief to reach the Protestants of Central Europe. Although this cause proves popular with the English people, the House of Commons refuses to vote funds for operations on the Continent, thereby hampering its prosecution. The result is that, while England remains officially at war with Spain for the next six and a half years (until the signing of the Treaty of Madrid in November 1630), its military efforts prove insignificant, and no major expeditions are dispatched into the New World.

SEPTEMBER 1625. A four-gun French brigantine with 40 men under Capt. Urbain du Roissey, Sieur de Chardonville—seconded by his good friend, 40-year-old Pierre Belin d'Esnambuc—engages a Spanish ship off southern Cuba, being badly mauled.

Limping eastward in search of refuge, the Frenchmen chance upon Saint Kitts two weeks later, where they are given sanctuary by its Anglo-French settlers. Erecting a tiny fort at its northern extremity (called Pointe de Sable), du Roissey and d'Esnambuc remain six months before sailing to France with a cargo of tobacco. In the autumn of 1626, they persuade the royal minister, Cardinal Armand Jean du Plessis de Richelieu, to create the Compagnie de Saint Christophe for the colonization and commercial exploitation of this island outpost.

NOVEMBER 1625. Some 500 Carib raiders arrive on Saint Kitts, only to be repelled by its few-score Anglo-French settlers.

DECEMBER 1625. Another Carib foray is defeated by the Anglo-French defenders of Saint Kitts.

MARCH 1627. In England, recently crowned Charles I—already fighting a listless war against Spain—becomes further enmeshed in France’s religious strife as well by offering succor to its hard-pressed Huguenots within La Rochelle. His declaration of war proves worthless—the royal favorite Buckingham leading a motley force of 6,000 men across the English Channel, only to lose half of them—while drawing England into a two-year conflict with France.

MAY 8, 1627. D’Esnambuc and du Roissey return to Saint Kitts, hoping to convert it into a French colony—for which purpose the former has shipped 322 men aboard his vessel Catholique from Le Havre, while the latter brings 210 Bretons aboard the Vic-toire and the Cardinale. Their transatlantic crossing is difficult, fully half these men reaching the Antilles dead or dying.

Saint Kitts’s Anglo-French inhabitants have suffered a serious falling-out with its natives during the two leaders’ absence, killing many and driving most others off the island. Fearful of Carib reprisals, the English and French agree to cooperate, signing a partition agreement on May 13 whereby d’Esnambuc will govern the northern portion of Saint Kitts around Pointe de Sable, Warner the middle part around Fort Charles, and du Roissey the southern section around Basseterre.

MARCH 1628. The Anglo-French brothers David and Lewis Kirke quit Boston with three ships, armed with a letter of marque, to assault French settlements in Canada. After seizing Miscou Island, they enter the Saint Lawrence Seaway, ravaging Tadoussac and Cape Tourmente before calling upon Governor de Champlain to surrender Quebec City. The latter refuses, and the Kirkes withdraw.

However, below Tadoussac on July 17, they encounter a relief convoy near Barnabé Island arriving from France under Claude Rougemont de Brisson, whom they take the next day after a prolonged exchange in which each side fires off 1,200 heavy shot. The Kirkes retire to New England with their prizes.

JULY 22, 1628. An Irish planter named Anthony Hilton arrives at Nevis with 100 men, founding a new English colony.

SPRING 1629. Quebec Campaign. Unaware of the peace, New England resumes its offensive against French Canada. William Alexander Jr. lands two shiploads of colonists and soldiers at deserted Port Royal (Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia) to erect Fort Charles, while another 60 Scottish settlers reach Cape Breton under James Stewart, Lord Ochiltree, to build Fort Rosamar (later Louisbourg).

Meanwhile, the Kirkes penetrate the Saint Lawrence Seaway as far as Tadoussac, from where 32-year-old David sends his younger brothers Lewis and Thomas with three ships to once more call upon Governor de Champlain to surrender Quebec City. The main New England fleet intercepts a lone French relief ship under Emery de Caen, persuading Champlain to finally capitulate on July 19. The next day, Thomas Kirke goes ashore with 150 men, beginning the evacuation of Quebec City and installing a British garrison. Champlain and the first French prisoners reach Tadoussac by August 1, and Quebec’s final evacuation occurs on September 9.

Off Cape Breton, a French relief fleet arrives too late to save Quebec, so instead drives the Scots out of Fort Rosmar, building a new fort with 40 soldiers nearby before returning toward France. (Three years later, on March 29, 1632, Quebec is restored to French rule by the Treaty of Saint Germain en Laye.)

APRIL 24, 1629. In Europe, the Treaty of La Suze or Susa marks an end to the war between England and France.

LATE JULY 1629. Six French men-of-war arrive at Saint Kitts under François de Rotondy, Sieur de Cahuzac, led by the flagship Trois Rois. They have been sent by Richelieu to aid the French settlers against their English neighbors, who have grown much more numerous and contentious. (Originally, the cardinal’s intent has been to dispossess the English altogether, but this objective changes once the Treaty of La Suze is signed in April.) The English governor Sir Thomas Warner being absent in London, his son Edward is told to withdraw certain colonists who have encroached upon French territory. When the Englishman hesitates, Cahuzac sails to Fort Charles and opens fire upon a half-dozen vessels lying in its roadstead. Three are driven ashore, the remainder cut out by French boarding parties, despite a brisk counterfire from the British batteries. The English sue for terms, so Cahuzac returns his three prizes, and the island's partition treaty is reconfirmed late in August.

Cahuzac thereupon detaches his second-in-command, Captain Giron, to make a reconnaissance throughout the West Indies, while he proceeds to Sint Eustatius to install another French colony and fort. Cahuzac eventually sends the Cardinale back to France, allowing two of his other ships to venture on independent cruises against Spanish America.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1629. Spanish Countersweep. A Spanish expedition materializes unexpectedly off Nevis, consisting of two fleets: the first under Adm. Fadrique de Toledo and his vice admiral Antonio de Oquendo leading the galleons Nuestra Señora de Atocha, Nuestra Señora del Rosario, Nuestra Señora de la Victoria, Santiago, San Sebastián, San Martín, Nuestra Señora de los Angeles, San Pedro de Cuatro Villas, San Carlos, Nuestra Señora de Begonia, San Juan Bautista, Natividad, Jesús María, Tres Reyes, San Felipe, and three galleons named San Bartolomé. The second is a plate-fleet escort under Adm. Martín de Vallecilla comprising Diego Alberto de Porras's Santiago, Sebastián de Anda's Anunciada, Juan Bautista de Garay's Santísima Trinidad, Felipe de Santa María's Nuestra Señora de Begonia, Miguel de Molina's San Felipe, Juan de Campo's Tres Reyes, Francisco Campi's San Juan Bautista, Agustín de Vivaldo's Jesús María, plus two other unnamed galleons. All are in the 500- to 600-ton range, thereby representing a formidable fighting force, as well as being accompanied by seven merchantmen and other lesser vessels.

The next morning, de Vallecilla probes Nevis's anchorage with 4 galleons, scattering 10 English tobacco ships inside the bay, of which all but 2 are captured as they emerge through the shallows. (One vessel, commanded by the Earl of Carlisle's representative, Henry Hawley, cuts its cable and succeeds in carrying a warning to neighboring Saint Kitts.) Capt. Tiburcio Redín's Jesús María runs aground during this pursuit, within range of a two-gun battery at Pelican Point, which strikes it repeatedly until de Oquendo leads a landing party ashore, killing 22 English defenders and driving the rest into the jungle. By the morning of September 18, the English deputy governor, John Hilton—his brother Anthony being absent in England—agrees to capitulate, and shortly thereafter the fort is dismantled, while warehouses and other buildings are put to the torch.

De Toledo then presses on against Saint Kitts, first weathering a brief storm. Once regrouped, his fleet probes du Roissey's defenses at Basseterre, then disembarks a large force near the principal English defense of Fort Charles, on the western side of this island. Its beaches are protected by an extensive trench system, yet the Spaniards fight their way through until the outnumbered defenders finally break and flee inland. Du Roissey and d'Esnambuc hastily evacuate the island's northwestern quarter, 400 people being crammed aboard two ships. The Spanish meanwhile begin demolishing Fort Charles, when they are approached by English and French plenipotentiaries under a flag of truce, who surrender their remaining populations.

De Toledo's booty amounts to 129 cannon, 42 mortars, 1,350 muskets and harquebuses, abundant ammunition, and 3,100 prisoners. Of the latter, 2,300 are repatriated toward Europe aboard a half-dozen prizes, while the remaining 800—all Catholic—are carried to Cartagena when the Spanish fleets depart Saint Kitts on October 4. However, de Toledo does not leave any garrison behind, so these islands are soon reoccupied by Sir Thomas Warner, d'Esnambuc, and Giron.

SPRING 1630. Anthony Hilton—following de Toledo's eradication of his Nevis colony—returns to gather up its few survivors, transferring them to join a handful of French and English hunters on Tortuga Island (northwestern Haiti). To ensure regular visits by passing merchantmen, Hilton and his lieutenant Christopher Wormeley sign an agreement with England's Providence Company, which is also attempting to colonize the nearby Bahamas. (For a time, therefore, Tortuga becomes known as "Association Island" among the English, although its original Spanish name eventually prevails.) A six-gun battery is erected to cover its southern harbor, while further emigration occurs.

MAY 1630. A new colony is established on the western side of the Amazon Delta, between the Matapi and Ananirapucu rivers. It is named Fort North in honor of the English Guiana Company's principal shareholder, Sir John North; it is also known by its local name, Pattacue.

NOVEMBER 1630. In Madrid, English and Spanish plenipotentiaries sign a peace treaty, marking an end to their six-and-a-half-year-old conflict.

JANUARY 28, 1631. A Portuguese counterexpedition under the capitão-mor Jácome Raimundo de Noronha departs Belém with a contingent of soldiers aboard 13 craft, being reinforced at Cametá by another 23 boatloads of native warriors, to press westward and attack the new English settlement of Fort North—also known as Forte Felipe to the attackers—between the Matapi and Ananirapucu rivers in the Amazon Delta. This sickly establishment is surprised and taken on March 1, with 86 of its defenders being slain and another 13 captured. Deputy Gov. Thomas Hixon attempts to escape downriver at night with a boatload of survivors, only to be overtaken by Indians in canoes commanded by Capt. Aires de Sousa Chichorro, who use their paddles to splash water into the English craft and soak their gunpowder, then slaughtering all aboard. Only seven Englishmen succeed in gaining refuge in the jungle. Fort North's defenses are thereupon razed, and all the prisoners are conveyed back into Belém.

JULY 9, 1632. After making a massive sweep through the territory of the Nengaiá Indians, allies to foreign interlopers, a Portuguese host under captains de Sousa Chichorro and Pedro Baião de Abreu captures a new outpost of 40 half-starved Englishmen at Camaú or Cumahu, near Point Macapá in the Amazon Delta. This outpost's absent leader, Capt. Roger Fry, is also taken when he returns five days later aboard his ship after making a regional reconnaissance. (During his subsequent detention at São Luís do Maranhão, Fry studies the solar eclipse of April 8, 1633, forwarding his observations to John Bainbridge, professor of astronomy at Oxford University.)

MAY 12, 1633. Three militia companies and 50 native auxiliaries quit Margarita Island (Venezuela) aboard three large piraguas under Julián de Eulate, eldest son of the island's Spanish governor Juan de Eulate. His mission is to investigate a foreign colony recently established on nearby Trinidad. De Eulate arrives to find a small group of English settlers, capturing 11 of them and 20 Indian allies. Back on Margarita, they confess to being an advance party for Sir Henry Colt's larger colonizing expedition, which has been diverted to Saint Kitts.

MAY 22, 1633. Champlain returns to Quebec.

JANUARY 4, 1634. Four Spanish warships slip out of the city of Santo Domingo with 100 soldiers under Capt. Francisco Turrillo de Yelva (or Yebra), circling round this island to meet up with 150 lancers riding overland toward Bayahá under 30-year-old Capt. Ruy Fernández de Fuenmayor. Both contingents then continue toward Tortuga Island.

JANUARY 21, 1634. Eradication of Tortuga. Under cover of darkness, and guided by an Irish lad named John Murphy—who has recently fled this buccaneer colony after killing a man in a dispute—the Spaniards disembark through Tortuga's surf and take its 300 inhabitants completely by surprise. Anthony Hilton, the self-proclaimed English "governor," is butchered along with 194 followers, while another 39 are captured, including three women. (One of the few people who manages to escape is Lieutenant Governor Wormeley—aboard a ship crammed with his own goods and servants; he is later convicted of cowardice and resettles in Virginia.) Tortuga's six-gun battery is thrown down, two prizes in its harbor are burned, and another is sailed back to Santo Domingo laden with 123 captured muskets and ammunition. The Spaniards fail to leave behind any garrison, however, so the remaining buccaneers soon reoccupy their base, eking out a meager subsistence under Nicholas Skinner during 1635–1636 and under William Ludyard until 1640.

FEBRUARY 1635. In Europe, the Franco-Habsburg War erupts as Paris—apprehensive of Spain's support of Austria's Ferdinand II in Central Europe—joins the Thirty Years' War on the side of Holland and other Protestant states. These Franco-Spanish hostilities will persist for more than two-dozen years, concluding with the Treaty of the Pyrenees in November 1659.

LATE JUNE 1635. A French colonizing expedition arrives at Guadeloupe aboard a pair of Dieppe ships under Charles Liénard, Sieur de l'Olive—the former deputy governor of Saint Kitts—and the naval captain Jean Duplessis, Sieur d'Ossoville (a veteran of Cahuzac's West Indian campaign; see "Late July 1629" entry). These settlers are soon to endure famine and disease.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1635. Occupation of Martinique. D'Esnameuc, governor of the French half of Saint Kitts, leads 150 subjects southwest to also lay claim to Martinique, his motivation being l'Olive and Duplessis's recent occupation of Guadeloupe, men he

Buccaneers

When the French privateer Charles Fleury visited Plateforme (Haiti) early in 1620, he and his crew met a pair of hunters ashore: a mulatto and a black, slaves who had escaped from Baracoa in Cuba, with 10 large dogs. They offered to supply the French vessel with meat from the cattle and pigs roaming wild on Hispaniola. When Fleury accepted, the hunters killed 18 cows within two days and cured the meat by smoking rather than with salt. They further told him “that if he had a larger ship, in less than fifteen days or three weeks, they could have filled it with hides.”

The thousands of cattle and pigs left behind when the Spanish settlers were removed 15 years earlier had obviously thrived (see “August 2, 1605” entry in “Early Footholds”). They now provided such an easy resource that pockets of such hunters began operating all along Hispaniola’s northwestern coastlines. Arawak natives and runaway blacks were joined by handfuls of sailors from visiting ships. All adopted the Arawak practice for curing meat. Wherever a cow was slain, a wooden boucan or “smokehouse” was erected to cure choice cuts over a slow fire. The hunters then retrieved them later.

Such men were called boucaniers in French, bucaneros in Spanish, and buccaneers in English. In many ways, they were similar to the mountain men who later opened the American West—pathfinders who adapted to local conditions and often excelled in the wilderness. To the Spanish, they were heretical trespassers, and a long guerrilla struggle ensued. As the buccaneers became more numerous, they gathered seasonally for attacks on enemy targets. Leadership among such individuals, who referred to themselves as the Frères de la Cote or “Brethren of the Coast,” was selected by popular acclaim.

A quarter-century later, one of William Jackson’s men wrote that Hispaniola was ... well known and frequented by ye English, Dutch, and French nations, who make a great benefit from their industry in hunting of beasts, and preparing ye hides and tallow. For it aboundeth with infinite herds of cattle, which ye Spaniards do not value, but only for their hides and tallow; and to that purpose employ cow-killers yearly to slaughter many thousands, otherwise ye great increase of them would pester ye whole island. There are besides vast numbers of wild hogs, and great store of very fair and serviceable horses.

views as rivals for Richelieu’s favor. Dropping anchor off Rivi re du Fort, d’Esnambuc orders a three-gun fortress erected on its northern bank, naming it Fort Saint Pierre and installing Jean du Pont as its commander, before departing by mid-November. On his passage toward Saint Kitts, d’Esnambuc pauses opposite Dominica on November 17 to set another small force ashore under his lieutenant Philippe Levayer de la Vall e, then completes his sweep by populating Saba before regaining Saint Kitts.

At Martinique, meanwhile, du Pont’s garrison is given a hostile reception by suspicious Caribs, who summon more than 1,000 allies from neighboring Dominica, Guadeloupe, and Saint Vincent to expel these interlopers. Du Pont remains watchful within his fort so that, when this Indian army finally bursts upon the French outpost, he lures them directly beneath its artillery before unleashing a volley of grapeshot. This sudden carnage shatters the Caribs’ resolve, sending them reeling. Over the next several months, du Pont succeeds in winning their confidence, establishing peaceable relations.

JANUARY 26, 1636. Conquest of Guadeloupe. The plight of its French colonists having grown so desperate because of want, Governor l’Olive decides to attack the friendly Indians. His more humane partner Duplessis having died on December 4, 1635, l’Olive is free to launch a surprise attack against a large Carib encampment in the vicinity of modern Basse-Terre. Although only a few casualties are inflicted, this unexpected brutality convinces most of Guadeloupe’s natives to flee to neighboring Dominica and Saint Vincent, from where they will launch harassing raids against the French for the next three years.

JULY 20, 1636 (O.S.). Pequot War. In New England, several years of friction between Puritan traders and settlers advancing from the Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay colonies into Pequot or Pequod tribal lands in the Connecticut River Valley explodes when the dishonest trader John Oldham and the crew of his bark are slain by Narragansett Indians off Block Island. Outraged reaction in Massachusetts prompts a force of 120 militiamen to depart on August 25 (O.S.) under captains John Endicott, John Underhill, and William Turner, who sweep across the island burning villages and crops, as well as slaying 14 natives.

Unsatisfied with this campaign, Endicott sails on to Fort Saybrook and, despite the protests of its Connecticut-appointed garrison commander, Lt. Lion Gardiner, threatens the Pequot town at the mouth of the modern Thames River. When its residents refuse to offer satisfaction, Endicott storms ashore with his troops and burns the settlement before retiring. Angered Pequots consequently besiege Fort Saybrook over the ensuing autumn and winter—although tribal leadership is riven between the sachem or chieftain Sassacus, who favors dealing with the Dutch out of New Amsterdam (modern New York City), and his rival Uncas of the Mohegan or Mohican splinter group, who is inclined toward the English.

When Sassacus sends war belts to neighboring tribes early in 1637, requesting their assistance against the Puritans, Chief Miantonomo of the Narragansett instead joins the English, allegedly solemnizing this treaty in March “with a gift of wampum and the severed hand of a Pequot brave.” The slaying on April 23 (O.S.) of seven to nine Puritan settlers working in a field near Wethersfield, plus the capture of two girls, galvanizes all the New England colonies into joint action. Capt. John Mason departs Hartford on May 10 (O.S.) with 90 colonists and 60 Mohegan warriors under Uncas, attacking the Pe-quot town near Fort Saybrook five days afterward and killing a half-dozen residents while the rest flee. Joined by 20 Massachusetts militiamen under Underhill, as well as Narragansett warriors and the eastern Niantic tribesmen of Chief Ninigret, Mason’s expedition presses on against the main Pequot town of Missituk or Mystic, arriving nearby by nightfall on May 25 (O.S.).

The next dawn, a volley is fired, and Mason leads an assault column in from the northeast, while Underhill sweeps in from the southwest. The 80 huts housing roughly 800 Pequots erupt in flames and as many as 700 residents are massacred within the hour, only 7 being taken alive. English losses total 2 dead and 20–40 wounded; more Pequot hamlets are torched as the attackers retire toward their ships.

Pequot power is destroyed by this ruthless attack, and isolated bands are pitilessly hunted down over the ensuing summer. On July 13, 1637 (O.S.), some 280 ragtag survivors are trapped near New Haven, the English sparing 200 women, children, and elderly before closing in the next morning against the remaining warriors, most of whom slip away in the fog. Desperate Pequots seek sanctuary amid outlying tribes, not all of whom prove welcoming; the Pequot War, 1636–1637.

Mohawk, for example, send Sassacus's severed head back to the English. By the autumn of 1638, the few surviving Pequots in Puritan territory are distributed as slaves among the victors, and their tribal name is expunged.

SEPTEMBER 1636. Some 66 Spanish militiamen under Juan de Vargas sortie from Santiago de los Caballeros in north-central Santo Domingo, advancing upon its coast to ambush a French watering party in Cruz Bay. The Spaniards then use this captured boat to row out and surprise the anchored ship, which proves to be a 12-gun slaver out of Saint Kitts under a captain known as Jambe de Bois or "Peg Leg."

De Vargas subsequently employs this vessel to raid the foreign settlements on Tortuga Island, then sails to engage a group of runaway slaves entrenched at Bayahá. He compels the latter to surrender, promising liberty to their leader, but sells the remaining 48 at Santo Domingo's slave market.

OCTOBER 1636. Capt. William Rous of the Blessing attempts an attack at Santa Marta (Colombia), only to be overwhelmed and sent prisoner to Spain.

LATE JANUARY 1637. In Sancti Spíritus (Cuba), Ens. Agustín de Vera is murdered when he attempts to collect royal taxes. Although troops are subsequently dispatched into this region by Havana's governor, Francisco Riaño y Gamboa, Knight of the Order of Santiago, they prove unable to detain the perpetrators.

SPRING 1637. A ship bearing 212 colonists appears off the West Indian island of Tobago, having been dispatched by 27-year-old Jekab or James Kettler, Duke of Kurland or Courland, who governs a small fiefdom on the Baltic Sea. Although his duchy consists of only the two westernmost provinces of the modern Republic of Latvia, encompassing the Courland Peninsula and the Plains of Semigallia between the Baltic Sea and the Gulf of Riga, it is nonetheless such an active maritime hub as to aspire to secure commercial outposts in West Africa and the New World. Unfortunately, this initial colony on Tobago will soon succumb to disease, malnourishment, and native hostility, as will a second Courlander attempt made two years later.

JUNE 1638. William Claiborne, a planter with properties in Virginia and Maryland, is licensed by the Providence Company to found a settlement on the island of Roatán (Honduras).

NOVEMBER 1639. A slave revolt erupts in the Capesterre district of Saint Kitts, approximately 60 rebels and a few women escaping to found a highland encampment atop Mount Misery in the island's northwestern quarter. This revolt requires the newly installed French governor general—Commo. Philippe de Lonvilliers de Poincy, Knight Commander of the Order of Saint John of Jerusalem—to dispatch 500 troops for its brutal suppression, as a deterrent against similar insurrections.

LATE JANUARY 1640. Anti-Carib Campaigns. De Poincy dispatches 132 men from Saint Kitts under Maj. Gen. Jean Soulon, Sieur de Sabouilly, followed shortly thereafter by a similar contingent under Roi de Courpon, Sieur de la Vernade, to assist the hard-pressed colonists of Guadeloupe in resisting Carib attacks. Sabouilly chases these seaborne raiders away after a clash off the coast, which kills 30 Indians and 2 Frenchmen.

MAY 1640. Off southern Guadeloupe, the boats of Major General Sabouilly encounter a Carib war fleet. Heavily outnumbered, his 24 harquebusiers retreat to a tiny atoll among the group of islands known as Les Saintes, fending off repeated attacks over the next 30 hours thanks to their superior firepower. The Caribs eventually draw off at the approach of a French relief flotilla under la Vernade.

ENGLAND'S RESURGENCE (1640–1659)

The sole European power to avoid direct involvement in the Thirty Years' War is England, under its self-centered Stuart monarchs James I (who rules from 1603 to 1625) and Charles I (1625–1649). These two monarchs' foreign policy, while superficially neutral, in fact precludes England from any substantive role in developments upon the Continent or overseas. Such a lack of assertiveness eventually becomes one of the complaints leveled against Charles I, resulting in serious disputes with Parliament, and eventually a civil war.

Yet despite such ineffectual Crown leadership, private English expeditions continue to press into the New World—hardly surprising for a vigorous island nation of 7.5 million people, who have already tasted the riches of the Americas. Numerous West Indian islands already support sizable English colonies, leading to continual frictions with their neighbors, although it is not until the home country undergoes the ordeal of its civil war from 1642–1646 and the First Anglo-Dutch War of 1652–1654 that the English government truly resumes its imperial aspirations. The result will be Oliver Cromwell’s “Western Design,” which conquers Jamaica in 1655.

SPRING 1640. Two Spanish galleons and six frigates, having sortied from Cartagena under the sargento mayor or “military adjutant” Antonio Maldonado, arrive to expel the English settlement on Providencia Island—called Santa Catalina by its original Spanish discoverers but renamed Providence by its English occupiers in the late 1620s. (Located 150 miles east of Nicaragua’s Mosquito Coast, the island today belongs to Colombia.) Maldonado vainly circles its reefs, looking for a spot to disembark his troops, while being shelled by its batteries. He eventually draws off in defeat, having lost 2 captains and 100 soldiers during a disastrous landing attempt.

AUGUST 1640. The two-year-old settlement by 300 English colonists on Saint Lucia is devastated by a Carib assault from neighboring Martinique and Dominica, forcing its few survivors to flee. The English suspect this attack has been instigated by Jacques Dyel du Parquet, French governor of Martinique, but the natives are actually seeking vengeance for a treacherous English merchant captain, who has tricked a number of their Dominican brethren to come on board only to carry them off into bondage.

MAY 17, 1641. Spanish Reconquest of Providencia. Determined to expel this island’s English settlers, the Spanish Crown orders veteran admiral Francisco Díaz Pimienta to take his battle fleet—which has escorted the annual treasure convoy into Cartagena—to expunge the intruders. Díaz Pimienta appears off Providencia Island with his 400-ton flagship San Juan; the 800-ton, foreign-built vice-flagship Sansón under Jerónimo de Ojeda; the 400-ton galleons Jesús María del Castillo and San Marcos; the 300-ton ships Santa Ana, Teatina, and Comboy; the 230-ton Portuguese man-of-war Virgem de Ajuda; the auxiliary San Pedro; plus three lesser craft of 70–

80 tons apiece. They bear a total of 600 sailors and 1,400 soldiers, a high proportion being Portuguese, hence of suspect loyalty to Spain because of the recent rising against Madrid’s rule (see “December 1, 1640” in “Holland’s ‘Great Design’”).

The attackers are again stymied by Providencia’s reefs and spend several days searching for a safe landing place. On May 19, the San Marcos strikes an outcropping and suffers such severe damage that it must retire toward Cartagena, taking 270 troops and a third of the Spanish siege train. Díaz Pimienta eventually decides to make a thrust directly into the main English harbor at dawn of May 24 with 1,200 men, hoping to catch his enemy off guard. This gamble pays off when Spanish troops waded through the surf, storming an intricate system of English trenches and parapets with cold steel. The defenders are driven back within their keep, while the Spaniards manhandle English artillery pieces into new emplacements to open up a close-range bombardment. At this point, Providencia’s residents send out two flags of truce and request terms.

The next day, May 25, Díaz Pimienta accepts the surrender of this fort along with 40 guns, 380 slaves, and all English goods on the island. Its 770 inhabitants give up with the understanding that they will be repatriated to Europe, while the Spanish commander in chief installs a new garrison on the island under Vice Admiral de Ojeda. Díaz Pimienta’s fleet thereupon prepares to weigh anchor, except for the Portuguese Ajuda, which attempts to desert its Spanish consorts, only to be wrecked on Providencia’s reefs. Furious, Díaz Pimienta orders two of its officers shot, their bodies displayed upon this twisted wreckage as a warning to other would-be runaways. (This incident will not be the last of its type; after the fleet returns into Cartagena, the Portuguese land commander Juan Rodríguez de Vasconcellos Sousa, Conde de Castel Melhor—whose brother, Capt.

Nicolás de Sousa, has given his life in the reconquest of Providencia—is arrested on August 29, 1641, and charged with plotting to seize this Spanish American port for King João IV. Although condemned to death, the count's sentence is never carried out, and he eventually escapes to Portugal.)

The victorious Spanish admiral is accorded a hero's welcome at Cartagena and is later invested with a knighthood in the Order of Santiago. He leaves his English prisoners behind when the fleet subsequently escorts the silver convoy across to Portobelo, and Cartagena's captain-general refuses to honor the terms of their capitulation, putting more than 500 to work as forced laborers clearing the Magdalena River.

JUNE 1641. In Canada, a skirmish near Trois Rivières (Quebec) marks the beginning of a new French-Iroquois war.

JUNE 9, 1641. Three ships of a newly reconstituted Armada de Barlovento sortie from Veracruz under Vice Adm. Antonio de la Plaza Eguiluz to disperse some English vessels prowling off the coast of Alvarado. Four days later, they scatter these interlopers from the mouth of the Cañas River, then return victorious into port on the evening of June 14 with a captured pink and 22 English prisoners. The pink will be incorporated into the Spanish squadron.

SPRING 1642. A third Courlander attempt is made to settle the West Indian island of Tobago, when two ships arrive under Capt. Cornelius Caroon and disembark another group of almost 300 settlers. They, too, soon sicken and are beset by Carib warriors; the survivors eventually flee for the safety of Dutch Guiana.

MAY 1642. The longtime West Indian resident and engineer François Le Vasseur quits Saint Kitts with a ship and 40 Huguenot followers, bearing a commission from Governor-General de Poincy to seize Tortuga Island (Haiti) and aid its French residents,

English Civil War

After an 11-year interlude, King Charles I recalled Parliament in April 1640 because he needed money. Angry at his Scottish subjects, he wanted to raise a large army to impose his will on them. But the Parliamentarians instead arrived with a long list of complaints, so the king dismissed them within three weeks. Yet when he invaded Scotland with only the troops that he had available, he was defeated and lost northern England to a counterinvasion.

Now desperate for funds, Charles I reluctantly summoned Parliament again in November 1640. Its members arrived even more determined than before. The king made concessions, yet bitterness grew. Because of his autocratic beliefs and marriage to a French Catholic queen, some members feared a threat to Protestantism. As Puritans and other English sects became more militant, Catholics in Ireland were gripped with fearful unrest in 1641.

Matters came to a head when Charles I entered the House of Commons with 400 soldiers early in January 1642 to arrest five members for treason. He failed because they were absent, and a few days later he withdrew from London with his entire royal court into western England. The king dealt with Parliament from a distance over the next few months, as people began choosing sides. Although most initially remained neutral, Charles I had his strongest support in the rural north and west of England, as well as in Wales. Cities in the wealthier southeast favored Parliament, as did the Royal Navy.

Finally, the House voted on June 9, 1642 (O.S.), to raise an army of 10,000 volunteers. Three days later, command was given to Robert Devereux, 3rd Earl of Essex, with orders "to rescue His Majesty's person" from his bad advisers. Charles in turn entered Nottingham with 2,000 riders and a small body of infantry on August 22 (O.S.) to gather his own army. The first major battle occurred two months later, when almost 30,000 men met at Edgehill. Royalists became known as "Cavaliers," and Parliamentarians, as "Roundheads."

After three years of clashes, the House reorganized its forces into the "New Model Army" under Sir Thomas Fairfax and Lt. Gen. Oliver Cromwell. This formidable host destroyed the last Loyalist armies at Naseby and Langport that summer, forcing the king to flee from besieged Oxford in April 1646. He went to his former enemies, the Scottish Presbyterian army at Newark, but after holding him for more than a year, they handed him over to Parliament.

Yet even from captivity, the monarch contrived to renew Royalist resistance in the spring of 1648, backed by a Scottish invasion. A second round of fighting ensued, until Cromwell defeated the Scots at Preston that August. Furious at the king's deceit, regiments from the New Model Army surrounded Parliament that December. All except the most radical members were excluded. This "Rump Parliament" tried and ordered that Charles I be beheaded by January 1649. England's monarchy was thereupon abolished and replaced by a republican state known as the "Commonwealth."

who have been complaining about their English leader, Capt. James Flood. Le Vasseur reaches Port à Margot, 20 miles east of Tortuga, and installs himself on a tiny key named “Refuge.” He rallies 40 buccaneers to his standard before sending a message to Flood and his English subjects ordering them to forsake Tortuga.

AUGUST 20, 1642. In Canada, 40 French soldiers constructing Fort Richelieu (modern Sorel, Quebec), successfully repel an attack by 300 Iroquois warriors. Nevertheless, the outpost is abandoned four years later, then burned down in 1647.

AUGUST 31, 1642. LeVasseur sails to Tortuga (Haiti) and lands unopposed. Outnumbered and unable to count upon his boucanier allies, Flood leaves the island for New Providence in the Bahamas, while Le Vasseur assumes office and temporarily renames Tortuga as “New Normandy.” He also uses his engineering skills to begin constructing a large fortress upon a promontory, which when completed will be called Fort de la Roche and offer its roadstead such protection as to produce an upsurge in French buccaneering activities throughout the region.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1642 (O.S.). Jackson’s Reprisal. Despite the on-going English Civil War, Commo. William Jackson reaches Barbados with his 30-gun, 350-ton flagship Charles; the 20-gun, 240-ton Valentine of Capt. Samuel Axe; and the 16-gun, 140-ton Dolphin of Capt. John Newcombe. They had left London in June, bearing a privateering commission issued by Robert, Earl of Warwick—Parliament’s Admiral of the Fleet—calling for a punitive strike against Spanish America in retaliation for the extirpation a year and a half previously of the Providence Island Company’s colony (Warwick being a member of its board, Jackson and Axe among its sea captains).

The commodore detaches the Valentine to Saint Kitts to recruit additional volunteers, while preparing three pinnaces of 10–12 tons apiece—named the Mercury, the Pegasus, and the Argus—for inshore work. The private ship Guiste of London is also hired for three to four months’ service. Jackson sets sail with 500 extra men on the afternoon of November 11 (O.S.) to rendezvous off Los Testigos Islands with the Valentine. They find the Valentine waiting when they arrive three days later, Axe having brought an additional 250 men from Saint Kitts. Jackson and his military second, Capt. Thomas Thorn, organize eight companies ashore totaling 643 foot soldiers as a landing force, while the pinnace Pegasus is sent to reconnoiter nearby Margarita Island (Venezuela).

It returns on November 23 (O.S.) with little to report. Jackson nonetheless steers his seven sail and perhaps 1,000 men for Margarita the next day. A force slips ashore before dawn on November 26 (O.S.) and seizes an unoccupied fort, while the pinnace Argus carries Capt. Thomas Molineux’s company through a hail of shots to board a Canary frigate anchored offshore. But the English are unable to surprise the inland residents and are repelled with 10 killed and 20 wounded when they attempt to advance. The prize is therefore incorporated into their formation under Capt. Simon Nicholas and with the name Margarita. The raiders prowl westward on November 29 (O.S.), Jackson dividing his small squadron to search for Spanish pearl boats, before reuniting the next day at Salt Tortuga Island. On December 2 (O.S.), they lay in a course for La Guaira.

DECEMBER 14, 1642. Jackson’s five ships and three pinnaces are detected approaching La Guaira, creating alarm among the Spaniards. Governor Ruy Fernández de Fuenmayor, advised at Caracas around 8:00 p.m., makes a hurried nocturnal march down to the coast with a sizable contingent of militiamen, arriving by midnight. On the morning of December 15, Jackson’s five ships stand in to commence their bombardment of La Guaira’s Maiquetía battery, only to be repulsed. That night, his three pinnaces attempt to creep into the harbor and cut out a hired English merchantman at anchor, but the vessel’s crew has been reinforced by 50 soldiers under Capt. Jacinto Sedeño (ex-governor of Spanish Jamaica), as well as being supported by a three-gun battery ashore, so proves impossible to board.

The next dawn, December 16, Jackson sails west, making minor disembarkations at Cata and Ocumare during daylight hours to search for water and provisions. The evening of December 17, though, he slips ashore near Puerto Cabello with 140 troops, who suffer two killed and seven wounded before dispersing its handful of Spanish defenders the next day. Puerto Cabello and its environs are plundered of six guns and other goods, after which the raiders depart.

Jackson next calls at Dutch Curaçao, where he is well received and provided with a pilot named “Abraham,” a veteran of Gerristz’s foray into the Laguna de Maracaibo (see “October 15, 1641” in “Holland’s ‘Great Design’”).

DECEMBER 22, 1642. Laguna de Maracaibo Raid.

Arriving before Maracaibo's bar, Jackson leaves his heavy flagship with 120 crewmen outside to mount a blockade, while working his remaining seven vessels and almost 1,000 men over the shoals the next day. Spanish lookouts convey word of this incursion to the maestre de campo, Manuel de Velasco, in Maracaibo, who musters 250 militiamen in anticipation of an assault.

The English do not resume their advance until December 26, giving the Spaniards ample time to prepare; but Jackson—aware that most of the city's defenses face seaward—surprises de Velasco by circling past at 11:00 p.m. that same night, landing two contingents of 400 men apiece five hours later, three miles farther south at Los Bebederos, to march inland and take the city from the rear. The Spanish militiamen are obliged to abandon their prepared waterfront trenches and fight in the dark jungle, where they are quickly stampeded by fears of superior English numbers. Only Maracaibo's main citadel under Capt. Francisco Rodrigo offers stiff resistance, before it surrenders and the city falls on December 27. De Velasco and most of his followers are driven into the hinterland, while four Spanish vessels are seized from its roadstead.

The English, who have suffered two killed and two wounded, repeatedly send out foraging parties until January 27, 1643, when they receive a ransom payment. They therefore depart across the lagoon the next day, hoping to attack its southeastern town of Gibraltar. The four English prizes have been renamed the Maracaibo under Capt. Andrew Axe, the Swallow under Capt. Charles Saltonstall, the Swift under Capt. William Yawland, and the Spy under Capt. Thomas Powell. That same morning, a 300-man Spanish relief column arrives overland from La Vela de Coro under the Venezuelan governor Fernández de Fuenmayor, who circles Maracaibo warily until he learns that it is deserted, so reoccupies it on January 29 and begins refurbishing its defenses.

The English commodore, meanwhile, arrives off Gibraltar on February 1 to find the governor of Mérida entrenched inside with some troops. Realizing that its residents have already fled with their valuables, so that they "could expect nothing but blows," the raiders choose not to mount an assault. Instead, their lighter vessels are used to pillage the surrounding plantations. A few days later, Jackson and his formation recross the lagoon, and by 8:00 a.m. on February 9, his vessels are once more sighted southeast of Maracaibo. Fernández de Fuenmayor sorties that same afternoon with 400 Spanish militiamen and 130 native archers, to lay an ambush at El Palmar. But Jackson ignores the Spaniards' bait—a cattle herd—and instead anchors out of range of Maracaibo's guns, offering to exchange his captives.

This transaction is completed by February 21, at which point the rovers retire toward the lagoon's bar, anchoring near Zapara Island for several days before working their way out to rejoin Jackson's flagship by February 28. After selling the Spy and assorted items to local Spaniards, Jackson's formation sails eastward on March 4. Shortly thereafter, the prize Swift—a Maracaibo frigate formerly belonging to Capt. Francisco Barbero—is dismantled by a storm and driven ashore near the Cocinas, and its 89 English officers and crewmen fall into Spanish hands.

Fernández de Fuenmayor quickly dispatches a missive from La Vela de Coro with Ens. Alonso de Cuevas aboard the sloop San Francisco y San Antonio to warn the Spanish authorities on Jamaica that their island is to be Jackson's next target. Governor Fernández de Fuenmayor then remains at Maracaibo until September 1643, supervising the construction of a small pentagonal fort at the lagoon's entrance to impede future incursions.

MARCH 22, 1643. Jackson reaches Hispaniola with only six vessels, the remainder having been scattered by stormy weather. After sighting the Maracaibo and the Guiste, the expedition reassembles at Cape Tiburon in anticipation of attacking Jamaica. Eight days later, Jackson sets sail with his force and captures a 25-ton Spanish vessel out of Baracoa en route.

MARCH 28 (PALM SATURDAY), 1643. The Spanish ensign Alonso de Cuevas arrives at Jamaica from Coro (Venezuela) aboard the sloop San Francisco y San Antonio, to warn its residents that their island is about to be attacked by Jackson's expedition. Its few inhabitants doubt the veracity of this report; furthermore, they are in no position to resist because of their extreme poverty and small, scattered plantations.

APRIL 3 (GOOD FRIDAY), 1643. Seizure of Jamaica. Jackson's squadron, now 11 vessels strong, materializes before Jamaica's main anchorage of Caguaya Bay (modern Kingston). Some 500 men under Lt. Philip Roberts are disembarked on its western shoreline but cannot advance into its hills, which are defended by the Spaniards and their slaves. Their "confused clamor and hideous noise" cause the English to halt overnight, yet no attack occurs.

After Jackson interrogates some prisoners, Richards's contingent goes aboard boats and pinnaces the next morning to be deposited farther inside the bay. As the invaders advance inland toward the main Spanish settlement of Santiago de la Vega, they are fired upon from an ambush, then they overrun a three-gun defensive work at a cost of a dozen English dead. More redoubts and ambushes are defeated, until an empty Santiago de la Vega is finally reached. The invaders deem Jamaica such a "terrestrial paradise" that many propose a permanent occupation.

Jackson refuses, instead coming to terms with the Spaniards for a modest ransom of cattle, cassava bread, and 7,000 pesos. He is shaken when 23 of his men desert one night, so restores Santiago de la Vega to the Spanish on April 10 and marches back to Caguaya Bay. After slaughtering and salting the cattle supplied to them, as well as taking on water and other provisions, the expedition stands away eastward on May 1, intending to raid Ríoacha on the Spanish Main (Colombia).

MAY 16, 1643. After staggering upwind toward Hispaniola, Jackson's formation steers for the Spanish Main, minus the Margarita and the Guiste, which have not rejoined.

Finally arriving near Santa Marta, the English raiders contemplate running into its harbor to "surprise ye town," but instead they become becalmed. Discovered, they sheer away northwestward in disappointment for Hispaniola.

Unable to reach its shores, Jackson returns to Jamaica. In a harbor adjacent to Caguaya Bay, the English seize a Spanish frigate preparing to weigh for Cartagena with hides, sugar, bread, and passengers.

JUNE 11, 1643. After pausing at "Point Negrillo" (modern Point Negril, Jamaica), Jackson and his privateer squadron steer for Gran Cayman Island. Arriving three days later, they find the Guiste and the Margarita lying at anchor.

While slaughtering and salting the local turtles for provisions, many men demand that Jackson "divide the purchase already taken" and allow them to depart for the Windward Islands. The commodore therefore allows about 200 to sail for Barbados aboard the Guiste. Another 50–60 will abscond with the Maracaibo.

Meanwhile, Jackson scraps the Swallow and uses its weaponry to arm his most recent Jamaican prize, which is renamed the Swan. It is his intent to lead his squadron in a descent on the port of San Pedro Sula in the Bay of Honduras, along with the recently joined privateer Joseph of Capt. W. Wollmer. The latter is sent aboard one of Jackson's pinnaces to conduct a reconnaissance.

JUNE 28, 1643. Jackson departs Gran Cayman Island with his depleted squadron, coming within sight of Cape Gracias a Dios four days later. On July 5, they drop anchor at the island of Roatán. Although its native population has been removed by a recent Spanish raid, the rovers learn a week later that two large Spanish merchantmen are expected at the port of Trujillo. Expecting to find riches accumulated in anticipation of their arrival, the Englishmen weigh anchor shortly thereafter.

JULY 28, 1643. Capture of Trujillo. Jackson's formation comes within sight of Trujillo and disembarks a landing force two to three miles from the town. They march into Trujillo unopposed, only to find that its Spanish inhabitants have fled with everything of value. Jackson sends out pursuit columns, yet fails to capture many Spanish, therefore he proclaims a truce so that the natives at least might return.

On August 3, the pair of expected Spanish merchantmen is seen approaching. Jackson sorties with five vessels in pursuit but loses sight of his prey in a fog. The English nonetheless scour the shoreline for the next two weeks but only capture a small Spanish frigate in the Dulce River, which they rename the Content.

Meanwhile, the garrison holding Trujillo begins to sicken, so they withdraw to Roatán. When Jackson rejoins them with his half-dozen vessels, the English reclaim Trujillo. The Joseph is broken up, and a small Spanish frigate is renamed the Exchange, with John Lock placed in command. A group of 120 Indians also appears, asking Jackson to restore them to Roatán and Guanaja islands, from where the Spaniards have removed them.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1643. Jackson's expedition quits Trujillo, anchoring 12 days later off Cape Gracias a Dios for local natives to come aboard and visit captains Samuel Axe and Lewis Morris, "who had formerly lived among them." The English then press on to the nearby Mosquito Islands for turtle meat, arriving there on September 28 to recuperate.

OCTOBER 13, 1643. Jackson's squadron sets sail for Bocas del Dragón. When Captain Wollmer and some of his men step ashore on one of its islands 13 days later, they are seized by a party of cannibals "and never after seen." Jackson sets an armed force ashore to rescue them, but although they fight their way inland to the cannibals' village, all have fled.

Jackson then leaves his ships at anchor, while leading a boat flotilla toward Escudo de Veragua (Panama).

NOVEMBER 1, 1643. Jackson's boats find one of his separated ships at anchor off Escudo de Veragua, with a small Spanish prize. A shallop is sent back to Bocas del Dragón to summon the rest of the English squadron. An armed force is meanwhile disembarked but fails to find the road into Veragua.

NOVEMBER 3, 1643. Jackson's flotilla of boats approaches the mouth of the Oro River. He sets his troops ashore, and they march inland to find Veragua empty. A week later, the disappointed privateers torch its buildings and withdraw to their ships.

NOVEMBER 24, 1643. Tolú Raid. After coasting past Chagres and Portobelo, Jackson's expedition nears Tolú (Colombia). Desperate for provisions, they steal into its harbor under cover of darkness. The Spaniards, who see their sails "by ye moonlight, beat up their drums."

The raiders nevertheless shoot their way ashore the next dawn, while the defenders retreat inland with their women and children. The English are delighted to find considerable booty and remain for four days before they torch the 300 dwellings and depart.

JANUARY 2, 1644. After refreshing near Cartagena (Colombia), Jackson sails past this port. Five days later, his squadron sights Santa Marta, then steers toward Cuba.

JANUARY 18, 1644. Jackson reaches Point Negril (Jamaica) and pauses there for 18 days to cut timber before proceeding toward Cuba. His vessels probe gingerly into the southern archipelago before anchoring at Cayo Colombo on March 3 to careen and make extensive repairs. While lying there, the Maracaibo comes in to rejoin Jackson (see "June 11, 1643" entry).

MARCH 30, 1644. In Canada, a contingent of French settlers is defeated by an Iroquois war party, intent upon attacking Montreal.

APRIL 1644. Last Anglo-Powhatan War. In Virginia, steady inland encroachments by English settlers provoke a second violent reaction from the Algonquian werowance or "chieftain" Opechancanough. Although now almost 80 years of age, he retains a hatred for whites and lays careful plans for a coordinated attack against their forward-most elements. His warriors strike suddenly and within the first two days kill perhaps 500 trappers, traders, and farmers; but the English are now much more numerous—approximately 15,000 people—and more experienced in irregular warfare. Over the next two years, they crush the Algonquian tribes, finally capturing Opechancanough himself, who is shot in the back in his Jamestown jail cell. His successor, Necotowance, is obliged to sue for terms by October 1646, agreeing to retire his people to a reservation north of the York River and acknowledge King Charles I as his lord.

JULY 15, 1644. After four months of repairs, Jackson's squadron departs Cayo Colombo on the southern coast of Cuba, reaching the Cayman Islands the next day. There, they meet Captain Taylor in the Nicholas of London, and the Charles of Bristol.

AUGUST 7, 1644. Tabasco Foray. Having refurbished and reprovisioned at the Caymans, Jackson and Taylor round Cape Catoche to enter the Gulf of Mexico and raid Tabasco. But while edging along the Mexican coast before dawn on August 13, the Valentine, the Maracaibo, and the Swan strike a cluster of rocky shoals known as Los Lazarillos and are lost.

All crewmen are nonetheless rescued by the other vessels, so the English resume their advance to the mouth of Tabasco's river. Boat parties advance upriver on August 21, capturing five small frigates laden with merchandise, before pressing on to Villahermosa. However, upon entering that empty city, the raiders find that its inhabitants have "carried away their wealth, and left us nothing but bare walls to gaze upon."

The boat parties therefore return to their anchored ships, after which Jackson and Taylor hover outside of Campeche, which has been reinforced by troops sent from the provincial capital of Mérida de Yucatán. The privateers continue on to Champotón, to slaughter cattle for their voyage home. The local Franciscan friars Antonio Vázquez and Andrés Navarro are captured when the raiders steal ashore at night, allegedly "while they were drinking and revelling" with some women, according to English accounts. Spanish records state that the two priests had lingered to hide church valuables and so were caught.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1644. Having reprovisioned, Jackson and Taylor's expedition quits the coast of Campeche for the Florida Keys and Cuba, intending to exit via the Straits of Florida. But instead they are scattered by a storm, so that Jackson touches at Matanzas Bay in Cuba for water and releases the two captive priests from Champotón and eight other Spanish prisoners before reaching Bermuda on October 27 (O.S.) with only his flagship and four other vessels. After resting for almost three months, he sets sail with his survivors and anchors in The Downs in England by March 6, 1645 (O.S.).

Captain Newcombe's Dolphin and a few other scattered vessels have meanwhile been driven back to Saint Kitts by February 24, 1645. They depart again on April 29 (O.S.) with a small cargo of tobacco and indigo, reaching Kinsale in Ireland five weeks later. But upon approaching Plymouth, the Dolphin is beset by Dunkirk privateers, Newcombe being slain and most of the booty lost after a hard-fought battle.

APRIL 1645. Puerto Rico's governor, Francisco de la Riva Agüero, dispatches an officer called Francisco Vicente Durán with 100 men aboard a frigate to exterminate a foreign settlement discovered on Santa Ana among the Virgin Islands. Durán slays its leader and 13 other trespassers, captures 15, then scatters another 30 inland, before burning the huts and returning into Puerto Rico.

APRIL 13, 1645. The 41-year-old Charles de Menou d'Aulnay, governor of Port Royal (modern Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia), crosses the Bay of Fundy with some ships and 200 men to capture Fort La Tour (Saint John, New Brunswick), stronghold of his hated 53-year-old French rival Charles de Saint Etienne de La Tour, who has switched allegiance to the English. After installing a two-piece battery ashore, the besiegers call upon Fort La Tour's 47-man garrison to surrender. They refuse, resisting heroically under their governor's wife, Françoise Marie Jacquelin de La Tour, as their leader is absent in Boston.

By the evening of April 16 (Easter Sunday), eight defenders have been killed and several others wounded, and a gaping hole has been battered in their parapet. D'Aulnay's troops storm through this opening, and Madame de La Tour surrenders on the understanding that her followers will be spared. However, all but two are hanged, and she dies in captivity a few days later, her infant son being sent to France.

JULY 14, 1645. French settlers in Canada sign a peace treaty with the Iroquois.

LATE JANUARY 1646. Poincy's Revolt. On the French half of Saint Kitts, Governor-General de Poincy resists being replaced by the Compagnie des Îles d'Amérique's Noël, Sieur de Patrocle de Thoisy, as directed by Paris. A secret disembarkation is therefore made at the northwestern tip of this island by Governor du Parquet of Martinique—one of the new governor general's supporters—who rallies 300–400 men and arrests de Poincy's nephews, Robert de Longvilliers and de Treval. De Poincy instantly marches with 2,000 militiamen (mostly Englishmen from adjoining districts) to confront this challenger, defeating du Parquet in a clash at Pointe de Sable, during which 60 Frenchmen die.

APRIL 1646. The Puerto Rican governor sends his son Fernando de la Riva Agüero with 50 soldiers aboard a frigate and two urcas or “storeships” to again sweep Santa Ana and Saint Croix in the Virgin Islands. The former is easily overrun, but at the second, the Spanish expedition unwittingly anchors beneath its lone battery. After a vigorous exchange of shot, this redoubt is captured and thrown down, the Spaniards thereupon retiring.

JUNE 26, 1646. Rioting breaks out on Martinique—led by a former Parisian glove maker assuming the title of “General” Beaufort—in protest against the Compagnie des Îles d'Amérique's appointment of a new governor general. A chaotic fortnight ensues, until Martinique's deputy governor Jérôme du Sarrat, Sieur de la Pierrière, lures Beaufort and 20 intimates to a meeting, where they are murdered. Trouble nonetheless spreads to Guadeloupe as well, where the new governor general's residence is besieged by several hundred armed men, only to be dispersed the next day by Major General Sabouilly.

De Thoisy subsequently transfers to Martinique on January 3, 1647, in anticipation of returning to France, while full-blown rioting engulfs Guadeloupe. An expedition is sent after the governor general 10 days later, arresting de Thoisy and delivering him to his archenemy de Poincy at Saint Kitts by January 25, in exchange for the captive du Parquet.

EARLY APRIL 1647. Embarrassed by the continued incarceration of his rival, de Poincy orders de Thoisy deported to France aboard a merchantman.

MAY 1647. A small Spanish expedition out of Puerto Rico removes an English colony from Saint Croix.

JUNE 30, 1647. Five Spanish vessels under captains Francisco Vicente Durán and Celedonio de Escobedo return into Puerto Rico, after having evacuated the infirm Saint Martin garrison from the Leeward Islands, since Spain's impoverished treasury could no longer maintain this outpost. (Within a year, Saint Martin is reoccupied by Dutch and French settlers; the sick Spanish soldiers moreover introduce the plague to Puerto Rico, causing the deaths of more than 500 people, including Bishop Damián López de Haro.)

LATE SEPTEMBER 1647. Some 60 French colonists under Jean Pinart, driven from Saint Kitts by Governor-General de Poincy, are deposited in the Virgin Islands (possibly on Saint John or Vieques) by Captain Le Verrier's bark. This establishment is soon discovered by Spaniards from nearby Puerto Rico, who send a contingent of soldiers aboard five vessels to eliminate the intruders. After a brief resistance, the French are overwhelmed and carried off into captivity at San Juan.

OCTOBER 1647. Capt. William Sayle returns to Bermuda from England with several volunteers, 400 muskets, and provisions for an attempted colonization of the Bahamas.

LATE FEBRUARY 1648. Dutch captain Martin Thomas arrives at Sint Maarten with a small band of settlers, having been sent to reoccupy this island by Abraham Adriaanszoon, governor of Sint Eustatius.

SPRING 1648. Sayle arrives off Eleuthera Island (Bahamas) from Bermuda, with 70 settlers aboard his 50-ton William and a six-ton shallop. His flagship is wrecked on reefs near Governor's Bay, compelling Sayle to go for help with eight men aboard his consort. Eventually, he returns from Virginia with 60 more colonists and in March 1650 receives a shipload of provisions from Boston. (In gratitude to Boston, he sends back 10 tons of braziletto wood as a gift, which when sold provides a substantial portion of Harvard University's initial endowment.)

MARCH 23, 1648. After Robert Lonvilliers de Poincy—nephew of the French governor general for the Windward Islands—and his brother Lt. Col. Henri de Lonvilliers, Chevalier de Benevent, Savin et Courpon, Sieur de la Tour, reach Saint Martin with 300 men to stake France's claim over this island, the Dutch governor Martin Thomas agrees to share it. A partition arrangement known as the “Treaty of Concordia” is signed whereby the French will inhabit its northern half, the Dutch, its southern part.

JUNE 1648. English raiders under a leader known only as “Abraham” sack the Mexican town of Nueva Salamanca de Bacalar in southeastern Yucatán (near the modern border with Belize). Women captives are carried offshore to Islote de los Cayos, from whence they are rescued by 11 Spanish militiamen

The Fronde Revolts

After King Louis XIII died on May 14, 1643, France was plunged into a period of weakness and unrest. His son was not yet five years old, therefore his Spanish-born wife, Queen Anne, tried to rule as regent. Being a foreigner, she lacked influence with the French aristocracy as well as the Parlement of Paris. Amid the demands and bankruptcy brought on by the Thirty Years' War, the bad harvests of 1647 and 1648 added the threat of starvation.

Parlement angrily debated reforms that summer, until the queen regent—against the advice of Cardinal Mazarin—arrested three leaders on August 26, 1648. Two days of riots ensued, fanned by aristocrats and other dissenters. As no serious battles were involved, it would be dubbed the “Revolt of the Frondes,” the slings played with by children in the streets. Anne, nonetheless, had to flee with her child heir, the prisoners were released, and some of Parlement’s demands were accepted by October. But the leading aristocrats, known as the “Princes of the Blood,” refused to accept any type of constitutional monarchy. They besieged Paris with their troops, and lawlessness reigned until a truce was arranged in March 1649.

Mazarin and the queen regent returned into Paris and quietly sided with one faction. They arrested their three main opponents on January 18, 1650, starting a second round of fighting known as the “Fronde of the Princes.” Anarchy gripped the nation, especially the province of Bordeaux. France’s two greatest generals—Henri, Vicomte de Turenne, and Louis, Prince de Condé—fought each other for Paris from April to July 1652. Although victorious, the latter then spoiled his victory by massacring the Assembly of Notables. One month later, the count went to join the Spaniards in the Netherlands.

Weary of this endless turmoil, people rallied around the 14-year-old heir. He was crowned as Louis XIV and made a triumphal entry into Paris on October 21, 1652. With the help of Mazarin, the provinces were then pacified. The Frondes ended when Bordeaux was retaken by royal troops in August 1653. The young king and his minister next began creating a strong central government to avoid any repeat of such anarchy. Louis always remembered having to flee his capital three times and pretending to be asleep while a mob filed through his bedroom. It led him to slowly impose an absolute monarchy over all of France and its overseas colonies.

and 17 native auxiliaries under Capt. Bartolomé Palomino.

LATE AUGUST 1648. An unidentified buccaneer ship appears off Havana with two small Cuban prizes. Gov. Diego de Villalba y Toledo, Knight of the Order of Santiago, presses two private galleons into service, manning them with troops and guns; upon exiting, however, the Spanish pursuers run aground and are wrecked, obliging the governor to send out a rescue expedition—as well as indemnifying the masters for their loss.

MARCH 16, 1649. In Canada, 1,000 Iroquois warriors attack the French missions at Saint Ignace and Saint Louis, torturing their Jesuit priests to death.

MARCH 17, 1649. Grenada Occupation. An expedition of 145 French settlers under Governor du Parquet of Martinique, crammed aboard two barks commanded by Jean Lepelletier (known as “Captaine Pas”) and Captain Lorimer, enter Saint George’s harbor to occupy a base previously explored by Captain La Rivière. Within eight days, they erect a palisade named Fort Annunciation—March 25 being the Day of the Annunciation in the Church calendar—and du Parquet appoints his 55-year-old cousin Jean Le Comte as Grenada’s new governor, departing on April 6.

The island’s Carib residents under Chief Kai-rouane remain suspicious yet nonhostile until November, when 11 large canoes arrive bearing several hundred warriors from nearby Saint Vincent, bent upon avenging an insult in the Grenadines. Le Comte’s followers retreat within their stockade and spend eight anxious days, while the Indians destroy their properties before withdrawing.

MAY 1650. Four Cuban warships with 350 troops under Capt. Francisco de Villalba y Toledo materialize under cover of darkness opposite Roatán to eradicate its English buccaneering camps. Disembarking two hours before dawn, the Spaniards attempt to rush Roatán’s defensive works, only to be discovered and fired upon. De Villalba vainly attempts to outflank this system of trenches and ramparts with 30 men, hampered by surrounding swamps. When ammunition runs low, the Spanish withdraw and sail to Santo Tomás del Castillo (Guatemala) for rearmament and reinforcements.

MAY 26, 1650. Governor du Parquet reaches Grenada from Martinique with 300 men, joining his subordinate (and cousin) Le Comte for a sneak attack against its natives, who have been killing isolated settlers. Guided by a Carib traitor, 60 French musketeers steal up a hill that same night, surrounding a camp of perhaps two-score sleeping Indians at the edge of a precipice overlooking the sea. When the French begin shooting, their crossfire proves so effective that the natives are either massacred or leap to their deaths (the spot becoming known as Morne des Sauteurs or “Jumpers’ Promontory”). Du Parquet then orders the construction of a second small keep on Grenada, which he names Fort Saint Jean, and garrisons it with 70 men under Capt. Yves Le Cercueil, Sieur Le Fort, before departing on June 7.

JUNE 1650. While returning toward Martinique, du Parquet detaches 40 men under Capt. Louis de Kerengoan, Sieur de Rosselan, to occupy uninhabited Saint Lucia. They disembark on its western coast near modern Castries, erecting a fort with double palisades, moat, and artillery on the banks of the Carénage River. De Rosselan, who is married to a Carib woman, proves a successful governor.

LATE JULY 1650. Roatán Counterattack. De Villalba’s expedition of four Cuban warships returns to Roatán a second time, having been resupplied with powder and shot by the audiencia of Guatemala. The Spaniards’ ranks have also been augmented by 50 soldiers from Chiquimula under Capt. Juan Bautista Echavarría, and a like number from Guatemala City under Capt. Martín de Alvarado y Guzmán.

On this occasion, the attackers disembark some distance from the English defenses and advance with four small fieldpieces, which allow them to blast a breach and overrun this trench system—although taking no prisoners, as the buccaneers melt into the jungle. De Villalba therefore retires empty-handed toward Cuba, leaving the English to reoccupy their base.

AUGUST 1650. Struggle for Saint Croix. Some 1,200 men out of Puerto Rico overwhelm the English colony on Saint Croix, forcing its settlers to evacuate to Saint Kitts. The Spaniards install a 60-man garrison, which captures two Dutch barks that arrive from nearby Sint Eustatius expecting to find Saint Croix uninhabited. A few weeks later, the Spaniards are in turn besieged within their keep by 160 French buccaneers who slip ashore under the Sieur de Vaugalan, having been sent from Saint Kitts by Governor-General de Poincy. The Spaniards surrender and are repatriated to Puerto Rico, while a further 300 French arrive from Saint Kitts under Sieur Auger to convert Saint Croix into a French colony.

DECEMBER 1, 1650. As the French Crown is distracted during the minority of King Louis XIV by internal fighting known as the “Fronde Revolts,” the 50-year-old naval officer Mathurin Gabaret departs La Rochelle with his 30-gun, 150–200-man, 350-ton Phénix to make an unauthorized privateering cruise through the West Indies. In the company of another raider, they seize a rich prize off Santa Marta (Colombia) early the next year.

MAY 24, 1651. Frustrated by its inability to control Saint Kitts, Saint Martin, Saint Croix, and Saint-Barthélémy, the Compagnie des Îles d’Amérique sells its interest to the Order of Malta for 120,000 francs.

MAY 26, 1651. At 4:00 a.m., 25 Franco-Dutch raiders shoot their way into Alvarado (Mexico), killing 10 residents and wounding 9 before withdrawing with their booty to a pair of waiting ships—presumably those of Gabaret and his consort. It is known that the French officer was present in Canada a few months later, reportedly after a raid into the Gulf of Mexico.

EARLY AUGUST 1651. A squadron of French privateers, piloted by the Spanish turncoat Pedro Vélez de Medrano—formerly an admiral in the Armada de Barlovento who quit several years earlier over his arrears in pay—surprises and destroys La Guaira (Venezuela), torches its buildings, and makes off with numerous anchored vessels.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1651. The 35-year-old Parliamentary commodore Sir George Ayscue arrives at Saint Vincent, fresh from having helped capture the Scilly Isles, with his 50-gun, 280-man flagship Rainbow; the 36-gun, 150-man vice-flagship Amity under Richard Pack; the 30-gun, 90-man Success of Edmund Witheridge; the 30-gun, 80-man Ruth of Edward Thompson; the 24-gun, 70-man frigate Brazil of Thomas Heath; the 36-gun, 190-man hired merchantman Malaga of Henry Collins; and the 36-gun, 100-man hired London merchantman Increase of Thomas Varwell.

This expedition has been sent out from England to establish Cromwell’s rule over Barbados, which remains loyal to the exiled King Charles II. After refreshing supplies for 10 days, Ayscue beats slowly upwind toward his objective, hampered by the “ill sailing” of Success, Brazil, and Malaga.

OCTOBER 25, 1651. Ayscue at Barbados. The Parliamentary squadron arrives off Barbados this evening, splitting early the next morning to make simultaneous descents upon Carlisle and Austin’s bays. Captain Pack enters the former with the Amity, the Success, the Malaga, and an unnamed merchantman under Captain Totty, surprising 14 Dutch traders at anchor. Two of these deliberately run aground, but the other dozen are boarded and brought off by Pack, while Carlisle Bay’s batteries open fire without inflicting damage. Pack then dispatches a shallop to advise Ayscue, who sails from nearby Austin’s Bay to rejoin his second-in-command. While passing Needham’s Point, Ayscue’s Rainbow is fired upon by its fort; at first he responds with a signal shot to leeward, still hoping to secure Barbados without bloodshed. But when this bombardment continues, his ships crash out full broadsides, suffering one man killed and two wounded before clawing out of range.

The next day, October 27, Ayscue sends an officer and trumpeter inshore to call for Barbados’s surrender “for the use of the Parliament of England.” The Royalist governor, Francis, Lord Willoughby of Parham, having arrived from his plantation 12 miles outside Bridgetown and assembled 400 riders and 6,000 militiamen, answers that he knows “no supreme authority over Englishmen but the King”; to further outrage Parliamentary sensibilities, he addresses his reply to “His Majesty’s ship Rainbow.” Faced with such intransigence, Ayscue institutes a close blockade, intercepting arriving merchantmen (mostly Dutch, which will unwittingly contribute to deteriorating relations in Europe, hastening the eruption of the First Anglo-Dutch War the next year).

A stalemate ensues, until a packet arrives from England on November 18 with news of Cromwell’s victory over the last Royalist army at Worcester on September 3 (O.S.). Buoyed by these tidings, Ayscue sends 200 seamen under Captain Morris to destroy the four-gun battery at The Hole on the night of December 3, spiking its cannon and coming away with 30 prisoners. The Royalists’ morale is further lowered on December 11 when the Parliamentary ship John of Capt. Robert Dennis and the frigate Guinea of Capt. Edmund Curtis (both mounting 32 guns) appear with 13 vessels bound to subdue Virginia.

Temporarily reinforced by this second squadron, Ayscue sends 400 seamen and 150 Scottish soldiers—paroled after their defeat at Worcester—to attack the small fort at Speight’s Bay early on the morning of December 17. The Barbadian militia is forewarned, and Colonel Gibbs awaits this disembarkation with three troops of horse and 1,200 foot; yet despite their superior numbers, the defenders break and run in the darkness, leaving behind four cannon, 500 small arms, and 80 prisoners (mostly wounded). Ayscue cunningly orders the latter treated and released to spread sedition among Royalist ranks. A desperate Willoughby orders two returnees hanged and prohibits reading documents brought from the blockading fleet.

On December 24, the Virginia squadron departs and proceeds toward Saint Kitts, leaving Ayscue to begin a secret correspondence with Sir Thomas Modyford, colonel of Barbados’s Windward Regiment, stationed near his plantation at Austin’s Bay. Although a longtime Royalist, Modyford believes this stalemate is ruining the island’s economy so agrees to change sides, and on January 13, 1652, he turns his 800-man regiment inland, allowing Ayscue to come ashore at Austin’s Bay. Once assembled, the Parliamentary forces total 2,000 foot and 100 horse, opposed by 2,000 foot and 400 horse under Willoughby, a quarter of a mile away.

An immediate clash is averted by a week of rain, after which the Royalists ask for terms. These are generous, the Barbadians being granted their own government, with no retaliations sought. Articles are signed at the Mermaid Inn near Austin’s Bay on January 21, and the next day the fortifications are occupied by Commonwealth officers. Ayscue installs his aide Daniel Searle as the new governor, and about mid-March he sails for Montserrat, Nevis, and Saint Kitts, which also submit to Parliamentary rule before his squadron returns to England in May.

JANUARY 1652. French buccaneers out of Tortuga seize the Cuban town of Baracoa, torching it along with its citadel—the Castillo de Seboruco—when they withdraw the next month.

MARCH 24, 1652. A party of 60 dispossessed French colonists returns to Cayenne under Captain de Navarre to rebuild their stockade atop Mont Cépérou and plant new crops.

MAY 28, 1652. Some 30 French and English raiders disembark from a ship inside the Gulf of Mexico to pillage the town of Minzapa (state of Veracruz). The alcalde mayor of nearby Coatzacoalcas, Capt. Diego de Estupiñán, rides to its relief with 18 militia horsemen and captures one Englishman as the remainder retreat aboard their vessel.

EARLY SUMMER 1652. Rupert's Counteroffensive.

Shortly after Ayscue's departure, the Royalist commander Prince Rupert (Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria and of Cumberland, Earl of Holderness, etc.) arrives in the West Indies from the Azores off West Africa, hoping to shore up monarchist resolve. Although only 32 years of age, the Czech-born Rupert—nephew of the executed King Charles I—is already acclaimed as a brilliant campaigner, having fought at his uncle's side throughout most of the English Civil War. Yet, once driven out of Britain and pursued by the Cromwellian admiral Robert Blake, Rupert's royal squadron becomes so depleted that it is now reduced to the men-of-war Swallow and Honest Seaman, two lesser vessels, plus a few unarmed Spanish prizes, with mutinous, unpaid crews.

These are wholly inadequate to reverse the recent assertion of Parliamentary rule throughout Barbados and the Windward Isles, so Rupert traverses the archipelago without attempting any attack. While approaching the Virgin Islands, his squadron is engulfed on the evening of September 13 (O.S.) by a storm, during which his own flagship is almost destroyed. The next morning, only the Swallow and two prizes remain afloat, his younger brother Prince Maurice Palatine being lost on the south shores of Anegada Island with the prize ship Defiance and three other vessels. Disheartened, Rupert returns to France in March 1653. For many years, he will pursue rumors that his favorite sibling has survived.

SUMMER 1652. On Saint Kitts, Governor-General de Poincy becomes so alarmed by the growing independence of the Huguenot colony under Le Vasseur at Tortuga Island (Haiti) that he commissions the naval officer Timoléon Hotman, Chevalier de Fontenay and Knight of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, plus his own nephew de Treval, to sail toward this place aboard de Fontenay's 22-gun frigate and another vessel.

They rendezvous at Port à l'Éu on the north shore of Hispaniola, but before they can proceed farther, word reaches them that Le Vasseur—who has alienated both Catholics and Protestants by his increasingly autocratic behavior—has been assassinated by two confidants Tibaut and Martin. De Fontenay and de Treval therefore hasten to Tortuga, the former assuming office as its new governor. He pardons the two assassins and will unilaterally issue numerous privateering commissions for raids against the Spaniards.

LATE AUGUST 1652. Buccaneer raiders from Tortuga Island (Haiti) ravage the defenseless Cuban town of San Juan de los Remedios and carry away many citizens as hostages or slaves.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1652. The ships Charité and Grand Saint-Pierre appear from Havre off Cayenne in French Guiana, bringing 800 fresh colonists of the new Compagnie de la France Equinoxiale (more commonly referred to as the Compagnie des Douze Seigneurs, because its finances have been raised by a dozen noblemen). This expedition's original leader, Etienne Le Roux, Sieur de Roiville, has been murdered in his bunk during the voyage by his subordinate Vertaumont.

The latter comes ashore the next day and assumes office as the new governor. The stronghold of Mont Cépérou is renamed Fort Saint-Michel in honor of Saint Michael's feast day, which falls on September 29 in the Church calendar. Vertaumont begins his rule by having its wooden ramparts replaced by a 10-gun stone structure, designed by his military engineer Captain d'Aigremont. A 70-man garrison is then installed into this completed structure, after which Vertaumont lays out an entirely new town that November at Rémire, on the southeastern side of Cayenne's peninsula. But disease and miserable living conditions soon begin taking their toll among these newcomers, after which they will begin squabbling among themselves.

OCTOBER 14, 1652. Near Montreal (Quebec), 34 Frenchmen under Maj. Lambert Closse repulse about 200 Iroquois warriors.

MARCH 1653. The king of France confirms the Order of Malta's ownership of Saint Kitts and its dependencies, including its fortifications and churches. The order can also name its own judges and officials.

JULY 8, 1653. The new French colony at Cayenne has so antagonized its Galibi inhabitants that a major uprising erupts. Five months later, 400 discouraged survivors will set sail westward to seek shelter at the new English colony of Suriname.

OCTOBER 1653. Charles Houël, governor of Guadeloupe, sends his younger brother the chevalier Robert Houël to Marie-Galante with 100 soldiers to erect a fort.

FEBRUARY 9, 1654. Spanish Conquest of Tortuga.

At midday, the French and English inhabitants of this island see four Spanish vessels bearing down. This counterattack has been prompted by the buccaneers' sack of Santiago de los Caballeros in 1650 and the Cuban port of San Juan de los Remedios in August 1652, plus the numerous commissions being granted by Governor de Fontenay. Consequently, a punitive expedition has slipped out of the capital of Santo Domingo on December 4, 1653, bearing 200 soldiers and 500 volunteers under Capt. Gabriel de Rojas y Figueroa, seconded by the former Irish renegade John Murphy (now promoted to maestre de campo, as well as having been invested with a knighthood in the Order of Santiago; see "January 21, 1634" entry in "Other Colonial Struggles").

This Spanish squadron captures a trio of buccaneer craft off Monte Cristi before sighting Tortuga. Gliding past its harbor, the Spaniards bombard the vessels in its roadstead, then continue two to three miles farther down the coast to disembark several hundred troops at the hamlet of Cayonne and march back to besiege the island's principal fortress. On the night of February 12, Rojas sends a company with grappling lines to scale the heights behind this keep and install siege artillery. By February 18, the French and English are so reduced as to request terms, and two days later de Fontenay surrenders. More than 500 captives are taken, among them 330 boucaniers. All are allowed to sail away toward France aboard a pair of ships—the first under de Fontenay and the second under Tibaut and Martin—save two leaders who are kept as hostages (one is the governor's younger brother Thomas), while the Spanish furthermore seize 70 cannon in the fortress and shore batteries, three ships, a frigate, and eight lesser craft as booty.

The attackers also decide to hold their hard-won conquest by leaving behind a garrison of 100 troops under Murphy. (A few months later, Santo Domingo's authorities send Capt. Baldomero Calderón Espinosa with 150 soldiers to relieve the Irishman, whom they do not trust.) However, Madrid subsequently issues a real cédula on September 13, 1654, ordering Tortuga evacuated altogether, after throwing down its fortifications.

APRIL 14, 1654. Franco-Carib War. On Grenada, warriors arrive from Saint Vincent and begin attacking its scattered French settlements, sending the survivors flying south for the protection of Governor Le Comte's stronghold at Beausejour. One month later, this place, too, is overrun, its French garrison escaping by the providential appearance of a Cayenne ship with 300 soldiers, who help restore the situation by occupying Fort d'Esnambuc on Morne des Sauteurs, then driving back the Caribs. A two-pronged counteroffensive eventually strikes northward, killing 80 Caribs and temporarily clearing Grenada of invaders; but Governor Le Comte is drowned while retiring along the coast from this campaign, so the Caribs return aboard 24 war canoes, landing at Grande Anse (south of present-day Saint George's) to resume their rampage until finally being defeated at Fort d'Esnambuc a month afterward.

Minor hostilities persist on Grenada and neighboring Saint Lucia for some time thereafter, prompting Martinique's Governor du Parquet to send 150 men under his deputy de la Pierrière to attack the Carib bases on Saint Vincent aboard four ships mounting 12 guns, 4 guns and 2 swivels, 2 guns and 4 swivels, and 2 swivels, respectively. They find the Caribs waiting, having erected a breastwork by placing their canoes end to end on the beach and filling them with sand. After vainly bombarding these emplacements from offshore, de la Pierrière sends boats in close, luring the Caribs out into the open where they are decimated by grapeshot from his ships. Sweeping ashore, the French then inflict fearful punishment upon the western half of Saint Vincent before retiring to Martinique.

Trouble soon erupts on that island as well when 2,000 Caribs and blacks rise against the French. This outburst is only put down thanks to the chance arrival of four large Dutch merchantmen, which disembark 300 men and assist the beleaguered Martinicans. Having broken this Carib-black army, Governor du Parquet delegates his subordinate Guillaume d'Orange to complete its extirpation.

MAY 20, 1654. The 45-gun Courlander ship Wappen der Herzogin von Kurland arrives off the southwestern coast of Tobago and disembarks 25 officers and 124 soldiers under Capt. Willem Mollens, as well as 80 families of colonists, for a fourth attempt to settle this West Indian island. A stronghold named Jakabsfort or “Fort James” is promptly erected overlooking Great Courland Bay, around which a community christened Jakaba Pilseta or “James Town” will soon appear. This colonization effort proves successful, a modest trade in New World produce soon develops, and a further 120 colonists arrive three years afterward.

JULY 8, 1654. Gov. Charles Houël of Guadeloupe, about to sail for France to have his title confirmed, appoints his brother Robert and nephew Charles de Boisseret d'Herblay to rule during his absence. By now, the island has 1,200 men capable of bearing arms, including 300 Portuguese refugees recently arrived from Brazil.

JULY 13, 1654. Maj. Robert Sedgewick, the British commander on the New England coast, departs Boston to attack French Acadia farther north in reprisal for attacks upon British vessels. He captures Fort Sainte Marie, Port Royal (modern Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia), and Fort Penobscot, but they are restored to France in November 1655 by the Treaty of Westminster.

AUGUST 24, 1654. Five buccaneer vessels return to Tortuga (Haiti), hoping to reoccupy this island. They include 100 of its original French settlers un-

Dutch Refugees from Brazil

Learning of Cayenne's abandonment, a group of Dutch refugees from Recife (Brazil) arrived early in 1654 under Quirijn Spranger, repairing and reoccupying Fort Saint-Michel, which they renamed Fort Nassau. They were soon reinforced by other independent groups, including 60 experienced Jewish settlers who arrived with 80 slaves in 1656 and erected the first ox-driven sugar mill at Rémire. Their leader, David Nassy, then invited more Jews to migrate into this area as well in September 1659, and they were joined the next year by another 152 coreligionists from Livorno (Leghorn, Italy).

When one group of 900 Dutch refugees and their slaves sought asylum on Martinique, Governor du Parquet reluctantly refused, allegedly under pressure from the Jesuits who were against the introduction of Protestants and Jews. But they were warmly welcomed on Guadeloupe by Governor Houël. Changing his mind, du Parquet then sent a ship after them, asking the Dutch to return.

der de Fontenay, who have sailed only as far as Saint Kitts to recruit greater strength—rather than to France, as promised. They disembark, intent upon reestablishing ownership, but after eight days' fruitless combat, they are compelled to retire. Opposite Monte Cristi, they are intercepted by three Spanish men-of-war hastening out from Santo Domingo to the garrison's rescue. One buccaneer ship with 50 men is captured; half are Dutch, the remainder, French. The former are spared and carried as prisoners into Santo Domingo, while the latter are hanged from the yardarms for violating their paroles. De Fontenay escapes this fate, pausing at Port à Margot before sailing back to France, never again to return to the West Indies.

SEPTEMBER 1654. A Dutch colonizing expedition from Zeeland under Pieter Becquart reaches Tobago and establishes a settlement called Nieuw Vlissingen or “New Flushing” (modern Scarborough) at Lampsis Bay on the south side of the island. Thanks to the United Provinces' good relations with the Duchy of Courland, these new arrivals are able to amicably coexist with the already emergent Courlander outpost on the far side of this peninsula. Soon, the Dutch outpost will also be defended by three forts: Lampsisberg, Beveren, and Bellavista.

JANUARY 31, 1655 (O.S.). An English fleet straggles into Barbados under the 33-year-old “General-at-Sea” William Penn, having been sent by Oliver Cromwell to conquer a major stronghold in the West Indies. His warships consist of the 60-gun, 380-man flagship Swiftsure under the flag captain Jonas Poole; the 54-gun, 330-man vice-flagship Paragon of Vice Adm. William Goodson; the 54-gun, 310-man Torrington of Rear Adm. George Dakins; the 54-gun, 310-man Marston Moor of Edward Blagg and Gloucester of Benjamin Blake; the 44-gun, 260-man Lion of John Lumbert; the 36-gun, 180-man Bear of Francis Kirby; the 44-gun, 230-man Mathias of John White; the 40-gun, 190-man Laurel of William Crispin, Portland of Richard Newberry, and Dover of Robert Saunders; the 24-gun Selby of John Clark and Grantham of John Lightfoot; the 44-gun, 210-man Indian of Captain Terry; the 12-gun, 60-man galley Martin of William Vessey; plus the 36-gun, 150-man Great Charity of Leonard Harris.

They are escorting the 30-gun transports Heart's Ease of Thomas Wright, Discovery of Thomas Wills, Convertine of John Hayward, and Katherine of Willoughby Hannam; the 28-gun Halfmoon of Bartholomew Ketcher and Rosebush of Richard Hodges; the 25-gun Golden Cock of William Garrat; the 24-gun Gillyflower of Henry Fenn; the 24-gun flyboat Falcon of Thomas Fleet; the 20-gun Adam & Eve of William Coppin, Sampson of John Hubbard, Arms of Holland of Robert Story, Westergate of Samuel Hawkes, Marigold of Humphrey Felsted, and Crow of Thomas Thompson; the 18-gun Tulip of Jeffrey Dane and Cardiff of John Grove; the 12-gun fire-ship Falcon of William Tickell; as well as the Hound of Richard Rooth and the Falmouth of Robert Mills. This expedition is furthermore accompanied by a pair of ketches, a hoy, and the dogger Adventure. A convoy of victualers also awaits them at Barbados.

This rather ill-prepared formation has departed Portsmouth on Christmas Day 1654 (O.S.) with

Admiral William Penn

William Penn is believed to have been born on April 23, 1621 (O.S.), in St. Thomas Parish, near Bristol. He was the youngest son of a prosperous merchant from that English seaport. Little is known about William's youth, except that he went to sea at an early age. By the time the English Civil War erupted in 1642, he was a 21-year-old ship's captain.

Energetic and ambitious, Penn enjoyed a meteoric rise in Parliament's navy. In January 1644, he married Margaret van der Schuren, the wealthy widow of a Dutch merchant. Through this union, Penn gained title to an estate at Kilcorny in County Clare, Ireland. Their first son was also born that October, the future colonizer of Pennsylvania.

Penn was employed during the summer of 1644 at the siege of Youghall. By August, he became vice admiral of Parliament's naval forces in Ireland, his flag aboard the 50-gun Lion. As such, he helped besiege Bunratty Castle in the spring of 1646. When the last Royalist outburst flared two years later, Penn helped Cromwell invade Ireland early in 1649 by blockading its ports.

After the English Civil War ended, Penn was sent in November 1650 with a squadron to relieve Adm. Robert Blake in the Mediterranean. He chased Prince Rupert from the Azores as far east as Malta in 1651. Despite taking 36 French and Portuguese prizes, he never caught sight of the prince. Yet Penn fought well the next year when the First Anglo-Dutch War began. In April 1653, he was promoted to admiral of the Blue Division at the Battle of Portland. And he did so well at the battles of North Foreland and Scheveningen that he was voted a gold medal and chain by Parliament. George Monck also recommended that Penn be raised to the rank of “General-at-Sea.”

This promotion was confirmed by the admiralty that same December 1653. When hostilities ceased the next year, Penn was further rewarded with Macroom Castle, a confiscated Irish estate in County Cork. And in August 1654, he was entrusted with the naval command of Cromwell's “Western Design.” This enterprise, however, proved to be most difficult. Penn returned into Spithead on the evening of August 31, 1655 (O.S.), just ahead of General Venables, and both were thrown into the Tower of London three weeks later. Cromwell was furious at the failure of his Santo Domingo plan and the unlicensed return of his officers.

Penn was released in October 1655, after apologizing and resigning from the navy. He retired to Macroom. Four years later, by March 1660, Monck helped him resume his naval career. Penn was one of those who secretly negotiated with the exiled King Charles II and sailed in May 1660 to bring him to England. For this, Penn was knighted on June 9 (O.S.) and made a commissioner of the navy. After fighting in the Second Anglo-Dutch War, he quarreled with Monck and was brought up on charges. He died in London in September 1670.

Gen. Robert Venables, 2,500 soldiers, and 38 horses on board. Sloops are immediately detached to prevent news of this expedition from spreading throughout the Caribbean, plus 18 Dutch traders in Carlisle Bay are embargoed. (Among them are three Dutch ships under Pieter Stuyvesant, returning from Holland to resume his posting at New Netherland—modern New York.) Penn and Venables use this lay-over to recruit auxiliaries, eventually raising 5,000 volunteers on this and other Antillean isles to supplement their forces. After giving the volunteers some rudimentary training, the expedition—augmented by numerous prizes—departs Carlisle Bay on March 31 (O.S.), bound for Santo Domingo via Nevis and Saint Kitts.

APRIL 23, 1655. Assault on Santo Domingo. The English expedition stems the Mona Passage and materializes unexpectedly before Santo Domingo's capital at 1:00 p.m., taking its garrison completely by surprise. The new island governor—Bernardino de Meneses-Bracamonte Zapata, Conde de Peñalba—has only been in office since April 5, his regulars numbering scarcely 300 musketeers and pikemen. The English fleet divides into two segments an hour later, Penn bearing down upon Santo Domingo's defenses with his men-of-war to create a diversion, while Vice Admiral Goodson leads the transport fleet westward, seeking a suitable disembarkation point. Because of uncertainty regarding shoals, the 9,000 soldiers and sailors (plus 120 horses) do not begin landing until the next day—30 miles away between Nizao Point and Jaina, an absurdly long distance that allows the heavily outnumbered Spanish time to recover from their shock and fortify their capital.

The English troops, moreover—unused to campaigning in tropical climes—soon begin to succumb to heat, insalubrious drinking water, exotic fruits, and mosquito-borne disease. Their vanguard cannot struggle back through the jungle to the outskirts of Santo Domingo until April 27; and when Venables's main body arrives the next day, rather than immediately storm its ramparts, the general withdraws several miles to the Jaina River to permit his enfeebled troops to resupply with fresh food and water from the fleet. When the attackers finally resume their advance on May 4, they are bloodied the next afternoon by 300 militia lancers and 250 Spanish musketeers around Fort San Jerónimo, which effectively ends the English offensive.

Growing increasingly infirm within their camps, the invaders begin reembarking by May 8, this withdrawal being complete by May 12th. They leave behind more than 600 graves, 200 prisoners, two siege guns, eight flags, and all their horses. The Spanish have lost 30 men killed and sustained a like number wounded during skirmishes. Hoping to salvage something from this fiasco, two days later the English decide to steer toward smaller, easier Jamaica.

MAY 20, 1655. Conquest of Jamaica. On May 19, two Spanish turtle hunters spot the English expedition rounding Point Morant and warn Gov. Juan Ramírez de Arellano at Santiago de la Vega (modern Spanish Town). Like their compatriots on Santo Domingo, Jamaica's Spaniards—perhaps 1,500 men, women, children, and slaves—are caught utterly off guard by this unannounced English aggression.

During the night, Penn's expedition heaves-to before Caguaya Point (mispronounced "Cagaway" or "Cagway" by the invaders; later renamed Port Royal), and the next dawn the admiral shifts his flag aboard the frigate Martin to lead a flotilla of lighter craft into its harbor around 10:00 a.m. The Martin and a few other vessels run aground, but after a brief exchange with the batteries, the latter are abandoned by their handful of inexperienced Spanish gunners—under a hastily appointed maestre de campo, Francisco de Proenza, who is actually a local hacendado or "estate owner"—and the frigate is refloated. Sick, General Venables refuses to step ashore, so Penn lands a force of volunteers at Esquivel, meeting no opposition.

On May 21, the English advance six miles and overrun Santiago de la Vega, at which point Ramírez calls for a parley. Venables comes ashore on May 25 to dictate terms: the inhabitants are to abandon their island within a fortnight, on pain of death. Ramírez temporizes for two days but eventually signs this arrangement on May 27; shortly thereafter he sails for Campeche, dying en route.

Not all Spanish residents recognize these terms, however, and the maestre de campo de Proenza—after evacuating some 250 noncombatants by boat toward Cuba from northern Jamaica—establishes his headquarters at the inland town of Guatibacoa, allying himself with the cimarrones or "runaway black slaves" of its mountainous interior to inaugurate a guerrilla war against English occupation. The latter suffer more severely from disease and want of provisions, dying by the hundreds. Within a year, the 7,000 English officers and troops are reduced to 2,500. Soon this sickness spreads to the Spanish, leaving de Proenza blind, and he is succeeded by Cristóbal Arnaldo de Isasi, who continues a rather ineffectual resistance for another three years.

JULY 5, 1655. Not wishing to tarry on disease-ridden Jamaica, Penn prepares for a quick return to England by careening his ships (during which the Discovery is accidentally consumed by fire). He also off-loads all but six weeks' provisions to help feed Jamaica's unhappy occupying army and appoints Vice Admiral Goodson as naval commander in chief for the station. The Jamaican squadron is to consist of the one-year-old, fourth-rate frigates Torrington (flag), the Gloucester, the Marston Moor, the Dover, and the Portland, the four-year-old frigate Laurel, as well as the lesser vessels Martin, Grantham, Selby, Hound, Falmouth, and Arms of Holland.

Penn departs at dawn of July 5 with the Swiftsure, the Paragon, the Lion, the Mathias, the Bear, the Indian, the Convertine, the Heart's Ease, the Halfmoon, the Rosebush, the Gillyflower, the Sampson, the Wester-gate, the Little Charity, the Marigold, the Golden Cock, and the Tulip (plus the flyboat Falcon, the fireship Falcon, and the Adam & Eve, all of which are bound for New England). His formation circles around western Cuba by July 19–20, possibly hoping to intercept a Spanish treasure convoy.

Then at noon three days later, Friday, July 13 (O.S.), Penn's vice-flagship Paragon catches fire and explodes with a loss of 110 men, so the admiral presses on directly toward England.

JULY 11, 1655. Pieter Stuyvesant reaches New Netherland (New York City) from Curaçao, delayed from being embargoed by Penn at Barbados. Nevertheless, he still arrives in time to lead seven Dutch vessels and several hundred men in a military sweep that recaptures Fort Casimir, then occupies Fort Christina (Wilmington, Delaware). He annexes the entire colony of "New Sweden" to Dutch rule.

AUGUST 8, 1655. The Spanish garrison occupying Tortuga Island (Haiti) is withdrawn, both in compliance with Madrid's decree of September 13, 1654, as well as to bolster Santo Domingo's defenses against the recent English offensive. Capt. Baldomero Calderón complains about this decision, which not only compels him to abandon Tortuga to the buccaneers but furthermore obliges him to bury its 70 cannon rather than carry them off. As expected, the island is soon reoccupied by English and French interlopers under a leader named Elias Watts (or Ward), who arrives from Jamaica with his family and about a dozen colonists some time during 1656, obtaining a commission shortly thereafter from Gov. William Brayne of Jamaica appointing him "governor" of Tortuga.

AUGUST 10, 1655. Sack of Santa Marta. A month after Penn's departure, Goodson sails with his squadron to patrol the Spanish Main, leaving behind a few ships to defend Jamaica during his absence. He tacks 450 miles upwind to Santa Marta, surprising its defenders on October 3 and easily overrunning Fort San Juan de las Matas, as well as a gun platform covering its beach (where Fort San Vicente will later be erected). Gov. Ramón de Zalarriga, Knight of the Order of Calatrava, and sargento mayor or garrison commander Juan Gutiérrez are powerless to repel this attack. The terrified citizenry flee inland, and the English sack the hapless city and its surrounding farms over the next 15 days, burning most edifices before departing, although carrying off scant booty except for 30 guns. The Spanish residents are so traumatized that they will not try to reconstitute their city until seven years later.

Goodson, meanwhile, sails west-southwestward to Cartagena but, upon arriving outside the bay, deems his force insufficient to attempt any assault. He thus returns to Jamaica by mid-November 1655 "to refit and consider of some other design."

OCTOBER 15, 1655 (O.S.). England officially declares war against Spain, and Cromwell issues a manifesto 11 days later claiming it is justified because of past Spanish aggressions against English colonies in the West Indies.

MAY 1656. Ríohacha Raid. Goodson again visits the Spanish Main, having sailed from Jamaica on April 25 with 10 ships (smaller in size than those of his previous foray). After devastating Ríohacha with 450 men—for little reward except its four brass cannon—he departs on May 18, after torching its buildings. Proceeding down the coast, he waters at Santa Marta from May 21 to 23 before capturing a small Spanish ship bearing wines from Cadiz. Anchoring impotently before Cartagena on May 24, Goodson returns toward Jamaica after leaving his second-in-command with three craft to maintain watch over this Spanish base. Meanwhile, Goodson intercepts another small Spanish vessel bound from Santo Domingo toward Mexico, then arrives back at Jamaica on June 2. He is followed into port 11 days later by his second-in-command.

JULY 1656. Goodson weighs anchor from Jamaica, sailing to join the 14 sail he has previously detached to hover off western Cuba in hopes of intercepting a Spanish treasure fleet. By July 20, he comes up with Commo. John Lambert's Lion, Indian, Success, Dover, Selby, and Martin off Cape San Antonio (the Arms of Holland having exploded earlier). A month later, Goodson proceeds toward Havana with 10 sail, arriving by July 27 to unite with his other squadron and institute a close blockade. On August 29, he decides to send his flagship Torrington home to England along with the Gloucester, the Dover, the Portland, and the Laurel, so he shifts his flag into Capt. Christopher Myngs's Marston Moor, the others parting company four days later.

Abandoning his Havana blockade on August 31 (O.S.), Goodson beats slowly upwind toward Nevis, arriving by October 19 to begin embarking 1,400 settlers who are scheduled to immigrate to Jamaica. Having completed this mission, Goodson remains in and around Jamaica until January 1657, when he shifts onto the Mathias and sails for England, arriving in late April complaining of ill health. Myngs follows a month later with a three-ship convoy, bringing the Marston Moor into Dover by July.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1656. Governor du Parquet of Martinique agrees to sell his rights to the islands of Grenada and the Grenadines to two representatives from Jean Faudaos, Comte de Cérillac. The count himself has sailed from Nantes on July 11, 1655, only to be taken captive by the English and carried into Plymouth. (One of his representatives before the Martinican governor is the Dominican priest du Tertre, who will later write a famous history of the Antilles.)

Cérillac will not have any better luck when he attempts to sail from France with 400 followers in October 1657. Delayed until December, his expedition is driven to England by a storm. He will not reach the West Indies until 1661.

LATE 1656. In the Capesterre region of Guadeloupe, Angolan slaves under the leadership of two men named Pedre and Jean le Blanc rise against their masters. Their hopes of being joined by the Cape Verde slaves of the Basse-Terre region are not realized, though, leaving the rebels to melt away into the jungle after two weeks of violence. They are soon tracked down by a 20-man company of musketeers under a Walloon named Despinay, who brings in Pedre and le Blanc to be drawn and quartered.

OCTOBER 18, 1657. The Caribs of Martinique sue for peace, which is granted by Governor du Parquet. Unable to travel because of illness, du Parquet delegates his subordinate d'Orange the next day to visit the native encampments at Capesterre, getting their leaders' promise to no longer harbor runaway black slaves, whom the French greatly fear.

JANUARY 6, 1658. After touching at the Cape Verde Islands and Brazil, the 20-gun French frigates Gaspard of Captain de Fontenay (former governor of Tortuga, Haiti) and Renommée of the Dutch-born captain Job Forant, plus the flûte or "transport" Meautrice of Captain Daniel and two prizes, arrive outside Buenos Aires. Although this expedition's intent is to penetrate the Strait of Magellan into the South Pacific, the sight of a score of Dutch and two English vessels anchored off that small, lightly defended Argentine port persuades de Fontenay to take up station on an offshore island and attempt a raid.

However, a captive English pilot mistakenly disembarks de Fontenay's landing force amid impassable marshes, after which both the Meautrice and the Renommée desert the expedition in succession. De Fontenay, therefore, proceeds alone toward the Strait of Magellan, only to be driven back by contrary weather. He later rejoins Forant's Renommée at Rio de Janeiro.

FEBRUARY 20, 1658 (O.S.). Commodore Myngs returns to Jamaica from England as the new commander in chief for this station, having captured six Dutch merchantmen for illegal trading during his stopover at Barbados. Claiming all six as legitimate prizes, he is annoyed when eventually only one is so deemed by Jamaica's Admiralty Court, the rest being released on technicalities.

APRIL 1658. Rather than return to France empty-handed and face his investors, de Fontenay reappears off Buenos Aires with his frigate Gaspard and the Renommée under Forant, blockading the entrance for three weeks. Eventually, three large Dutch vessels emerge, determined to win their way past with their consigned cargoes. After a protracted engagement during which de Fontenay is killed and the Gaspard captured, the Renommée emerges with a single prize.

MAY 20, 1658. Spanish Landing at Río Nuevo. Four troop transports anchor in a half-moon-shaped cove off north-central Jamaica and deposit the surviving members of the Tercio Mexicano or "Mexican Regiment”: 31 captains, 31 ensigns, 28 sergeants, and 467 soldiers recruited in New Spain that previous August to wrest the island back from English control. Two days later, a trio of English coast-guard vessels chances upon the Spanish transports still at anchor, although they are chased away by gunfire. The English scouts nonetheless report to Gov. Edward d'Oyley, who appears at Río Nuevo by June 25 with more than 700 soldiers aboard 10 ships commanded by Myngs, disembarking nearby.

The disease-ridden Mexicans, who in the meantime have been joined by perhaps 50 tattered Spanish guerrillas, choose to fight from behind a redoubt, despite the heavy firepower advantage enjoyed by the English. The Mexicans are pulverized in a two-day pitched battle ending on June 27, suffering at least 300 deaths before dispersing into the jungle, leaving behind 11 flags, six guns, numerous prisoners, and most of their arms and ammunition. The English suffer 60 fatalities, conveying the Spanish artillery back to their island capital to install these pieces into its defenses.

SUMMER 1658. Myngs's First Foray. Alarmed by reports of the arrival of a large Spanish fleet at Cartagena, the English commodore sails from Jamaica with 300 soldiers (aboard the Marston Moor, the Hector, the Coventry, the Blackamoor, and the Cagway), to examine this base from out at sea, then veers southward to assault Tolú. After burning this latter port along with two ships in its roadstead, Myngs circles northeastward to disembark at abandoned Santa Marta, where his troops march 12 miles inland in quest of Spanish targets before withdrawing three days later. Returning into Jamaica after a 10-week cruise, Myngs brings in three Spanish merchantmen intercepted while bound from Cartagena toward Portobelo. The ships are sold to men who in coming years will prove formidable corsairs: Robert Searle, Dutch-born Laurens Prins or “Lawrence Prince,” and John Morris.

SEPTEMBER 1658. Martinique's acting governor, Médéric Rolle, Sieur de Gourselas, assembles 600 militiamen to exterminate the last Caribs in its northern Capesterre region. Five barks under François Rolle de Loubière are to carry 200 attackers by sea, while another 200 are to advance overland around Mount Pelée and a similar force to circle by way of Morne des Gommiers. The outnumbered and outgunned natives are quickly defeated, fleeing toward Dominica and Saint Vincent, while their villages go up in flames. De Loubière completes this heartless campaign by erecting a small fortress on Martinique's northern coast, hindering the Caribs' return.

LATE 1658. News reaches Tobago that James, Duke of Courland, has been captured by Swedish troops in Europe's Northern Wars, so the 1,200 Dutch colonists who now constitute an overwhelming majority on this West Indian island besiege Fort Jekabs and compel Gov. Hubert de Beveren to acknowledge Dutch sovereignty. This relinquishment of Courlander authority is officially acknowledged in Europe as of December 11, 1659.

EARLY JANUARY 1659. Myngs's Second Foray. Having enjoyed such success on his first foray, Myngs's frigates Marston Moor, Hector, Diamond, and Cagway are joined by numerous freebooters for his next raid against the Spanish Main. To surprise different targets, Myngs patiently tacks hundreds of miles farther east than he or Goodson has previously operated. This strategy pays handsome dividends when his formation bursts upon Cumaná, seizing and ransacking this unprepared port. Myngs then hurries westward upon the prevailing winds and currents and falls upon Puerto Cabello, before any alarm can be carried overland, and burns an anchored ship; he then repeats this tactic a third time by racing still farther west to make another rich haul at Coro.

At this latter port, he seizes at least 22 chests—each containing 400 pounds' weight in silver ingots—from two Dutch merchantmen flying Spanish colors in its roadstead; yet, when Myngs returns into Jamaica on April 23–24 (O.S.), these chests are found to have been opened, and officials suspect a great deal of bullion has been extracted by Myngs rather than surrendered to the Commonwealth's coffers. Myngs does not deny that some looting occurred, dismissing it as customary among privateers after a battle, yet the officials take a dimmer view, believing Myngs to be taking justice into his own hands because the Admiralty Court earlier refused to condemn his Dutch prizes (see “February 20, 1658” entry). Governor d'Oyley therefore suspends him and orders the Marston Moor home, where Myngs is to stand trial for defrauding the Exchequer.

a sympathetic hearing in June and restored to his Jamaica command shortly thereafter; see "July 1662" entry in "No Peace beyond the Line." The Spaniards have meanwhile commenced construction of a coral-stone fortress called the Castillo de San Antonio de la Eminencia atop Cumaná's Pan de Azúcar or "Sugar Loaf" Hill to better protect that town, a project which will not be completed until 1686.)

APRIL 9, 1659. Santiago de los Caballeros. On this Wednesday before Easter, 400 English and French buccaneers depart Tortuga Island (Haiti) aboard the frigate and three lesser vessels of Captain de l'Isle under a letter of reprisal issued by Governor Watts. They land near Puerto Plata to march inland and, on the night of Good Friday, attack its border town of Santiago de los Caballeros. Some 25 Spaniards are killed, the town ransacked, and a number of hostages seized; but the buccaneers must then make a fighting retreat toward their ships, beset by the fearsome cincuentenas (Spanish militia cavalymen, organized in companies of fifty apiece—in Spanish, cincuenta, hence their nickname).

Shortly thereafter, a French adventurer named Jérémie Deschamps de Moussac et du Rausset arrives at Jamaica from Europe, bearing letters from both the French and English governments appointing him governor of Tortuga. Rather than resist, Watts packs his family and goods aboard a ship and sails away to resettle in New England. The next day, du Rausset assumes office, although he soon transfers off Tortuga to the more salubrious mainland clearance at Petit Goâve, leaving his nephew Frédéric Deschamps de La Place to govern the off-shore island.

LATE JULY 1659. A private French ship arrives at Marie-Galante with 100 soldiers under the Chevalier Robert Houël, disgruntled younger brother to Charles Houël, governor of Guadeloupe. Having previously been promised a third of Charles's holdings, Robert was dismissed two years previously and so returned to France. Determined to reassert his rights, Robert proclaims himself governor of this tiny offshore island of Marie-Galante then continues to Guadeloupe's quartier Grande Anse to raise support. He rounds to its capital of Capesterre and disembarks a small army to directly challenge his brother. When Charles orders the local militia to march against Robert, they refuse, forcing the governor to accept a compromise and share his lands.

Intercolonial Friction (1660–1700)

If the King of Spain shall refuse to admit our subjects to trade with them, you shall in such case endeavor to procure and settle a trade with his subjects in those parts by force.

—Instructions to the Jamaican governor Thomas, Lord Windsor (1662)

NO PEACE BEYOND THE LINE (1660–1665)

Two years after Oliver Cromwell's death, the English monarchy is reinstated, Charles II returning from exile in May 1660 to assume his ancestral throne amid popular rejoicing. Yet despite a general cessation of hostilities throughout Europe, little tranquility is enjoyed in the New World. Treaties signed by Spain with both England and France avoid any mention of their American holdings, which Madrid eventually hopes to reconquer. This policy helps fuel the hostile undercurrent already prevalent in the theater.

FEBRUARY 1660. On Saint Kitts, a conference is held between English governors James Russell of Nevis, Christopher Kaynall of Antigua, and Roger Osborne of Montserrat, plus the French governor general de Poincy, and Guadeloupe's co-governors Charles and Robert Houël. They draw up an agreement pledging mutual aid against Carib attacks, while further recognizing that Dominica and Saint Vincent are to be left to the natives. Funds for this defensive alliance are to be deposited at Basseterre on Saint Kitts, to be disposed of by governors Charles Houël and Osborne; the former is also to sign a peace treaty with the Caribs on behalf of all members.

MARCH 31, 1660. Fifteen Carib chieftains gather at Gov. Charles Houël's residence (modern Houëlmont, Guadeloupe) to sign a peace treaty with the French and English. By its terms, the natives agree to desist from seaborne raids in exchange for being allowed to live peacefully on Dominica and Saint Vincent.

MAY 2, 1660. In Canada, 16 French voyageurs, 40 Huron allies, and 4 Algonquins under the youthful commander of Montreal's garrison—Adam Dollard, Sieur des Ormeaux—are surprised by 200 Onondaga Iroquois warriors at an abandoned fortification at Long Sault on the Ottawa River (near modern Hawkesbury, Ontario). Although its defenders are able to repel the initial Iroquois assault, the latter summons several hundred Mohawk and Oneida reinforcements from the Sorel Islands at the Richelieu River mouth. Once they arrive, 30 Hurons also defect from des Ormeaux's camp, which is easily overwhelmed by May 15. All the Frenchmen are slain, Iroquois losses totaling 14 killed and 19 wounded.

DECEMBER 10, 1661. In La Paz (Bolivia), long-simmering resentment by American-born mestizos against the stranglehold on power enjoyed by Iberian-born peninsular Spaniards climaxes in bloodshed. The actual incitement is the detention this morning of a popular mestizo mine owner, Antonio Gallardo from nearby Puno, which prompts a dozen armed men to storm the house of La Paz's corregidor general Cristóbal de Cañedo around 10:00–11:00 p.m. that same night to slay both him and another peninsular, while wounding three other officials and releasing Gallardo from the city jail. Next morning, to cries of Viva el Rey! and Muera mal gobierno! ("Long live the King!" and "Death to bad government!"), several hundred mestizos marshal menacingly in the streets, while Spanish citizens either flee or seek sanctuary within the churches.

On December 20, a small army of 300 mestizos and 150 Indians rides up the winding trail toward Lake Titicaca with 800 mules, intent on punishing peninsulars, gaining further adherents, and deposing the corrupt corregidor of nearby Paucarcolla, Pedro de Herquinjo Velarrinaga. However, after wreaking havoc among isolated mining camps and seizing the Salcedo Mill outside of Puno, the rebels are defeated at dawn eight days later by a sudden Spanish militia sally under Gen. Alonso de Molina y Herrera. Their ringleaders are slain and followers dispersed after a half-hour fight, thus bringing this so-called Motín de los Mestizos or "Mestizo Mutiny" to an end. More than 60 fugitives who return into La Paz are subsequently arrested and tortured, 6 eventually facing execution.

EARLY 1662. At night, a 30-man Jamaican expedition under Col. James Arundell lands on Tortuga Island (Haiti), marching upon the home of its acting French governor Frédéric Deschamps de La Place to place him under arrest and restore English rule. Because Deschamps is sleeping elsewhere, he hears this commotion and surrounds his residence with followers, who in turn disarm the English usurpers.

Arundell and his Jamaicans are expelled, their ship falling prey shortly thereafter to a Spanish vessel, which carries them into Santiago de Cuba where Arundell subsequently dies.

JULY 1662. The 35-year-old governor designate of Jamaica—Thomas Hickman-Windsor, seventh Baron Windsor de Stanwell—who has fought for Charles I at Naseby and will later become the first Earl of Plymouth of the second creation, arrives at Barbados from England with the fourth-rate frigate HMS Centurion of 46 guns and the Griffin of 14. (Both ships are under the command of Commo. Christopher Myngs, newly reappointed station chief for Port Royal; see “Early January 1659” entry in “England’s Resurgence.”) While refreshing himself after this transatlantic crossing, Windsor sends the latter vessel to Puerto Rico and Santo Domingo, asking their Spanish governors if they will permit English ships to trade now that peace prevails. This inquiry—which Windsor fully expects will be rejected—is actually meant to furnish a pretext for hostilities, as the governor is carrying secret instructions from Whitehall that, if such trade is refused, he might impose it by force.

Windsor resumes his voyage a few weeks later, reaching Port Royal by August. Having also brought out the back pay for its English garrison, he releases over 1,000 soldiers from duty with full wages and a gratuity, replacing them with five volunteer militia regiments distributed throughout the island. Work is moreover accelerated on Port Royal’s harbor castle (renamed Fort Charles in honor of the King), a local assembly is convened, and a vice-admiralty court is established so that cases no longer need to be appealed across the ocean to London.

SEPTEMBER 1662. Following the reappearance of the Griffin with Spanish dispatches denying trade, Windsor inaugurates his aggressive new policy by once more making privateering commissions available and summoning volunteers for a major expedition against the Spaniards, to be led by Myngs. Many old hands are delighted, so that within three days, 1,300 men assemble—many of them former soldiers—and the Centurion and the Griffin are joined by 10 privateering vessels, including a tiny craft commanded by a 27-year-old militia captain named Henry Morgan. The commodore is to lead this force against Santiago de Cuba, which—having been the Spaniards’ advance base in their recent efforts to reconquer Jamaica—is particularly detested by the English.

OCTOBER 1, 1662. Myngs’s flotilla quits Port Royal, slowly rounding Point Negril in light winds. Landfall is made a few score miles east of Santiago de Cuba, where the rogue privateer Sir Thomas Whetstone is spotted at anchor. Myngs obtains recent intelligence from him as to Spanish dispositions, then decides to burst directly into the enemy port, taking it by surprise. Joined by Whetstone and seven more Jamaican privateers who belatedly overtake his expedition, Myngs steers westward in scanty winds.

OCTOBER 18, 1662. Destruction of Santiago de Cuba. At daybreak, the English come within sight of the towering harbor castle guarding the entrance into Santiago Bay, yet cannot close because of faint breezes. Finally, late that afternoon Myngs decides to veer toward Aguadores village two miles distant at the San Juan River mouth. By nightfall, he puts 1,000 men ashore, no resistance being encountered, after which the English advance inland through darkened woods by torchlight.

The next dawn, they emerge six miles from the coast and three from Santiago, which they rush at midmorning. Their assault is met at Las Lagunas outside the gates by 170 hastily mustered Spanish regulars and two fieldpieces under Gov. Pedro de Morales, backed by 200 militiamen under Cristóbal Arnaldo de Isasi (former guerrilla leader on Jamaica; see "May 20, 1655" entry in "England's Resurgence"). The overmatched defenders are quickly routed, the English gaining mastery over this city and seven vessels lying in its harbor by noon.

The next day, October 20, Myngs detaches a column to attack the San Pedro de la Roca harbor castle from behind, in conjunction with a naval bombardment from his flotilla offshore. Such efforts prove unnecessary, though, as the isolated 30-man garrison has already deserted, allowing the English ships to enter unchallenged. The invaders spend the next five days pursuing the Spaniards inland, vainly hoping to extort their riches. Frustrated in this design, the freebooters raze Santiago; Myngs uses 700 barrels of powder from its magazines to demolish the fortifications and principal buildings, as well as leaving Santiago's harbor castle completely leveled. (It will take the Spaniards more than a decade to repair this redoubt.) Finally, Myngs departs on October 25 with his six prizes—the seventh being scuttled—at a cost of half-a-dozen Englishmen killed in action and another 20 dead through accidents or illness.

NOVEMBER 1, 1662. Myngs returns into Port Royal to find its political situation changed: Governor Windsor has sailed for England three days earlier complaining of ill health, leaving power in the hands of Jamaica's newly created local assembly—to which Myngs has been elected during his absence.

Encouraged by their easy success at Santiago, most privateers put to sea again to plunder other Spanish targets, while the Jamaican Council votes on December 22 to authorize another raid, this time against Campeche. Myngs's flagship Centurion is refitted, while freebooters once more marshal under commanders such as Edward Mansfield and William James.

EARLY JANUARY 1663. The Jamaican privateer Robert Blunden (or Munden) quits Port Royal, accompanied by Col. Samuel Barry and retired naval captain Abraham Langford to wean the French boucaniers of Tortuga Island (Haiti) over to English rule, in compliance with instructions from Whitehall. Both officers sail across to western Santo Domingo aboard Blunden's Charles, but upon arriving learn that the Tortugans are hostile to such a notion, following Arundell's abortive attempt (see "Early 1662" entry). Blunden consequently refuses to proceed, so that—over Barry's objections—the delegates instead visit a different band of boucaniers at Petit Goâve, who are persuaded to acclaim Blunden as their chieftain and raise an English flag. Disapproving, Barry returns to Jamaica several months later, while Blunden's partner Langford sails for England to petition Charles II to be appointed governor of "Tortuga and the coasts of Hispaniola"—which is eventually denied.

JANUARY 21, 1663. This Sunday two Royal Navy warships and approximately 10 privateer vessels depart Port Royal under Myngs to attack Campeche. Working his way down Yucatán's treacherous coastline, Myngs loses contact with his vice-flag Griffin and several privateersmen before finally coming within sight of his target.

FEBRUARY 8, 1663. Myngs's Sack of Campeche. Under cover of darkness, the British commodore sneaks almost 1,000 men ashore at Jámula Beach, four miles west of Campeche, and begins his overland advance against that sleeping city. At first light of February 9, Spanish lookouts spot his smaller vessels opposite this disembarkation point, with two larger men-of-war farther out to sea. They sound

Rebirth of Santiago de Cuba

The cruel destruction left behind by the English in October 1662 almost completely destroyed Santiago as a city. Frightened citizens at first refused to even return from their inland hiding places, much less rebuild their homes. The port's prosperity was also crippled because production had ceased altogether at the royal copper mines, located eight miles farther to the northwest at Santiago del Cobre. When Crown officials offered a generous new lease to reactivate these mines in 1663, they did not receive a single bid.

It was not until Santiago's former sargento mayor or "garrison commander," Pedro de Bayona Villanueva, arrived from Spain to assume office as its new governor in June 1664 that the city began a faltering recuperation. He came with the military engineer Juan de Siscara. Both officers reported that they found Santiago just "as the enemy left it," flattened and defenseless. Repairs soon began on the San Pedro harbor castle, which was to be rebuilt and strengthened by the addition of the Estrella and Santa Catalina batteries at its water level.

Yet more importantly, both men also realized that a tangible means of security had to be provided for homeowners to feel safe enough to resume residence. As a result, a stone citadel called the Fuerte Real de San Francisco or "Royal Fort of Saint Francis" was started atop the ruined foundations of the old Franciscan convent in the city's gutted core. Its defensive qualities were questionable, but its reassuring bulk heartened the citizenry.

All these projects proceeded only fitfully because of frequent interruptions in the receipt of funds from Mexico. Still, they were enough to deter a small Dutch squadron from braving Santiago's harbor entrance in May 1667, as well as a dozen ships under Morgan next March. The city nonetheless led an uneasy existence over the next few decades, the Golden Age of Buccaneers. And ironically, many citizens prospered as well from clandestine deals along the coast with foreign smugglers seeking Cuban meats, hides, tobacco, sugar, and dyewood.

the alarm too late, just as the freebooter army bursts out of the nearby woods at 8:00 a.m.

Despite being surprised and outnumbered, the 150 Spanish militia defenders put up a spirited resistance, and Myngs receives serious wounds in his face and thighs while leading the opening charge. As he is carried back aboard the Centurion, the privateer chief Mansfield assumes overall command. After two hours of heated fighting, the defenders are subdued, suffering more than 50 fatalities (as opposed to 30 invaders slain). Some 170 Spanish captives are thereupon rounded up, while many of the city's thatched huts go up in flames. Next morning, the only Spanish official still free—the regidor Antonio Maldonado de Aldana—agrees to a truce in exchange for the good treatment of the prisoners, thereby leaving the English undisturbed within the city.

By February 17, Myngs is sufficiently recuperated to order the release of four prominent captives, with a message to Maldonado de Aldana offering to spare Campeche's buildings and release the remainder of his prisoners unharmed upon withdrawing, if the raiders can draw water from the nearby Lerma wells. The Spaniard accedes, and as a token of good faith Myngs releases all but six of his most important hostages before watering. On February 23, his fleet gets under way, carrying off booty and 14 vessels (described by a Spanish eyewitness as "three of 300 tons, the rest medium or small, and some with valuable cargo still on board"). The heavily laden formation beats its way back around Yucatán against contrary winds and currents, taking so long that concern begins to mount at Jamaica as to their fate.

Eventually, the Centurion reaches Port Royal on April 23 under its flag captain Thomas Morgan, followed by the rest of the expedition. Myngs's wounds require a lengthy convalescence, so he sails for England early in July.

MAY 11, 1664. Having sailed from La Rochelle on February 26, an expedition arrives off Dutch-held Cayenne (Guiana) under Alexandre de Prouville, Marquis de Tracy, the new lieutenant general designate for all of France's American colonies. His mission is to impose government rule over all French settlements, supplanting that of the diverse private merchant adventurers who have ruled until now. De Tracy commands the 50-gun, 800-ton flagship Brézé under Dutch-born captain Job Forant, as well as the smaller Aigle d'Or, Saint Sébastien, and Sainte Anne, manned by 250 sailors. They are bearing 600 soldiers in 12 companies: 4 apiece from the Navarre and Normandie regiments, plus 1 each from the Chambellé, Orléans, Poitou, and L'Allier regiments. This convoy is furthermore accompanied by 650 colonists aboard 3 transports.

Disembarking 750 men two days later at Cayenne under the newly created governor for French Guiana—the 42-year-old naval captain Joseph Antoine Le Febvre, Seigneur de La Barre—the Marquis's subordinate Samuel Le Picard, Sieur de Flavigny, cows the Dutch governor Spranger into agreeing by May 15 to surrender Fort Nassau (formerly Fort Céperou). The outnumbered Dutch march out 12 days later with all their belongings to transfer into Suriname. Le Febvre de La Barre is temporarily installed as governor, and Fort Nassau is renamed Fort Saint Louis, after which de Tracy's expedition steers northwestward into the Lesser Antilles to continue his mission. He is well received at Guadeloupe and Martinique in June, although his subsequent efforts to eliminate free trade meet with only grudging success.

When Le Febvre de La Barre returns next year from Guiana to France, he will secure the appointment of his brother Cyprien Le Febvre, Chevalier de Lézy, as Cayenne's governor from the newly created Crown corporation, the Compagnie Royale des Indes Occidentales or "Royal West Indies Company."

Carignan-Salières Regiment

To bolster the frail French foothold in Canada, the Crown decided to send out a proper military force. This regiment had to be specially selected, because its soldiers would not only have to adapt to the Canadian climate, but it was hoped that some would remain as settlers once their service expired. The unit chosen was an amalgamation formed in May 1659 at the end of the Franco-Spanish conflict. To reduce the size of the French army, the veteran Piedmont regiment of Thomas François de Savoie, Prince de Carignan, had been merged with that of Henri de Chastelard de Salières.

Its 400 men in eight companies was considered an insufficient number, though, when the Carignan-Salières Regiment was chosen to serve in the New World. Twelve additional companies therefore were transferred from other units: four from the Chambellé and L'Allier regiments, three from the Poitou, plus one from the Broglio Regiment. Colonel de Salières reviewed these 20 companies in the spring of 1665 at La Rochelle, and the first four sailed for Canada. On June 19, the 200-ton Vieux Siméon of Capt. Pierre Gaigneur arrived at Quebec City with the Chambly, Froment, La Tour, and Petit companies. Eleven days later, de Tracy's Brézé reached Gaspé directly from Guadeloupe in the West Indies, ferrying upriver the Durantaye Company of the Chambellé Regiment, La Brisadière of the Orléans, Monteil of Poitou, and Berthier of L'Allier. (These four companies would be attached to the Carignan-Salières Regiment, not incorporated into it.)

The naval captain René de Gousabats, Sieur de Villepars, brought another four companies from La Rochelle aboard his elderly royal warship Aigle d'Or on August 18, followed by a like number next day aboard the Paix of Etienne Guillon, Sieur de Laubiére. The Saint Sébastien under Captain Du Pas de Jeu and the 300-ton supply-ship Jardin de Hollande of Captain Des Bouiges entered with four more on September 12, as well as the governor designate for New France, Daniel de Rémy, Sieur de Courcelles. Then, the last four companies arrived two days later aboard the Justice of Captain Guillet, 100 of these men being sick.

The insertion of 80 officers and 1,200 soldiers into a colony of scarcely 3,200 people left a significant impact. Not only did they expand and secure the borders, but they also erected forts that became towns. And when the Carignan-Salières Regiment returned to France in 1668, almost 450 of its officers and men chose to stay in the New World. Today, most persons of French Canadian descent can claim at least some of these soldiers as ancestors.

“October 25, 1651” entry in “England’s Resurgence”), sends 1,000 men from Barbados aboard five vessels—two of them armed with 36 guns—plus 600 Caribs in 17 war canoes, to occupy Saint Lucia and drive its 14-man French garrison under Jean Bonnard back to Martinique, leaving Saint Lucia and its several thousand Carib residents entirely to the English.

Willoughby justifies this seizure by including among his expedition the half-breed Thomas Warner, being the natural son of a Carib woman and Sir Thomas Warner (see “January 28, 1624” entry in “Other Colonial Struggles”). As the nominal leader of the Indians, the younger Warner has therefore “sold” Saint Lucia to England. The French lieutenant general de Tracy lodges a formal protest, yet before any accommodation can be reached between London and Paris, the new English colony succumbs to a series of disasters and is unilaterally abandoned on February 16, 1666.

JUNE 14, 1664. The new Jamaican governor, 44-year-old Sir Thomas Modyford (see “October 25, 1651” entry in “England’s Resurgence”), reaches Port Royal from Barbados aboard Captain Stokes’s 42-gun frigate HMS Marmaduke. On June 26, he proclaims “that for the future all acts of hostility against the Spaniards should cease,” adding that every English privateer must return into port to surrender his commission.

AUGUST 1664. Seizure of New Amsterdam. The English commodore Robert Holmes arrives in the Americas from conducting peacetime reprisals against Dutch interests in West Africa. Upon reaching New England, he discovers that, as of March, Charles II has annexed all disputed territories bordering on the Dutch colony of New Netherland—from the west side of the Connecticut River to the east side of Delaware Bay, plus all of Long Island—merging them into a new English province and granting proprietorship to his brother James, Duke of York. The latter in turn delegates Col. Richard Nicolls as this province’s new governor, dispatching him with a small expedition to take control.

Backed by Holmes’s four warships and New England’s governor Sir Robert Carr, Nicolls wins over New Amsterdam’s burgomaster and several other prominent Dutch citizens, compelling Pieter Stuyvesant to surrender without bloodshed. The English flag is raised by September 18, and New Amsterdam is renamed New York City, Fort Orange becomes Fort Albany, and so on.

SEPTEMBER 1664. The Jamaican privateer Robert Searle returns into Port Royal with two rich Spanish prizes. To underscore his new policy of peaceful coexistence with the Spaniards, Governor Modyford orders them restored to Santiago de Cuba, while Searle has his ship’s rudder and sails impounded as a punishment.

NOVEMBER 15, 1664. In Paris, Governor du Rausset—imprisoned in the Bastille for offering to sell Tortuga Island (Haiti) to England that previous year for £6,000—agrees to turn it over instead to the new Compagnie des Indes Occidentales for 10,000 livres. Its directors thereupon appoint the 52-year-old veteran planter Bertrand d’Ogeron, Sieur de la Bouère, in June 1665 as governor of the 700–800 Frenchmen living on Saint Domingue and Tortuga.

FEBRUARY 1665. A renegade expedition of a few vessels and 200 Jamaicans under John Morris and Dutch-born David Martien—seconded by captains Freeman, Jackman, and Henry Morgan—cut an 8-gun Spanish frigate out of Campeche at night. Despite the peace recently promulgated by Governor Modyford, these commanders have chosen to slip away in January, feigning ignorance of his decree so as to continue their depredations against Spanish America.

Sailing their prize down past the Laguna de Términos, they anchor on February 19 opposite Santa María de la Frontera, at the mouth of the Grijalva River. Some 110–120 buccaneers then disembark and travel 50 miles upriver, until coming within sight of the provincial capital of Villahermosa de Tabasco.

FEBRUARY 24, 1665. Tabasco Raid. At 4:00 a.m., English rovers fall upon the sleeping city of Villahermosa de Tabasco, capturing most of its inhabitants in their beds. A general sack ensues, after which the booty and captives are loaded aboard a coaster. The marauders then pause at nearby Santa Teresa Ranch to release their women captives, retaining the men for whom they demand a ransom of 300 head of cattle. Farther downriver they come upon a second coaster bearing flour, which they also seize.

Nearing the mouth of the Grijalva River, they discover that their waiting ships have been captured during their absence by three Spanish frigates and 270 men sent by Campeche’s lieutenant governor Antonio Maldonado de Aldana. This Spanish flotilla has sighted the interlopers’ anchored trio on February 22, boarding the 10-gun English flagship and 8-gun prize, while the anchor watches flee aboard the one remaining vessel.

Their retreat cut off, the main freebooter army releases their remaining hostages and begins moving west along Tabasco's shoreline with their two coasters, hoping to find another means of escaping out to sea.

MARCH 17, 1665. This afternoon, Morris's and Martien's raiders are overtaken opposite Santa Ana Cay (Tabasco) by Spanish guardacostas sailing the privateers' former 10-gun flagship and 8-gun prize, crewed by 300 volunteer militiamen from Campeche. Their commander, José Aldana, sends a boat inshore to call upon the buccaneers to surrender, but they pretend not to understand. When an interpreter approaches shore next morning, Morris and Martien reply that they will not give up without a fight, so the Spaniards rather reluctantly disembark—only to discover that the rovers have used this interval to entrench behind a palisade reinforced with sandbags, bristling with seven small cannon brought from Villahermosa. The Spanish force, mostly comprised of armed civilians, shows little stomach for an assault, so are easily repelled without inflicting a single loss among the freebooters.

Next day, March 19, the Spanish ships are found conveniently run aground, allowing the raiders to sail away unchallenged aboard their two coasters. Morris and Martien steer northward, hugging Yucatán's coastline and making occasional forays ashore to obtain supplies. Off Sisal they loot a vessel laden with corn, before finally rounding the peninsula and disappearing southward.

SECOND ANGLO-DUTCH WAR (1665–1667) AND WAR OF DEVOLUTION (1667)

In Europe, mercantile jealousies between English and Dutch interests lead to increased tensions, so that both nations mobilize their navies. The English unofficially open hostilities by sending an expedition to take over Dutch possessions in West Africa and North America in 1664, then attack a homeward-bound Dutch convoy from Smyrna off Gibraltar on December 29. The Dutch retaliate, so that Charles II officially declares war against the Netherlands as of March 14, 1665.

FEBRUARY 1665. News of the imminent rupture between England and Holland reaches Port Royal, where Governor Modyford determines to send an expedition of Jamaican privateers against the rival Dutch West Indian islands of Sint Eustatius, Sabá, Curaçao, and Bonaire. He assigns this task to his lieutenant governor, Col. Edward Morgan (uncle to Henry), a professional soldier of fortune who has seen extensive service in the Thirty Years' War and English Civil War.

FEBRUARY 11, 1665. The Dutch-born Jamaican subject Laurens Prins (better known among the English as "Lawrence Prince"), having sortied from Port Royal in command of Robert Searle's 8-gun, 60-ton frigate Cagway with 61 "mostly English" freebooters aboard, falls upon unsuspecting Bonaire four hours before daybreak on February 11, remaining for six days while his followers wreak considerable damage.

APRIL 5, 1665. Five English privateer vessels depart Port Royal, advance elements of Colonel Morgan's flotilla against Dutch possessions in the eastern Caribbean.

APRIL 25, 1665. Having been ordered to transfer to French Canada, the Lieutenant General Marquis de Tracy departs Guadeloupe aboard his flagship Brézé with the four companies of the Chambellé, Orléans, Poitou, and L'Allier regiments, leaving behind the eight companies of the Navarre and Normandie regiments to garrison the Lesser Antilles.

APRIL 28, 1665. Colonel Morgan quits Jamaica aboard Capt. Maurice Williams's 18-gun privateer Speaker, accompanied by three other boats, bound to assault the Dutch in the Lesser Antilles. Once united, the colonel's force will muster a total of 650 buccaneers aboard his flagship, plus the 16-gun Civilian of Garret Garretson, the 12-gun Saint John

Admiral de Ruyter

This great Dutch seaman was born Michiel Adriaenszoon on March 24, 1607, in the Zeeland seaport of Vlissingen or Flushing. Son of a humble beer porter, he made his first voyage at the age of 11 to Brazil aboard the ship Haen. He was captured in 1623 by Spanish privateers, yet escaped through France. Adriaenszoon also acted on behalf of the trading house of the Lampsins brothers at Dublin from that same year until 1631. He traveled as well to the Mediterranean and Barbary Coast and on whaling voyages from 1633 to 1635. And he proved so adept a privateer, that by 1636 he was nicknamed De Ruyter or "The Raider."

That same July 1636, his first wife died in childbirth, and he married the daughter of a wealthy burgher. Next year, he obtained command of a private ship to hunt French privateers operating out of Dunkirk, and as of April 1637 adopted the name of "Michiel Adriaenszoon de Ruyter." After three years of successful cruises, he was given command of the 26-gun Haze by the Zeeland admiralty. De Ruyter helped defeat a Spanish-Dunkirker fleet off Cape St. Vincent in Spain on November 4, 1641. He then bought his own ship, the Salamander, and made many trading voyages to Morocco and the West Indies from 1642 to 1651. Now wealthy, but once again a widower, he remarried on January 8, 1652, bought a house in Flushing, and retired from the sea.

But when the First Anglo-Dutch War erupted that same year, De Ruyter was offered the rank of commodore of a squadron of the Zeeland "directors' ships." Risen from the ranks, he at first declined, believing that he was not qualified. However, he accepted as of July 29, 1652, and performed brilliantly in a series of victories won under Lt. Adm. Maarten Tromp. When this commander was slain in the last big battle of that war next August, De Ruyter once again refused command of the Zeeland fleet. Instead, to avoid jealousies, he accepted the title of vice admiral at Amsterdam on November 11, 1653, and moved there with his family by 1655.

Over the next eight years, de Ruyter campaigned off the Barbary Coast and in the Baltic. He also blockaded Lisbon and escorted convoys through the Mediterranean. When a crisis with Algeria arose, he left Texel on May 8, 1664, with a dozen warships. On regaining the Spanish port of Málaga by September 1, he found new secret orders waiting from the admiralty in Amsterdam, which were to sail his fleet on to West Africa to counter British actions. Off Goree by October 22, he prowled that coast until more orders reached him at El Mina on February 13, 1665.

With war against England a certainty, de Ruyter was ordered to raid Barbados, New York, and Newfoundland. He was also promoted to lieutenant admiral of Amsterdam as of January 29, 1665, but was not confirmed until five days after his return to Delft on August 6. Smart, brave, and pious, his sailors referred to their 58-year-old admiral as Bestevaer or "Grandpa."

of John Harman, the 10-gun Pearl of Robert Searle, the 6-gun Olive Branch of John Outlaw and Trueman of Albert Bernardson, the 2-gun Susannah of Nathaniel Cobham, the single-gun Mayflower of John Bamfield, and an unnamed galliot under Abraham Malarka (or Malarkey).

However, these rovers show scant enthusiasm for such a venture, being much more inclined to raid their traditional Spanish American foes—an attitude further hardened when Morgan's flotilla puts into Santo Domingo to buy provisions, firewood, and water, only to be refused. Nevertheless, their long upwind beat continues, until Montserrat is raised by July 17.

APRIL 29, 1665. De Ruyter at Barbados. At 10:00 a.m., a Dutch fleet under Adm. Michiel de Ruyter appears out of the Atlantic bent upon punishing England's American possessions.

Africa, and after repeatedly clashing with English vessels in and around Holland's slaving stations—plus receiving reports of deteriorating relations back in Europe—he has been instructed to strike out across the ocean to launch a preemptive strike in the Caribbean.

At 11:00 a.m. the next morning, he boldly leads his fleet into Carlisle Bay, where 29 Barbadian merchantmen and a single man-of-war are about to weigh anchor. De Ruyter does not bother returning the fire from the island's batteries or anchored vessels until his ships come within point-blank range. Both sides then exchange furious volleys over the next several hours, de Ruyter's Spiegel and a number of other ships sustaining considerable damage. Despite destroying much of the English convoy, the Dutch admiral cannot dent Barbados's defenses so is obliged to withdraw for the neutral French port of Saint Pierre on Martinique to effect repairs, arriving there by May 1.

MAY 5, 1665. While his fleet refurbishes at Fort Royal, de Ruyter quits Martinique with seven ships and, during a sweep through the Lesser Antilles, learns that the Second Anglo-Dutch War has officially erupted back in Europe. After seizing the 20-gun English merchantman Africa and several other lesser prizes off Montserrat and Nevis, he sights Saint Kitts by May 12, then pauses at Sint Eustatius two days afterward to deliver supplies before being rejoined by his Martinique consorts under van Nes.

The whole Dutch fleet of a dozen men-of-war, one provision ship, the fireship Martha, Rotterdam merchantman Sint Petrus, and five English prizes subsequently quits the Caribbean on May 17, exiting around Saint Martin for Bermuda. De Ruyter passes this latter island by May 31 and, having already decided that New York (former New Amsterdam) is too difficult for his depleted forces to attempt, reaches Newfoundland two weeks later. Here, he captures a few English fishing boats and anchors in Saint John's from June 16 to 20, before proceeding out into the North Atlantic and toward the Netherlands. (Upon returning home, he will be made "Lieutenant Admiral" of Holland and play a distinguished role in the ensuing North Sea fighting.)

JUNE 29, 1665. Sack of Granada. This spring, the rogue band of Jamaican privateers under John Morris and David Martien—including Henry Morgan—has traversed the Bay of Honduras and gained Roatán, pausing to take on water. Continuing toward Trujillo, the privateers have also overrun this port and seized a vessel in its roads, before proceeding toward Cape Gracias a Dios and the Mosquito Coast. Nine native guides join them there, sailing south to Punta Mono or "Monkey Point," where the buccaneers hide their ships in an inlet and head up the San Juan River in nine lighter boats called piraguas. More than 100 miles and three waterfalls later, they emerge into the Lago de Nicaragua, crossing it by nocturnal stages so as to sneak up on Granada and take that city by surprise.

At dawn of June 29, they march undetected into its main square, loosing off a sudden volley. The rovers then herd 300 captives into its principal church and plunder for 16 hours before coming away with 150 prisoners. Retracing their course across the lake, they ransack a 100-ton Spanish vessel and Solentiname Island before finally regaining their anchored vessels and returning into Port Royal by late August.

(Having learned that the Second Anglo-Dutch War has erupted, they know that their illicit raids will be pardoned by Governor Modyford; only the Dutchman Martien does not return, preferring to continue toward the French boucanier stronghold of Tortuga Island. His withdrawal from Jamaican service is short-lived, though, for one year later he is being actively recruited by Modyford. Meanwhile, Gov. Diego de Castro and three Spanish subordinates are court-martialed because of Granada's feeble defense.)

JUNE 30, 1665. Governor General de Tracy arrives in Quebec City (population 500) from Guadeloupe with his four companies of troops 11 days after the first 200 of 1,000 more soldiers of the Carignan-Salières Regiment have also begun disembarking from La Rochelle. They will mostly be deployed inland for the construction of a chain of forts along the Richelieu River (at modern Sorel, Chambly, Contrecoeur, Verchères, etc.), thereby expanding and securing Canada's boundaries.

JULY 17, 1665. Fall of Sint Eustatius. Having reached Montserrat, the nine-vessel privateering expedition of Col. Edward Morgan pauses to gather strength and procure landing craft. Shortly thereafter, they run northwestward before prevailing winds, coming within sight of Dutch Sint Eustatius. Morgan leads 350 buccaneers in a charge ashore, easily defeating its outnumbered and surprised garrison—although the colonel then suddenly dies of a heart attack.

His Jamaican privateers remain at Sint Eustatius, renaming it “New Dunkirk” and deporting 250 residents to Barbados, while sending a single vessel with 70 men under Maj. Richard Stevens to also occupy adjoining Sabá; yet despite gaining 910 slaves and much booty, Morgan's death deprives the buccaneers of any incentive to attack other Dutch islands. Each captain splits off on an independent cruise, leaving Lt. Col. Thomas Morgan (apparently no relation to either the colonel or Henry) as governor of Sint Eustatius.

JULY 18, 1665. Although not yet officially commissioned to attack Dutch interests, the English privateer John Wentworth of Bermuda disembarks 36 men this morning from his small frigate Charles and surprises the 130-man, 7-gun Dutch garrison on Tortola in the Virgin Islands, securing it unopposed. Next day, he raises the English flag, and roughly half the island's inhabitants swear fealty to Charles II. Later that same day of July 19, the brigantine Hazewind—which belongs to the captive Dutch governor Willem Houten—comes in and is seized.

On July 24, Houten and his retinue are sent away in a bark, Wentworth appointing Lt. Thomas Bicknell (or Bignoll) to act as temporary governor in his place. Four days afterward, the Charles sails for Bermuda carrying 67 black slaves and the Hazewind as prizes, arriving eight days later to find his unsanctioned attack deemed illegal.

OCTOBER 11, 1665. To impede future piratical incursions up the San Juan River, Nicaragua's governor Juan de Salinas orders the immediate digging of a system of trenches and two towers at the strategic Boca del Ture until a proper fortress can be erected.

NOVEMBER 1665. Because of continual victimization of neutral Spanish Americans by English privateers, Governor Modyford convenes a rover meeting at Bluefields Bay (Jamaica), hoping to recall them to their proper duty. Eventually, 600 buccaneers answer his summons, reassuring the governor that they are “very forward” to attack the Dutch, and even accepting instructions for a descent against Curaçao. But once they depart, the rogues instead lay in a course for southern Cuba, supposedly to buy provisions for their forthcoming campaign.

A Spanish bark is intercepted among the Cayos and its 22 crewmembers murdered, after which the buccaneers seize the port of Júcaro around Christmastime. Some 200–300 raiders then march 42 miles inland, taking and firing Sancti Spíritus on December 26 without suffering a single casualty before carrying their prisoners back to their ships to be ransomed for 300 cattle. (Some later justify these depredations by alleging that they hold Portuguese commissions in addition to their English ones, issued by the French governor of Tortuga.)

Having thus disposed of their supply problem, the privateers choose Mansfield as their “admiral” and by mid-January 1666 begin the long upwind beat toward Curaçao. Yet their good intentions soon evaporate, the flotilla again dispersing to attack Spanish targets: eight privateer vessels roaming eastward from Bocas del Toro (Panama) to descend upon Nata, while Mansfield leads another seven westward against Costa Rica.

JANUARY 1666. The Jamaican freebooter captains Searle and Steadman, with 80 men aboard two ships, descend from Sint Eustatius upon the Dutch settlements on the island of Tobago. Although populated by more than 1,500 colonists and 7,000 slaves, the island’s inhabitants cannot adequately defend their couple of hundred scattered plantations or mills. The raiders therefore inflict great damage until they are joined a few days later by Governor General Willoughby, with a half-dozen vessels and 350 men from Barbados, who convinces the Jamaicans to refrain from such wanton vandalism and instead installs a 50-man force to occupy the island.

JANUARY 9, 1666. The recently arrived, 39-year-old governor of New France—Daniel de Rémy, Sieur de Courcelles—departs Quebec City with 300 troops of the Carignan-Salières Regiment, plus 200 Canadian volunteers, to mount an expedition against the Mohawks farther to the south. This expedition is reinforced at Fort Sainte Thérèse by more men out of Montreal before continuing across the wintry landscape.

On February 17, Courcelles reaches Schenectady (New York), his followers being too exhausted to attack the main Mohawk villages that still lay three days beyond. After being resupplied by Schenectady’s Anglo-Dutch residents, Courcelles’s force returns into Canada by March 17, having suffered 19 men killed and 2 captured during this campaign; Mohawk losses are 3 dead and 5 wounded.

JANUARY 26, 1666. In Europe, Louis XIV declares war against England, entering the hostilities as a Dutch ally.

EARLY MARCH 1666. At Jamaica, Modyford decides to bow to popular demand and unilaterally authorize the granting of “letters of marque against the Spaniard,” despite London’s peaceful relations with that nation in Europe. The governor’s reasons are manifold: to better control his unruly privateers, who are attacking Spanish Americans anyway and then carrying their prizes into French Saint Domingue, thereby diverting the steady flow of booty needed to maintain Jamaica’s economy. There are also the usual complaints against the activities of Spanish guardacostas and officials throughout the Caribbean.

MARCH 19, 1666. News of the outbreak of Franco-English hostilities reaches Martinique, prompting Gov. Robert Le Frichot des Friches, Seigneur de Clodoré, to begin refurbishing its defenses and recruit a company of tough black rebels under their leader, François Fabulé, as extra militiamen.

APRIL 1666. As news of France’s entry into the Anglo-Dutch conflict spreads throughout the Windward Isles, the nonaggression pact between Saint Kitts’ English and French residents is strained by mutual distrust, so that rearmament commences on both sides. The English soon begin concentrating all their regional strength upon this particular island, with Lt. Col. Thomas Morgan bringing over his 260 Jamaican buccaneers, who have been occupying Dutch Sint Eustatius since Edward Morgan’s conquest.

APRIL 8, 1666. Costa Rican Invasion. Seven English buccaneer ships, five lesser vessels, and two prizes under Edward Mansfield arrive before Portete, capturing its lookout before any alarm can be sent inland. After anchoring off Punta del Toro, several hundred raiders burst upon Matina, snapping up its 35 Spanish citizens; but an Indian named Esteban Yaperi flees from the smaller hamlet of Teotique carrying word of this incursion by April 14 to

This expression was simply another name for a privateering commission. It originated as long ago as the early 15th century, derived from the French. The full legal term was “letters of marque and reprisal.” The original purpose was to license a private individual to seize or destroy certain assets in retaliation for a wrong. With the passage of time, its meaning narrowed into a permit for private sea captains to serve in a war. Letters of marque were issued by Crown officials. A captain had to apply and post a bond, receive instructions, then be given a commission for a fixed period of time and scope. Prizes were to be brought in for adjudication, the Crown retaining one-fifth of their value. Within a few months of a cessation of hostilities, the papers became invalid.

Yet letters of marque could also be granted in peacetime, for a specific grievance. Only the High Court of the Admiralty in London or one of its justices could usually issue such warrants. A vice-admiralty court was established at Port Royal (Jamaica) in the autumn of 1662. In addition, island governors could grant regional licenses whenever frictions flared. Actions by the Spaniards in the Caribbean constantly furnished an excuse, and in the lawless 17th century, the limits placed on the letters of marque were often exceeded. William Beeston noted in August 1665 that the privateers who sacked Tabasco and Granada “went out and in, as if there had been an actual war, without commission.”

But in this era before the great commercial plantations, colonial authorities did not wish to alienate their privateers. Booty could fuel an economy, and they were often the mainstay of defense. French, Dutch, Danish, and even Spanish officials proved equally eager to lure rovers into their own ports with similar commissions. And as naval uniforms were not yet even worn, it could be vitally important for any captain to have the proper papers. The privateer John Wentworth of Bermuda also returned home hopefully from Dutch Tortola that same August 1665 with a hard-won prize and 67 slaves. But as he had not yet obtained a commission, his capture was deemed illegal, and the slaves were forfeited to the Royal African Company.

For this reason, whenever a conflict loomed, even honest merchantmen applied for letters of marque, in case they should chance upon a prize. John Dryden jestingly referred to such a need in his 1690 play, Don Sebastian:

Tis a prize worth a million of crowns, and you carry your letters of mark about you.
(IV.iii.16–17)

the recently installed Costa Rican governor maestre de campo, Juan López de Flor y Reinoso. It is Mansfield's intent to take the capital of Cartago by a surprise overland march, yet Yaperi's action spoils his plan. As of April 15, hundreds of Spanish militiamen begin mustering at the mountain stronghold of Turrialba, ready to dispute the invaders' passage. Mansfield meanwhile experiences considerable hardship penetrating the jungle, his 700–800 men succumbing to hunger, thirst, and fatigue. When the buccaneers encounter some Costa Rican natives transporting bags of ground wheat, they begin fighting among themselves over this meager spoil.

López, heartened by this report, advances with his more lightly armed troops, and Mansfield retreats. By April 23, the exhausted raiders stagger back aboard their ships at Portete, retiring shortly thereafter into the maze of islands in Bocas del Toro. Two ships then desert Mansfield, leaving him in the awkward position of being regarded as a failure both by his mercurial followers as well as by the Crown officials on Jamaica (for not attacking the Dutch as instructed). In an effort to vindicate himself, Mansfield decides to assail the Spanish garrison on Providencia Island, which has once belonged to English settlers (see “May 17, 1641” entry in “England's Resurgence”).

APRIL 22, 1666. Pointe de Sable. At dawn, the outnumbered French settlers on Saint Kitts attack their English neighbors, torching outlying plantations and prompting English governor William Watts and Lieutenant Colonel Morgan to march with 1,400 men against the smaller French concentration at Pointe de Sable.

Cresting a hill shortly before noon, the English descend through cane fields to engage 350 defenders under Robert Lonvilliers de Poincy. Confident of victory, Morgan's buccaneers drive directly toward the French center, only to be ambushed by a company of musketeers hiding behind a hedge under Bernard Lafond de l'Espérance. The buccaneers fight their way through with horrific casualties, emerging against the main French body and fatally wounding Lonvilliers. Yet the Jamaican survivors then receive a heavy artillery blast that fells Morgan, destroying the last of their courage. Of the 260 who plunged into this firefight, only 17 emerge unhurt.

Seeing the tough buccaneers falter, Watts circles warily around the French positions with his staff, hoping to find a better line of advance for his own force; yet he, too, is ambushed, a single volley dropping him and most of his retinue. His militiamen being left leaderless, they blaze away ineffectually from long range over the next two hours before finally running low on powder and withdrawing. The demoralized English subsequently stampede back to their half of Saint Kitts, offering no resistance when Lafond's columns arrive to consummate the French conquest of this island.

LATE APRIL 1666. Nau's Maracaibo Campaign.

A French buccaneer named Jean-David Nau—alias “l’Olonnais,” being originally from Les Sables d’Olonne—sets sail from Tortuga Island (Haiti) with his colleague Michel le Basque, leading eight small vessels and 660 men toward Bayahá for an additional party of boucaniers and provisions. Three months later, this formation stands into the Mona Passage in late July, where Nau captures a neutral 16-gun Spanish vessel that has just departed Puerto Rico for Mexico, sending it on to Tortuga to be offloaded. Nau meanwhile remains off Saona Island, intercepting a second 8-gun Spanish ship carrying gunpowder and payrolls for the Santo Domingo and Cumaná garrisons. When his first prize rejoins, the boucanier chieftain makes it his flagship, then proceeds with his entire flotilla to the Spanish Main, which he has combed the previous year.

Sailing into the Gulf of Venezuela, Nau and le Basque disembark their flibustiers near the 16-gun battery guarding Maracaibo's bar, quickly overwhelming this feeble fortification and passing their ships into the Laguna. Two days later, they reach Maracaibo, which lies abandoned by its 3,000 citizens. After occupying the city for two weeks and unsuccessfully sending out patrols to bring in rich captives, Nau crosses the Laguna to Gibraltar (near modern Bobures), which the Spaniards have reinforced with several hundred troops. His flibustiers mount a ferocious assault, Gibraltar falling after a brutal battle in which 40 buccaneers are killed and 30 wounded, the Spaniards suffering disproportionately heavier casualties (their dead being loaded onto two old boats, then towed a mile out into the Laguna to be sunk).

The town is pillaged and occupied for a month, after which Nau demands 10,000 pesos ransom to leave its buildings intact. Once paid, his flibustiers recross the Laguna and extort 20,000 pesos and 500 cattle to spare Maracaibo as well, before quitting the Laguna altogether two months after entering. Eight days later, they touch at Ile à Vache (Haiti) to divide up their spoils, then visit Jamaica before reentering Tortuga a month later.

MAY 1666. Gabriel, Sieur des Roses, the French governor of Saint Martin, leads 300 men aboard the ships Harmonie, Concorde, and three barks sent to rescue his colonists, preferring instead to use them in an assault against nearby Anguilla, where they disembark and burn the houses, bringing away two English prisoners and three cannon.

MAY 25, 1666. Seizure of Providencia. At noon, Mansfield's two frigates and three sloops raise Spanish-held Providencia Island, gliding down to anchor unobserved off its northern coast by 10:00 p.m. Around midnight the moon rises, and by its glow 200 buccaneers—more than 100 Englishmen, 80 Frenchmen from Tortuga (unaware or indifferent to their country's recent declaration of war against England), plus a few Dutchmen and Portuguese—row in through the reefs. They then march across the island, rounding up its more isolated Spanish residents, before storming the lone citadel at first light of May 26 without suffering a single fatality. Eight Spanish soldiers are asleep inside, the remaining 62 being scattered around their civilian billets. Mansfield grants all of Providencia's inhabitants quarter, while the French flibustiers prevent their English allies from ransacking the church.

Ten days later, Mansfield sets sail again with 170 Spanish captives, whom he has promised to repatriate. Captain Hatsell is left as “governor” of Providencia with 35 privateersmen and 50 black slaves until Mansfield or some other English authority can return. On June 11, Mansfield pauses at Punta de Brujas (Panama) to deposit his prisoners before standing away toward Jamaica. He arrives at Port Royal with two ships on June 22, learning of Modyford's fortuitous resolution of three-and-a-half months previously (see “Early March 1666” entry), which authorizes depredations against Spanish America. Mansfield thus finds his unsanctioned seizure of Providencia retroactively approved.

JULY 28, 1666. Lord Willoughby, governor general of the English Windward Islands, having just learnt of the French victory on Saint Kitts, commandeers a merchant convoy about to depart Barbados and uses it to assemble a relief expedition comprised of 2 Royal Navy frigates, 12 large vessels, 3 barks, a fireship, and a ketch bearing a total of more than 1,000 men. It is his aim to sail northwest toward Nevis, Montserrat, and Antigua, amassing further reinforcements before attempting to reconquer Saint Kitts.

His fleet arrives off Martinique two days later, cruising ineffectually offshore for a day before continuing toward Guadeloupe and hovering before its coast on August 2–3. Watchful French militia cavalry patrols prevent any English disembarkation, though, so Willoughby detaches his vice-flagship—the 26-gun frigate HMS Coventry of Capt. William Hill—with a bark and a ketch, to seize two French West Indiamen anchored at the nearby Saintes.

AUGUST 1, 1666. Nicaragua's Governor de Salinas completes the erection of Fort San Carlos de Austria on an island in the San Juan River, opposite the Pocosol River mouth. Its garrison commander, Gonzalo Noguera, will furthermore roll boulders into the channel to prevent any ascents by raiders.

AUGUST 4, 1666. Willoughby's Shipwreck. Hill bursts into the French anchorage at the Saintes, engaging its tiny battery commanded by Captain Des Meuriers, then closing upon the merchantmen Bergère of Captain Reauville and the Marianne of Captain Baron. The latter sets his ship ablaze to prevent capture, although the first is boarded. The English thereupon disembark their troops, who overrun the Saintes's small redoubt, scattering its defenders inland.

However, the weather changes this evening, blowing into a hurricane by midnight. Willoughby's entire expedition is destroyed over the next 24 hours, only a dismasted flute gaining Montserrat and a fireship staggering into Antigua. The other 18 English vessels are lost between the Saintes and Guadeloupe with horrific loss of life, including the governor general himself. The French later salvage Hill's Coventry and rename it Armes d'Angleterre, giving command to Captain Bourdet, whose Saint Sébastien has foundered at Martinique during this same hurricane.

AUGUST 11, 1666. François Rolle de Loubière arrives at Martinique with the Saint Christophe, bringing 120 reinforcements from France, plus news of further assistance on its way.

AUGUST 14, 1666. Under cover of darkness, Gov. Claude François du Lion of Guadeloupe leads seven boats with 450 militiamen and two guns across to the neighboring Saintes, where numerous English survivors from Willoughby's shipwreck are entrenching under Captain Hill. Du Lion attacks these extemporized fortifications this night and on August 15, eventually forcing the English to surrender by morning of August 16 after suffering 33 killed and 80 wounded (as opposed to negligible French casualties). The prisoners are thereupon transferred to Guadeloupe.

AUGUST 17, 1666. Four French ships and two barks reach Guadeloupe from Martinique, with 400 men under Captain de Loubière. That afternoon, they sight eight smaller English vessels tacking upwind from Nevis toward the Saintes under Henry Willoughby (the dead governor general's nephew), hoping to rescue their marooned compatriots. The largest English warship mounts only 12 guns, while de Loubière's smallest has 14; thus the French commodore waits until his opponents arrive off Basse-Terre before attacking. The English are hopelessly outclassed, young Willoughby escaping in a bark along with his four smallest vessels, leaving his three largest to de Loubière. Some 200 English captives are carried into Guadeloupe and set to work.

LATE AUGUST 1666. A counterexpedition of 500 Spaniards under José Sánchez Ximénez, garrison commander at the Panamanian port of Portobelo, recuperates Providencia Island from Mansfield's occupiers (see "May 25, 1666" entry). Some time later, this Spanish commander is murdered at night by his disgruntled soldiers.

EARLY SEPTEMBER 1666. A single French bark under Gilles Gaspart of Grenada deposits a tiny landing force on English-held Tobago, captured from the Dutch in January, and in the darkness tricks its garrison into surrendering. The French will remain in possession until March 1667, when they fire Tobago's buildings and withdraw shortly before Commo. Abraham Crijnsen's Dutch relief force appears (see "April 17, 1667" entry).

SEPTEMBER 14, 1666. In Canada, Governor General de Tracy and Governor Courcelles depart Quebec with 700 soldiers, 400 volunteers, plus 100 Huron and Algonquin allies to make a punitive sweep southward against the Mohawks. Encountering scant opposition, they burn four major abandoned villages and destroy numerous crops before returning home by November 5.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1666. More French reinforcements under the maréchal de bataille Chevalier de Saint Léon—including the famed, 48-year-old military engineer Nicolas François Blondel, who is to inspect and suggest improvements to Antillean defenses—begin arriving at Martinique from La Rochelle aboard the 28-gun Saint Sébastien of Du Pas de Jeu, the 26-gun Aigle d'Or of Du Maine, the 16-gun Aurore of Du Pré, the 8-gun Cher Ami of Julien, plus the 16-gun hired merchantman Eglise under Acard.

Blondel will draw up plans for a new stone fort to replace the palisades defending Fort Royal promontory in Cul de Sac Royal, as well as for new strongholds on Grenada and later for Tortuga Island off Saint Domingue (Haiti). Construction will actually start in the ensuing years.

OCTOBER 1, 1666. The newly promoted lieutenant general for the Antilles—Joseph Antoine Le Febvre, Seigneur de La Barre—reaches Martinique from France aboard the 28-gun Royal West Indies Company vessel Florissant, accompanied by the Mercier, the Ironnelle, the Lion d'Or, the Dorothée, the Pucelle, and two lesser vessels, bearing further reinforcements.

OCTOBER 25, 1666. After strengthening Martinique's defenses, Le Febvre de La Barre departs with an expedition raised in conjunction with Governor Clodoré and the local West Indies Company representative Chambré to attack English Antigua. To secure greater numbers, this force pauses at Guadeloupe during its passage northward, receiving further help from Governor du Lion.

De La Barre puts to sea again on November 2 with the 28-gun company ships Florissant (flag), the 40-gun Lis Couronnée, the 32-gun Justice, the 26-gun Saint Christophe and Saint Sébastien, the 18-gun Vierge, the 14-gun Africaine, and the 8-gun Bergère. The frigate Armes d'Angleterre and a smaller craft follow later.

LATE OCTOBER 1666. While the French are marshalling on Martinique and Guadeloupe, the Dutch

Tortuga

This small, rocky island off northwestern Hispaniola was sighted by Columbus during his first Caribbean voyage. It was named Isla de la Tortuga or "Turtle Island" in Spanish colonial times, which the French would retain as Île de la Tortue. The 25-mile-long island took on a strategic importance in the early 17th century after all Spanish settlers had been removed from the coastline opposite it by the Crown for trading with foreign interlopers. Smuggling nonetheless continued, despite the Spanish authorities' occasional sweeps to arrest violators.

Tortuga Island proved an ideal base for visiting vessels, safe from surprise descents by Dominican troops on the mainland. Yet it also lay only six miles away, close enough to ferry goods in and out of sheltered harbors. And by keeping a good lookout, Tortuga could be quickly evacuated at the approach of any heavy Spanish galleons. Anchored traders would typically install some of their guns ashore, while emptying or refilling their holds. Some sailors stayed behind as well, adapting to local customs.

Anthony Hilton tried to add an English colony amid the foreign settlers on Tortuga in 1630, only to be wiped out by a Spanish raid four years later. These attackers, however, did not leave a garrison, hence foreign occupancy soon resumed. In 1642, the longtime French West Indian resident François Le Vasseur arrived from Saint Kitts with his Huguenot following. He renamed Tortuga "New Normandy" and erected a fortress to cover its main anchorage. A decade later, Le Vasseur was murdered and succeeded by the French naval officer Timoléon Hotman, Chevalier de Fontenay.

Once again, a Spanish attack in February 1654 removed Tortuga's 500 residents. But these occupiers withdrew by August 1655, and the island soon after was reclaimed. Ownership was then halfheartedly disputed between Paris and London, until the French title was upheld. Buccaneers of all nationalities were still drawn to Tortuga, though, for privateering licenses. The untamed colony flourished so vigorously that 12 residents under the former flibustier Pierre Le Long left Tortuga in 1670 to establish a new town on the mainland called Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien). Others soon followed.

Because turtling was so common in the Caribbean, numerous islands also bore this same name, such as, for example, the shoals at the west end of the Florida Keys. According to the 17th-century buccaneer chronicler William Dampier, they were nicknamed the Dry Tortugas because of the sun-drying method used for curing turtle meat there. Salt Tortuga Island off Venezuela, on the other hand, drew on its natural pans for salting meat.

privateer Gerart Bogaert arrives at French-held Saint Kitts from Curaçao and recruits 100 compatriots, refugees driven out of Sint Maarten and Sint Eustatius by the English. Further reinforced by 50 French soldiers, this expedition then sets sail for Sint Eustatius to besiege the remnants of Thomas Morgan's Jamaican garrison within its fort.

NOVEMBER 4, 1666. Capture of Antigua. Le Febvre de La Barre's fleet appears off Antigua, flying false English colors, which allows the Saint Christophe and the Vierge to enter Five Islands harbor and silence its eight- and six-gun platforms while the Florissant and the Justice open fire upon its main fort, stampeding the startled English garrison with their first salvo. Some 200 men under Capt. Rémi Guilouet, Seigneur d'Orvilliers (Le Febvre de La Barre's son-in-law), thereupon disembark, securing the port.

Le Febvre de La Barre comes ashore and next dawn permits d'Orvilliers and an adventurer named Baston to advance against English governor John Bunckley's stone residence, a mile and a half inland. It is rather ineffectually defended by Col. Robert Carden, who is captured along with 30 men. The morning of November 6, Governors Clodoré and Du Lion lead the main French army in from the beach, being checked by about 400 English defenders behind a palisade near Carden's house directed by Col. Charles Guest, who succeeds in halting Du Lion's initial rush and wounding the French governor and many followers. But Clodoré's and D'Orvilliers's support columns soon arrive and fight their way through, seriously wounding Guest before scattering his company. French casualties total 50–60 men, and this action marks an end to hostilities on Antigua. Next day, Le Febvre de La Barre offers Bunckley terms, and by November 10 a capitulation is signed aboard Armes d'Angleterre in Saint John's harbor.

NOVEMBER 15, 1666. Having overrun Antigua, Le Febvre de La Barre visits nearby Saint Kitts, where he learns that a small Franco-Dutch force has Sint Eustatius's 200-man English garrison besieged (see "Late October 1666" entry). To aid in this effort, the French lieutenant general detaches the Saint Sébastien and the Saint Christophe with 150 men under d'Orvilliers, whose arrival persuades the defenders to surrender. The French thereupon seize the stronghold and install an 80-man occupying force, over Dutch objections.

Meanwhile, the 6-gun French Pigeon escorts 350 Englishmen and their families from Saint Kitts to Jamaica, while Le Febvre de La Barre—after failing to convince his French colleagues to assault Nevis—returns southeastward to continue refortifying Martinique, delegating command of his Saint Kitts forces to Clodoré.

NOVEMBER 30, 1666. Eleven French vessels return to Saint John's harbor (Antigua) from Saint Kitts with almost 1,000 men under Clodoré, learning that 900 Englishmen have marshaled in its northern district (Pope's Head) from neighboring Barbuda and Nevis under Col. Daniel Fitch. Despite having given their parole when Antigua surrendered to the French, many English residents now appear in Fitch's ranks. The French commander therefore sails for Pope's Head and disembarks his small army, seconded by Pierre Hencelin and Blondel, immediately charging into the motley English force and scattering its members back aboard ship, without suffering a single loss. Having thus reasserted French domination, Clodoré continues toward Martinique.

FEBRUARY 4, 1667. Conquest of Montserrat. Having reappeared at Saint Kitts from Martinique and raised another large expedition, Lieutenant General Le Febvre de La Barre sails southeastward against Montserrat. His flagship Florissant, the Justice, and 10 other vessels sight the westernmost tip of this island by February 4; while waiting for the remainder of his fleet to beat upwind, Le Febvre de La Barre bombards its principal English fort until well past nightfall without effect. Eventually, the French commander decides to disembark his 1,000 troops a few days later—despite having lost the element of surprise—because he learns that Gov. Roger Osborne's 900-man English garrison includes many Irish Catholics who are serving unwillingly. The French landing force of Maréchal Saint Léon fights its way ashore under covering fire from a brigantine, being comprised of 300 men of the Navarre Regiment under Captain Sanson, 200 of the Normandie Regiment under Captain de l'Ecoissais, and 500 Saint Kitts militiamen under Pierre Giraud du Poyet.

That evening, Le Febvre de La Barre's flotilla is furthermore joined by a trio of French warships bringing two prizes from Barbados, who add 150 more soldiers of the Poitou Regiment to Saint Léon's army. Next day, the French advance under Le Febvre de La Barre, Saint Léon, and the governor of Saint Kitts—Claude de Roux, Chevalier de Saint-Laurent—seeking 600–700 Englishmen who are believed to be concentrated in a nearby valley called the “Gardens.” No contact is established, but after a few days the lieutenant general detaches his son-in-law d’Orvilliers with a company of French troops and Carib auxiliaries to scour Montserrat’s jungles. They capture Osborne’s wife and another 80 English non-combatants, obliging the governor to sue for conditions a few days later. By these terms, more than 300 English colonists become prisoners, along with 16 guns, 40 barrels of powder, 500 muskets, 3,000 shot, and a large number of slaves, horses, and cattle. Montserrat’s 2,000 Irish residents agree to become subjects of Louis XIV, remaining under the interim governorship of the Sieur de Praille and backed by 80 French soldiers and two frigates. Le Febvre de La Barre returns to Saint Kitts by February 19.

FEBRUARY 26, 1667. Reconquest of Suriname. Zeeland’s commodore Abraham Crijnssen—known to the English as “Captain Crimson”—appears out of the Atlantic with his 34-gun, 140-man flagship the Zeelandia; 28-gun vice-flag West-Cappel of Simon Lonck; the 34-gun, 167-man Zeeridder of Pieter de Mauregnault; the 14-gun, 75-man yacht Prins te Paard of Salomon le Sage; the 6-gun, 13-man hooker Wester-Souburg of Rochus Bastaert; plus the flute Aardenburg of Abraham Trouwers and an unnamed snow under Hayman Adriaensen. They are manned by almost 1,000 sailors and soldiers, who are to reconquer Dutch Guiana, ally themselves with the French in the Windward Islands to ravage English outposts, then attack Virginia, New York, and Newfoundland on their homeward passage. (Crijnssen’s force has been raised by the Province of Zeeland alone, hoping to improve upon de Ruyter’s poor fortune of two years previously; see “April 29, 1665” entry.)

William Byam, Suriname’s English governor, refuses Crijnssen’s initial call to surrender, so next morning the Dutch squadron opens fire upon Paramaribo’s incomplete Fort Willoughby and sets 700 men ashore. Byam flees inland after a brief fight, finally agreeing to capitulate five days later and evacuate Suriname with most of his English followers. The actual articles of surrender are signed aboard the Zeelandia by March 6. Crijnssen meanwhile begins rebuilding Paramaribo’s fortifications and on March 27 is reinforced by the 26-gun frigate Vischersherder (“Fishers’ Herder,” a euphemism for Christ) under Boudewijn Keuvelaer.

MARCH 4, 1667. The 32-year-old Royal Navy veteran John Berry arrives at Barbados with the hired men-of-war Coronation (flag, 56 guns), Colchester, East India, and Quaker, escorting a merchant convoy. This is the first contingent of a fleet being hastened out from London under 42-year-old rear admiral Sir John Harman to bolster English strength throughout this theater.

Berry adds the local vessels Pearl, Constant Katherine, William, Companion, Phoenix, and John and Thomas to his force, departing Carlisle Bay on March 31 to establish his base of operations at Nevis. Shortly thereafter, the new English governor general for the West Indies—William Willoughby, younger brother to the deceased Francis—reaches Bridgetown (Barbados) with 800 soldiers under Sir Tobias Bridge, plus abundant supplies of artillery, powder, and shot.

APRIL 1667. Blondel reaches Tortuga Island off northwestern Saint Domingue (modern Haiti) and designs a new fortification for this French outpost, although the subsequent construction efforts will prove disappointing.

EARLY APRIL 1667. Learning of the arrival of Berry’s English squadron, Lieutenant General Le Febvre de La Barre sets sail from Basseterre (Saint Kitts), hoping to beat back to Martinique with his frigate Armes d’Angleterre and a small brigantine. They are intercepted off Charlestown (Nevis’s capital) by the 48-gun Colchester, which Berry has detached on patrol. After a lengthy chase, the English warship overhauls de La Barre’s frigate, engaging by moonlight. A ferocious firefight ensues, ending when the decrepit Colchester sinks and the badly damaged Armes d’Angleterre staggers away west-northwestward to Saint Croix.

MID-APRIL 1667. After reaching Nevis, Berry blockades French-held Saint Kitts. Some Martinican and Guadeloupan vessels run this gauntlet, disembarking 250 reinforcements on its eastern shores. The speedy French frigate Notre Dame de Bon Port is also sent to retrieve Lieutenant General Le Febvre de La Barre from Saint Croix, returning him to Martinique.

APRIL 17, 1667. Crijnssen sails from Suriname toward Berbice (modern New Amsterdam, Guyana), detaching the West-Cappel and the Aardenburg on separate services: the former to cruise for English prizes, the latter to carry captured sugar toward La Rochelle. After touching at Berbice and being joined by the yacht Windhond, Crijnssen reverses course

Sir John Harman

Little is known about John Harman's origins and early life. He apparently was born in Suffolk around 1625. Some family members may have been involved in maritime trade. His brother was believed to have been "an upholsterer at Cornhill," presumably the Philip Harman who was related by marriage to the diarist Samuel Pepys.

The first known mention of John Harman occurred in 1646, when he was serving on the Parliamentary side in the English Civil War with the hired merchantman Falcon. The 36-gun Commonwealth ship Welcome was his first naval command in 1652, which he sailed into the battles of Portland and the Gabbard. He was captain of the Diamond from August 1653 to 1655 and of the Worcester between 1656 and 1657. He served in Blake's fleet and took part in the successful attack against the Mexican plate fleet at Santa Cruz. Harman also commanded the Torrington in the Baltic in 1659.

When Charles II was restored to the throne the next year, Harman soon adapted to royal rule. He forsook his Baptist faith, so as to conform to the Church of England. He returned to sea in September 1664 as captain of HMS Gloucester and the next March was transferred aboard the Royal Charles to serve as flag captain to James, Duke of York. Ten days after the victory at Lowestoft that June, Harman was promoted to rear admiral, hoisting his flag aboard HMS Resolution. (And the night after the battle, he also received a notorious message from Lord Henry Brouncker, one of James's retinue, to shorten sail, which allowed the fleeing Dutch to escape the next morning.)

In June 1666, Harman fought bravely in the Four Days' Fight. His 80-gun flagship HMS Henry bore the brunt of the Dutch attack on the first day; the admiral himself was seriously wounded by a falling spar. The Henry was also pounded and survived three fireship attacks so narrowly that more than 40 crewmen leapt overboard and drowned "for fear of burning." Still, Harman won clear, refitted the Henry overnight, and was able to rejoin the fleet by the next day. But five days after this action ceased, he gave up his command to convalesce and was knighted.

After recovering, Harman was appointed to HMS Lion and ordered to lead a squadron to the West Indies. His aggressive tactics at Martinique, Cayenne, and Suriname restored English gains in that theater. On returning to London in April 1668, he was called before the House of Commons, which was investigating the shortening of sail after the battle of Lowestoft. Harman fared poorly in his first appearance before the House because he had been carousing with his crew the previous night. Four days later, though, he did much better. Because Brouncker fled in a panic, all the blame was shifted onto him. Harman campaigned with his usual vigor in the Third Anglo-Dutch War before dying in London on October 11, 1673 (O.S.).

west-northwestward, reclaims abandoned Tobago by installing a 29-man garrison with four guns under Pieter Constant, then continues toward Martinique by May 4, arriving three days later.

MAY 14, 1667. Having agreed to a combined attack against Nevis, Crijnssen's Dutch squadron is joined at Martinique by the French admiral Le Febvre de La Barre aboard his 38-gun flagship Lis Couronnée under Captain D'Elbée, accompanied by Vice Admiral de Clodoré—Martinique's governor—aboard the 32-gun Justice of Jacques Gauvain and Rear Admiral du Lion—Guadeloupe's governor—aboard the 32-gun Concorde of Captain Jamain.

The remainder of the French fleet is comprised of the 34-gun Saint Jean and Saint Sébastien of Captain Chevalier, the 32-gun Harmonie under Pingault, the 30-gun Florissant of La Jaunay, the 26-gun Saint Christophe of Séguin and Hercule of Garnier, the 24-gun Armes d'Angleterre of Bourdet and Mercier of Tadourneau, the 14-gun Irondele of Mallet, the 10-gun Nôtre Dame de Bon Voyage (with an additional 12 swivels) under Du Vigneau, the 18-gun transport Marsouin of Sanson, as well as the fireships Cher Ami under Lescouble and Souci under Ferrand. The French vessels are furthermore carrying 600 volunteers raised on Martinique and will be strengthened by another 500 two days later at Guadeloupe, before the entire fleet steers toward Nevis on May 18.

MAY 20, 1667. Battle Off Nevis. Rounding this island's southern points during the early morning hours, the Franco-Dutch fleet is sighted by English reconnaissance boats, which carry a warning into Charlestown. By 8:00 a.m., 17 English ships exit under Berry, 13 of which immediately bear down upon the attackers. The French line disintegrates into confusion while preparing to engage. Crijnssen's Zeelandia closes upon Berry's Coronation, but the Dutch flagship is driven off by two fireships, and after a desultory long-range exchange between both fleets, Le Febvre de La Barre sheers off toward Saint Kitts by 11:00 a.m., compelling his Dutch ally to follow. It is believed that the English lose two to three small vessels and perhaps 80 men in this indecisive confrontation, as opposed to 20 casualties among the Franco-Dutch fleet.

Disheartened by this poor showing, Crijnssen decides to part company with the French, sailing north by May 27 with the ships Zeelandia, Zeeridder, Vischersherder, Prins te Paard, and Wester-Souburg. Le Febvre de La Barre's fleet accompanies the Dutch as far as Saint Barthélemy, before veering round and being chased south toward Martinique by some of Berry's cruisers.

MAY 24, 1667. In Europe, peace negotiations are progressing among England, France, and Holland when Louis XIV declares war against Spain. His objective is to uphold the claim of his wife, Maria Teresa, claim to Brabant and other parts of the Spanish Netherlands following the death of her father Philip IV; this separate year-long conflict will therefore become known to the French as the Guerre des Droits de la Reine or "War of the Rights of the Queen," while in England it is called the War of Devolution—France seeking the legal return or "devolution" of these territories.

JUNE 5, 1667. Henry Willoughby, nephew of the English governor general, brings reinforcements into Nevis from Barbados with the 40-gun HMS Jersey, the East India, and a supply ship. He is followed shortly thereafter by the 60-gun Saint George and two other Royal Navy warships that have arrived late in May, part of a series of units being hustled out to recoup England's fortunes in this region before peace can be finalized.

When added to local volunteers raised by Nevis's governor Russell and members of Commodore Berry's squadron, English forces total 3,200 men, 14 ships, and a like number of smaller vessels—sufficient to contemplate an invasion of nearby Saint Kitts, held by 2,000 Frenchmen under Governor Saint Laurent.

JUNE 11, 1667. Crijnssen's Virginia Raid. The Dutch squadron appears undetected off Chesapeake Bay, snapping up a Carolina-bound shallop, plus another English merchantman. Learning of a convoy assembling up the James River to convey the annual tobacco crop to London, Crijnssen orders English colors hoisted on his ships four days later, then follows his captured shallop in past Point Comfort. English-speaking crewmembers call out the soundings, and passing vessels are hailed in the same language, so that everyone they meet is deceived.

Nine miles upriver, the raiders come upon the sole Royal Navy vessel for this station: the 20-year-old frigate HMS Elizabeth of 46 guns, which has arrived from across the Atlantic the previous month. Undergoing repairs, with only a 30-man skeleton crew aboard, Crijnssen blasts the hapless Elizabeth with a broadside, then boards but cannot haul this man-of-war off, so burns it at its mooring.

The Dutch thereupon reverse course downriver, seizing everything in their path. Of 17 merchantmen that they take, 7 are scuttled for lack of prize crews; the rest are retained. (The Wester-Souburg is also destroyed around this same time, being used as a fireship.) The Virginians under Gov. Sir William Berkeley mount only a feeble resistance, few merchant masters being willing to match broadsides with Crijnssen's veterans, so that the Dutch commodore departs unmolested by June 21.

JUNE 16, 1667. Repulse on Saint Kitts. News of an imminent English assault reaches the French on this island, and next dawn Henry Willoughby's 30 ships appear from Nevis, splitting into two contingents: one making toward Old Road Town, the other toward the French capital of Basseterre. After anchoring out of range overnight, Willoughby signals before daybreak of June 18 to begin the disembarkation north of Palmetto Point, near Pelham River.

By the time Governor Saint Laurent can gallop to this place with a handful of French militiamen, 300 Englishmen are ashore, boats bringing in more; yet although this beach offers a good landing site, it is encircled by steep bluffs, with only a narrow path leading inland. Thus Saint Laurent with his aides Giraud du Poyet and Dominique des Vergers de Sannois, plus fewer than a dozen others, are able to contain this English advance until further cavalry units arrive. The invaders thereupon attempt to outflank Saint Laurent's position by circling north, only to be checked by the timely arrival of Captain d'Orvilliers with 120 men of the Poitou Regiment. A body of horsemen and four companies of the Navarre Regiment deal a similar setback to another English maneuver in the opposite direction, after which the invasion force becomes pinned down at the base of the cliffs. Offshore, Willoughby sends three boatloads of men in a desperate attempt to open yet another flanking movement, only to have them checked at the shoreline as well. After six hours of hopeless struggle, the English landing force surrenders, having suffered 506 killed, 284 wounded, and 140 captured. Defeated, Willoughby retires to Nevis.

JUNE 18, 1667. Rear Admiral Harman reaches Barbados from England with his 68-gun flagship HMS Lion; the 50-gun Crown (ex-Taunton); the 44-gun Newcastle; the 40-gun Dover, Bonadventure, and Assistance; the 32-gun Assurance; two fireships; and a pair of ketches. His squadron is quickly dispatched toward Nevis by Governor General Willoughby to support the operation against French-held Saint Kitts.

JUNE 21, 1667. Harman reaches Nevis and, after learning of Henry Willoughby's debacle off Saint Kitts, cruises impotently before the latter island, until he opts to blockade Martinique. Setting sail southeastward from Nevis on June 25 with his original squadron, plus the Jersey and the Norwich (for a total strength of nine ships of the line, a fireship, and an auxiliary), Harman sights 19 French West Indies Company vessels and 14 Martinican traders huddled beneath Fort Saint Pierre at midday on June 29. At 4:30 p.m., his formation stands into the bay, only to be driven off by the combined fire of the anchored ships and batteries. This tactic of drawing Martinique's fire is to become part of Harman's strategy over the next few weeks, knowing the island's defenders to be short of powder.

JUNE 30, 1667. This afternoon, Harman's flagship Lion and three frigates lead the English fleet back into Saint Pierre's Bay (Martinique), precipitating a four-hour firefight that ends with the attackers' vessels becoming becalmed, obliging them to be towed out of range—their rowers suffering heavily.

JULY 2, 1667. Harman once more assaults Martinique's main harbor, engaging in a spirited three-hour exchange with its anchored warships and batteries under Lieutenant General Le Febvre de La Barre, Governor Clodoré, and Commodore de Loubière, before the English are obliged to withdraw.

JULY 4, 1667. At 10:00 a.m., Harman makes his third attack against Saint Pierre (Martinique), obliging its French defenders to expend a good deal of their remaining powder in a two-hour exchange.

JULY 6, 1667. Harman's Martinican Bonfire. Once more, the English admiral leads his fleet into Saint Pierre, the French counterfire growing increasingly slack. During a lull, an English fireship slips through the smoke to grapple the Lis Couronnée, setting it ablaze. This conflagration quickly spreads to the Saint Jean, the Mercier, and the Lion d'Or, which are consumed down to their waterlines, while panicky French crews abandon other ships. (Adding to the confusion, the fireship Pucelle is set ablaze by its own French crew, who thereupon swim ashore.) After five hours, the English retire, leaving the badly shaken French resolved to scuttle their remaining vessels should any more attacks occur.

Another attack commences the next day, when Harman leads his warships in to unleash a point-blank bombardment against Saint Pierre's battered redoubts. Fort Saint Robert already lies demolished, but Governor Clodoré and militia captain Guillaume d'Orange resist bravely from Saint Sébastien, supplementing their meager magazines from the fireship Souci. Yet when Harman retires an hour and a half later, 23 French vessels are left sinking, burning, or destroyed. The English have suffered 80 dead and numerous wounded plus considerable damage to their warships; Harman therefore quits Martinique before dawn of July 11, returning into Nevis to effect repairs.

JULY 26, 1667. Having refurbished his men-of-war, Harman discovers that his forces—when united with local contingents under Henry Willoughby—total 22 ships and 3,000 troops, sufficient to contemplate a second invasion attempt against French-held Saint Kitts. The admiral therefore circles that island on July 26 with 12 vessels, coasting from Basseterre northward to Pointe de Sable and bombarding strategic points; but a 500-strong French cavalry unit under Governor Saint Laurent keeps pace, preventing any disembarkation. Disillusioned, Harman returns into Nevis and informs Willoughby that he will lead an expedition against French Cayenne (Guiana), while leaving Commo. William Poole with a small squadron in the Leeward Islands.

JULY 31, 1667. The Treaty of Breda is signed in Europe, signaling peace between England, France, and Holland. By its terms, Antigua, Montserrat, and half of Saint Kitts are to be restored to English rule within six months. However, word of this pact does not reach the New World until a month and a half later—official notification not arriving until Christmas—nor does it mark an end to the Franco-Spanish hostilities.

AUGUST 1667. While at anchor after pillaging San Juan de los Remedios (Cuba), the French buccaneer Nau l'Olonnais learns that a 10-gun Spanish galliot is approaching with 90 men to capture him, sent from Havana by the Cap. Gen. Francisco Dávila Orejón y Gastón. Instead, the flibustier sneaks upon the galliot with two boats this same night, taking it by surprise while the crew is resting off the coast and allegedly slaughtering everyone aboard—save one black slave, who is spared to carry word of this defeat back to Havana.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1667. Extirpation of French Cayenne. Admiral Harman, apparently still unaware of the peace in Europe, bears down on Cayenne with his nine ships of the line and 850 troops. Lookouts report this sighting to Governor Le Febvre de Lézy, who assumes them to be reinforcements sent from Martinique by his brother, the lieutenant general. Upon circling around from his residence at Matoury into Fort Saint Louis at Cayenne, though, the governor learns that they are actually English warships, pursuing a lone French supply frigate.

He therefore leads 200 men to join another 100 marshalling at Rémire, watching warily as 14 boatloads of invaders gather offshore at Père or Cabrittes Isle in anticipation of a landing. But when Harman's fleet shifts menacingly overnight toward Romana (modern Bourda Beach), nearer to Cayenne, Le Febvre de Lézy follows this feint, which allows the boat parties to disgorge unopposed next day at Rémire. Panic thereupon grips the outnumbered defenders, who spike their guns and flee in every direction.

It takes the English at Rémire six days to discover that Fort Saint Louis is in fact lying abandoned, at which point they circle around and leisurely strip its citadel and surrounding district of everything of value, as well as seizing numerous captives. After loading their squadron with captured guns, ammunition, and 250 slaves, the English torch the plantations, then depart on October 9 to visit a like treatment upon Dutch Suriname.

OCTOBER 13, 1667. Seizure of Suriname. Venturing westward along the Guianas, Harman appears before Suriname's capital of Paramaribo, disembarking his troops a half mile below Fort Zeelandia, then surrounding and calling upon its 250-man garrison under Maurits de Rame to surrender by nightfall. The Dutch refuse, so after a four-day lull in the winds, the English launch a combined land assault on October 17. After heavy fighting in which Capt. Thomas Willoughby of the ketch Portsmouth—among others—loses his life and the defenders suffer 50 casualties, de Rame requests terms. While these are being finalized, some English soldiers stealthily swim round its defenses and occupy the fort.

When a fleet arrives two weeks later from the Netherlands, announcing that the colony is to be restored to Holland according to the Treaty of Breda, Governor Willoughby refuses to comply, instead destroying its fortifications and many other properties. Harman, however, reenters Barbados by November 20 in anticipation of returning home to England.

BUCCANEER HEYDAY (1668–1672)

Although peace has been restored in Europe, local frictions remain in the New World. Jamaica, in particular, experiences a period of renewed anti-Spanish fears late in 1667, prompting Governor Modyford to commission Henry Morgan—recently promoted to colonel of the Port Royal militia—“to draw together the English privateers [throughout the region] and take prisoners of the Spanish nation, whereby he might inform of the intention of that enemy to invade Jamaica.” Such an open-ended license is meant to go well beyond mere intelligence gathering; it is actually intended to bestow the unofficial mantle of buccaneer “admiral” upon Morgan, following the death of Edward Mansfield several months previously.

Duly armed with his permit, Morgan attracts hundreds of rovers to his rendezvous off southern Cuba, including such notable commanders as John Morris and Edward Collier (as well as numerous French flibustiers, whose country is at least at war against Spain). After various consultations, Morgan leads his dozen ships and 700 men to Santiago de Cuba by March 1, briefly blockading its entrance before proceeding into the Gulf of Santa María.

FEBRUARY 1668. Buccaneers once again pillage the helpless Cuban town of San Juan de los Remedios, whose weary citizens petition the Crown for permission to relocate.

FEBRUARY 12, 1668. The Spanish admiral Agustín de Diústegui enters Havana from Veracruz with his 325-man, 572-ton, Dutch-built flagship San Felipe and the 188-man, 412-ton Magdalena. Having delivered a transatlantic quicksilver consignment to Mexico, he now rejoins his three other vessels: Vice Adm. Alonso de Campos y Espinosa's 238-man, 507-ton, Dutch-built Nuestra Señora de la Concepción, plus the 80-man, 50-ton auxiliary sloop Concepción, as well as the 27-man Nuestra Señora de la Soledad (alias Marquesa). These vessels are to constitute Spain's new Armada de Barlovento or "Windward Fleet." Having already touched at their base of San Juan de Puerto Rico on August 27, 1667, they have separated briefly, before reuniting.

Diústegui will shortly thereafter sortie from Havana with his entire armada, cruising the Antilles as far as Caracas before returning into San Juan de Puerto Rico for a refit. Feeling that its facilities are

Henry Morgan

Henry Morgan is believed to have been born around 1635 at Abergavenny or possibly in the Welsh manor of Llanrhymny near the town of Newport (modern suburb of Cardiff). He was raised after the customs of his father, Robert, and their military family, noting years later: "I left school too young to be a great proficient in [Admiralty] or other laws, and have been more used to the pike than the book."

His uncles Edward and Thomas served as professional soldiers of fortune in Europe, achieving high ranks during the Thirty Years' War. When the English Civil War erupted in 1642, Edward fought for the king, Thomas on the Parliamentary side. After the execution of Charles I, Edward fled into exile, while Thomas remained in England as a major general in the New Model Army. He was second-in-command of the Flanders expedition, described as "a little, shrill-voiced, choleric man" in action.

Young Henry was apparently left in reduced circumstances by the royalists' defeat. The Bristol Apprentice Books (Servants to Foreign Plantations) contains the following entry: "1655, February 9 [O.S.]. Henry Morgan of Abergavenny, laborer, bound to Timothy Townsend of Bristol, cutler, for three years to serve in Barbados." Almost 30 years later, the buccaneer chronicler Exquemelin would confirm that Morgan served his full term and then "took himself to Jamaica, there to seek new fortunes."

Then England's monarchy was restored, and Lord Windsor reached Jamaica in August 1662 as its first Royal governor. The 27-year-old Morgan was made a captain in the Port Royal Regiment and raised enough money to attach his tiny privateer craft to Myngs's raid against Santiago de Cuba. Although a soldier and not a sailor, Morgan came to excel as a buccaneer leader. After his uncle Edward arrived as lieutenant governor, Morgan was promoted to colonel in February 1666. He was also entrusted with Port Royal's defenses and married his first cousin Mary Elizabeth Morgan. And late in 1667, he inherited the unofficial mantle of buccaneer chief. When Edward Mansfield died, Governor Modyford sent Morgan out "to draw together the English privateers."

Over the next three years, he led four spectacular descents against Spanish America. The buccaneers appreciated his tactical cunning, which minimized losses. They also enjoyed his mischievous humor, as when he taunted the advancing governor of Panama from captive Portobelo in July 1668:

I write you these few lines to ask you to come quickly. We are waiting for you with great pleasure, and we have powder and ball with which to receive you. If you do not come very soon, we will, with the favor of God and our arms, come and visit you in Panama, . . . and since I do not believe that you have sufficient men to fight with me tomorrow, I will order all the poor prisoners to be freed, so that they may go to help you.

Even when he was deported to England in 1672 for sacking Panama, Morgan's luck held. A timely rupture with Spain led to all charges being dropped. Then he was knighted in November 1674 and returned to Jamaica the next spring as its lieutenant governor.

His holdings came to include 4,000 acres at what was later called Eaton, near Lucea in Hanover Parish. He named his estates Llanrhymny and Pencarne, the latter another manor near his childhood home in Wales. Although restless in his official role as lieutenant governor, he never went to sea again. He instead grew fat as a plantation owner and died of dropsy on August 25, 1688 (O.S.). His physician, Hans Sloane, attributed his death to the patient's being "much given to drinking and sitting up late." Morgan left an estate valued at more than £5,000, as well as several large properties. He was buried with a 22-gun salute, fired by all the ships in Port Royal harbor.

inadequate, he will suggest transferring operations to Havana; but instead, fresh orders arrive from Madrid. His large ships San Felipe and Nuestra Señora de la Concepción are deemed too cumbersome to pursue nimble buccaneer craft, so he has been ordered to sail them to Spain.

By June 1668, Diústegui is en route to Veracruz with his flagship and vice-flagship, to pick up a silver consignment for his passage homeward.

SPRING 1668. On Saint Domingue (Haiti), the buccaneer chieftain Nau l'Olonnais sorties with 700 flibustiers, 300 of them aboard the large Spanish prize, which he has brought from Maracaibo (see “Late April 1666” entry in “Second Anglo-Dutch War and War of Devolution”). Accompanied by five smaller craft, he proceeds into Bayahá to take on salt meat, then cruises southern Cuba as far as the Gulf of Batabanó, seizing boats for a proposed ascent of Nicaragua’s San Juan River to sack Granada. But when Nau attempts to clear Cape Gracias a Dios on the Mosquito Coast, he is prevented by a lack of wind, so drifts along northern Honduras. Running low on provisions, he sends foraging parties up the Aguán River and eventually prowls as far west as Puerto Caballos (today Puerto Cortés).

There, he captures a Spanish merchantman armed with 24 cannon and 16 swivels, as well as occupies the town. Two terrified captives are persuaded to lead his 300 flibustiers inland toward San Pedro Sula, while he leaves the remainder to garrison Puerto Caballos under his Dutch-born lieutenant Mozes van Klijn. Fewer than 10 miles into the jungle, the French are waylaid by a party of Spaniards, and more ambushes are sprung as they advance. The Spanish even repel Nau’s initial assault against San Pedro Sula before being allowed to evacuate under a flag of truce. The city and its outlying district are then pillaged over the next few days and burned to the ground when Nau retires toward the coast.

Upon returning into Puerto Caballos, Nau learns that a wealthy Spanish galleon is due to arrive at nearby Amatique Bay, so he posts a pair of lookout boats on its southern shoreline, while crossing to the west side of the Gulf of Honduras to careen. Three months elapse until word is finally received that the galleon has arrived. Nau attacks, although the Spaniard has 42 cannon and 130 men. His 28-gun flagship and a smaller consort are beaten off, but four boatloads of flibustiers storm the galleon. Its booty proves disappointing though, because most cargo has already been offloaded. Discouraged, Nau’s confederates Van Klijn and Pierre le Picard quit his company. Nau runs aground some time later among the Cayos de Perlas (near Bluefields, Nicaragua), eventually reaching the Gulf of Darien in a small boat, only to be massacred by its natives.

MARCH 27, 1668. Puerto Príncipe Raid. At dawn, Morgan sets a large party ashore at Florida Beach in the Ensenada de Santa María (today called Santa Cruz del Sur) to raid its inland town of Puerto Príncipe (modern Camagüey, Cuba). The Spaniards attempt to dispute the invaders’ passage at the next sunrise with 800 militia cavalymen and native spearmen, yet they are helpless against the buccaneers’ superior firepower, and the latter inflict several hundred casualties—including more than 100 deaths—before carrying Puerto Príncipe by storm that same afternoon. Fifteen days of pillage ensue, although the raiders withdraw by April 1 with only 50,000 pieces of eight, a disappointing sum when redistributed among so many. The Spaniards eventually provide some 500 additional cattle to ransom hostages, so that Morgan leaves Cuba well supplied to head to Cape Gracias a Dios (Nicaragua).

Here, his two national contingents part company when Morgan suggests a descent upon Portobelo; the French—already resentful at the meager profit obtained at Puerto Príncipe—refuse to join his enterprise, preferring instead to sail off on their own. With the four frigates, eight sloops, and fewer than 500 men left to him, Morgan reaches Bocas del Toro (Panama), transferring his men into 23 piraguas and smaller boats to row the 150 miles eastward against his chosen target.

APRIL 25, 1668. The Dutch commodore Crijnsen returns to Suriname with the frigates Suriname and Zeelandia, plus the flute Land van Belofien or “Promised Land,” bearing 270 sailors and 180 soldiers to reclaim this former colony for the Netherlands. Crijnsen sails into Paramaribo’s harbor and threatens to open fire if its recalcitrant English occupiers do not surrender. They submit and are eventually made to pay for all property damages, while Crijnsen remains as new colonial governor before being succeeded on February 16, 1669. He dies shortly thereafter.

MAY 28, 1668. Having intercepted the Mexican supply ship bound for St. Augustine (Florida) off Cuba, the Jamaican privateer Searle arrives aboard it outside Anastasia Island and lures the harbor pilot aboard. After nightfall, Searle slips into the bay and leads more than 100 rovers aboard four boats toward the sleeping city.

Detected by a fisherman shortly after 1:00 a.m. on May 29, they open fire and storm ashore. Gov. Francisco de la Guerra y de la Vega and his 120-man garrison are caught completely by surprise so can offer little resistance at first. But the governor reaches the stockade and directs its 33 soldiers in a successful defense, repelling repeated filibuster assaults for more than an hour. Five defenders are killed and a like number wounded, compared to 11 dead and 19 wounded among Searle’s ranks.

Yet the raiders ransack the hapless town, while Searle’s 8-gun, 60-ton Cagway and a captured St. Augustine frigate sail into its anchorage at daybreak to join his Mexican prize. As the English begin retiring with their booty, Governor de la Guerra sends out two attack columns, which are easily repulsed. By nightfall, the pirates are back aboard their vessels, leaving behind 60 dead Spaniards within gutted St. Augustine.

On May 30, Searle offers to ransom his 70 captives for water, meat, and wood. Most Spaniards are released over the next six days, but the privateers retain all blacks, mestizos, and natives when they sail away on June 5 to be sold as slaves.

LATE MAY 1668. The expelled French governor of Cayenne, Le Febvre de Lézy—having been released by his English captors and resupplied by his brother at Martinique—returns to his devastated colony with 200 followers. They find another 40 French survivors emerging from hiding places in the jungle, and together they begin reconstructing Fort Saint Louis, as well as their other devastated properties at Cayenne.

JULY 10, 1668. Sack of Portobelo. This afternoon, Morgan’s flotilla of boats arrives in the vicinity of Portobelo, four nights after quitting Bocas del Toro (see “March 27, 1668” entry). His men disembark, and Morgan leads them on a swift nocturnal march, taking the town by surprise at daybreak of July 11. Its citizenry are secured without a single buccaneer loss. The 80-man Santiago de la Gloria citadel holds out for a couple of hours longer, until Morgan rounds up a group of captives—including Portobelo’s alcalde mayor, two friars, several women, and nuns—to act as a human shield for an assault party that approaches its main gate with torches and axes. The Spanish defenders reluctantly open fire, wounding two friars and killing an Englishman, but are unable to prevent the enemy sappers from reaching their gate. While thus distracted, another band of buccaneers uses scaling ladders to enter on the far side of the fortress, carrying it in a bloodbath that costs 45 Spanish soldiers their lives, the rest being wounded.

The next morning, Morgan leads 200 buccaneers across Portobelo’s bay and forces the surrender of 50 Spanish soldiers still holding out in its San Felipe or Todo Fierro harbor castle, after only a token resistance. This victory allows his ships to enter once they arrive from Bocas del Toro, so that, with the loss of 18 buccaneer dead, Portobelo is taken. Wealthy Spanish residents are tortured to reveal their riches, and other excesses are committed.

On July 14, Morgan writes a letter to the president of the real audiencia or “royal tribunal” at Panama City, offering to spare Portobelo for 350,000 pesos. Acting president Agustín de Bracamonte, already marching to Portobelo’s relief at the head of 800 militiamen, brusquely refuses. Morgan digs in to receive this relief column. Bracamonte's army proves too weak to assault Morgan's positions once he arrives outside Portobelo next day, and the Spaniards are obliged to remain encamped within the jungle for a week. Finally, Bracamonte orders a retreat on July 24, leaving a subordinate to negotiate Portobelo's ransom, which is set at 100,000 pesos. This sum is paid during the first days of the next month, after which Morgan sails away, regaining Port Royal by August 27.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1668. The Spanish admiral Diústegui exits Veracruz with his flagship San Felipe and vice-flagship Concepción, delivering the royal situados or "payrolls" to Havana before proceeding across the Atlantic to Cadiz with a consignment of Mexican silver. His vice admiral Alonso de Campos is to remain in command of the depleted Armada de Barlovento in the West Indies.

EARLY OCTOBER 1668. Morgan sorties again from Jamaica, calling on freebooters to join him at Ile à Vache (Haiti) for another quasi-official venture against Spanish America. When the 34-gun royal frigate Oxford reaches Port Royal shortly thereafter—having been sent out from England for use against piracy—Governor Modyford sends it with a crew of 160 men under the veteran privateer Edward Collier as reinforcement for Morgan. Collier departs on December 20 and upon arriving at Ile à Vache detains the 14-gun, 120-ton French corsair Cerf Volant or "Kite" out of La Rochelle, which has recently plundered a Virginia merchantman. Captain Vivien and his 45-man crew are sailed into Port Royal for adjudication, and the Cerf Volant is quickly condemned and renamed Satisfaction, then incorporated back into Morgan's fleet.

DECEMBER 1668. A Courlander ship appears off their abandoned outpost on Tobago but withdraws when the small Dutch force occupying the island approaches.

DECEMBER 19, 1668. The newly purchased, 26-gun, 218-ton, Spanish frigate San Luis under Capt. Mateo Alonso de Huidobro and the sloop Marquesa under Diego de Barrios exit from Veracruz, bearing almost 300 Mexican recruits for the Armada de Barlovento. They will reach Havana by January 5, 1669, with orders to sail on to the relief of Portobelo; but this operation is cancelled, as it is already known that Morgan's raiders have long since withdrawn.

Instead, Admiral de Campos sails for Puerto Rico with his armada, hoping to learn of the enemy's intentions. Receiving a report that the buccaneers might be planning a descent on Hispaniola, he arrives there by March 25. Another rumor indicates that the Spanish Main is the raiders' true destination, so de Campos steers southeastward. Off the island of Uría, he will finally learn from a Dutch merchantman that Morgan is attacking Maracaibo.

JANUARY 12, 1669. At Ile à Vache, Morgan and his consorts decide that, since 900–1,000 freebooters have gathered, their strength is sufficient to try Cartagena, after which they begin a feast to celebrate both their forthcoming voyage and the English New Year (being January 2, O.S.). Captains Aylett, Bigford, Collier, Morris, Thornbury, and Whiting join Morgan for dinner, while seamen carouse upon the Oxford's forecastle. Suddenly, the ship's magazine explodes, killing more than 200 crewmembers—only 6 men and 4 boys surviving, Morgan and Collier being among them.

Such heavy loss of life ends any prospects for a major campaign. Collier consequently departs with the Satisfaction on a cruise against Campeche, while Morgan transfers into the 14-gun frigate Lilly and leads his remaining forces eastward, hoping to raid either Trinidad or Margarita. But by the time he reaches Saona at the eastern end of Santo Domingo, three more of his ships have deserted, leaving only eight with 500 men under captains John Morris, Jeffery Pennant, Edward Dempster, Richard Norman, Richard Dobson, Adam Brewster, and one other. One of Morgan's French followers then suggests a repeat of Nau l'Olonnais's foray of three years previously by raiding Maracaibo. Morgan and his colleagues agree, so after visiting Dutch Aruba a few weeks later to reprovision, the buccaneer fleet steers toward the Gulf of Venezuela.

FEBRUARY 4, 1669. A French squadron under Commo. Jean, Comte d'Estrées, arrives at Martinique bearing the new governor general Jean-Charles de Baas Castelmore, who takes up residence at Saint Pierre. D'Estrées is also to curb foreign trade into France's colonies, but he performs this service rather indifferently, before returning to Europe.

SPRING 1669. The Jamaican privateer Joseph Bradley sails his 80-man frigate (thought to be the Mayflower) into the Gulf of Mexico, along with the brigantines of Dutch-born Rok Brasiliano and

Armada de Barlovento

Since the earliest forays by European rivals, the Spanish Antilles needed an Armada de Barlovento or “Windward Fleet.” But the occasional squadrons assigned mostly convoyed plate fleets; they did not patrol the West Indies. An attempt to station a permanent fleet was made in 1607, when Admiral Enríquez de Borja brought out several hundred men from Cadiz to build six galleons at Havana. Yet when completed in March 1610, they sailed to Spain for other duties. Only individual warships or squadrons detached from visiting plate fleets made sporadic patrols through the West Indies for the next three decades.

Then late in 1640, four galleons and a patache were selected by the Mexican viceroy Marqués de Cadereyta from a plate fleet anchored at Veracruz, plus a newly built frigate from Campeche, to reconstitute the armada. Vice Adm. Antonio de la Plaza Eguiluz sortied with three of these ships on June 9, 1641, and chased some English vessels away from Alvarado. But upon escorting the plate fleet across to Havana that same July, the armada was ordered to continue on to Spain. A hurricane struck both formations in the Bahamas Channel, so that only a few battered armada ships limped back into Veracruz.

The new 32-gun, 650-ton flagship Nuestra Señora de Porciúncula was built, and 1,200 crewmen were raised in Mexico over the next year and a half. The armada’s seven ships then exited again on April 24, 1643, accompanying the plate fleet across the Gulf into Havana. Yet once more, Madrid ordered the armada on to Spain. Because of the Crown’s bankruptcy, sailors went unpaid, and ships decayed. After two more transatlantic crossings, the depleted armada finally was able to make a West Indian patrol late in 1646. But its few captures were insignificant. This armada then made one last crossing to Spain before being disbanded in February 1648.

Fifteen years later, Madrid sent an agent to Amsterdam to arrange the launch of four new armada galleons. Poor financing threatened this project, until officers’ commissions were offered to anyone in Spain willing to advance money. Agustín de Diústegui secured overall command for a loan of 50,000 pesos, plus the use of two of his own frigates. Other appointments resulted from lesser donations. These officers therefore were mindful of recouping their investments or otherwise profiting from service in the New World.

When construction was complete early in 1664, Dutch crews were hired to sail the four galleons into Spanish ports. Many were then retained to serve Spain. A long delay ensued, and only two of these ships left Seville on July 21, 1667, under Diústegui’s command. Accompanied by three lesser warships, they reconstituted the Armada de Barlovento and were based out of San Juan de Puerto Rico. More than 100 of the 963 officers and men deserted, though, after being paid during a stopover at the Canary Islands. And after reaching Puerto Rico on August 27, 1667, problems multiplied. A year and a half later, the armada was annihilated by Morgan. A new squadron would not be raised until 1677.

Jelles de Lecat, to campaign against the Spaniards. For two or three weeks, this trio hovers off Campeche, then attempts some disembarkations upon its coast, before Bradley finally captures a Cuban vessel laden with flour and the raiders retire into the Laguna de Términos. They remain there for two months, Brasiliano’s brigantine being careened, while de Lecat lays in a cargo of logwood. At the end of this interlude, Bradley and Brasiliano return to blockade Campeche, while de Lecat’s brigantine hauls up close inshore off Las Bocas, four leagues to its southwest.

MARCH 9, 1669. Maracaibo Campaign. Reaching the bar of its Laguna, Morgan’s raiders discover that its entrance has been fortified with a small 11-gun castle, which the freebooters disembark to besiege. Only a single Spanish officer and eight soldiers are within this keep, though they put up a token show of resistance before slipping into the night. After spiking its guns, Morgan’s ships navigate through the shoals and proceed southward to Maracaibo, which they find abandoned by its terrified citizenry. The buccaneers send parties out into the surrounding countryside to round up scores of prisoners, who are tortured to reveal their riches.

Three weeks later, Morgan crosses to the southeastern side of the Laguna, visiting a like treatment upon Gibraltar (near Bobures). By April 17, he returns into Maracaibo with a captive Cuban merchant ship and five smaller piraguas, ready to head back out into the Caribbean. But while the freebooters have been ransacking the Laguna’s interior, Spain’s Armada de Barlovento has arrived outside its bar, bottling the interlopers inside.

Adm. Alonso de Campos has brought his 38-gun flagship Magdalena, the 26-gun frigate San Luis under his second-in-command Mateo Alonso de Huidobro, plus the 14-gun sloop Marquesa, all manned by 500 officers, troops, and sailors. Having found the Laguna fortress devastated, Campos has reoccupied it with 40 harquebusiers, repaired six of its guns, then dispatched messengers inland calling for further assistance from the local militias. After several days, he also lightens his warships and passes them over the bar, before sending a letter to Morgan in Maracaibo calling upon him to surrender.

APRIL 20, 1669. In Madrid, news of Morgan's Portobelo raid prompts Queen Regent Mariana to authorize Spanish American officials to issue privateering commissions against English vessels.

APRIL 25, 1669. Battle of the Bar. After a week's preparation, Morgan's 13 vessels approach Maracaibo's bar, arriving within sight of the anchored Spanish squadron. Two days later, Morgan rushes Campos's formation at 9:00 a.m., led by his large Cuban prize, which is flying an admiral's insignia. It bears down upon Campos's flagship and grapples, but when the Spaniards surge over its bulwarks, they find its decks lined only with wooden dummies and 12 buccaneers hastily decamping over its far side. The Cuban ship thereupon bursts into flames, and the Magdalena becomes engulfed, forcing Campos to leap into the water along with his panic-stricken crew. Seeing this terrifying spectacle, de Huidobro's smaller San Luis and Marquesa cut their cables and run for the shelter of the fort, pursued by buccaneer craft. Both Spanish vessels run aground and are deliberately set ablaze by their crews, although the latter is boarded and saved by the privateers.

Despite his victory, Morgan's flotilla is still unable to get past the fort—its garrison having been augmented by 70 militiamen from the interior, plus most of the surviving armada crews. When the buccaneers attempt a land assault next day, it is easily repelled, so Morgan retires back into Maracaibo. After offering to exchange his Spanish captives for free passage out to sea, which is rebuffed by Campos, Morgan returns to the bar a few days later and sets his boats busily plying back and forth out of sight of the Spanish fort.

Believing that the English are depositing a large force for another assault, Campos's garrison manhandles their few guns into the landward embrasures and brace for a nocturnal attack. Yet Morgan has again deceived them, his boat movements being a feint. No buccaneers have actually disembarked; instead, his ships weigh and slip past the Spanish fortress's unguarded seaward side under cover of darkness, depositing their prisoners outside before sailing triumphantly off. Morgan is back in Port Royal by May 27.

JUNE 24, 1669. Jamaica's Governor Modyford proclaims the English Crown's latest prohibition against anti-Spanish hostilities.

DECEMBER 18, 1669. Three armed Spanish ships sortie from Campeche, chasing away the intruder vessels of Englishman Joseph Bradley and Dutch-born Rok Brasiliano. The latter is shortly thereafter wrecked on Chicxulub Beach (east of modern Progreso), where he is found burying a cannon and two swivels by a Spanish cavalry patrol. Brasiliano's men flee aboard their boats, later being rescued by his Dutch colleague De Lecat and transferred aboard Bradley's frigate for conveyance to Jamaica.

JANUARY 3, 1670. Gov. Pedro de Ulloa of Cartagena issues a privateering commission to the Portuguese-born rover Manuel Rivero Pardal to attack English interests in the West Indies. Rivero sets sail three days later with 70 men aboard his San Pedro, alias Fama. It is his intent to raid Point Morant (Jamaica) for slaves, but unfavorable winds carry him past to the Cayman Islands, where he burns English fishing shacks, then takes a ketch, canoe, and four children captives into Cuba.

Here, Rivero learns of an English privateer lying at Manzanillo (the port for Bayamo), which proves to be the 18-man Mary and Jane, commanded by an old Dutch rover named Bernard Claesen Speirdyke, who has been dispatched under flag of truce by Governor Modyford of Jamaica to carry letters and restore some Spanish prisoners. When Speirdyke stands out of Manzanillo, he is intercepted by Rivero's Fama, which opens fire and fights him until dark. Next day, the Spaniards close to board; the Mary and Jane puts up a staunch resistance, killing or wounding a third of Rivero's men before it is overwhelmed. Five of the Mary and Jane's crew lay dead—including Speirdyke—and the corsair sends nine English prisoners back to Port Royal, boasting of his victory. This creates an ugly mood on Jamaica, and Modyford is hard-pressed to prevent retaliatory strikes by his buccaneers.

Rivero meanwhile sails his prize back to Cartagena, arriving by March 23. A fiesta is held to celebrate his cruise, and other corsairs come forward to emulate his example. One month later, two more vessels are fitting out in Cartagena's roadstead, with Rivero flying a royal standard as "admiral" to this motley force.

APRIL 1670. Some 150 colonists from England and Barbados disembark at the Ashley River mouth, establishing South Carolina. Spain regards this outpost as an infringement upon its Florida colony, headquartered farther south at St. Augustine.

EARLY MAY 1670. On Tortuga Island (Haiti), Governor d'Ogeron learns that his French West Indies Company deputy, Maj. Jean de Renou, has been overthrown at Léogâne by an unruly mob for attempting to prevent trade with two large Dutch merchantmen under captains Pieter Constant and Pieter Marck. D'Ogeron sails to the rescue aboard the Ironnelle, freeing de Renou. Yet when he then attempts to reinstate his subordinate at Petit Goâve, the Ironnelle is fired upon by a large crowd of angry buccaneers, so he retreats to Tortuga.

JUNE 11, 1670. The Spanish corsair Rivero reappears off northern Jamaica, having sortied from Cartagena at the end of May, accompanied by the Gallardina or "Graceful" (a French privateer seized two years previously). Flying false English colors, they pursue William Harris's sloop for an hour and a half after he arrives to trade. The English master eventually beaches his sloop and escapes inland, firing at Rivero's men as they come ashore. His sloop is refloated, then sailed away to Cuba along with a canoe found on the beach. One week later, the Fama and the Gallardina return, landing 30 men at Montego Bay to burn its settlements before retiring into Cuba once more.

LATE SPRING 1670. The Dutch-born Jamaican privateer and plantation owner Laurens Prins or "Lawrence Prince," along with his English colleagues Harris and Ludbury, take it upon themselves to retaliate for Rivero's nuisance raids by sailing up Colombia's Magdalena River to sack the inland port of Santa Cruz de Mompox (modern Mompós). This attempt is checked by a fort recently installed upon its river, so the trio instead heads westward in August, hoping for better fortune along the Mosquito Coast.

JULY 3, 1670. The Spanish corsair Rivero is back off Jamaica for a third time, having manned his captured sloop at Santiago de Cuba. Some 40 mounted Jamaican militiamen watch his trio of vessels for an hour, before they stand off to leeward. Next day, the Spanish raiders land 50 miles away and burn two houses, then the following night post a letter ashore challenging Morgan to a ship-to-ship duel.

JULY 9, 1670. Incensed by the Spanish corsair Rivero's nuisance raids, Governor Modyford and the Jamaican Council pass a resolution commissioning Morgan as "Admiral and Commander-in-Chief of all the ships of war belonging to this harbor [Port Royal]," ordering him to draw them together to "attack, seize, and destroy all the enemy's vessels that shall come within his reach." Morgan sets sail on August 11 with 11 privateer vessels and 600 men, his flag flying aboard the Satisfaction, now armed with 22 guns. He has also called for a freebooter assembly at Ile à Vache, though he first ventures to southern Cuba, where he leaves John Morris's 10-gun Dolphin on watch before tacking eastward with his main body.

AUGUST 1670. Three Spanish ships under Juan Menéndez Márquez, accompanied from St. Augustine by 14 piraguas, arrive outside the new English settlement at Charles Town (present-day Charleston, South Carolina) to expel its colonists. Having been forewarned by friendly tribesmen, the English are prepared for a siege, and Menéndez retires without attempting any attack after a storm drags his ships' anchors.

AUGUST 17, 1670. After ascending Nicaragua's San Juan River, the English privateer captains Prins, Harris, and Ludbury seize the new Fort San Carlos de Austria (installed after Morris's and Martien's raid five years previously), then steal across its lake with their 170 men to also surprise Granada on August 26. The freebooters wreak considerable havoc in this city before withdrawing with 200 men and women captives and driving home their demand for 70,000 pesos' ransom by "sending the head of a priest in a basket" to its provincial authorities. They finally sail away with the rest of their booty.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1670. After touching at Tortuga Island (Haiti), Morgan and his privateer fleet continue south toward their rendezvous off Ile à Vache. Four days later, Morgan detaches six vessels under Edward Collier to gather provisions and intelligence from the Spanish Main.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1670. Deputy Governor de Renou of Saint Domingue (Haiti) reaches the French governor general de Baas at Saint Kitts, requesting assistance on behalf of D'Ogeron to suppress a buccaneer mutiny (see "Early May 1670" entry). Eventually, the 14-gun, 80-ton royal frigate Aurore (ex-Normande) of 36-year-old captain Louis Gabaret is detached from Grenada to help.

Reaching Tortuga, Gabaret escorts D'Ogeron back to Léogâne, where several hundred buccaneers swear fealty to France, yet refuse to abide by its West Indies Company rule. A like reception awaits at Petit Goâve, where D'Ogeron storms angrily ashore and disperses its mutineers before returning to Tortuga. Gabaret thereupon sails for Europe, leaving D'Ogeron to resolve the issue by eventually moderating his conditions and granting a general amnesty at the end of April 1671.

OCTOBER 1670. Off southeastern Cuba, Morris's 10-gun, 60-man privateer Dolphin is forced into a small bay by a threatening storm. Two hours later, just before dark, Rivero sails in for the same purpose with his 14-gun Fama, delighted to find the smaller Jamaican ship embayed. Setting men ashore to cut off all escape, the Spaniards prepare to attack at dawn; yet it is Morris who moves first next morning, bearing down upon the Fama with the land breeze and boarding at his first attempt. Rivero is killed, and his crew jump into the sea, where some drown but most are slaughtered by the English privateers so that only five Spaniards reach shore alive. Later that same month, Morris leads the Fama—now renamed Lamb—to Morgan's rendezvous off Ile à Vache. Despite the death of this Spanish tormentor, however, the English still press on with their plans for a major blow against Spanish America.

OCTOBER 24, 1670. At daybreak, Collier's half-dozen English privateers appear off Río hacha, disembarking a force to march against its tiny four-gun fort. In the harbor lies the Spanish corsair Gallardina, whose crew is terrified of falling into buccaneer hands. Río hacha's fort holds out for a day and night before surrendering, after which Collier conducts a pair of executions and tortures several prominent captives for their wealth. He weighs anchor almost four weeks later to rejoin Morgan with meat, maize, 38 prisoners, the Gallardina, and one other prize.

OCTOBER 29, 1670. The English privateer captains Prins, Harris, and Ludbury return to Jamaica from their rampage through Central America, being mildly reprimanded by Governor Modyford for attacking Spanish America without permission. They are then ordered to join Morgan's expedition, which is regrouping after being scattered by a storm off Ile à Vache.

NOVEMBER 1, 1670. The 29-year-old unemployed Royal Navy captain John Narborough enters the Strait of Magellan from Patagonia aboard the Sweepstakes, a private frigate of 36 guns, 300 tons, and 80 men, to trade with Spain's Pacific colonies. After passing Cape Pilar on the last day of the month, the Sweepstakes anchors in Valdivia Bay by Christmas (December 15, 1670 [O.S.]), receiving a friendly reception. But the Spaniards arrest a four-man landing party three days later, and Narborough finds the port closed to him. Unable to recover his men, nor being authorized to take any offensive actions, he departs on January 1, 1671, to return through the Strait, arriving back in England by June.

DECEMBER 18, 1670. Morgan's fleet quits Ile à Vache, having swelled to 38 privateer vessels and more than 2,000 English, French, and Dutch freebooters. Although his intended target is Panama, Morgan first lays in a course for Providencia Island, which on two previous occasions has belonged to England.

DECEMBER 24, 1670. Early this morning, Morgan's buccaneer fleet appears before Providencia Island, forcing its Spanish garrison to surrender next day.

DECEMBER 28, 1670. Morgan detaches 470 men under the rather unofficially commissioned Lt. Col. Joseph Bradley of the frigate Mayflower, Maj. Richard Norman of the 10-gun Lilly, and the Dutch-born mercenary Jelles de Lecat's Seviliaen to sail ahead of his main body and seize Chagres, where he intends to disembark his army to advance across the Isthmus.

JANUARY 6, 1671. Capture of Chagres. At noon, Bradley's three ships disgorge 400 freebooters within sight of Fort San Lorenzo, making their initial assault that same afternoon. The 360 defenders wait confidently under castellano or "garrison commander" Pedro de Elizalde y Ursúa, halting Bradley's first and second charges with deadly volleys. As dusk falls, the English commander switches tactics, leading his men through some gullies to toss grenades and firepots inside, igniting the fort's wooden stockades. These fires spread throughout the night, consuming the defenses and detonating San Lorenzo's magazines. In the darkness, 150 Spanish soldiers desert, yet enough remain to again break Bradley's first two assaults the next morning.

Finally, a contingent of Tortuga flibustiers fights its way inside on the third attempt, Elizalde and his 70 surviving defenders fighting bravely to the last man. At least 30 buccaneers are killed and another 76 injured during these final assaults—including Bradley, who is shot through both legs. The attackers' total losses are estimated at slightly more than 100 dead and 70 wounded. Norman assumes overall command while Bradley convalesces, but five days later, just as Morgan's ships hove into view, Bradley dies.

JANUARY 12, 1671. Having departed Providencia a few days after Bradley, Morgan's fleet comes within sight of Chagres. As his flagship Satisfaction leads the way into harbor, it strikes a reef and sinks along with another four vessels astern. Ten men are drowned, yet losses are otherwise minimal.

After a week spent refurbishing Fort San Lorenzo and ensconcing 300 defenders under Norman, plus 200 sailors as anchor watches aboard their ships, Morgan ventures upriver with 1,500 men, 7 small ships, and 36 boats. An epic seven-day trek ensues through the jungle, the Spaniards shrinking away before this host; nonetheless, the climate, terrain, hunger, and thirst prove formidable obstacles.

JANUARY 20, 1671. In Panama City, 52-year-old governor Juan Pérez de Guzmán, Knight of the Order of Santiago, rises from his sick bed and rides forth next day with 800 militiamen to encamp at Guayabal, awaiting news of Morgan. But as the invaders continue their advance, Spanish morale plummets, so that by January 24 the governor awakens to find two-thirds of his army gone. Retreating into Panama City, Pérez de Guzmán orders all able-bodied men to muster at Mata Asnillos (two and a half miles southwest of the city), while noncombatants are evacuated by ship.

JANUARY 27, 1671. At 9:00 a.m., Morgan's vanguard breasts a hill and sights the Pacific. Toward noon, the buccaneers come upon a plain filled with cattle, which they eat. Thus refreshed, they press on and this afternoon espy the tiled roofs of Panama City, with a Spanish army drawn up outside to bar their path.

JANUARY 28, 1671. Sack of Panama. Morgan begins his final advance at sunrise, 1,200 buccaneers marching steadily into battle. Governor Pérez de Guzmán has 1,200 militia infantrymen drawn up in a line six men deep at Mata Asnillos, with two companies of 200 militia riders apiece on either flank. His inexperienced troops have few firearms and no artillery, however, so they are no match for the better-armed, veteran freebooters.

Morgan's 300-man van under "Lieutenant Colonel" Prins and "Major" Morris are still advancing up a hillock on the Spaniards' right, when Pérez de Guzmán's unwieldy throng launches an undisciplined dash against the buccaneers. They break this wild Spanish charge with steady fusillades, more than 100 militiamen being killed with the first volley. This murderous fire, to which the Panamanians can scarcely reply, undoes their spirit and causes wholesale panic. The defenders break and flee, leaving 400 casualties on the battlefield, as opposed to only 15 buccaneer casualties.

Panama City is occupied, but many of its buildings are set ablaze as the raiders enter, most of its riches having previously been removed offshore. Although Morgan remains in the city for the next four weeks, he finds its wealth largely gone. Despite cruel tortures inflicted by the frustrated invaders, relatively little booty can be extracted from Panama or its outlying district so that, when his army marches back to Chagres and makes its final division of spoils, the rank-and-file buccaneers receive only £15–£18 per head, prompting ugly talk of being defrauded.

MARCH 16, 1671. Morgan hastily departs Chagres aboard the dead Bradley's Mayflower, accompanied by Prins's Pearl, Morris's Dolphin, and Thomas Harris's Mary. They reach Jamaica a couple of weeks later to find English policy reversed, a new treaty having recently been signed with Madrid, so that attacks against Spanish America are now out of favor.

Three months later, HMS Assistance and HMS Welcome enter Port Royal with a new governor, Sir Thomas Lynch. Some time later, Lynch arrests his predecessor Modyford and deports him to London to answer Madrid's complaints about West Indian depredations.

Relocation of Panama City

When the first Spanish survivors crept back into Panama City in March 1671, they found most of its buildings reduced to charred ruins. Only the Augustinian convent and a few shacks along its northern fringe had escaped destruction. Disease soon appeared as well, more than 3,000 of 10,000 inhabitants dying as a result. Another 600 had been marched off as captives by the buccaneers, besides those slain at the Battle of Mata Asnillos.

Traumatized by these horrors, few citizens wished to rebuild their homes in such a vulnerable spot. When Antonio Fernández de Córdoba y Mendoza, Knight of the Order of Santiago, arrived from Cadiz as the new audiencia president in mid-January 1672, they clamored for a move. Panama's capital was to be abandoned altogether, shifting five miles southwest onto La Punta headland. This rocky protrusion was naturally defensible, being encircled by a ring of reefs, while ramparts could be erected across its narrow access to the mainland. Fresh water was available from Chorrillo Spring just to its west in the shadow of 560-foot Ancón Hill. The Perico Island anchorage also lay much closer, so cargos would only have to be transported two miles to be deposited at El Taller Beach.

Within a year, work began on clearing this new site. By the time official sanction was received from Madrid, it only remained for Governor Fernández to distribute plots to the first 300 residents in a ceremony on January 21, 1673. The original city, which Morgan had gutted, gradually became depopulated, its ruins being referred to as Panamá la Vieja or "Old Panama." This transfer nonetheless took time, as moving proved expensive for people who had lost everything, while many preferred to go elsewhere. Fernández also died in the unhealthy older city on April 8, being succeeded by the corrupt oidor or "justice" Luis de Lozada, who used public funds to build himself a palatial home and seized unclaimed plots.

By 1675, the new city still only had 1,600 residents, a fraction of its number prior to the buccaneer raid. But despite its shrunken populace, the Crown increased the garrison from 200 to 500 royal troops plus 300 seamen. They offered such spirited resistance when 330 buccaneers reappeared offshore in early May 1680 that these rovers dispersed to pillage weaker towns. Panama was saved.

JULY 1671. Commo. René de Gousabats, Sieur de Villepars, arrives off Saint Domingue with two French warships and three frigates to restore government rule following the buccaneer revolt against D'Ogeron (see "Early May 1670" entry). His squadron finds the island now peaceable.

Proposed street layout for the new Panama City, as it was to be reconstituted on La Punta headland after Morgan's raid. It would take many years for the capital to become this densely populated. (Archivo General de Indias, Sevilla)

JULY 15, 1671. French governor general de Baas officially restores half of Saint Kitts to Sir Charles Wheeler, newly appointed governor general for the English Leeward Islands, fulfilling the terms of the Treaty of Breda signed almost four years previously.

SEPTEMBER 1671. Commodore de Villepars loses his flagship by running it aground on Tortuga Island (Haiti). Next year, the commodore himself will die and be succeeded in command of France's West Indian squadron by Captain de Montortié.

OCTOBER 29, 1671. Given the increasing size and frequency of buccaneer raids in the New World, Madrid authorizes Guatemala's captain general Francisco Fernando de Escobedo to erect a new fortress on the strategic San Juan River of Nicaragua.

NOVEMBER 1671. An arrest order for Morgan arrives at Jamaica. Governor Lynch is loath to comply, fearing it will alienate the privateers on whom he relies for the island's defense. He therefore defers the actual detention until mid-April 1672, at which time the freebooter admiral is conducted aboard the 36-gun royal frigate Welcome of Capt. John Keene to travel for England in comfort as part of a three-ship merchant convoy.

Morgan's legendary luck continues to hold, for by the time he reaches London in August 1672, the Crown is distracted by the Third Anglo-Dutch War. When England's French allies declare war against Spain the next year, there is no longer any need to appease Madrid, so all charges are dropped. In July 1673, Morgan is consulted as to the best methods of ensuring Jamaica's security. By November 1674, he is so restored into favor as to be knighted and appointed deputy governor of the island, returning into Port Royal on March 15, 1675, and serving in this office until his death 13 years later.

MARCH 31, 1672. This night citizens in the Mexican seaport of Campeche awaken to a huge conflagration at nearby San Román Beach, where a vast quantity of timber has been stockpiled for the construction of a guardacosta frigate and two armed launches. Pirates have slipped ashore to set this mass of timber ablaze, and they then infiltrate the illuminated harbor aboard their ships, although without attacking the panic-stricken garrison.

Next morning, the raiders depart to intercept an unsuspecting merchantman, which is returning into port from Veracruz bearing a rich cargo and 120,000 pesos in silver. The pirates then continue westward, disembarking to ravage the Spanish settlements at Tabasco. On their return passage eastward, they will also sack and torch the town of Champotón.

THIRD ANGLO-DUTCH WAR (1672–1674) AND FRANCO-SPANISH WAR (1673–1679)

In England Charles II treacherously declares war against the Netherlands in March 1672, being joined by his secret French allies one month later. Although England regards Holland as a commercial rival, this particular conflict proves unpopular with the public, having been engineered by Louis XIV of France whose armies quickly invade the Low Countries. They are checked, though, after which the new Dutch leader Willem II forms alliances with Brandenburg, the Holy Roman Empire, Spain, and Lorraine, so that strengths even out. A discouraged England soon retires, leaving the Continental powers to fight it out.

LATE JUNE 1672. Gov. Sir William Stapleton of the English Leeward Islands leads an invasion force against Sint Eustatius, being joined shortly thereafter by a French contingent from Saint Kitts. The outnumbered Dutch garrison surrenders to the English by the end of this same month, as does neighboring Sabá by July 4 and Tortola and Virgin Gorda in the Virgin Islands somewhat later. The French, meanwhile, seize Saint Martin without loss.

DECEMBER 18, 1672. Bridge arrives off Tobago with his flagship King David, accompanied by 600 volunteers aboard a half-dozen lesser craft from Barbados. After five or six hours of intense fighting, the 400 Dutch residents under Gov. Pieter Constant agree to surrender New Walcheren and be transported to Barbados. Two days later a French frigate also arrives from Martinique with a similar hostile intent, only to find Tobago already in English hands.

FEBRUARY 1673. San Juan de los Remedios (Cuba) is surprised by buccaneer raiders, 14 of its women being carried off as hostages.

FEBRUARY 8, 1673. Given the failure of Fort San Carlos de Austria to prevent enemy ascents of the San Juan River, Captain General de Escobedo departs Granada on an inspection tour with the Spanish military engineer Martín de Andujar, returning 20 days later after selecting an old 16th-century site called the Raudal del Diablo or the “Devil’s Torrent” at Santa Cruz to build a much larger new fort. Construction starts on March 10, destined to become two years later the Fortress of the Limpia, Pura e Inmaculada Concepción (modern El Castillo).

FEBRUARY 18, 1673. The 50-gun French warship Ecueil and smaller Petite Infante arrive at Tortuga Island (Haiti), having rounded Môle Saint Nicolas with 400 volunteers from Léogâne and Petit Goâve under Governor d’Ogeron. This force has been raised to join Governor General de Baas in the Windward Isles, who—having learnt during the latter half of 1672 of the outbreak of Franco-Dutch hostilities in Europe—is organizing a strike against Curaçao and so has detached these two warships to Saint Domingue with orders to rejoin him off Saint Croix by March 4. Almost immediately after touching Tortuga, D’Ogeron gets under way again, having been further reinforced by numerous more volunteers aboard a half-dozen privateer vessels.

FEBRUARY 25, 1673. This night, D’Ogeron’s Ecueil runs aground through navigational error near Arecibo in northwestern Puerto Rico, more than 500 men struggling ashore through its surf. D’Ogeron sends Lieutenant Brodart and his nephew Jacques Nepveu, Sieur de Pouançay, to the local Spanish authorities requesting aid, but buccaneers having so long victimized these shores, both emissaries are thrown into jail and a host of Spanish militiamen descends upon the remainder, subduing them after a one-sided clash in which 10 Puerto Ricans die and 12 are wounded as opposed to 40 fatalities among D’Ogeron’s group. Gov. Gaspar de Arteaga y Aunavidao then orders the 460 French survivors marched around his island to San Germán, where they are settled under a loose guard of 60 Spanish soldiers. Six months later, D’Ogeron escapes.

MARCH 1673. Zeeland’s Commodore Cornelis Evertsen de Jongste—nicknamed “Kees the Devil”—arrives off Suriname with his 44-gun, 186-man flagship Swaenenburgh (ex-HMS Saint Patrick) under Flg. Capt. Evert Evertsen Corneliszoon; the 30-gun, 157-man Schaeckerloo under Passchier de Witte; the 25-gun, 158-man Suriname (ex-English Richard and James) under Evert Evertsen Franszoon; the 6-gun, 22-man snow Zeehond under Daniel Thijssen; the 6-gun, 34-man ketch Sint Joris of Cornelis Eewoutsen; plus the 4-gun, 30-man victualler Eendracht of Maerten Andriessen.

Evertsen’s original mission upon being dispatched out of Flushing on December 5, 1672, by the Zeeland Chamber of the Dutch West India Company (WIC) was a privateering venture to intercept a homeward-bound English East India Company convoy at St. Helena. After touching at Madeira and the Canaries, however, he blundered into an English force at the Cape Verde Islands in February 1673, losing the element of surprise. Evertsen has therefore turned to his alternate commission, the reconquest of the disputed settlements at Cayenne.

After disembarking troops and provisions at Suriname's Fort Zeelandia starting on March 25, Evertsen decides instead to scour the West Indies, reinforcing Dutch colonies while simultaneously attacking Anglo-French interests. He will therefore steer northwestward into the Lesser Antilles six weeks later.

EARLY MARCH 1673. After vainly awaiting the arrival of D'Ogeron's Saint Domingue contingent—only the Petite Infante appearing with 100 buccaneers—French governor general de Baas quits his Saint Croix rendezvous and steers toward Curaçao with his 70-gun royal flagship Belliqueux under Captain Dumé d'Amplimont, the frigates Sibylle and Fée, plus three transports bearing 600 volunteers from Martinique, Guadeloupe, and Saint Kitts.

After arriving off Curaçao's coast on March 13, then disembarking the next day on the north shore of Santa Barbara Bay on the island's eastern side, de Baas skirmishes with the defenders of tiny Fort Tolcksburg and attempts to advance overland with his small army. He becomes disconcerted by the strength of the acting governor Jan Doncker's defenses and the number of ships lying inshore, covering the approaches to the capital, Willemstad. After hurriedly consulting with his military engineer, Louis Ancelin de Gémosat, de Baas retreats, reembarking his men by March 16 to sail away two days later.

LATE MARCH 1673. The English privateer Peter Wroth approaches the Suriname River mouth from Barbados with his 20-ton, 6-gun sloop Little Kitt, manned by 30 men, intending to raid the turtling

Kees the Devil

Cornelis Evertsen was born in the Zeeland seaport of Vlissingen or Flushing on November 16, 1642. He was reared in a proud naval tradition, a descendant of the first Sea Beggars. He was the second son of 12 children born to Capt. Cornelis "Kees" Evertsen and his first wife, Johanna Gorcum. A contraction of Cornelis, "Kees" was a common Dutch nickname. Because his infant son and 14-year-old nephew shared the exact same name, Cornelis the father—who eventually became lieutenant admiral of Zeeland—became known as Evertsen de Oude or "the Elder." Cornelis the cousin, who rose to the rank of vice admiral, was called Evertsen de Jonge or "the Younger," while the infant Cornelis, destined to become a lieutenant admiral like his father, gained fame as Evertsen de Jongste or "the Youngest." The latter proved so willful and hot-tempered a child that he was also nicknamed Keesje de Duivel or "Little Kees the Devil."

By the age of 10, young Kees had already sailed aboard his father's ship. Three years later, he was entered into the books of Zeeland's navy, and by 1661, he was second officer aboard his father's flagship Vlissingen. And when frictions with England worsened in the winter of 1664–1665, he was in command of the 32-gun privateer Eendracht.

In February 1665, just prior to the eruption of the Second Anglo-Dutch War, Evertsen and another Dutch ship fought a pitched duel against a trio of British men-of-war before being captured. Next month, the diarist John Evelyn recorded how he took the captive young officer before Charles II, who "gave him his hand to kiss, and restored him his liberty." The English king's younger brother, James, Duke of York, who was also present, asked about a bullet hole in Evertsen's hat. He was impressed when the 23-year-old Dutchman casually replied "that he wished it had gone through his head, rather than be taken."

Restored to Zeeland, Evertsen fought that same year in the Battle of Lowestoft, then in June 1666 commanded his father's flagship Walcheren in the Four Days' Fight. On its first evening, he saw his father cut in two by the last shot fired from the escaping HMS Henry of Rear Adm. Sir John Harman. Then in August, Evertsen took part in the Battle of Saint James's Day, where his uncle was slain. And in 1667, Kees served in Michiel de Ruyter's bold Medway raid, which helped to end the conflict.

Five years later, Evertsen also fought the opening battle of the Third Anglo-Dutch War by defending the Smyrna convoy against Sir Robert Holmes before hostilities were declared. Then in May 1672, Kees commanded the Swaenenburgh in the Battle of Solebay. Being a Zeelander, he was an early supporter and intimate of Willem II of Orange. After the 22-year-old prince was acclaimed as Stadthouder that June, Evertsen started to rise into high positions. Once the European campaigning season ended with the onset of that winter, he was sent on a privateering cruise. Even his unauthorized seizure of New York City could not prevent his promotion to rear admiral by the age of 32.

camp at Three Creeks. Finding its waterway blocked by the Dutch and thus learning of Evertsen's arrival, he immediately departs with this intelligence, which is eventually forwarded to London.

MAY 22, 1673. At noon Evertsen sights a half-dozen vessels off Cul de Sac Bay at Martinique flying French colors. When he bears down, they prove to be Commo. Jacob Binckes's (or Benckes) two-year-old frigate Noordhollandt (flag) of 46 guns and 210 men, three other men-of-war, plus a pair of prizes. Binckes left Amsterdam the previous December on a similar mission, and both commodores agree to join forces and attempt the French harbor entrance that same night, only to be prevented by contrary winds.

The united Dutch squadrons thereupon proceed toward Guadeloupe, seizing the French merchantmen Saint Joseph and Françoise off its coast, as well as the island trader Nouveau France and the Saint Michael of Galway from beneath the English batteries at Monserrat shortly thereafter. Nevis and Saint Kitts are also bombarded in passing, before Sint Eustatius is reached on May 29.

When its acting English governor John Pognon refuses to surrender, the Dutch open fire upon the fort and disembark 600 men, quickly overwhelming its defenders. Two prizes are also captured off-shore along with 200 slaves, after which Sabá is liberated a few days later. The English garrisons are then deported to Saint Kitts, while those Dutch residents who previously sided with the invaders are transported to Curaçao. With too few loyal inhabitants left to hold the islands, Binckes and Evertsen destroy their installations, then strike north by June 8 bound for Virginia.

JUNE 1673. The Cuban-born mulatto buccaneer Diego Grillo, with his 15-gun vessel, intercepts a Spanish merchant frigate bound from Havana toward Campeche. A few days later, 150 Spaniards exit Havana aboard a ship and two frigates to engage this raider. Instead, they are defeated off Nuevitas, Grillo executing all 20 peninsular-born Spanish captives before releasing the rest.

JULY 1673. Binckes and Evertsen raid the Virginia coast, being resisted in Chesapeake Bay by the Royal Navy's hired vessels Barnaby and Augustine. The Dutch rovers then continue up the Atlantic Seaboard toward New York.

AUGUST 1673. After a particularly audacious raid against Coatzacoalcos by a small English vessel several months previously, in which three villages were ransacked and eight Indians carried off, the Mexican viceroy Antonio Sebastián de Toledo Molina y Salazar, Marqués de Mancera, orders Veracruz's new sargento mayor or "garrison commander" Mateo Alonso de Huidobro to pursue these interlopers with a frigate and three piraguas. He overtakes them near Santa Ana Bar (Tabasco), forcing them to beach their vessel and set it ablaze before disappearing into the jungle.

Upon his return into Veracruz, however, accounts of further nuisance raids arrive, and two enemy ships are reported to be inside the Laguna de Términos. Therefore a second, larger enterprise is mounted, de Huidobro leaving Veracruz again on August 14 with three frigates, a sloop, and 300 soldiers from San Juan de Ulúa's garrison. The expedition arrives undetected off Xicalango Point, where they are approached by three piraguas. Belatedly realizing their danger, they suddenly veer around and flee into the Laguna, while de Huidobro's men storm ashore. One interloper is killed and several others wounded, abandoned huts and boats are burned, but the Spanish men-of-war draw too much water to pass over the bar. A brigantine can be seen heading deeper into the Laguna, but de Huidobro has no choice but to continue toward Campeche. En route, he chases another piragua manned by a mixed English, French, and Indian crew, which escapes when a storm sets in.

After visiting Campeche, de Huidobro reverses course toward Veracruz and intercepts the brigantine that previously eluded him—this time outside the Laguna—along with a Spanish prize. Its Dutch captain, Jan Lucas, is carried into Veracruz along with his crew by late October.

AUGUST 7, 1673. Reoccupation of New York.

Evertsen and Binckes anchor off Sandy Hook, outside the harbor at New York City (formerly New Amsterdam). From Dutch-born residents who paddle out from Long Island, they learn that its English governor, Francis Lovelace, is out of town and that Fort James in lower Manhattan is unprepared for action. The two Dutch squadrons therefore penetrate the harbor next day and anchor off Staten Island, where they are approached on August 9 by a boat from the fort bearing the governor's brother Ens. Thomas Lovelace.

His challenge is answered by Evertsen, who shouts back that they have come to restore the rule “of Their Mightinesses, the Lords States-General, and His Serene Highness, the Lord Prince of Orange.” The attackers then advance and disembark 600 troops under Capt. Anthony Colve, who are welcomed by the local Dutch residents. The frigates meanwhile bear down on Fort James, and after an hour's exchange of gunfire that produces only minor casualties, it surrenders. Governor Lovelace returns to the city a few days later and is seized, to be deported to England when Binckes sails for Europe shortly thereafter, having detached Capt. Nikolaas Boes with four warships to raid Newfoundland. (The English governor will be thrown into the Tower of London upon his arrival for his defeat.)

Before Binckes leaves, however, the two commodores reinstate Dutch rule, renaming the colony as “New Orange” and appointing Colve as acting governor general. English settlements at the eastern end of Long Island refuse to acknowledge this change of administration. When three new commissioners led by Cornelis Steenwyck sail to the East Riding on October 31 aboard the snow Zeehond, they are turned back by a hostile crowd. Next February 1674, the Zeehond and two other Dutch warships again threaten Southold, retreating after an exchange of volleys.

In the spring of 1674, Evertsen departs to cross the Atlantic with his own squadron. In conjunction with Binckes, their New World operations have captured 34 English and French ships, plus destroyed at least 150 others. However, the reoccupation of New York meets with disapproval on their return, as the Netherlands is already deep in negotiations to conclude a separate peace with England. Evertsen is even charged by the Zeeland Admiralty in July 1674 with “disobedience of orders” for having exceeded his original WIC instructions to attack only St. Helena or Cayenne.

New York is restored to English domination that same November, and nothing more is said about the damages wrought by Binckes's and Evertsen's American foray. The latter is exonerated and next year promoted to rear admiral of Zeeland.

OCTOBER 7, 1673. Governor d'Ogeron, having returned to Saint Domingue after a harrowing escape from Puerto Rico (see “February 25, 1673” entry), raises 500 flibustiers on Tortuga Island to rescue his imprisoned men. Pausing at Samaná Bay for reinforcements, his expedition appears before Aguada on Puerto Rico by mid-October, being incorrectly informed that Spanish governor de Arteaga might consider an exchange.

When an exchange is not forthcoming, and despite the peace prevailing between France and Spain, d'Ogeron blunders ashore with 300 men and tries to seize hostages, marching as far as six miles inland on the third day of his disembarkation before being ambushed and forced to retreat after losing 17 men. The Spaniards allegedly lose double this number, and in their wrath, they butcher the flibustier wounded; de Arteaga furthermore orders 40 French prisoners at San Germán executed and the rest placed in strict confinement.

D'Ogeron cruises helplessly off Puerto Rico for the next couple of months until word arrives from Europe that France and Spain are officially at war, dashing his final hopes of ransoming his followers. Discouraged, he returns into Tortuga by December 29.

OCTOBER 15, 1673. In Europe, after several months of strained relations, France declares war against Spain.

MARCH 6, 1674. After winter-long negotiations, the second Treaty of Westminster is ratified and proclaimed in Europe, reestablishing peace between England and the Netherlands by promising to restore Sint Eustatius, Tobago, and Sabá to the Dutch, and New York to the English.

EARLY JULY 1674. The Dutch corsair Jurriaen Aernouts arrives at New York with his frigate Vliegende Postpaard, commissioned by Governor Doncker of Curaçao to attack English and French interests. Learning that New York is soon to be restored to English rule by the Treaty of Westminster, Aernouts decides to attack the French farther north in Acadia (Maine and New Brunswick). While preparing for this enterprise, he meets Capt. John Rhoades of Boston, who is well acquainted with these settlements, enlisting him and several other Anglo-Americans.

Shortly thereafter, Aernouts sails into the Bay of Fundy and lands 110 men to advance against the French stronghold of Penobscot (Pentagoët). The invaders overwhelm its 30-man garrison on August 11 after a one-hour fight. French Governor Jacques de Chambly is captured with a musket wound in one arm, and its defenses are thrown down. Aernouts then ravages several smaller outposts before entering the Saint Jean River and seizing the secondary French fort at Jemsec. Its lieutenant governor, Pierre de Joybert de Soulanges et de Marson, is also taken, and Aernouts renames this entire territory “New Holland” before retiring into Boston.

Prior to departing on his return voyage toward the Antilles, Aernouts appoints Rhoades as acting governor for this new colony on September 11, furnishing him with two small armed vessels. The Massachusetts authorities later refuse to acknowledge Dutch jurisdiction over this region.

JULY 19, 1674. De Ruyter and the “Victory of Rum.” With England’s withdrawal from the alliance against the Netherlands, the Dutch are free to take the offensive against France’s overseas empire. Therefore, Adm. Michiel de Ruyter materializes at

A Dutch dispatch yacht bearing down on de Ruyter's flagship Zeven Provinciën off the Texel, with orders to weigh for Africa and the New World; by Willem van de Velde the Younger. (National Maritime Museum, London)

3:00 p.m. off Martinique, with his 80-gun, 566-man flagship Zeven Provinciën leading a Rotterdam squadron consisting of the 60-gun, 290-man Schieland under Adriaan Poort; the 42-gun, 244-man Zeelandia of Pieter de Liefde; the 36-gun, 169-man Utrecht of Barent Rees; the fireships Louisa under Jan Danielszoon van den Rijn and Maria under Dirk de Munnik; the snows Faam under Jakob Hoek and Griffioen under Evert de Liefde; the 10-gun, 40-man Nieuw Rotterdam of Frans van Nydek, 8-gun, 30-man Moriaans Hoofd of Moises Wichmans, 9-gun, 30-man Juffrouw Katarina of Cornelis van der Hoeven, 8-gun, 29-man Blaauwen Arend of Isaak Teuniszoon van Anten, and Swaan of Joost Gilliszoon van den Brande, all five acting as troop transports; plus the 4-gun, 14-man store-ship Haas of Klaas Huigen, and the galliot Sint Pieter of Pieter Drooghart.

De Ruyter is furthermore accompanied by an Amsterdam squadron under his 25-year-old son, Rear Adm. Engel de Ruyter, aboard the 70-gun, 379-man Spiegel, which is leading the 58-gun, 183-man Geloof of Thomas Tobiaszoon; the 56-gun, 206-man Oisterwijk of Pieter van Middeland; the 60-gun, 198-man Provincie van Utrecht of Joan de Witte; the 52-gun, 197-man Tijdverdijf of Count van Stierum; the 50-gun, 188-man Bescherming of Pieter de Sitter; the 44-gun Burg van Leyden of Philis de Munnik; the 34-gun, 96-man Damiaten of Cornelis van der Zaan; the 4-gun, 20-man fireships Groene Draak of Willem Willemszoon, Zaaijer of Cornelis Boermans, Leidster of Jan van Kampen, and Zalm of Arent Ruighaver; the snows Hoen of 12 guns and 45 men under Klaas Portugaal, Tonijn of 8 guns and 28 men under Philips Melkenbeeke, and Bonte Haan of 8 guns and 36 men under Zeger Corneliszoon; the transports Potter Oppendoes with 16 guns and 39 men under Roemer Vlak, Barkhout with 12 guns and 40 men under Michiel Kind, Sphaera Mundi with 9 guns and 32 men under Abraham Taalman, Graaf Floris with 12 guns and 32 men under Jan Noiroot, Liefde with 16 guns and 32 men under Jan Rijlofszoon, Neptunus with 12 guns and 32 men under Hans Hartwijk, Prins te Paard with 12 guns and 33 men under Barent Haas, plus Jupiter with 12 guns and 31 men under Willem van Ewyk; the victuallers Sint Jan Evangelist of Jan Evertszoon, Koning David of Heertge Karstens, Sint Pieter of Hendrik Walop, and Witte Tas of Jan Adriaanszoon; as well as the galliots Witte Paard of Meindert Jakobszoon Quast and Jonge Tobias of Cornelis Pieterszoon Heertjes.

The Zeeland squadron is led by Vice Adm. Cornelis Evertsen de Jonge or “the Younger” aboard his 60-gun, 305-man vice-flagship Zierikzee, with the 50-gun, 220-man Vlissingen of Karel van der Putten; the 32-gun, 120-man Delft of Adriaan Bankert; the snow Bruinvis of Matthys Laurenszoon; as well as the 8-gun, 24-man water transport Wijnrank of Cornelis Lyncourt. The Hoorn or Noordeerkwartier squadron makes up the rest of the fleet: the 56-gun, 237-man Gelderland; the 46-gun, 198-man Caleb of Jan Muys; the 40-gun, 166-man Jupiter of Pieter Bakker; the 12-gun, 41-man transport Prins te Paard; and the 12-gun, 36-man Wapen van Hoorn under Wijnbergen. There are 3,400 troops under Col. Jan van Uyttenhove traveling aboard this expedition.

The French have been forewarned of de Ruyter’s approach, but they are gathered in strength at their main settlement of Saint Pierre, farther northwest up the coast. Being familiar with this island from previous visits, as well as carrying the Huguenot turncoat Charles de Birac of Gascony, de Ruyter instead bears down upon its principal anchorage of Cul de Sac Royal. He intends to seize the lightly defended Fort Royal (modern Fort de France), then disembark Van Uyttenhove’s army to strike overland from this beachhead. But the Dutch admiral fails to take the port that first day when his fleet becomes becalmed.

During the ensuing night, 118 hastily assembled men under de Baas de l’Herpinière (nephew of the French governor general, who lies ill at Saint Pierre) work frantically to shore up Fort Royal’s defenses, supplemented by crews from the vessels anchored in the adjacent Carénage: Capt. Thomas Claude Renart de Fuch Samberg, Marquis d’Amblimont’s, royal warship Jeux of 44 guns, 350 tons, and 150 men; the 22-gun merchantman Saint Eustache of Saint-Malo; the Sagesse of Bordeaux; the Notre Dame of Ciotat; and the Saint Joseph of Toulon. The latter two vessels are scuttled as block ships, while their 25 crew members go ashore under masters Antoine Ganteaume and Joune, plus Ensign de Martignac, a sergeant, and 16 marines from the Jeux, to bolster Fort Royal’s slender garrison.

By dawn, the French have mustered enough men under Guillaume d’Orange to stretch booms across the Carénage’s entrance and work their batteries, while the 65-year-old island governor Antoine André Sainte Marthe de Lalande (a distinguished military veteran) arrives by boat to assume overall command. When de Ruyter approaches Fort Royal on the morning of July 20, he is greeted by heavy gunfire; and when Uyttenhove’s troops disembark nearby at 9:00 a.m., they encounter positions of great natural strength. New French ramparts defend the rocky peninsula, so that the Dutch columns soon become ensnared in a cross fire between the batteries, as well as receiving fire from D'Amblimont's Jeux and Captain Beaulieu's Saint Eustache anchored in the Carénage.

The 1,000 Dutch attackers have no siege pieces, scaling ladders, or support fire from de Ruyter's more distant ships. Their discipline, moreover, collapses when a rum warehouse is breached. The Dutch land commanders therefore attempt to regroup in the lee of a nearby cliff, but D'Amblimont quickly lands a half-dozen guns from his frigate and opens fire upon this new position. Van Uyttenhove is seriously wounded, and the Dutch morale snaps so that, by 11:00 a.m., the invaders are streaming off toward their boats. They return at 2:00 p.m. for a second try under Vice Admiral Evertsen and Rear Admiral de Ruyter. Again, the assault troops suffer heavily from the combined French cross fires and two hours later retire to their transports in defeat when Michiel de Ruyter hoists the white recall signal from Zeven Provinciën. Dutch casualties total 143 killed and 318 wounded, as opposed to 15 French dead, among them D'Orange.

Not yet realizing that they have won a great victory, the masters of the Saint Eustache and the Sagesse set their ships aflame and come ashore overnight, while D'Amblimont spends a nervous time aboard his royal frigate, preparing to do the same. Dawn of July 21, though, reveals De Ruyter gone, his fleet staggering north toward Dominica to recuperate. From there, a few Dutch ships return southward on July 25, although their main body continues north, passing Guadeloupe next day to visit the English on Nevis. Eventually, de Ruyter steers for Europe, sickness raging throughout his crowded transports. The French will remember their unexpected win as the Victoire du Rhum or "Victory of Rum."

MARCH 1675. The Spaniards complete the 32-gun Fortress of the Limpia, Pura e Inmaculada Concepción, on the San Juan River (modern El Castillo, Nicaragua), the engineer Diego Gómez de Ocampo being installed as its first garrison commander.

APRIL 1675. The English privateer John Bennett—his 20-man brigantine bearing a commission from Governor d'Ogeron of French Saint Domingue to campaign against the Spaniards—intercepts the 50-ton hired frigate Buen Jesús de las Almas of Bernardo Ferrer Espejo as it approaches the coast of Hispaniola with 46,471 pesos in payrolls for that island.

APRIL 13, 1675. John, Lord Vaughan (new governor of Jamaica), issues a proclamation at Port Royal ordering all English privateers to refrain from serving under foreign flags, now that England is at peace. With France still at war against both Spain and Holland, though, thus freely issuing commissions, many freebooters will choose to ignore this injunction and continue roving.

SUMMER 1675. The Dutch corsairs Jurriaen Aernouts and Jan Erasmus Reyning make a descent upon Grenada with about 100 raiders, quickly occupying its principal French fort, garrisoned by only eight men. They fail to notice, however, the arrival of enemy reinforcements, who in turn besiege the Dutchmen inside this keep and starve them into submission. Aernouts, Reyning, and the other captives are conveyed to Martinique aboard the 52-gun, 1,000-ton royal warship Émerillon of Captain

Capt. William Dampier, "pirate and hydrographer," as painted by Thomas Murray around 1698, the year after publication of Dampier's Voyage around the World. (Russell, W. Clark. William Dampier, 1894)

William Dampier

William Dampier was born at East Coker, near Yeovil in England. The son of a tenant farmer, he was baptized on June 8, 1652 (O.S.). His father died when William was only 10 years old, and his mother died when he was 16. The teenage orphan was sent to sea in charge of a Weymouth trader, making a voyage to France, then another to Newfoundland. After a brief pause, Dampier sailed to Bantam in Asia aboard the East Indiaman John and Martha, returning to England just as the Third Anglo-Dutch War erupted in 1672. The next year, he was rated an able seaman aboard the 100-gun HMS Royal Prince, Sir Edward Spragge's flagship at the battles of Schooneveldt and the Texel. Dampier missed this latter engagement, having been sent home sick.

His health restored and hostilities with the Dutch ended, Dampier accepted an offer in 1674 from his father's old landlord, Col. William Helyar, to go to Jamaica as assistant manager on the Begbrook Plantation. Soon tiring of this occupation, the restless young man started Caribbean trading voyages. In August 1675, Dampier shipped out on a ketch, bound into the "Bay of Campeche" or Laguna de Términos (Mexico) with a cargo of rum and sugar to trade for logwood. So taken was he with the bayman's life that he made his way back there in February 1676.

Dampier remained in the Laguna for more than two years. By the time he sailed for England in the autumn of 1678, he had amassed such a sum that he could marry a young woman named Judith, "out of the family of the Duchess of Grafton." The next spring, Dampier returned to the West Indies aboard the Loyal Merchant, leaving his young wife at Arlington House. He remained on Jamaica until Christmas 1679, when on the verge of traveling home he was persuaded to go on a short voyage to the Mosquito Coast. It was the start of a lifetime of remarkable travel and adventure.

He joined a buccaneer crew under Capt. Richard Sawkins, who became part of a pirate fleet under John Coxon. They crossed the Isthmus of Panama and terrorized the Pacific for a year and a half. Once back in the Caribbean, Dampier and 19 companions went to Virginia in July 1682. They joined Capt. John Cooke's Revenge and crossed to Sierra Leone in West Africa to steal a 36-gun Danish ship. Renamed Bachelor's Delight, they then rounded Cape Horn into the South Seas for another two and a half years. In the spring of 1686, Dampier struck out from the Mexican coast toward Guam aboard Charles Swan's Cygnnet.

Dampier cruised Far Eastern waters for another five years before finally regaining England aboard the Indiaman Defence in September 1691. What truly distinguished Dampier, however, was his intelligence and powers of observation. They became evident when he published his Voyage around the World six years later, which was an instant best-seller. Dampier sailed around the world two more times and covered more than 200,000 miles in all. Even after his death in March 1715, his books continued to be read by such men as Charles Darwin, Jonathan Swift, Daniel Defoe, James Cook, and Horatio Nelson. Samuel Taylor Coleridge, in fact, called him a "man of exquisite mind."

Louis Chadeau, Seigneur de La Clocheterie, where they eventually succeed in escaping, regaining Curaçao by 1676.

JUNE 17, 1675 (O.S.). King Philip's War. In New England, the Algonquian tribes have grown increasingly restive because of Puritan expansion inland from Plymouth (Massachusetts), as well as offended by their religious proselytization and other mistreatment. As a result, the sachem or "chieftain" Metacomet, known to the English as Philip, begins organizing his Wampanoag tribes around Mount Hope for an uprising.

On June 17 (O.S.), Indian bands begin raiding Puritan farms, resulting in a warrior being shot the next day at Swansea. Hostilities around this settlement quickly escalate and burst into open warfare by June 24 (O.S.). Isolated Puritan farms and hamlets are destroyed before 500 militiamen can be raised at Plymouth and Boston to advance into Wampanoag territory four days later. Philip's followers fall back into the Pocasset Swamp, from where they burn Swansea and Dartmouth as well as attack Taunton and Rehoboth, before slipping across the Taunton River on July 28 (O.S.) and being scattered by 50 Mohican Indians loyal to the English four days later.

The defeated Philip escapes into neighboring Nipmuk territory with only 40 warriors and 250 non-combatants, prompting the Puritans to disband their militia. However, on August 2 (O.S.), 20 Connecticut troopers under captains Edward Hutchinson and Thomas Wheeler are ambushed while peacefully approaching a Nipmuk gathering near Brookfield, suffering 8 killed and 5 wounded. The town of Brookfield is then leveled by a war band led by Chief Sagamore John; its 83 terrified survivors are rescued two evenings later by 73-year-old major Simon Williard with 46 troopers and 5 loyal scouts from Groton. Again, an additional 350 militiamen rush into this area, only to find the hostiles gone. An Indian band is eventually attacked near Hatfield late in August by captains Richard Beers and Thomas Lathrop, who slay 26 Nipmucs at a cost of 10 English dead. This action provokes the natives under chiefs Manaco, alias One-Eyed John, and Sagamore Sam to attack Deerfield in retaliation on September 1 (O.S.), to destroy Northfield the next day, then to devastate Beers's 36-man relief column just south of there on September 3 (O.S.), killing the captain and 20 of his men. Lathrop is killed on September 18 (O.S.) when his 90-man wagon train is ambushed after evacuating Deerfield, being almost totally annihilated five miles south at Bloody Brook. Frightened English settlers abandon the Connecticut Valley to huddle around Hatfield and Hadley, while Springfield is attacked but not entirely overrun on October 5 (O.S.).

On November 2 (O.S.), the New Englanders declare war against the Narragansett tribe of Rhode Island as well, convinced that they have been abetting the hostiles. Five weeks later, seven companies of Massachusetts militia—527 men—under Maj.

Samuel Appleton depart Dedham, uniting at Pawtuxet on December 11 (O.S.) with an additional 158 from Plymouth under Maj. William Bradford and Capt. John Gorham. Together they sweep through Narragansett territory over the next seven days, destroying minor villages and killing or capturing three-score natives before meeting 300 Connecticut troops and 150 Mohican allies under Maj. Robert Treat at Petasquamscot. After a further seven-hour trek across a frozen swamp through heavy snow, this army surprises 3,000 Narragansetts within a fortified camp at noon on December 19 (O.S.). The English fight their way inside after three hours' intense combat, during which they suffer 68 dead and 150 wounded; the natives are driven into the wilderness after enduring several hundred casualties. Still, the exhausted victors cannot hold their prize after this so-called Great Swamp Fight, instead retiring toward Wickford with considerable hardship.

Gov. Josiah Winslow of Plymouth subsequently attempts to maintain pressure on the scattered Narragansett bands with 1,500 militiamen, but the discouraged New Englanders disband by February 6, 1676 (O.S.). Four days later, Philip, with 300–400 Narragansett and Nipmuk warriors, razes Lancaster in a dawn raid, departing before any rescuers can appear. On February 21 (O.S.), he burns 40 houses at Medfield, then evades a pursuing column under Major General Denison. Numerous hit-and-run raids by the Indians ensue during that unusually mild winter: Weymouth is attacked on February 28 (O.S.), Groton three days later, the outskirts of Plymouth on March 12 (O.S.), Warwick five days later, Marlboro on March 26 (O.S.), Seekonk and Longmeadow two days later, Bridgewater and Billerica on April 9 (O.S.), Chelmsford six days after. Then the natives descend upon Sudbury—15 miles outside of Boston—in great numbers early on the morning of April 21 (O.S.), inflicting heavy casualties before withdrawing.

Despite these successes, spring sees a revival in English fortunes, while the natives succumb to famine and disease. When a band of warriors approaches Hadley on June 11, 1676 (O.S.), they find it defended by 500 troops, so retire without attacking. Morale among the hostiles soon collapses, each small band looking to its own survival; some surrender to the English, while others are hunted down and exterminated. On August 12 (O.S.), Capt. Benjamin Church surprises Philip's camp near Mount Hope and kills him, his head being carried into Plymouth on a pole. During the course of these year-long hostilities, 600 colonists have died, totaling one out of every 16 English males of military age in Massachusetts and Connecticut.

JULY 1675. Rogue Doeg and Susquehannock Indians (Siouan-speaking natives driven out of their traditional homelands by Iroquois pressure) slip across Virginia's border to rob and murder several English settlers, before retiring into Maryland. They are pursued by Virginia militiamen, who attack and kill a number of raiders before withdrawing.

Such clashes are not uncommon, but this particular incident gains greater significance when the Maryland authorities contact Gov. Sir William Berkeley of Virginia, proposing a joint operation. Berkeley orders John Washington and Isaac Allerton to raise a company of militia late in August to campaign with the Marylanders. Both contingents meet and advance upon the principal Susquehannock stronghold, arriving in late September to accuse its inhabitants of participating in the summer raid. The natives vigorously deny it, but an unconvinced Washington and Allerton lead five chieftains away to be executed. The English then besiege the stronghold, but a few nights later its Susquehannock inhabitants escape.

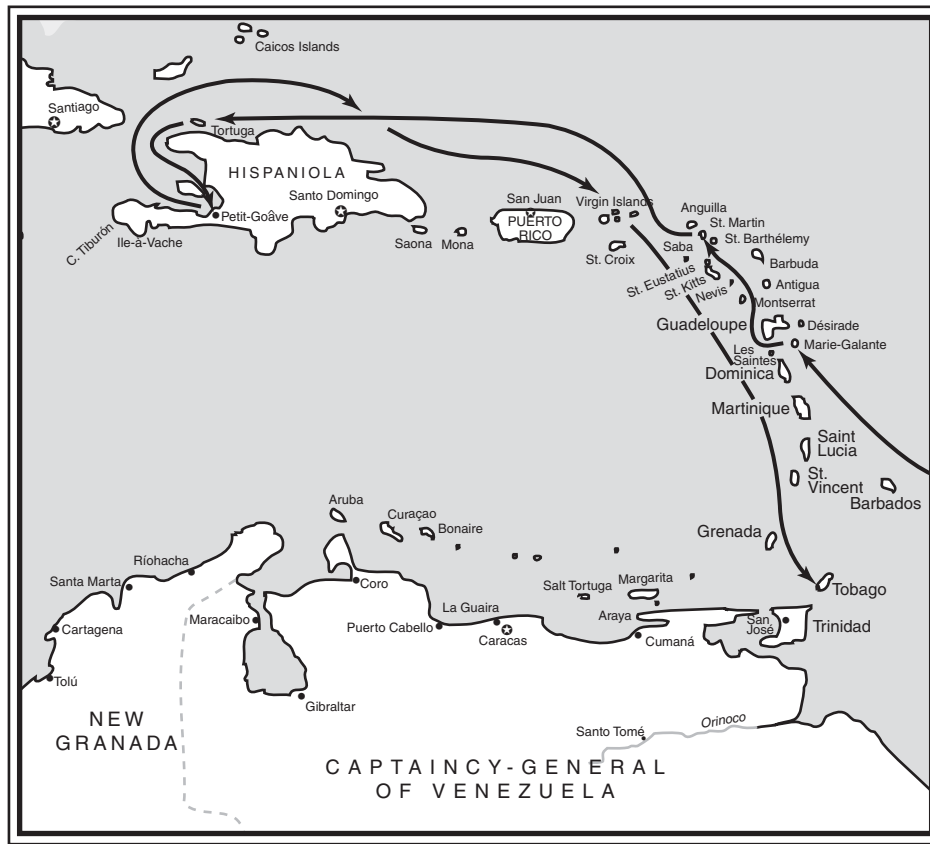

JANUARY 1676. Enraged by the summary execution of their five chieftains that previous autumn, the Susquehannock take revenge by attacking the English settlements along the Rappahannock and Potomac rivers, killing 36 people. News of this foray creates panic throughout Virginia, with Governor Berkeley attempting to control passions and protect friendly Indians.

APRIL 1676. Bacon's Rebellion. Convinced that they are about to endure a massive Indian attack because of Berkeley's inaction, Virginia hotheads rally around a new councilor named Nathaniel Bacon to advance into the wilderness southwest of Henrico County and hunt natives. They join a band of friendly Indians and attack a group of Susquehannocks, but after this victory the Virginians fall out with their allies, destroying their village before retiring.

A furious Governor Berkeley in the meantime has marched with 300 men to intercept Bacon but arrives too late to prevent his departure. He removes Bacon from the council and declares him in rebellion. Encountering much pro-Bacon sentiment, the governor thereupon decides to dissolve the assembly and call for the first general elections in 14 years. Bacon is easily elected burgess for Henrico County, yet when he arrives off Jamestown in his sloop to take his seat on June 5, his vessel is fired upon and he is arrested. Brought before Berkeley, he begs forgiveness, is pardoned, and allowed to return upriver to his plantation, apparently being promised command of a forthcoming Indian campaign.

The assembly meanwhile remains in session until the end of that month, when Bacon suddenly reappears in Jamestown with 500 armed men, terrorizing its members into giving him his Indian command, plus restitution of his sloop, before marching off into the wilderness. While scouting around the James Falls that summer and early autumn, Bacon learns that the governor has again declared him a rebel. Retracing his steps toward Jamestown, Bacon forces Berkeley to flee to Accomack on the eastern shore and attempts to assume control over the entire government.

To reconfirm his reputation as the people's champion, Bacon sets off once more against the Indians, destroying the main encampment of the Pamunkey on the pretext that they are secretly aiding the Susquehannocks. During his absence, Berkeley reoccupies Jamestown, which is besieged upon Bacon's return, forcing the governor to retreat for a second time into his Accomack stronghold. On this occasion, though, Jamestown is burned to the ground, after which the rebellion begins to fall apart. Bacon dies of disease on October 26, freeing Berkeley to stamp out the last vestiges of his rebellion over that ensuing winter. The governor is nonetheless recalled to London and dies in disgrace, after more than 1,000 troops arrive from England early in 1677 under Col. Herbert Jeffreys of the 1st Regiment of Foot Guards and the Royal Navy's Commo. Sir John Berry.

MAY 3, 1676. Binckes's Campaign. At 2:00 p.m. this Sunday afternoon, French lookouts stationed at Montjoly outside Cayenne (French Guiana) spot an approaching fleet. It proves to be under recently promoted Vice Adm. Jacob Binckes of Amsterdam, who has returned to the Americas with three ships of the line with 44–56 guns each; six frigates of 24–36 guns; a fireship; and 16 transports. Next morning, he sends in a boat under a flag of truce, calling on the French to capitulate.

When no reply is received, Binckes disembarks 900 troops at Queslin Cove on May 5, who advance upon Rémire. Meanwhile, his three heaviest warships circle around, cross Cayenne's 12-foot bar, and anchor opposite Fort Saint Louis to initiate a bombardment by 2:00 p.m. Rémire is quickly overrun, therefore Governor Le Febvre de Lézy feels compelled to surrender his battered stronghold (which contains only 180 defenders and 120 noncombatants).

On May 6, Binckes installs a new administration at Cayenne under its former Dutch governor, Quirijn Spranger, who is to govern over 120 Dutch settlers until reinforced from Holland. Le Febvre de Lézy and the bulk of his French colonists are carried away to be deported to France, after which Binckes proceeds northwestward to visit a like treatment upon Marie-Galante.

JUNE 1676. Binckes materializes off Marie Galante, whose French residents—many unhappy over royal minister Jean Baptiste Colbert's stringent new trade regulations—offer no resistance, even agreeing to emigrate to the new Dutch colony that Binckes is to establish on Tobago. After throwing down Marie-Galante's fortifications and embarking its inhabitants, Binckes sights Guadeloupe on June 16. However, considering its defenses too strong, he passes by and instead pursues a trio of French vessels off-shore, without success.

LATE JUNE 1676. Binckes arrives at Saint Martin to disembark 500 men and reconquer this island from the French. The latter offer a spirited resistance under Governor de Magne from behind a recently constructed fortress and parapet near its salt pans. During this fighting, the defenders apparently fire upon Dutch emissaries sent to negotiate terms, so Binckes orders that no quarter be given. The Dutch eventually surmount a hill overlooking this parapet, shooting down into it and killing de Magne, after which the French settlers scatter. Angry, Binckes commandeers 100 slaves and a large number of cattle before departing, yet no Dutch garrison is installed, and the French soon reoccupy their devastated stronghold.

From Saint Martin, Binckes divides his command, directing Commo. Jan Bont to sail toward Tobago with a squadron bearing colonists under its new Swedish-born governor designate, Hendrik Carloff, to begin refounding “New Walcheren” (see “December 18, 1672” entry); the admiral meanwhile probes farther west with a larger force in the forlorn hope of inciting a revolt among the boucaniers of Saint Domingue (Haiti), who are known to be resentful against the high tariffs of France’s West Indies company.

JUNE 30, 1676. Some 800 buccaneers attempt to penetrate the Matina Valley (Costa Rica) in search of booty, only to suffer a couple of hundred casualties in a clash at Moin Beach against 500 Spanish militiamen and 200 native archers that were marched from the capital, Cartago, by Gov. Juan Francisco Sáenz Vázquez.

JULY 16, 1676. Having failed to persuade any French residents along Saint Domingue’s northern coastline to reject Parisian rule, Binckes arrives before Petit Goâve with his 50-gun flagship Bescherming, the 44-gun Zeelandia under Pieter Constant (ex-governor of Dutch Tobago), the 24-gun Popkesburg under Pieter Stolwyck, and the privateer sloop Fortuijn under Jan Erasmus Reyning.

Loading tobacco in Petit Goâve’s roads are the 14-gun, 28-man Saint René of Nantes under Pierre Chevalier; the 14-gun, 40-man Florissant of Nantes; the 18-gun, 50-man Dauphin of Havre under Jean Dupont; the 18-gun, 50-man Alcyon of Dieppe under Jean Pimont; the 16-gun, 35-man Roi David of Honfleur under Captain Martin; the 2-gun, 14-man Marie of Dieppe; and the 22-gun, 40-man Lis Couronné under Jean Ducasse.

Binckes decides upon a more direct approach, launching a lopsided battle in which the French resist gamely, suffering many killed and wounded before their merchantmen are boarded that night. The Dutch seize three as prizes, judging the rest to be too heavily damaged. However, they cannot then go ashore because of the timely arrival of French reinforcements overland from Tortuga Island under acting governor Pierre Paul Tarin de Cussy. After dispatching his prizes toward the Netherlands, Binckes reverses course through the Antilles toward Tobago.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1676. Binckes reaches Tobago to discover that all the colonizing vessels of Commo-dore Bont’s detached squadron have arrived, save three minor vessels intercepted off Nevis by a pair of French men-of-war under Commo. Rouxel de Médavy, Marquis de Grancey d’Argentan, plus Bont’s own flagship (the latter has inexplicably sailed back toward Europe—he is eventually beheaded for desertion). The admiral begins organizing the island’s defenses, erecting a fort called Sterreschans or the “Star Bastion” to cover Klip or Roodklip Bay (“Red Rock,” modern Rockly Bay) plus a smaller redoubt nearby, in anticipation of a French counteroffensive. Dutch morale is boosted in February 1677 by the appearance of a relief convoy bearing 150 soldiers, more settlers, and provisions.

DECEMBER 17, 1676. D’Estrées’s Counteroffensive. The haughty 52-year-old vice admiral Jean, Comte (later Duc) d’Estrées, appears from Brest before Rémire at Dutch-held Cayenne with his 72-gun, 1,000-ton flagship Glorieux (ex-Agréable), as well as the warships Intrépide, Fendant, Marquis, and Précieux, plus five frigates, and three sloops. These vessels have been dispatched by Louis XIV to reverse the recent Dutch gains made by Binckes, and they are piloted in their approach by the colony’s expelled French governor, Le Febvre de Lézy.

A veteran field marshal before joining France’s Royal Navy, d’Estrées disembarks 800 troops next day at Conobé Bay and forms them into two columns, one led by himself and the other by Captain Panetié of the 50-gun, 800-ton Précieux. Commo. Louis Gabaret of the 56-gun, 900-ton Intrépide (ex-Saint-Esprit) blockades the Armire roadstead with five men-of-war, until the two land columns enter the deserted town of Cayenne on December 19, its outnumbered Dutch residents having retreated inside Fort Saint Louis without offering resistance.

After vainly calling upon the Dutch garrison commander, Quirijn Spranger, to surrender, the remaining French warships close in to support d'Estrées's columns. The attackers storm its ramparts at 9:00 p.m. on December 21, carrying the citadel a half hour later at a cost of 25 French dead and 92 wounded (including Panetié, whose jaw is shattered), compared to 20 killed, 38 injured, and 219 captured among its defenders.

Le Febvre de Lézy is thereupon restored into office as governor of French Guiana and left 150 soldiers to reconstitute his garrison. After refreshing his ships and dispatching 260 Dutch prisoners toward Europe (where they are to be severely mistreated), d'Estrées presses northwestward to continue his West Indian campaign. Le Febvre de Lézy will spend the next several months razing smaller Dutch outposts inland.

JANUARY 19, 1677. D'Estrées reaches Martinique, hoping to gain intelligence about Dutch defensive measures at his next intended target of Tobago and be reinforced by flibustier contingents. Governor General de Baas dies on January 24 after a protracted illness, after which d'Estrées sets sail on February 12, slowly steering toward Tobago while his strength gradually expands to 10 men-of-war, 6 lesser warships (Fanfaron, Coche, Bayonnais, Entreprenant, Adroite, and Assurée), a fireship, some victuallers, and more than 4,000 men.

JANUARY 24, 1677. The 29-year-old French commander Charles François d'Angennes, Marquis de Maintenon, disembarks 500–600 men on the Spanish island of Margarita (Venezuela) and partially destroys its capital of La Asunción. This raid will in turn prompt the Spaniards under Juan Fermin Huidobro to shortly thereafter commence erecting a stone fortress, dubbed Castillo de Santa Rosa upon its completion in 1683.

JANUARY 29, 1677 (O.S.). The veteran commodore Sir John Berry reaches the James River in Virginia with his flagship HMS Bristol and ketch Deptford, to be followed over the next couple of weeks by the frigates Rose and Dartmouth and the small convoy of hired merchantmen that they are escorting. One thousand troops of Colonel Jeffreys's regiment have been sent from England because of concerns about Indian uprisings and Bacon's rebellion (see "April 1676" entry). Finding the situation largely stabilized, Berry returns homeward shortly thereafter.

FEBRUARY 18, 1677. On Tobago, Binckes receives word of two small French vessels reconnoitering the approaches to Klip (modern Rockly) Bay, correctly surmising them to be advance units from d'Estrées's approaching fleet. This same night, the Dutch admiral also receives intelligence—brought from the English on Nevis by his Dutch auxiliary Jan Erasmus Reyning—advising of Cayenne's fall and d'Estrées's recruitment of West Indian privateers. The next day, Binckes and his 1,700 followers count 9 unidentified sail off their coast, which increase to 14 by February 20. This ominous buildup leads the admiral to redouble his defensive preparations, marshalling soldiers and sailors around Sterreschans fortress, while ferrying noncombatants out to the ships anchored under the protection of its guns.

FEBRUARY 21, 1677. This evening, d'Estrées disembarks seven infantry companies and 200 sailors (more than 1,000 men in total) at a quiet inlet, marching overland under Lt. Col. Hérouard de la Pirogerie and Maj. Hubert d'Andigny, Chevalier de Grandfontaine, toward Tobago's distant Dutch stronghold. On February 23, a French emissary approaches Sterreschans fortress, calling upon its defenders to surrender, which is rejected. The French army therefore resumes its advance, skirmishing with Dutch units until coming within sight of Sterreschans a few days later and emplacing a siege battery.

The French commanders are daunted by this imposing, well-armed fortification with its encircling river moat, but eventually—concerned about his dwindling provisions—d'Estrées orders a probe made between 9:00 and 10:00 p.m., supported by 14 light vessels feinting against the harbor entrance. This assault does not prosper, and the French are seriously considering lifting their siege, when d'Estrées decides at a general conference on March 2 to make one last desperate storm by both sea and land.

MARCH 3 (ASH WEDNESDAY), 1677. First Battle of Tobago. In the first light at 6:00 a.m., piloted by a Dutch turncoat, d'Estrées heads into what are today the outer reaches of Scarborough Bay inside Rockly Bay with his 72-gun, 445-man, 1,000-ton flagship Glorieux; the 50-gun, 350-man, 800-ton Précieux under Mascarany; the 36-gun, 280-man,

First Battle of Tobago.

350-ton Émerillon (formerly Actif) of Nicolas Le Febvre de Méricourt; and the 38-gun, 250-man, 500-ton Laurier (former Serpente) under Charles François de Machault.

Closer inshore, d'Estrées's second-in-command Louis Gabaret leads his own 56-gun, 320-man, 900-ton vice-flagship Intrépide; the 62-gun, 380-man, 900-ton Fendant (formerly Grâces) of Charles, Comte de Blénac; the 48-gun, 300-man Marquis of the Chevalier de Lézines; the 50-gun, 300-man, 600-ton Galant of De Montortié; the 36-gun, 240-man, 350-ton Soleil d'Afrique (former Éclair) of De La Borde; and the 38-gun, 240-man, 350-ton Jeux of De La Cassini. This French fleet is furthermore accompanied by a pair of aviso or "dispatch" sloops, a fireship (which will soon run aground), and a galliot.

D'Estrées's audacity has caught the Dutch fleet off guard, their warships having been stripped of fighting men to bolster the defenses ashore. Awaiting the French, anchored in a curving line, are the 13-man fireship Zaaijer of Heertje Carstenszoon; the 44-gun, 118-man Zeelandia of Pieter Constant; the 24-gun, 25-man French prize Alcyon under Cornelis Stolwyck; the 50-gun, 153-man flagship Bescherming of Jacob Binckes; the 26-gun, 35-man victualler Duc de Yorck of Frederik Sweers; the 56-gun, 128-man vice-flagship Huis te Kruiningen of Roemer Vlacq; the 31-gun, 25-man victualler Gouden Monnik of Dirk Schoen; the 36-gun, 83-man Middelburg of Jan Swart; the 28-gun, 74-man Gouden Ster of Pieter Coreman; the 24-gun, 52-man Popkesburg of Pieter Stolwyck; the 34-gun, 73-man Leyden of Galtje Galtjes; and the 25-man sloop Fortuijn of Jan Erasmus Reyning. Behind them lie the beached hulk Starrenburg, a neutral Portuguese vessel, and the 12-gun transport Sphaera Mundi, crammed with more than 200 women and children, several hundred slaves, plus its regular 30-man complement.

D'Estrées's fleet enters with guns blazing, expending more than 1,000 rounds against the Dutch batteries and suffering numerous casualties from their counterfire, before reaching the moored warships shortly before 9:00 a.m. Inshore, the Marquis closes upon Leyden despite ferocious countersalvos, while farther out the Glorieux sinks the fireship Zaaijer, then grapples with the Huis te Kruiningen. The Dutch vice-flagship is boarded and carried within 15 minutes by the Chevalier d'Hervault, while nearby Précieux begins a losing struggle against the Dutch flagship Bescherming, and the Marquis overwhelms the Leyden. On land, Colonel de la Pirogerie sends assault-columns against Sterreschans, only to be turned back by the efficient Dutch artillery. Twice more, the French soldiers rush its walls, suffering almost 200 casualties before giving up.

This repulse allows Binckes to shift his attention to the harbor, where flames soon begin spreading among the entangled vessels, multiplied by heated shots fired from Sterreschans. Eventually, conflagrations take hold throughout both fleets; d'Estrées's own Glorieux is almost destroyed when the captive Huis te Kruiningen explodes. The French admiral himself is wounded in the head, and his flagship subsequently catches fire and burns down to the waterline, along with the Marquis and the Assurée. Ten of the 13 Dutch vessels are also consumed; the badly damaged Bescherming, Zeelandia, and Alcyon emerge as sole survivors. Two French vessels, Intrépide and Précieux, run aground and are captured, despite d'Estrées's cold-blooded order that they be burned, notwithstanding the wounded men heaped upon their decks. The Fendant and the Galant are dismasted, while the Émerillon sustains considerable damage as well.

All told, the French suffer more than 1,000 casualties, Colonel de la Pirogerie, Commodore Gabaret, captains de Lézines, and De La Borde numbering among their dead. Dutch casualties are 344 men, with captains Vlacq, Galtjes, Sweers, Constant, and Coreman among them. Three days after withdrawing into Palmyt Bay (modern Petit Tree Lagoon), six miles southwest of Sterreschans, d'Estrées limps away for Grenada and Martinique, proclaiming victory despite his retreat and heavy losses. By early July, he is back in Versailles reporting to the king, who orders his admiral to return into the West Indies and complete this mission.

MARCH 7, 1677. A buccaneering expedition sneaks upon the Mexican town of Jalpa before sunrise, having departed the Laguna de Términos six days earlier, led by a French rover named André Ribaut with 35 men aboard his 3-gun frigate. Another 117 freebooters sail aboard the frigate and brigantine of an English captain named George Rivers, who has also bolstered Ribaut's crew with an additional 70 men. The rovers' intent is to seize a rich cargo of silver and arms recently salvaged from Campeche's coast-guard frigate Pescadora, which has sunk near the entrance to the Grijalva River in mid-November 1676 while returning from Veracruz under Capt. Fermín de Huidobro.

The buccaneers anchor their vessels near Barra de Dos Bocas and advance up the Seco River, guided by a mulatto prisoner named Bartolomé Saraos. Forging streams more than 20 times during this trek, 150 heavily armed freebooters eventually appear outside Jalpa before sunrise on Sunday, March 7, attacking and overwhelming its Spanish citizenry in their beds. However, the treasure and arms have already been shipped back toward the coast with the mule train of José Tenorio, so 40 buccaneers are sent in pursuit to the coastal town of Amatitlán; however, they arrive too late, despite killing three teamsters and capturing the rest of Tenorio's men. Only the slow matches and powder flasks have not yet been sent aboard ship for transfer to Campeche. The frustrated Ribaut and Rivers therefore evacuate Jalpa at 10:00 a.m. of March 8, taking whatever booty and prisoners they can. The raiders are back aboard their ships before any Spanish militia units from outlying areas can react, not having suffered a single loss during their incursion.

LATE JUNE 1677. The French privateer Pierre La Garde attacks Santa Marta (Colombia), seconded by English mercenaries under captains John Coxon and William Barnes. They surprise the port at dawn and take many captives, including its governor, Vicente Sebastián Mestre, and 53-year-old bishop Dr. Lucas Fernández y Piedrahita, whom they hold for ransom while ransacking the buildings.

JULY 6, 1677. Francisco de Alberrós, the Spanish governor designate of Venezuela, arrives from Cadiz at La Guaira aboard the 450-ton San José, Santa Rosa María y San Pedro de Alcántara. He has agreed to purchase this vessel in Spain for the Crown on the understanding that it will transport him out to his destination, and then its value will be reimbursed to him out of local taxes.

The vessel is intended to serve as the flagship of a newly reconstituted Armada de Barlovento (Windward Fleet) in the West Indies. It is being followed out from Cadiz by three smaller warships, which will enter Cartagena four days later. All four will be united at year's end with the 350-ton vice-flagship Nuestra Señora de Aranzazu y San Lorenzo, which has been sold to the Crown by Antonio de Astina on condition that he be appointed almirante or second-in-command of the armada and might recoup its value at Puerto Rico. The Aranzazu will not depart Spain until October, conveying a quicksilver consignment to Veracruz.

JULY 10, 1677. The 240-ton Spanish warship San Juan (formerly the French Dauphine, more commonly called Princesa or Francesa by the Spaniards), the 200-ton Nuestra Señora del Camino, and 200-ton Santo Cristo del Buen Viaje (alias Mogoleño) arrive at Cartagena, intended to form part of the new Armada de Barlovento. Captains José de Arizmendi, Felipe de Diústegui, and Francisco López de Gámara report to their new capitán general Antonio de Quintana, a veteran of 20 years' service with Cartagena's coast guard.

Immediately, this trio is dispatched along with 2 hired merchantmen and 500 troops to rescue Santa Marta, which is still occupied by La Garde, Coxon, and Barnes. Quintana's flotilla supposedly bombards these invaders before being driven off by a storm, although Spanish witnesses later charge that the men-of-war engage reluctantly, as they are heavily laden with European imports. By the time they return to the attack a few days later, the buccaneers have withdrawn from Santa Marta with their hostages.

JULY 28, 1677. La Garde and Barnes arrive at Port Royal (Jamaica) to spend their booty from Santa Marta. Three days later, Coxon enters port and personally escorts the captive Bishop Fernández and a Spanish friar before the island governor, Lord Vaughan. The prelate is nobly housed, and English officers are sent aboard the buccaneer flotilla to attempt "to procure the liberty of the [Spanish] Governor and others, but finding the privateers all drunk, it was impossible to persuade them to do anything by fair means."

Vaughan therefore orders the French to depart and officially informs Coxon and his English followers that it is illegal for them to continue serving under foreign colors. The governor reports that the French are “damnably enraged” at being deprived of their English companions, so they sail off without releasing any more captives. Fernández is soon after restored to Cartagena and is reappointed as bishop of Panama.

OCTOBER 3, 1677. Admiral d’Estrées departs Brest with his new 72-gun flagship Terrible; the 66-gun vice-flagship Tonnant under the Marquis de Grancey; 70-gun Belliqueux under Rear Adm. Charles de Courbon, Seigneur de Romegeux and Comte de Blénac (new governor general for the French West Indies, replacing the deceased De Baas); the 56-gun ships of the line Bourbon, Prince, and Hercule; the 44-gun, 400-ton Alcyon (ex-Havre); the 40-gun, 480-ton Brillant (ex-Basque); the 38-gun, 400-ton Étoile (former fireship Actif); and the 36-gun Émerillon; the 36-gun, 550-ton flûte or “armed transport” Dromadaire and the 24-gun, 450-ton Tardif; a hospital ship; the 24-gun, 180-ton frigate Maligne; the 10-gun, 290-ton fireship Périlleux and the 6-gun, 90-ton Brutal (ex-English Rueben or Justice); plus a barco luengo and a caïque.

During his outward passage, d’Estrées destroys the Dutch slaving station at Gorée in West Africa early in November, before entering the West Indies later this same month, steering for Tobago.

NOVEMBER 9, 1677. At nightfall, the French buccaneer Pierre de Frasnquénay leads 400 flibustiers ashore at Justicia Inlet, planning to fall upon nearby Santiago de Cuba while it sleeps. (He believes that its defenses are still weakened after a devastating earthquake two years previously.) However, the invaders are guided through winding jungle trails by a simpleminded Spanish captive named Juan Perdomo, becoming so confused that one column fires upon another by mistake in the darkness. With the element of surprise lost and 14 boucaniers dead, Frasnquénay has no choice but to retire to his waiting ships the next day.

DECEMBER 6, 1677. Second Battle of Tobago. The abrupt reappearance of d’Estrées finds this island’s Dutch defenders completely unrecovered. Binckes has sent the repaired French prize Intrépide under a badly wounded Constant to the Netherlands to beg for reinforcements, but none has arrived. Within Klip (modern Rockly) Bay lie the damaged flagship Bescherming and prize Précieux, plus three minor vessels. On land, the Dutch garrison is reduced to fewer than 500 effectives as a result of losses during its first defense plus subsequent bouts of disease. Binckes’s sole ally is the weather, which bursts into torrential downpours, hampering the French disembarkation and advance from Palmyt Bay.

Yet d’Estrées nonetheless quickly throws almost 1,000 troops and a siege train ashore under Grancey and Blénac, who march upon Fort Sterreschans while brushing aside 200 Dutch troops. By December 10, d’Estrées comes ashore and begins installing his siege battery under the direction of military engineer Pierre de Combes (brought specifically aboard Chadeau de La Clocheterie’s Brillant for this work). Having indulged in a suicidal, all-out assault the last time, d’Estrées is determined to proceed more prudently on this occasion by instituting a formal siege.

On December 12, his chief gunner Pierre Landouillette de Logivière begins firing ranging shots against the Dutch fort, laying odds that he will blow it up at the third attempt. Incredibly, Landouillette’s third round lands squarely inside Sterreschans’s magazine, killing Binckes and 250 other Dutch defenders with a mighty blast, while paralyzing the remainder. The French swarm exultantly over its ruins, with Dutch resolve collapsing. The Étoile, the Hercule, and the Bourbon enter Klip Bay to seize its 16 vessels, while a total of 525 prisoners are rounded up both on land and sea, as well as 45 artillery pieces and 30,000 pieces of shot. (One of the few Dutchmen to escape is the privateer Reyning, who carries word of this disaster to Curaçao aboard a tiny boat.) D’Estrées remains in Tobago until January 1678, when he throws down its fortifications, depopulates the island, and retires to Grenada.

APRIL 1678. After resting at Saint Kitts throughout March, d’Estrées transfers his fleet to Martinique in April, calling for flibustiers from as far away as Saint Domingue (Haiti) to rally for a descent against the last remaining Dutch outpost in the West Indies—Curaçao. Supremely confident, this French expedition quits its rendezvous off Saint Kitts by May 7, comprised of 18 royal warships and more than a dozen flibustier craft. It is the admiral’s intent to lead them down the Lesser Antilles, then to proceed westward past the Orchila, Roques, and Aves island groups, despite warnings from local pilots that this can be a treacherous heading. The Étoile and a buccaneer vessel are sent ahead to sweep for any dangers.

MAY 11, 1678. Aves Islands Shipwreck. At 9:00 p.m. this Wednesday evening, one of d'Estrées's flibustier consorts suddenly begins firing musket shots followed by a heavy gun, signaling that the French fleet is too far south and about to sail onto the reefs around the Aves Islands group. This warning comes too late, though, many ships beginning to strike in the darkness.

Dawn of May 12 reveals the following vessels beneath the waves: the 70-gun flagship Terrible of Le Febvre de Méricourt; the 66-gun vice-flagship Tonnant of the Marquis de Grancey; the 70-gun Bellicieux of Capt. André, Chevalier (later Marquis) de Nesmond; the 56-gun Bourbon of De Rosmad, the Prince of Saint Aubin d'Infreville, and the Hercule of De Flacourt; the 50-gun Défenseur of the Marquis d'Amblimont; the 36-gun transport Dromadaire of Périer; a 24-gun unnamed caïque; and the 14-gun hired merchantman Roi David of Honoré Julien. Three corsair vessels of 18, 12, and 6 guns apiece—bearing 400 men between them—have also been destroyed. A total of 500 sailors and soldiers are drowned, and the French siege train is mostly lost, along with almost 500 naval guns.

The admiral therefore has no choice but to retire toward Saint Domingue on May 16 with his remaining warships and 800–900 survivors plucked from the water. Once reassembled at Petit Goâve early in June, his fleet is reduced to the 56-gun, 300-man flagship Duc under François d'Escoubleau, Comte de Sourdis; the men-of-war Brillant, Alcyon, and Émerillon; the transport Tardif; three fireships; and a victualler pinnace. By the time d'Estrées staggers home to France, the war with the Netherlands is virtually ended.

JUNE 10, 1678. Grammont's Maracaibo Campaign.

Rather than retreat with d'Estrées following his Aves Islands disaster, many flibustiers prefer an alternate project of their own under the veteran corsair Sieur de Grammont. Having no interest in tackling the tough Dutch garrison at Curaçao, they instead materialize unexpectedly in the Gulf of Venezuela by June 10. They include 2,000 freebooters aboard six large ships and 13 smaller craft, under commanders such as La Garde, Archambaud, the Englishman John Stel, Jean Le Gascon, Nicolas Le Fée, Desmoulin, Aymé, Pierre Gouin, Mathieu, Josée, and Nicolas Amon (nicknamed Grenezé, as he is apparently an Anglo-Norman originally from the Channel island of Guernsey).

Grammont disembarks half his force and marches along the San Carlos Peninsula toward the fort guarding its bar, whose artillery he knows to be mostly pointed seaward. Its garrison commander, Francisco Pérez de Guzmán, is only able to stave off an immediate assault by stationing 100 harquebusiers outside his walls; yet heavy guns are then landed from the buccaneer flotilla, and after a brief bombardment, the Spaniards surrender. Grammont passes his ships over the bar, leaving his 6 largest to blockade the entrance while he presses on toward Maracaibo with the other 13.

This city and its outlying district are thrown into a panic; the ancient, sickly governor, Jorge Madureira Ferreira—in office scarcely a week—is unable to inspire any confidence. Citizens therefore begin fleeing in every direction, soon followed by Madureira himself, who retires to Maicao with a handful of regulars. Grammont takes Maracaibo largely unopposed on June 14 and gives it over to be sacked. Flibustier columns also strike out into its countryside pursuing the Spanish governor and other notables in hopes of extorting ransom, thus scattering them even farther afield.

By June 28, Grammont abandons the gutted remains of Maracaibo to cross the Laguna and fall upon Gibraltar. This town, too, is already quite deserted, and after its walls are bombarded, the 22-man garrison gives up. Emboldened by such weak resistance, Grammont marches 425 buccaneers almost 50 miles inland to Trujillo, which is defended by a regular fort with 350 troops and four artillery pieces. Again, the corsair chieftain prevails, storming this fortification from the rear on September 1, “by some hills where it seemed impossible to do so.”

Once more, terrified citizens crowd the roads, straggling 75 miles southwestward into Mérida de la Grita. Having defeated or dispersed every Spanish concentration he has encountered, Grammont retraces his steps toward the Laguna, eventually reentering Gibraltar, which is stripped bare and put to the torch on September 25. The invaders then sail away with an 18-gun merchantman from the “Coulouba” (thought to be the present-day Catatumbo) River, remaining in this region until almost the end of that year; on December 3, Grammont finally departs the Gulf of Venezuela, after razing the fort guarding its bar. His ships are laden with 77 captured cannon, booty, and numerous captives and arrive at Petit Goâve by Christmas Eve.

JULY 6, 1678. Two English buccaneer ships under captains George Spurre and Edward Neville—bearing French commissions—anchor near Jaina (Mexico), with eight piraguas in tow. Neville departs that same night to reconnoiter the nearby port of Campeche with his sloop, rejoining the main body at daybreak of July 7 to report that all is calm. Both captains then slip ashore with 160 freebooters, leaving instructions for their vessels to bear down upon Campeche at dawn two days later. The land party approaches the town by nocturnal stages, capturing every person it meets. Some are tortured to reveal the best access into Campeche, and one is even persuaded to deceive its guard.

An hour before daybreak on Sunday, July 10, the disguised raider column materializes before a small city gate, where their terrified captive answers the sentinel's challenge and gains them entry. In the gloom, the sentry assumes that these shadowy figures are Indians come early to market, allowing the attackers to march swiftly toward the central plaza and “with a great shout fire a heavy volley” outside the governor's residence. Campeche's garrison is taken utterly by surprise, only 9 soldiers being on duty instead of the usual 60. The sargento mayor (garrison commander) Gonzalo Borrallo is taken in his nightshirt, along with virtually every other prominent citizen. Spurre's Toro and Neville's sloop appear on schedule, two huts being fired to signal them to enter. Captives are terrorized into raising ransoms, and every building is ransacked over the next few days. Although the buccaneers remain in Campeche only until the evening of Tuesday, July 12, they withdraw with the ship San Antonio, a barco luengo, a boat, plus money and foodstuffs. They also carry off 250 black, mulatto, and Indian townspeople to sell as slaves at the Laguna de Términos. They then proceed into Jamaica by the end of October to spend their ill-gotten gains.

AUGUST 10, 1678. In Europe, Louis XIV signs the Treaty of Nijmegen, marking an end to his hostilities with the Netherlands. By its terms, the French retain their wartime conquests of Tobago and Cayenne in Guiana.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1678. France and Spain sign a separate treaty at Nijmegen, marking an end to their European conflict; yet, unlike the peace with Holland, this document does not contain any reference to the Americas, so the fighting there will continue.

EARLY DECEMBER 1678. Two French ships and a pair of caïques arrive at Martinique under Commodore Forant, the 37-year-old Joseph Andrault, Marquis de Langeron, and Captain Paris. They have been sent to salvage the remains of Admiral d'Estrées's fleet from the Aves Islands, which they accomplish by recruiting another two ships and four island traders, then spending several months working the site. Eventually, 364 guns and 3,000 shot are recovered.

EARLY JULY 1679. D'Estrées returns into the West Indies from Brest ostensibly to demand prisoners from the Spanish American authorities at Cartagena and Havana, but actually to reestablish France's naval prestige throughout this theater. His 74-gun, 1,350-ton flagship Triomphant (ex-Constant) is accompanied by the 54-gun, 800-ton Bon of Jean Gabaret; the 46-gun, 600-ton Opiniâtre (ex-Galant) of the Comte de Sourdis; the 40-gun, 500-ton Faucon of the Chevalier de Nesmond; the 40-gun, 480-ton Tigre of Saint-Aubin d'Infreville; the 26-gun flûte or transport Tempête of De Flacourt and the 18-gun Mignon of De

Fort Royal as seen from the Carénage by Jean Barbot, while visiting in 1679 aboard the slaver Soleil d'Afrique. (British Library)

Fort de France

When the first French colonists landed on Martinique, they created the town of Saint Pierre on its northwestern shore in 1635. But the magnificent bay farther to its southeast, enclosed on three sides by hills and a peninsula, offered the best anchorage. Protected against storms, this harbor also had a stony, 100-foot-high headland jutting out from its northern bank. Beside it lay a shallow inlet, ideal for careening ships, which was soon known as the Carénage.

Gov. Jacques Dyel, Sieur du Parquet, erected a palisade around this promontory in 1638 and named it “Fort Royal.” But most island residents stayed clustered around the main settlement of Saint Pierre. Fort Royal remained undeveloped, until the English rear admiral Sir John Harman pulverized a French fleet anchored off Saint Pierre in July 1667. Realizing that Saint Pierre’s open roadstead was indefensible, planning accelerated to fortify Fort Royal. This project was boosted when a new governor general for the French Antilles, Jean-Charles de Baas-Castelmore, arrived a year and a half later.

He chose Martinique over Saint Kitts as his official headquarters, and his orders from Paris included a clause that one impregnable stronghold be erected on each island. De Baas decided that the original wooden stockade at Fort Royal should be strengthened in accordance with plans drawn up a few years earlier by the visiting royal engineer Blondel. De Baas moreover proposed elevating the tiny clutch of shacks and warehouses around the Carénage to the status of a city on October 3, 1669, and took up residence there. The royal minister Colbert approved these proposals on November 4, 1671, so that the governor general could begin issuing plots the next year.

Work had scarcely started in 1673 on the lowest circuit of stone ramparts around Fort Royal when Admiral de Ruyter’s Dutch fleet attacked in July. Fortunately, these unexpected obstacles checked the Dutch assault and saved the island. The construction of a few upper battlements of masonry did not commence until 1676 under the direction of the royal engineer Nicolas Payen. He modified Blondel’s plans and was encouraged by the vigorous new governor, Charles de Courbon, Comte de Blénac. Ten years later, the latter was able to write to the king: “I have made you a fort which provides security for all these islands.”

But its crowning stone citadel had yet to appear. When war erupted with Holland, England, and Spain in 1689, Martinique became hard-pressed. Blénac returned from Paris on February 5, 1692, with orders to complete Fort Royal and make it the island capital. Plantation owners assisted these efforts with their slaves, directed by the new royal engineer, Jean de Giou, Sieur de Caylus. Their labors were enough to discourage a direct assault when a huge English fleet under Rear Adm. Sir Francis Wheler attacked in April 1693. Despite numerous additions over the next seven decades, the fort was overcome by British invaders in February 1762. Expansion and improvements continued well into the 20th century.

Béthune; the 26-gun, 180-ton frigate Bouffonne and 10-gun, 75-ton frigate Moqueuse; bark Utile; plus the 10-gun, 400-ton transport Chameau. The arrival of this powerful squadron causes consternation throughout the Antilles, as it is believed its appearance portends another outbreak in Europe.

When d’Estrées appears off Jamaica on July 18, the English governor, Charles, Earl of Carlisle, orders its defenses manned, while Port Royal’s citizenry flee inland; but one of d’Estrées’s subordinates—the Comte d’Erveux, Knight of the Order of Malta—merely comes ashore to request permission to take on water and provisions at nearby Bluefields Bay, which is granted. The French squadron subsequently works its way through the Greater Antilles, piloted by the 31-year-old West Indian veteran Charles François d’Angennes, Marquis de Maintenon, before finally visiting Havana on October 18, then continuing out across the Atlantic from Matanzas for France.

IRREGULAR WARFARE (1679–1688)

Notwithstanding the cessation of hostilities in Europe, frictions persist in the New World—especially as French authorities in the West Indies continue to issue privateering commissions against Spanish America because of Madrid’s refusal to acknowledge the legitimacy of their existence.

FEBRUARY 11, 1679. The city of Santiago de Cuba is struck by a strong earthquake, and its defenses are heavily damaged, tempting the French corsair Pierre Bot to organize a disembarkation of buccaneers at nearby Sabana la Mar, which proves fruitless.

FEBRUARY 21, 1679. Repulse at Guanaja. An expedition under Grammont disembarks from three ships, two brigantines, and four lesser craft in La Gloria Bay near Guanaja along the northern coast of Cuba, advancing overland with 600 flibustiers against the town of Puerto Principe (modern Camagüey). The Spanish priest Francisco Garcerán chances to sight these raiders when they reach La Matanza, so carries a warning into Puerto Principe. Its inhabitants flee, allowing the invaders to enter unopposed to find its buildings mostly empty.

Some 600 Spanish militiamen meanwhile gather under alcalde mayor Benito de Agüero, challenging the buccaneers' retreat back toward the coast with their few captives. In a pitched battle on February 25 in the Cubitas Range, Grammont is compelled to extemporize a redoubt, suffering 70 killed before his Dutch-born colleague, Laurens de Graaf, can extricate his contingent, inflicting 67 Spanish fatalities.

Grammont regains the coast and takes 14 prominent women prisoners aboard his flotilla, whom the Spaniards ransom after 30 days.

LATE APRIL 1679. Grammont departs Petit Goâve (Haiti) for another cruise, although this time accompanied by only two or three vessels and 200 buccaneers at most. He will prowls off Havana until August.

JUNE 1679. The French buccaneer captains Bot and Bréhal, having split off from Grammont's formation near Havana, attack the Spanish salvors working the Los Mimbres wreck site of the galleon Nuestra Señora de las Maravillas on the east coast of Florida. Some 30 Spaniards are killed, including their leader, Martín de Melgar, and their two vessels are seized.

Bot and Bréhal then compel the native divers to continue working the wreck, making away with some 200,000 pieces of eight.

AUGUST 26, 1679. Santa Marta (Colombia) is surprised at dawn by buccaneer raiders and sacked.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1679. After sailing from Roatán Island with a mixed band of buccaneers, the English rovers Coxon, Bartholomew Sharpe, Cornelius Essex, and others capture a Spanish merchantman in the Bay of Honduras, smuggling its cargo of "500 chests of indigo, a great quantity of cacao, cochineal, [and] tortoise shell" into Jamaica next month for sale.

LATE DECEMBER 1679. Having disposed of his Honduran booty on Jamaica, Coxon convenes an illegal assemblage at its southeastern tip of Port Morant, which is attended by Essex and Sharpe, as well as the sloops of captains Robert Allison and Thomas Magott. They agreed to unite under Coxon for an assault against Spanish Portobelo. Authorization for this venture is very sketchy, the privateers holding a mixture of outdated French and English commissions, including "let-passes" from the new Jamaican governor Lord Carlisle simply to "go into the Bay of Honduras to cut logwood."

JANUARY 17, 1680. Coxon's buccaneer flotilla departs Port Morant (Jamaica) to attack Portobelo. Less than 20 miles out at sea, they meet the French brigantine of the flibustier Capt. Jean Rose, who also joins the expedition. They then struggle through bad weather to Fuerte Island, 90 miles south-southwest of Cartagena.

From there, Coxon sweeps the nearby San Bernardo or "Friends" Islands to obtain landing craft, returning three days later with "four piraguas and six very good large canoes." The formation continues toward Isla de Pinos, 130 miles east of Portobelo amid the Archipiélago de las Mulatas, although it is forced into Isla de Oro or "Golden Island" some miles away. Coxon takes 250 buccaneers into boats and rows westward along the coast, hoping to strike before the Spaniards can detect his presence. While advancing, he comes upon "a great ship riding at anchor," which proves to be that of the flibustier Capitaine Lassonde, who adds 80 Frenchmen to the boat parties. Shortly thereafter, the buccaneers slip ashore in the Gulf of San Blas, proceeding afoot down the Cascajal River Valley to avoid Spanish coastal watchers.

JANUARY 20, 1680. Manuel Lobo, newly appointed Portuguese governor of Rio de Janeiro and Knight of the Order of Christo, arrives at San Gabriel Island (Uruguay) with one cavalry and three infantry companies—a total of 200 soldiers—plus 100 laborers and 18 cannon aboard the 30-gun, 300-ton flagship Santa Veríssima of Capt. Antônio Fernandes Poderoso; the 14-gun, 250-ton vice-flagship of Manuel Carneiro da Costa; 10-gun, 200-ton vessel of Captain Mainardt; the 6-gun, 150-ton frigate Jesus, Maria, Joseph of naval lieutenant Feliciano Inácio da Silva; and a small supply boat. This expedition disembarks on the mainland opposite and, by February 4, begins erecting a stockaded fort called Colônia do Sacramento. The Spaniards across the River Plate in Buenos Aires consider this frontier outpost to be an infringement upon their territory.

FEBRUARY 6, 1680. Spanish piraguas steal into Mexico's Laguna de Términos under the alcalde ordinario or "town magistrate" Felipe de la Barreda y Villegas to strike against its English logwood cutters, who have been selling trees to outward-bound Jamaican vessels. De la Barreda manages to surprise some interlopers, returning into Campeche with a few prizes. Encouraged by this success, he leads a second expedition—consisting of a barco luengo, two piraguas, and 115 men—several weeks later, which nets a 24-gun English merchantman.

FEBRUARY 17, 1680. Having struggled overland for three days "without any food, and their feet cut with the rocks for want of shoes," Coxon's raiders are spotted by a native boy from a village three miles short of Portobelo, who sets off at a run to warn its Spanish inhabitants. The footsore buccaneers trot in pursuit, yet the Indian arrives a half hour before them and raises the alarm by "running down the street past the slaughterhouse," shouting: "To your arms, Christians, for the English are coming!"

The pirate vanguard under Allison nonetheless sweeps into Portobelo unopposed, as its few Spaniards have withdrawn inside Santiago de la Gloria Castle, leaving their dwellings and warehouses to be ransacked over the next two days. Coxon's raiders then retire 10 miles northeast to a coastal hamlet known as Bastimentos, entrenching themselves with a few prisoners on a cay a half-mile offshore, while Allison is sent in a boat to recall their anchored ships.

Three days later, several hundred Spanish militia-men arrive, having been hastened across the Isthmus

Logwood

Logwood is a dark red tropical tree found in the West Indies and Central America. For centuries prior to Columbus's arrival, natives used it to produce black, brown, or red dyes of great permanence. After the conquest of Mexico, the Spaniards were taught its fine qualities, so they continued harvesting the so-called palo de tinte or dyewood. Exports to Europe also became highly prized for tinting cloth, because—as the pirate chronicler Alexandre Olivier Exquemelin would later note—the dye did "not fade like ours."

Yet the greatest concentrations of logwood were found along torrid stretches of jungle shoreline, where few Spaniards chose to settle. In 1565, the royal alcalde mayor Diego de Quijada reported that there were such abundant stands along the coasts of "Yucatán and Tabasco and New Spain, that every year all the carracks of the world can be filled." Only small pockets were tapped, however. (More than a century later, Gov. Fernando Francisco de Escobedo informed the Crown that there were still not 1,300 Spaniards living in 1671 along the entire 1,000-mile coast of the Gulf of Mexico, the population being most concentrated around Campeche.)

As rival western European nations established outposts in the Caribbean to produce commercial crops such as sugar and tobacco, logwood came to be coveted as a secondary good. For example, the Amsterdam directors of the Dutch West India Company on July 7, 1654, instructed their representative on Curaçao "to promote the cutting of dyewood as much as possible," paying attention "that the young saplings are spared." English interest was roused as their rovers ventured out from Jamaica to raid Spanish America, discovering vast unclaimed coastal tracts where logwood grew wild.

By the early 1670s, poachers were living in the Bay of Campeche (Mexico's Laguna de Términos), the Bay of Honduras (modern Belize), and along the Mosquito Coast. They cut down logwood trees, waiting for a sail to appear over the horizon. If a paying customer, their boats were guided through the river maze to the felled trees for sale and loading. On the rare occasion that a Spanish patrol-vessel appeared, the loggers remained hidden by the jungle. Business proved good because a ton of logwood already cost £20 at Port Royal yet was worth 20 times as much in London. Masters outward bound from Jamaica therefore took the chance of visiting a logging camp to complete their cargoes with a valuable commodity at a very low price before proceeding out into the Atlantic for home.

Risks could be dire, as the Spaniards feared that these poaching settlements might evolve into full-fledged colonies; as a result, friction was common.

from Panama City. They begin firing upon the pirates from the beach but are unable to exact any vengeance before Coxon's vessels appear. He, Allison, and Sharpe subsequently impose a brief blockade on Portobelo, intercepting a barco luengo and a new 8-gun, 90-ton ship as they arrive from Cartagena, before distributing their booty and dispersing to Bocas del Toro "to make clean our ships, there being the best place to careen our ships, by reason there is good store of turtle and manatee and fish."

APRIL 12, 1680. Promoted to teniente de capitán general or "lieutenant military governor" of Campeche, de la Barreda prepares a third raid against the English in the Laguna de Términos, securing—at his own expense—half-ownership of his 24-gun prize, then supplementing it with two brigantines and six piraguas bearing 200 mulatto militiamen from Mérida de Yucatán, 70 regulars, and 16 gunners from Campeche's garrison, plus 240 volunteers. His officers include the corsair captains Pedro de Castro and Juan Corso.

This expedition bursts into the Laguna de Términos by April 17, seizing more than 38 craft along with 163 baymen (among them, George Rivers; see "March 7, 1677" entry in "Third Anglo-Dutch War and Franco-Spanish War") while releasing numerous Spanish hostages and slaves. De la Barreda then learns of 240 buccaneers who have departed in 7 vessels to waylay the annual cocoa harvest in Tabasco, so he sends a detachment in pursuit. His prisoners and prizes are carried back into Campeche, but de la Barreda does not arrive. Ironically, he becomes separated from his expedition and is captured by English stragglers, conveyed to London, and allegedly detained in the Tower before eventually being released and reaching Madrid in January 1682.

The Jamaicans meanwhile raise strong objections to his Laguna incursions, feeling that they violate the truce prevailing in the Caribbean.

APRIL 15, 1680. First Pacific Incursions. At 6:00 a.m. this Monday morning, 332 buccaneers disembark on the northeastern coast of Panama from Golden Island after having hidden their ships in a small cove. Coxon, Allison, Sharpe, Edmund Cooke, Peter Harris (the Elder), and Richard Sawkins have combined forces and secured native guides to march across the Isthmus and raid the Spaniards in a more vulnerable theater.

Ten days later, they come upon the Spanish mining camp of Santa María el Real at the confluence of the Chucunaque and Tuira rivers. Sawkins and two or three buccaneers rush its palisades at dawn, working their way inside and admitting the main force. A massacre ensues, and 70 of its 200 Spanish residents are killed outright; the survivors are later murdered by local Indians. The buccaneers meanwhile press on into the Pacific, coasting westward in river boats, until one night they capture an anchored Spanish bark, of which Sharpe assumes command with 135 men. The next night, Harris comes upon a second Spanish bark and seizes it, and now the privateers have a small flotilla, with which they bear down upon the newly relocated Panama City.

First wave of buccaneer incursions into the Pacific.

The Spaniards feverishly try completing the unfinished stone defenses with earthen ramparts, while sending out a scratch naval force to offer battle. The raiders overwhelm that force in a three-hour fight, during which Harris receives a mortal wound.

LATE APRIL 1680. In South Carolina the short-lived “Westo War” commences when English traders and slave catchers ally themselves with the Savannah Indians—a migrating group of Shawnee—to defeat the bellicose “Westo” tribe farther inland (most likely Ricahericans, expelled from Virginia in 1656). Three years later, not 50 of the latter remain.

MAY 5, 1680. After the buccaneers’ victory off Panama, Coxon is voted out as admiral and retraces his steps across the Isthmus to Golden Island with 70 loyal hands. Sawkins becomes chief commander aboard the captured Santísima Trinidad, while Cooke commands an 80-ton bark and Sharpe a slightly smaller one. Next day, a large ship is intercepted arriving from Lima, which becomes Sharpe’s new command. The flotilla then roams west past Coiba Island, where Sawkins goes aboard Cooke’s bark with 60 men two days later to attempt a landing at Remedios (then called Pueblo Nuevo). During this disembarkation, he is killed, and Cooke brings off the survivors.

Upon leaving this river mouth on May 11 (May 1, 1680 [O.S.]), the pirates seize a Spanish bark, which Cooke transfers into and renames Mayflower. Rejoining the main body, he finds Sawkins’s death has created an upheaval; 60 of Sawkins’s followers have abandoned the enterprise altogether to sail away in Cooke’s former bark for the Caribbean. Sharpe is now promoted commander aboard the Trinidad, while Cooke is turned out of Mayflower by his crew.

EARLY JUNE 1680. Sharpe’s 186 buccaneers lay in a southeasterly course from Coiba Island, reaching Gorgona Island more than a month later to replenish their supplies.

JUNE 26, 1680. This night, the French flibustier chieftain Grammont mounts an exceptionally daring assault against La Guaira. Slipping ashore with only 47 followers, he infiltrates the city, whose citizens awaken to find it occupied and the garrison commander and 150 soldiers seized without a struggle. Grammont and his flibustiers quickly fall to looting before any relief force can arrive from nearby Caracas. A small Spanish company under Capt. Juan de Laya Mújica escapes capture, marching around to Peñón de Maiquetía just outside the port to rally the outlying defenders.

When word of this freebooter attack reaches Caracas that same morning, there is such widespread concern that mule trains immediately begin traveling inland with the royal treasure and other valuables. Meanwhile, every able-bodied militiaman falls in and sets off toward La Guaira under Gov. Francisco de Alberrós. Before they can arrive, Captain de Laya launches his own local counterattack, encouraged by the small number of flibustiers visible in daylight. Grammont is forced to make a fighting retreat back to his beached boats, during which nine buccaneers are killed and several others wounded—including the commander himself who is slashed across the neck with a machete.

Although repelled, this raid produces plentiful booty and hostages for the flibustiers, as well as shaking Spanish morale. Grammont’s stock soars among the Brethren of the Coast, although being somewhat diminished when he subsequently loses most of his captives and profits in a shipwreck off Petit Goâve during a hurricane. (The individual rovers who gathered every year from ports along the north coast of Hispaniola and throughout the West Indies, choosing leaders and Spanish targets by popular acclaim, sometimes referred to themselves as the Frères de la Côte or “Brethren of the Coast.”)

AUGUST 7, 1680. Colônia do Sacramento. After massing 480 Argentine troops and 3,000 native auxiliaries around the newly installed Portuguese outpost of Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay; see “January 20, 1680” entry), maestre de campo Antonio de Vera Mújica launches a surprise attack at 2:00 a.m. The attackers succeed in overrunning this outnumbered garrison after four hours of fighting, during which 116 defenders die and the rest are captured, compared to 34 dead and 96 wounded among the Hispano-Indian ranks.

Some time after these captives have been transported into Buenos Aires, a belated Portuguese relief force of 150 soldiers appears offshore on September 20 aboard the ship of Capt. João Gomes de Sousa. By this time, Colônia do Sacramento has already been razed, and the imprisoned Governor Lobo eventually dies of disease on January 7, 1683.

AUGUST 9, 1680. Pueblo Revolt. In Santa Fe (New Mexico), Gov. Antonio de Otermín receives word from three separate village priests that a native uprising has been ordained by the Taos medicine man Popé for Tuesday, August 13. This date, however, proves to be a deliberately planted falsehood, because Popé's attacks actually begin at dawn of Sunday, August 11, when a panic-stricken soldier rides into Santa Fe with word that Indians at nearby Tesuque have donned their war paint, killed their priest and a trader, then marched to join the San Juan natives.

De Otermín musters his 50-man garrison, sends out reconnaissance patrols, and distributes arms to every one of Santa Fe's 1,000 able-bodied residents. Over the next three days, a steady stream of reports comes in of Spanish ranchers found dead in their fields and major settlements exterminated. Finally, news arrives on Wednesday, August 14, of 500 warriors advancing upon Santa Fe, small groups being seen the next day moving through its cornfields. Soon, they infiltrate the abandoned dwellings along the city's outskirts, hurling insults from the rooftops.

The governor attempts to parley, but this is rebuffed, so he leads a dawn sally on August 16, which drives the Indians back after a furious, day-long fight. The besiegers are then joined by Popé himself, who brings in a large contingent from San Juan, Taos, and Picuries at nightfall. The rebel chieftain allows his army's strength to build up over the next two days, launching an all-out assault with 2,500 natives at sunrise of August 19. By midday, they have driven the Spaniards back into the governor's palace, away from their water supply. Next day, the defenders fight desperately to regain this ground, watching helplessly as Santa Fe burns to the ground that night.

At dawn of August 21, de Otermín leads a counterattack that pushes Popé's army out of the smoldering ruins, leaving behind 300 dead Indians and 47 prisoners. The Spanish then avail themselves of this respite to quickly evacuate Santa Fe (after hanging their captives), hoping to find sanctuary farther south. They are not safe until they gain El Paso (Texas), their losses reaching 400 people—including 21 of 33 Franciscan friars.

NOVEMBER 3, 1680. Sharpe's buccaneers attempt a landing at Ilo (Peru), then Arica on the next day, being foiled on both occasions by high seas. Finally, on November 6, he gets 48 men ashore by canoe at Ilo, who easily brush aside the 60 militia riders and infantrymen sent to challenge them, thus obtaining fresh water and provisions. From the occupied town, Sharpe next probes inland and discovers a small sugar mill, which the locals beg him to spare in exchange for 80 cattle. Sharpe agrees, yet five days later learns that the Spaniards have used this interval to gather 300 riders from the outlying district to drive him and his forces out. He is obliged to retire to his ships the next day, first setting fire to the sugar works.

DECEMBER 13, 1680. Some 35 of Sharpe's freebooters land at Coquimbo (Chile), only to be confronted by 150 Spaniards. The buccaneer commander rushes reinforcements ashore to disperse the Spanish, afterward overrunning the inland town of La Serena, 10 miles farther to the north. Following four days of wanton pillage, the town's residents offer to raise 95,000 pesos for La Serena's buildings to be left intact once the raiders withdraw toward the coast. Sharpe agrees, yet finds that this truce was used by the locals to marshal greater strength. He and his men have to fight hard simply to regain the sea, furthermore discovering that an attempt has been made to destroy their anchored ships during their absence when an Indian swam out one night with a combustible raft.

Sharpe next proceeds to the Juan Fernández Islands, intending to restock the Trinidad so as to round the Strait of Magellan and regain the West Indies. His buccaneers, however, wish to continue roving in the Pacific, so early in January 1681 they vote him out of office, replacing Sharpe with John Watling.

DECEMBER 30, 1680. Four Dutch frigates—with the 32-gun Kurprinz or “Prince Elector” as flagship—and a 2-gun fireship arrive at Port Royal (Jamaica) escorting three small Spanish prizes. Commo. Cornelis Reers bears a commission from Friedrich Wilhelm, Elector of Brandenburg, authorizing his 500-man squadron to conduct reprisals in the West Indies for Madrid’s unpaid war debts. After remaining at anchor until early February 1681, Reers sets sail on another sweep, then returns to Europe by May.

FEBRUARY 8, 1681. This night, Watling leads 90 buccaneers ashore to make another attempt against Arica (Chile). The raiders draw near at 8:00 Sunday morning, February 9; Watling’s hope is to subdue the town with one column, while Sharpe directs another—armed with grenades—in storming its fortress. The Spaniards are caught sleeping, so Arica is easily penetrated, although its fort continues to resist. Despite the buccaneers’ original success, however, the town and its outlying district simply prove to be too big, 600–700 militiamen rallying under maestre de campo Gaspar de Oviedo. After recuperating from their initial shock, the Spaniards press the invaders back.

After four hours of intense fighting, Watling is killed; only 47 buccaneers stagger back aboard ship, having inflicted 24 dead and 60 injured among the Spanish. The buccaneer wounded, all of whom have been left behind in a ransacked church, are slaughtered by the victors (except for two surgeons), while Watling’s head is stuck upon a pole and paraded through the streets of Arica.

The decimated buccaneers restore Sharpe as their commander, although after touching at Huasco and Ilo for fresh supplies in March (where they steal 120 sheep and 80 goats), another faction of 50 buccaneers parts company to recross the Isthmus of Panama under John Cooke. Sharpe’s remaining 70 hands aboard the Trinidad at last see their luck change, capturing two valuable prizes in July and August.

JUNE 28, 1681. A band of buccaneers penetrates the Matina Valley (Costa Rica), sacking numerous plantations and capturing civilians, until they are expelled by Governor Sáenz Vázquez of Cartago.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1681. Fort Royal is officially declared the capital of Martinique because of its recently completed stone battlements. Less than nine years later, it will also become the regional capital of France’s Lesser Antilles.

NOVEMBER 1681. Sharpe attempts to sail out of the Pacific via the Strait of Magellan but, failing to find its entrance in heavy weather, continues as far south as 58° latitude before veering east, thus becoming the first Englishman to round Cape Horn from this direction. Skillfully navigating up the Atlantic out of sight of land, he makes landfall at Barbados on February 7, 1682, proceeding next to Saint Thomas in the Danish Virgin Islands to dispose of the Trinidad.

LATE DECEMBER 1681. A 46-man Spanish coast-guard piragua boards a foreign interloper off the Laguna de Términos (Mexico), only to be repelled.

FEBRUARY 10, 1682. The Spanish ship Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria, bound from St. Augustine (Florida) to Veracruz for the annual subsidy, runs aground at Las Playuelas in the Florida Keys. Found by five French corsair vessels, including those of the buccaneer chieftains Grammont and de Graaf, the vessel is captured and torched.

EARLY MAY 1682. In Virginia, the “Plant Cutter riots” erupt, requiring Dep. Gov. Sir Henry Chicheley to call out the militia. Frustrated by depressed tobacco prices—which the local assembly cannot address because of the prolonged absence in England of Gov. Thomas, Lord Culpeper—farmers in the counties of Gloucester, Middlesex, and New Kent begin destroying some of their own and other crops so as to drive up prices. Chicheley swiftly arrests a number of ringleaders, eventually executing two.

JULY 1682. The 240-ton frigate Princesa of Spain’s West Indian squadron or Armada de Barlovento stands

Laurens de Graaf

Little is known about the early life and career of Laurens Cornelis Boudewijn de Graaf. Various records confirm that he was born in the Dutch seaport of Dordrecht, often abbreviated as “Dor’t” or “Dort,” possibly in 1653. By the age of 21, he had moved to Santa Cruz de Tenerife. In 1674, he married Francisca Petronila de Guzmán. According to Raynald Laprise, de Graaf also began making voyages to the West Indies aboard the 30-gun, 300-man local merchantman San Juan Bautista, San Antonio de Padua y San Cayetano of Juan Rico de Moya.

But when the San Juan Bautista reached Havana on August 13, 1676, Rico de Moya and his first mate were arrested for carrying contraband, and the ship was impounded. De Graaf, as a skilled coxswain and gunner, was pressed aboard another ship. Soon afterward, he fell into buccaneer hands and joined their ranks. By the spring of 1682, Acting Gov. Sir Henry Morgan of Jamaica was describing de Graaf as “a great and mischievous pirate.” In fact, Morgan even warned Capt. Peter Heywood, when he departed on patrol with the frigate HMS Norwich, “to look out for one Laurence . . . who commands a ship of 28 guns and has 200 men on board.” As an added precaution, Morgan reinforced the Royal Navy warship with 40 extra soldiers from the Port Royal garrison.

But de Graaf’s target was the armada frigate Princesa, which he surprised off Puerto Rico in July 1682. While disposing of his booty, he also took out a privateering license from Gov. Jacques Nepveu, Sieur de Pouançay of Saint Domingue. This official wrote to Paris that de Graaf had been roving for the past five or six years, “never having wanted to take out a commission from anyone” nor “put into the port of any nation.” His rise as a pirate, the governor added, had occurred as follows: “From a small bark, he took a small ship; from this a bigger one, until at last there came into his power one of 24 to 28 guns.” This was the Tigre, wrested from the armada off the Spanish Main in the autumn of 1679.

A brilliant seaman and charismatic leader of the Brethren of the Coast, de Graaf remained active for the next two decades. At the height of his powers, he was described as tall, blonde, and handsome, with a spiked Spanish-style moustache “which suited him very well.” It was also noted:

He always carries violins and trumpets aboard with which to entertain himself and amuse others, who derive pleasure from this. He is further distinguished amongst filibusters by his courtesy and good taste. Overall he has won such fame that when it is known he has arrived at some place, many come from all around to see with their own eyes whether “Lorenzo” is made like other men.

into the Mona Passage out of the northwest, bound from Havana under Capt. Manuel Delgado to deliver 120,000 pesos in Peruvian silver as situados or “allocated payrolls” for the Puerto Rico and Santo Domingo garrisons. Its decks cluttered in anticipation of making landfall at Aguada, the Princesa is surprised by the Tigre of the buccaneer chieftain Laurens de Graaf, 50 of its 250-man Spanish crew being killed or wounded in the ensuing battle. The 140 rovers (mostly French boucaniers) repair to Samaná Bay with their prize, releasing the Spanish prisoners to sail toward Cuba aboard a pink, while retaining the Princesa as de Graaf’s new flagship.

AUGUST 1682. The French buccaneer Capt. Jean Foccard raids Tampico (Mexico), seizing 30 Spanish captives and slaughtering a large number of cattle before departing.

NOVEMBER 1682. Outraged by the loss of their payrolls (see “July 1682” entry), the Spaniards of Santo Domingo retaliate by expropriating a consignment of slaves brought peaceably into their harbor by Nikolaas van Hoorn, another Dutch adventurer with French ties. Furious, van Hoorn escapes three months later, with only 20 crewmen left aboard his ship Sint Nicolaas.

FEBRUARY 1683. The Dutch slaver van Hoorn obtains a letter of reprisal from Jacques Nepveu, Sieur de Pouançay and governor of French Saint Domingue (Haiti), to exact vengeance for the expropriation of his slaves by the Spaniards. To recruit freebooters for this venture, van Hoorn is put in touch with the veteran flibustier Grammont, who comes aboard the Sint Nicolaas with 300 men. The rovers then depart Petit Goâve, steering toward Central America to find de Graaf and his Dutch confederate Michiel Andrieszoon, who are reputedly lying there with two ships, a bark, a sloop, and 500 men.

In the Bay of Honduras, two large Spanish merchantmen—the Nuestra Señora de Consolación and the Nuestra Señora de Regla—are seized at anchor, while a huge pirate gathering is then celebrated at Roatán on April 7 to discuss a joint assault against Veracruz. De Graaf and his followers agree, the privateer fleet shifting to nearby Guanaja Island for further reinforcements, then scurrying north around Yucatán before word of their design can reach Spanish ears. De Graaf leads the way in the captured Regla, accompanied by Dutch-born Jan Willems in another Spanish prize, while the remaining three corsair ships and eight sloops trail astern out of sight.

MARCH 1683. The French flibustier Captain Bréhal, seconded by the English mercenaries John Markham of New York, Thomas Paine, and Conway Wooley—plus Dutch-born Jan Corneliszoon, also of New York—set sail from the Bahamas to raid St. Augustine. They land flying French colors, only to find its garrison forewarned; they therefore withdraw after releasing some Spanish captives that they have brought and after looting the countryside.

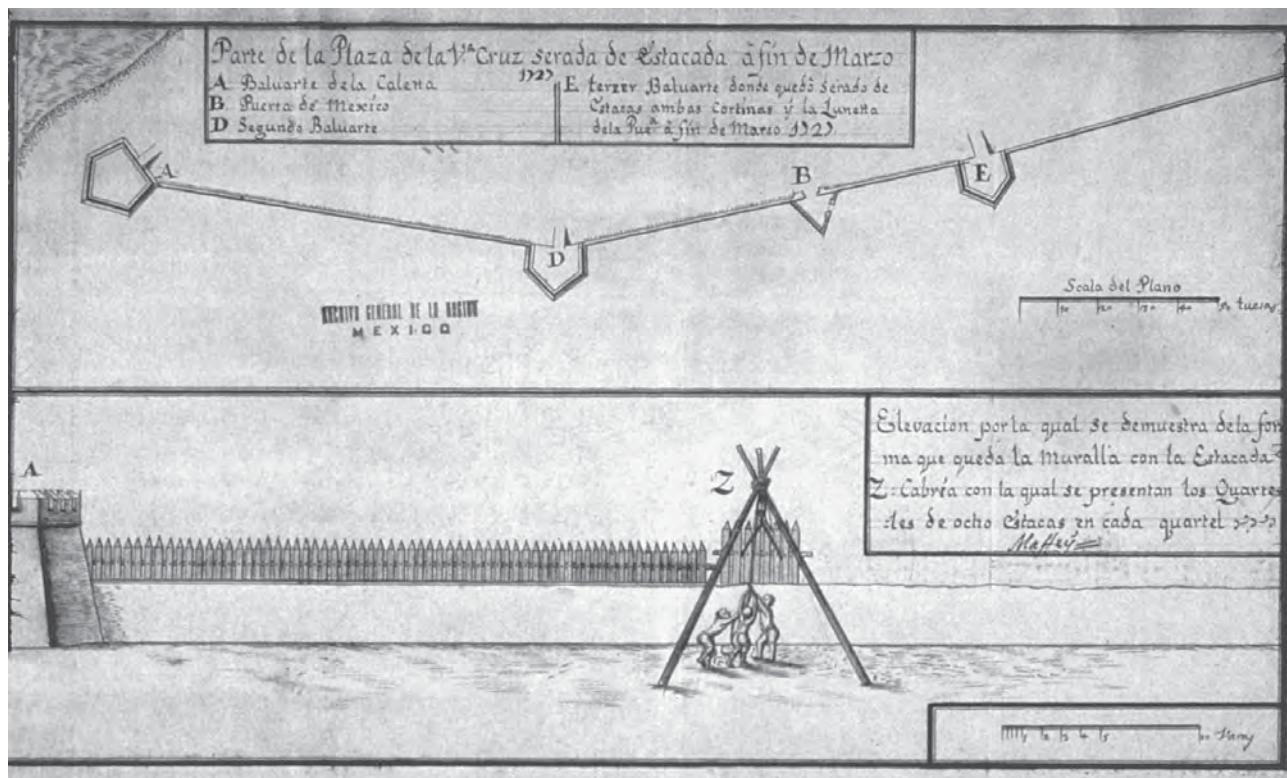

MAY 1683. The Cuban corsair captains Gaspar de Acosta and Tomás Uraburru lead 200 men from Havana toward the Bahamas, attacking its capital of Charles Town (modern New Providence) with a single piragua and the galliot Nuestra Señora del Rosario.

MAY 17, 1683. Sack of Veracruz. This afternoon, de Graaf and Willems approach this Mexican port aboard two Spanish prizes, breaking off after closing within 10 miles and determining that the annual plate fleet has not yet arrived. Veracruz's lookouts assume that these two sails are Spanish merchantmen fearful of chancing its shoals after dark, so they raise no alarm. That night, de Graaf pilots his two vessels close inshore and lands 200 volunteers. While he leads them on a reconnaissance of the sleeping city, his colleagues Grammont and van Hoorn bring another 600 buccaneers ashore farther away and stealthily march to join him. Veracruz has 6,000 inhabitants, of whom 300 are regular troops and another 400 civilian militiamen; there are an additional 300 soldiers on its outlying island—the fortress of San Juan de Ulúa. But Veracruz's landward palisades are low and neglected, with sand dunes drifted up against them, so the pirates are able to steal over them and into the city.

At dawn of May 18, the pirates attack, firing indiscriminately so as to stampede the unprepared Spanish defenders. Within a half hour, Veracruz is theirs, several thousand half-dressed captives being herded into its principal church. The city is ransacked over the next four days, and numerous prisoners are tortured to reveal their treasures. De Graaf and Grammont subsequently drive the bulk of their captives down the coast and transfer two miles offshore to Sacrificios Island, beyond easy rescue. Here the raiders begin loading their booty while waiting for payment of a final ransom out of Mexico's interior.

Shortly after it is received, the fibustiers herd 1,500 blacks and mulattos aboard as slaves, then weigh anchor. They encounter the annual plate fleet just as they are standing out from the coast, but its admiral, Diego Fernández de Zaldívar, defers combat, allowing the raiders to escape unmolested. The buccaneers pause at Coatzacoalcos to take on water before shouldering their way around Yucatán to Isla Mujeres, where they divide their spoils by late June and disperse.

AUGUST 4, 1683. Adm. Andrés de Ochoa y Zárate, commander of Spain's West Indian squadron or Armada de Barlovento, touches at Little Cayman with his 650-ton flagship Santo Cristo de Burgos; the 550-ton vice-flag Nuestra Señora de la Concepción; the 450-ton San José, the Santa Rosa María y San Pedro de Alcántara; and the 350-ton Nuestra Señora de la Soledad. There, they seize the tiny French privateer Prophète Daniel of Antoine Bernard and the Dauphin of Pierre d'Orange, thus learning of the massive assault upon Veracruz. The Spanish prize Nuestra Señora de Regla is also recuperated, despite having been set ablaze by its captors with 90 slaves on board (who extinguish its flames). Ochoa arrives at Veracruz by August 22 to find it in ruins, and a few of his pirate captives are executed on November 22.

AUGUST 8, 1683. At 3:00 p.m., Royal Navy captain Charles Carlile passes before Saint Thomas (then Danish; now Charlotte Amalie in the present U.S. Virgin Islands) with HMS Francis, spying a large ship lying inside masquerading as an English man-of-war. Carlile's pilot confirms this to be Jean Hamlin's Trompeuse, a 32-gun pirate frigate. The Francis therefore stands into port, but both the pirate ship and the batteries open fire, obliging the Royal Navy frigate to retreat. Carlile sends a letter ashore requesting cooperation from the Danish governor Adolf Esmit, but none is forthcoming.

The English captain therefore takes the Francis's pinnace and another boat into the harbor after nightfall of August 9, his 14 men exchanging shots with the Trompeuse's anchor watch (most of Hamlin's pirates having already quit his service), who flee ashore, leaving the Royal Navy boarders to set fire to the frigate before withdrawing. The Trompeuse blows up, also kindling Bartholomew Sharpe's Santísima Trinidad—anchored nearby after being abandoned the previous year upon his return from the South Seas (see "November 1681" entry)—which burns to the waterline.

With both wrecks left smoldering, the Francis tacks about a league eastward next morning before sighting a grounded 300-ton Flemish vessel full of pirate stores. Carlile's men cut down its masts and set it ablaze, then return to blockade Saint Thomas. When the weather changes a few days later, Carlile is forced to retire into Nevis.

LATE NOVEMBER 1683. The buccaneer chieftain de Graaf and his cohorts Michiel Andrieszoon, Jan Willems, François Le Sage, and several other commanders arrive near Cartagena to prey upon its coastal traffic. When Gov. Juan de Pando Estrada learns that these pirates are before his harbor, he commandeers the private slavers San Francisco of 40 guns, Paz of 34, and a 28-gun galliot to chase them away. This trio exits on December 23, manned by 800 soldiers and sailors under the 26-year-old naval captain Andrés de Pez y Malzárraga.

The seven smaller pirate craft do not flee but instead swarm all around the Spanish vessels. In the confusion, the San Francisco runs aground, the Paz surrenders after four hours, and Willems takes the galliot. Ninety Spaniards are killed as opposed to 20 pirates. De Graaf refloats the San Francisco and claims it as his new flagship, renaming it Fortune (later Nep-tune), Andrieszoon receives the Paz, calling it Mutine, while Willems is given de Graaf's old Princesa. On December 25, the triumphant buccaneers deposit their prisoners ashore, along with a message thanking Governor de Pando for the Christmas presents. De Graaf subsequently blockades the port

Andrés de Pez

Andrés de Pez y Malzárraga was born in Cadiz and baptized in its cathedral on July 10, 1657. His father was a naval officer of Basque origin. At the age of 16, Andrés was enrolled in the Royal Spanish Marines. In a naval battle off Palermo on June 2, 1676, he saw his brother and father both slain by French cannon fire, starting a lifelong enmity.

Five years later, de Pez was assigned to a trio of warships bound across the Atlantic to reinforce the Armada de Barlovento in the West Indies. He showed promise as a cartographer and navigator so, by the summer of 1683, was promoted to captain of its 8-gun auxiliary Jesús, María y José (alias Sevillano). When Adm. Andrés de Ochoa sent the frigate Santo Cristo de San Román from Havana to strengthen Panama's northern defenses, de Pez's Sevillano sailed in company.

De Pez endured a humiliating defeat at the hands of Laurens de Graaf outside of Cartagena that same Christmas. He nonetheless retained command of the Sevillano, only to be bested again by the Dutch corsair off Alacrán Reef in September 1685. De Pez was, at least, one of the few armada officers absolved of that debacle. The Sevillano sank at anchor during a norther at Veracruz next year. As a result, de Pez was given the Santo Cristo de San Román in June 1687 to go in search of de La Salle's new French colony on the Gulf coast.

Repeated tries failed to find the outpost. Still, de Pez suggested that a Spanish colony be established at Pensacola to preempt any future incursions. He traveled to Spain in 1689 with this proposal and returned three years later aboard the plate fleet. The next summer, he conducted a survey of Pensacola Bay and made a second trip to Spain to secure permission for large-scale occupation. He was back by September 1695, unable to mount an effort because of the ongoing war against France. However, de Pez did bear a new commission as capitán general or commanding admiral of the Armada de Barlovento.

He suffered an embarrassing setback on his first sortie in the winter of 1696–1697, losing his vice-flagship Maracaibo. After a lengthy Caribbean patrol in 1698–1699, he returned into Veracruz to be jailed and deported to Spain to stand trial for cowardice and neglect of duty in the loss of the Maracaibo. Cleared at his trial in 1701, he returned to command the armada. He was also entrusted with the defense of Veracruz and made several transatlantic crossings with the king's bullion, which won him great distinction. He ended the war by serving at the siege of Barcelona from 1712 to 1714.

After hostilities ceased, de Pez was appointed to Spain's Supreme War Council in August 1715. A year and a half later, he became gobernador of the Council of Indies and continued to press for measures to contain the French colony of Louisiana. He was made secretary of state and navy in 1721 and died two years later in Madrid, where a street still bears his name.

for another three weeks before standing away northwest toward Roatán and Saint Domingue (Haiti).

JANUARY 19, 1684 (O.S.). Destruction of New Providence. The Cuban corsair Juan de Larco stealthily approaches New Providence (Bahamas) with a pair of barcos luengo bearing 200 men. He has earlier captured a woodcutting sloop off Andros Island and is compelling its captain, William Bell, to pilot the Spaniards, entering via the eastern channel. At daybreak, de Larco disembarks 150 men a half mile outside Charles Town (modern Nassau), sending the remainder to board six vessels in its harbor.

Former governor Robert Clarke is wounded and captured while leading an English counterattack, while his successor, Robert Lilburne, flees the Wheel of Fortune Inn directly into the jungle along with most other residents. The 10-gun New England frigate Good Intent of Capt. William Warren and another vessel flee across the bar, leaving the Spaniards to pillage the remaining four, in the process killing three sailors. The attackers then ransack the town, loading their plunder aboard their largest prize, while torching the remainder before sailing away that same evening.

De Larco hastens to northern Eleuthera, visiting a like treatment upon its largest English settlement before returning to Charles Town a short while later to complete his work. This time, most of its buildings are burned, and the Bahamas are left largely denuded. Some 200 surviving colonists subsequently seek refuge on Jamaica, while another 50 from northern Eleuthera temporarily resettle in Casco (Maine), leaving the Bahamas devoid of Englishmen until 1686.

EARLY FEBRUARY 1684. Pacific Incursions (Second Wave). The English renegade John Cooke's 36-gun, 70-man Bachelor's Delight rounds Cape Horn, entering the South Pacific a month later to inaugurate a new round of buccaneer depredations in these waters. On March 19, he pursues a sail near Valdivia (Chile), which proves to be yet another interloper: the ship Nicholas of London, commanded by John Eaton. Although supposedly intended for a trading mission, Eaton's expedition has quickly resorted to plundering, having already sown a swathe of destruction down the Brazilian coast plus raiding the River Plate and capturing a Portuguese prize (which was lost in a storm). At the entrance to the strait, Eaton also encountered the 16-gun Cygnets of Charles Swan, likewise out of London and bent upon having commerce with South America. Both ships rounded the Horn in company but became separated by bad weather.

The piratical Cooke and dishonest Eaton decide to combine forces, repairing to the Juan Fernández Islands for fresh supplies before heading north on April 8 in hopes of surprising the Peruvian coastal traffic. Yet when they seize a vessel on May 3 bearing timber from Guayaquil to Lima, they learn that their presence is already known: the Cygnets having earlier entered Valdivia to trade, where Swan warned the Spaniards about other more hostile Englishmen off the coast. Valdivia's authorities have nonetheless closed their port to Swan, killing two of his men and capturing several others.

Withdrawing to the Lobos de Afuera Islands on May 9 to careen and revise their plans, Cooke and Eaton can only muster 108 men between them. They overhaul three sails that they sight the next day, which prove to be Spanish supply ships bearing flour and provisions for Panama. The buccaneers divert the supply ships to the remote Galápagos Islands on May 31, unloading them as a reserve supply.

FEBRUARY 24, 1684. During the absence at Belém (Brazil) of Gov. Francisco de Sá de Meneses of Maranhão, simmering dissatisfaction in his district erupts into open revolt at São Luís, led by the brothers Manuel and Tomás Beckman, as well as Jorge Sampaio. Wealthy plantation owners, these dissidents are unhappy with Lisbon's recent restrictions upon the use of native slave labor, as well as the trade monopoly granted to the Companhia Geral do Estado in 1682. The Capitão-Mor or Capt. Gen. Baltazar Fernandes is therefore detained, company warehouses are ransacked, and the Jesuit Order—defenders of native rights—are expelled. Tomás Beckman sails to Lisbon to lay their complaints before the Crown but is arrested upon his arrival. A small military counterexpedition comes out from Portugal under the new governor designate, Gomes Freire de Andrade, who disembarks unopposed at São Luís. Manuel Beckman and Jorge Sampaio are caught shortly thereafter and executed on November 2.

SPRING 1684. In Europe, Spain declares war against France, both in retaliation for Louis XIV's continual pressure in the Spanish Netherlands as well as for the buccaneering descent upon Veracruz. Madrid's power is by now so eroded, however, that it is powerless to implement any significant offensives, while Louis has no interest in fighting the Spaniards at this time. Therefore, the conflict is ended—along with other European tensions—by the signing in August of the 20-year truce of Ratisbonne or Regensburg.

MAY 30, 1684. Bearing a privateering commission from the French governor of Saint Croix, the rover Jean Bernanos of Saint Domingue seizes the Spanish fort of San Francisco, which guards the approaches to Santo Tomé de Guayana on the Orinoco River (Venezuela), with his 6-gun, 60-man flagship; four other vessels; plus a party of Carib auxiliaries. Born 36 years earlier in Metz, Bernanos served as a cavalry officer in France before emigrating to Saint Domingue. He will hold Fort San Francisco until August, then will depart to prowl the islands of Margarita and Trinidad before eventually regaining Saint Domingue.

JUNE 12, 1684. The English buccaneers Cooke and Eaton proceed northward for New Spain, hoping news of their Pacific depredations has not yet penetrated that far; but as they approach the Gulf of Nicoya in Costa Rica to forage for beef, Cooke dies, being succeeded in command of the Bachelor's Delight by his first mate Edward Davis, who reverses course.

Meanwhile, Swan also reaches this gulf, where on August 3 he meets a small party of West Indian freebooters under Peter Harris (nephew to Coxon's former confederate; see "April 15, 1680" entry), who has sortied from Jamaica on a straightforward raid, crossing the Isthmus of Panama via his uncle's old route and sacking Santa María el Real before gaining the Pacific Ocean. There he has defeated a Spanish flotilla off Panama's Pearl Islands. Swan's disgruntled crew, tired of his attempts to establish trade with South American contacts, insists upon joining Harris's buccaneers to rove on the account. The luckless merchant captain is constrained to accede, insisting that the Cygnets' owners receive a full share in any prize money. Both commanders thereupon steer southward.

AUTUMN 1684. Some 100 Scottish Covenanters under Henry Erskine, Lord Cardross, arrive at Port Royal (South Carolina) aboard the Carolina Merchant to escape persecution in Britain. This particular region has been depopulated of Spanish natives due to cross-border raids by Indians, instigated by the English located farther north at Charles Town. The Scots institute a similar policy—thus antagonizing the Spaniards at St. Augustine—while also quarrelling with their English neighbors over trade matters.

EARLY OCTOBER 1684. Swan and Harris reach Isla de la Plata (Ecuador), encountering Davis's Bachelor's Delight and Eaton's Nicholas. Together, they muster nearly 200 men and sail for the South American mainland to mount an attack.

NOVEMBER 3, 1684. This morning, Davis, Eaton, Harris, and Swan assault Paita (Peru), and although their landing force overruns the town with little difficulty, the raiders find scant booty among its buildings before putting them to the torch. The Lobos de Afuera Islands are visited next, after which a second abortive raid ensues against Guayaquil in early December, being foiled when their captive Indian guide escapes as they are marching overland to surprise that city. A few small Spanish vessels are also intercepted, but Davis and company feel their strength insufficient for any greater enterprise, so they veer north toward Panama in hopes of dispatching messages back across its Isthmus and persuading other buccaneers to join them.

JANUARY 8, 1685. Davis's buccaneers intercept the 90-ton Santa Rosa before repairing to Panama's Pearl Islands to careen and await reinforcements. On February 14, 200 French flibustiers and 80 English buccaneers reach them in canoes under captains François Grognet (alias "Chasse-marée") and Lescuyer. Davis offers the Santa Rosa to the flibustiers, while the English buccaneers are incorporated into his own Bachelor's Delight and Swan's Cygnat. Grognet, in turn, presents the English commanders with blank privateering commissions from the French governor of Saint Domingue (Haiti) and informs them that more freebooters are on their way across the Isthmus. A party is sent to meet them in the Gulf of San Miguel.

On March 3, this search party meets up with Capt. Francis Townley and 180 more men (mostly English) sailing two captured Spanish barks. A few days later, another bark bearing about a dozen Englishmen enters the Gulf of Panama from the west, having become separated from yet another interloper—Capt. William Knight—off the coast of New Spain.

APRIL 11, 1685. The French flibustier captains Jean Rose, Pierre le Picard, and Mathurin Desmarais join the buccaneer rendezvous off Isla del Rey (Pearl Islands) with 264 men, having left their ships at Golden Island. The six vessels and almost 1,000 men of this freebooter fleet then settle down to blockade Panama, hoping to intercept the anticipated treasure fleet out of Peru.

JUNE 3, 1685. Having departed Callao on May 7, the Peruvian silver fleet of Lt. Gen. Tomás Palavacino arrives in Panama City, having slipped past its blockers. His force consists of the 825-ton flagship San José, its armament augmented from 24 to 40 cannon for this expedition, and a crew of 405 under the veteran Santiago Pontejos; the 825-ton vice-flag Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe under Capt. Antonio de Vea, with 36 guns and 374 men; the 26-gun auxiliary San Lorenzo under Manuel Pantoja; and a 6-gun tender. This armada is furthermore accompanied by the private merchantmen Nuestra Señora del Pópulo and Nuestra Señora del Rosario, both mounting 20 guns, and a 6-gun fireship. The fleet bears 1,431 men, plus stores and arms for Panama's garrison, along with a situado of 533,434 pesos and private goods. After delivering their cargo, the men-of-war sally to engage the rovers.

JUNE 7, 1685. Isla del Rey. Toward noon, the Peruvian squadron emerges from a rain shower to find their enemy lying off Pacheca Island. The buccaneers are unprepared, particularly Grognet who has to delay weighing anchor because many of his men are ashore at two small chapels. The raiders have 11 vessels, yet only Davis's and Swan's mount artillery, the rest being unarmed Spanish prizes smaller than the 6 Peruvian men-of-war and 1 tender. An indecisive, long-range engagement ensues, with the rovers reluctant to close, while the bigger armada vessels fear being outmaneuvered and boarded by their nimble opponents. Both formations wheel around each other all afternoon, firing until dark.

Overnight, Palavacino extinguishes and rekindles the lights on his ships, deceiving the freebooters into believing that he has shifted position. But it is the Spanish ships that are in good order next morning, while the privateers are scattered, so their pursuit resumes. The day ends with a Spanish victory, the raiders being driven off west toward Coiba Island, their Panamanian blockade ended. The buccaneers then fall out amongst themselves along national lines, each group blaming the other for this defeat.

EARLY JULY 1685. The Anglo-French buccaneer companies of Davis, Swan, and Grognet attack Remedios (Panama), after which both contingents continue northwestward as separate groups.

JULY 6, 1685. Sack of Campeche. This afternoon, de Graaf's and Grammont's 6 large and 4 small privateer ships, 6 sloops, and 17 piraguas appear a half-dozen miles off this Mexican port. Some 700 buccaneers begin rowing in toward shore, but four Spanish militia companies (200 men) exit and position themselves opposite their intended disembarkation point, prompting the invaders to put up their helms. All night they remain bobbing upon the swell, until next morning the boats begin to draw off toward their ships, which are standing in to meet them.

This move proves to be but a feint, though, for before the defenders can react, the buccaneer boats change course and come storming ashore at the very outskirts of Campeche itself. Some 100 rovers form up behind Rettechard as the vanguard, 200 join de Graaf and march directly toward the city center, another 200 advance under Jean Foccard along a street parallel to de Graaf's, and the final 200 follow Grammont in an encircling maneuver. The Spaniards fall back, while out in the harbor Capt. Cristóbal Martínez de Acevedo prepares to scuttle his coast-guard frigate, the Nuestra Señora de la Soledad, as per his instructions. Originally intending to bore holes in its bottom, he now—given the speed of the invaders' advance—directs his boatswain to run a trail of powder into its magazine, lighting the fuse from his frigate's boat. The Soledad explodes with such a shattering blast that it collapses the defenders' morale, sending them scurrying back into their citadel while the freebooters enter Campeche uncontested.

Over the next few days, isolated strongpoints around the city are subdued, until only the citadel remains in Spanish hands. The rovers begin bombarding this fortress at dawn of July 12, only to be interrupted at 10:00 a.m. when two Spanish relief columns appear on the beach, having hastened down the peninsula from Mérida de Yucatán. In the past, such militia simply had to appear for smaller bands of raiders to scuttle back out to sea; this time, however, the freebooters stand and fight from behind Campeche's ramparts, and the first ranks of Spaniards go down to well-aimed volleys. All day the two sides battle, until Grammont circles behind the Yucatán militia and catches them between two fires. The Spanish relief force draws off in disarray, and after nightfall, Campeche's disheartened garrison mutinies. By 11 p.m., the citadel is deserted, and a couple of English prisoners admit its besiegers.

Grammont subsequently organizes troops of mounted buccaneers to reconnoiter and ravage the surrounding countryside as far as 25 miles inland, until 250 rovers are defeated at Hampolol by 300 Spaniards under 44-year-old maestre de campo Juan Antonio Chacón, effectively putting an end to such forays. Nevertheless, the invaders remain in possession of Campeche for the next two months, although most of its wealth has been withdrawn prior to the assault and little plunder is obtained. Captives are threatened with death if ransoms are not forthcoming, but the Yucatán's governor, Juan Bruno Téllez de Guzmán—headquartered at Hecelchak—prohibits any payments. Finally, on August 25, Grammont's flibustiers celebrate Louis XIV's feast day and, the next morning, begin preparations to break camp. A message is sent inland demanding 80,000 pesos and 400 cattle to leave Campeche's buildings intact; Téllez de Guzmán's rejection so infuriates Grammont that he orders the houses torched the next dawn, then sends another missive inland threatening the captives.

Again he receives the same response, so on August 28 he parades his prisoners in the main square and begins executions. De Graaf intervenes after a half-dozen deaths, and after a lengthy discussion, the brutality stops and the pirates retire, pausing briefly at Sisal before rounding the Yucatán to head to Isla Mujeres and divide their loot. The flibustier fleet eventually disperses, de Graaf sailing for Petit Goâve (Haiti) with his heavily-laden Neptune, Pierre Bot's Nuestra Señora de Regla, and three other vessels. Grammont's Hardi, a captured Spanish galliot under Nicolas Brigaut, and a sloop make for Roatán to careen.

EARLY AUGUST 1685. In the Pacific, Grognet refuses to join his English colleagues Davis and Swan in raiding León (Nicaragua), so the latter proceed independently, netting little booty. Meanwhile, the French commander takes 120 men in five boats for a repeat attempt against Remedios (Panama), but he is repulsed. He rejoins his remaining 200 men aboard the Santa Rosa by September 3.

AUGUST 1, 1685. The 48-year-old brigadier general Jacques René de Brisay, Marquis de Denonville, reaches Quebec City as the newly appointed governor general for French Canada. He is to be followed at month's end by 500 troops, who are to reverse the aggressions of Iroquois war bands and the encroachments by English traders. However, most of the soldiers are sick or dying and require a lengthy convalescence.

AUGUST 2, 1685. Having been advised at Cartagena of Campeche's occupation, Admiral Ochoa sorties with his flagship Santo Cristo de Burgos, the vice-flagship Concepción, the 335-ton Nuestra Señora del Honhón, and the 8-gun sloop Jesús, María y José (alias Sevillano) to punish the raiders. The Spaniards check the Cayman Islands before touching at Trujillo (Honduras) on August 17. They then inspect Roatán shortly thereafter, finding it uninhabited. Ochoa returns into Trujillo for provisions before resuming his northerly progression on September 8.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1685. Alacrán Reef. At dawn, Ochoa's Spanish warships chase five sail near Isla Mujeres (Mexico). Two lag behind and are captured, proving to be Pierre Bot's 22-gun prize Nuestra Señora de Regla and a sloop, both bearing spoils from Campeche. In their company is de Graaf's Neptune, whom the Spaniards desperately wish to overtake. Having lost sight of this prey while securing Bot's prize and scuttling the sloop, the Spaniards spot more sails to the northwest at 2:00 the following afternoon. Ochoa sends the Honhón and the Sevillano to investigate, who recognize the largest of these vessels as de Graaf's flagship. The Honhón therefore shadows the pirate chieftain, while the Sevillano returns to inform the admiral.

The Honhón loses contact at nightfall and the next morning makes for Veracruz. The Sevillano, however, finds Ochoa's flagship and vice-flagship, leading them toward de Graaf. At 4:00 p.m. on September 13, they spot him within the Gulf of Mexico east of Alacrán Reef, and both Spanish men-of-war gradually close upon the heavily laden corsair. Enjoying both the weather gauge and a two-to-one superiority, Ochoa commences his fight at dawn of September 14, despite being so infirm as to be lying under an awning upon his quarterdeck. De Graaf fights his ship brilliantly, outmaneuvering and outshooting the Spaniards until dark. Ochoa's flagship then hails Vice Adm. Antonio de Astina aboard the Concepción to advise him that Ochoa has been given last rites and that command of the armada is now his. Next morning, de Graaf's Neptune is seen bearing away to windward, and the battered armada gives up the chase. The Santo Cristo's weakened superstructure falls overboard, and Ochoa dies two days later. Astina limps back into Veracruz with his four vessels on the night of September 28–29 and is court-martialed for this failure.

NOVEMBER 1, 1685. Grognet and his boucaniers enter Realejo (Nicaragua), finding it and its surrounding countryside devastated by an earlier English assault; they thus obtain little booty. The French

Revocation of the Edict of Nantes

In the early 1680s in France, the "Sun King" Louis XIV moved to exert absolute power. Already victorious in war, with a rich treasury, servile nobility, as well as a flourishing economy and arts, the king took on organized religions. An assembly of Catholic clergymen was called in on November 1681 to curtail the prerogatives of the Pope. Henceforth, French bishops could not leave, Papal legates could not arrive, royal ministers could not be excommunicated, ecclesiastical laws could not be made, and so on, without the king's consent.

Because Louis held that, to truly unite his nation, religious unanimity was required, he also moved that same year against the country's Huguenots or "Protestants." In a brutal measure, rough dragons or "royal dragoons" were quartered in Protestant homes and encouraged to mistreat residents until they converted to Catholicism. Hundreds of thousands began to flee into Switzerland, the Netherlands, England, and German principalities.

In March 1685, the Sun King issued an edict expelling all Jews from France's colonies. Then he announced the Edict of Fontainebleau in October, which revoked the religious tolerance enshrined in the 1598 Edict of Nantes. Protestant rites were to be completely banned, their ministers were ordered to leave, and Huguenot newborns were to be baptized as Catholics "under penalty of a fine of five hundred livres, to be increased as circumstances may demand." Most Protestants who had not already fled made a grudging conversion. By January 17, 1686, Louis could boast that, of his 800,000 to 900,000 Huguenot subjects, only 1,000 to 1,500 remained.

Yet a large percentage of France's most skilled craftsmen were driven away as a result of his actions. Silkweavers, glaziers, silversmiths, clockmakers, cabinetmakers, and many others were lost. In the West Indies, experienced planters and refiners left, and the French Royal Navy lost some of its most able officers. Even those who remained as Catholic converts often served under a cloud of suspicion, with slim chances of promotion.

then hesitate to march inland and sack Esparta (Costa Rica), instead pressing on into the Gulf of Chiriquí toward the end of the year.

NOVEMBER 21, 1685. Having learned from captive buccaneers that the French explorer Robert Cavelier, Sieur de La Salle, has reached the Gulf with a small seaborne expedition to found a colony, the Spanish authorities in Mexico City—worried about this potential threat to their main plate-fleet route—decide to send out a reconnaissance mission. Therefore, the armada pilots Juan Enrique Barroto of the Soledad and Antonio Romero of the Concepción set sail this day from Veracruz for Havana aboard Gaspar de Acosta's Nuestra Señora del Carmen, arriving by December 3.

They hire Capt. Juan Rodríguez Manzano's 42-man frigate Nuestra Señora de la Concepción y San José and exit on January 3, 1686, to reconnoiter the Gulf coast and locate the intruders. They will return into Veracruz by March 13, however, without having sighted any settlement.

JANUARY 9, 1686. Grognet's flibustiers capture Chiriquita (Panama), abandoning it a week later.

MARCH 1686. Valladolid Raid. From the Gulf of Honduras, de Graaf leads seven freebooter ships into Ascensión Bay (modern Emiliano Zapata Bay, Yucatán), disembarking 500 buccaneers who march inland against Tihosuco, which is abandoned by its terrified Spanish citizens before it can be ransacked and burned. De Graaf then penetrates deeper toward Valladolid, which, by the time his rovers arrive within a half-dozen miles, only has 36 men left to defend it; yet, inexplicably, de Graaf gives the order to return to the coast without attempting an assault. By April, he and his followers reemerge into Ascensión Bay and retire toward Roatán soon afterward.

MARCH 5, 1686. Grognet's men approach Remedios (Panama) at night to forage for food, being ambushed by a small Spanish frigate, barco luengo, and piragua and suffering more than 30 casualties. They then roam westward once more, anchor off Esparta by March 19, and sight Townley's flotilla four days later.

MARCH 20, 1686. Capt. Pierre, Chevalier de Troyes, departs Montreal with 30 soldiers and 70 French Canadian militiamen, traveling in three groups aboard 35 canoes up the Ottawa River. The newly arrived governor general Brisay de Denonville has issued orders to seize the English furring outposts in Hudson's Bay, which are diverting trade from France's Compagnie du Nord—this despite the peace prevailing between England and France and the ongoing negotiations in London to resolve Canadian border issues.

APRIL 7, 1686. Sack of Granada. Despite some residual ill will, Townley's and Grognet's groups combine for an attempt against Granada (Nicaragua), landing 345 men at Escalante, who fight their way into the capital three days later. Little plunder is found, for the Spaniards have been forewarned and have transferred their valuables to Zapatera Island; thus the pirates withdraw empty-handed five days later. They weather numerous ambushes before passing through Masaya on April 16 and regaining their ships, after which they travel to Realejo.

Having enjoyed such limited success thus far, half of Grognet's followers vote on June 9 to join Townley in his eastward progression toward Panama. The remaining 148 flibustiers sail westward with Grognet, operating for a time in the Gulf of Fonseca, until a majority of the men again vote to quit his command. These 85 flibustiers sail the Santa Rosa northwest toward New Spain and California in hopes of waylaying the Manila galleon, while Grognet retraces his course down Central America with 60 followers aboard three piraguas.

APRIL 30, 1686. Grammont's 180-man Hardi, Brigaut's captured Spanish galliot, and a buccaneer sloop appear off Florida, bent upon attacking St. Augustine. To gather intelligence, Brigaut's galliot advances alone toward Matanzas, flying false Spanish colors, while Grammont's flagship and sloop remain concealed farther south awaiting the scout's return. When Brigaut is wrecked in heavy weather and fails to reappear, Grammont sails toward Matanzas three days later, only to be driven north by the same storm and lost with all hands.

JUNE 20, 1686. After an arduous 85-day boat trip through 800 miles of Canadian wilderness, Captain de Troyes's expedition arrives opposite Fort Monisipi (modern Moose Factory, Ontario), an English trading outpost on Hayes Island in James Bay. Its 17 men, leaderless because John Bridgar has left the day before on a trip, are caught utterly by surprise and surrender, this structure being renamed Fort Saint Louis. The inhabitants of Charles Fort (modern Fort Rupert) also capitulate without a fight on July 3, and it is renamed Fort Saint Jacques.

JULY 4, 1686. Two Royal Navy frigates from Jamaica—Charles Talbot's Falcon and Thomas Spragge's Drake—catch the English renegade Joseph Bannister careening his 30-gun Golden Fleece near Samaná Bay along with a small prize. The corsair has two batteries mounted ashore and fights the English frigates as they work in as close as the water will allow, beating the Golden Fleece to pieces. The Drake suffers 13 casualties, the Falcon, 10, before running out of ammunition. The English captains return into Port Royal a few days later and are censured for not destroying both of Bannister's craft. They therefore rearm and go back to Samaná Bay, discovering that in the interim the renegade has torched the Golden Fleece and sailed away in his prize.

JULY 6, 1686. In Europe, the League of Augsburg is formed by Austria, Sweden, Spain, Bavaria, Saxony, and the Palatinate for protection against the aggressive Louis XIV of France.

JULY 22, 1686. In the Pacific, Townley's buccaneers make a sudden descent upon the outskirts of Panama City, seizing merchandise reputedly worth 1.5 million pesos, which is subsequently lost in a Spanish counterambush. The raiders nonetheless make off with 15,000 pesos in silver and 300 captives, which Townley uses to extort a truce. After two captives' heads are sent to the president of the audiencia of Panama, the latter reluctantly agrees to supply the pirates with cattle, sheep, and flour on a daily basis. Meanwhile, Townley threatens to send another 50 heads ashore if five buccaneers in Spanish hands are not released, and an uneasy peace ensues.

JULY 25, 1686. Using the captured English ship Craven, Pierre de Troyes's 25-year-old second lieutenant Pierre Le Moyne d'Iberville attacks Albany Fort—the last remaining English outpost in Bottom of the Bay (James Bay, Ontario)—whose Gov. Henry Sergeant capitulates after a three-day siege and bombardment. The French thereupon rename this place Fort Sainte Anne, before de Troyes installs d'Iberville as new governor of the three captured English forts with 40 men, then withdraws toward Montreal with the remainder of his force in August. By early October, de Troyes is reporting to Governor General Jacques René de Brisay, Marquis de Denonville, at Quebec City.

Pierre Le Moyne d'Iberville

Pierre Le Moyne, Sieur d'Iberville et d'Ardillières, was born in Montreal and baptized on July 20, 1661. He was the third of 11 sons and 2 daughters of a settler originally from Dieppe in Normandy. His father, Charles Le Moyne, had arrived 20 years earlier as an indentured servant. He had become a major fur trader and rich landowner, who was soon to be ennobled.

Young Pierre proved to be an avid boatman and was destined for the sea. The first notice of his activities occurred in 1683, when Governor Le Febvre de La Barre sent him to France with dispatches. Three years later, he took part in the Chevalier de Troyes's expedition against the English trading outposts in James Bay. d'Iberville's successful role was rewarded with an appointment as acting "governor" of the captured forts. Lack of supplies obliged him to return into Quebec by the summer of 1687, where he found that he had been accused in a paternity suit.

The 26-year-old adventurer nonetheless traveled to France and persuaded the Crown to assist his new foothold on James Bay. d'Iberville returned in the summer of 1688, commanding the frigate Soleil d'Afrique with a cargo of trade goods to entice native trappers away from the remaining English outpost at Port Nelson. He defeated an English counterexpedition by ruthlessly starving his more numerous foes over the winter of 1688–1689. When d'Iberville finally regained Quebec on October 28, 1689, he arrived heavily laden with prisoners, booty, and a fortune in furs.

He participated that same winter, under his older brother Jacques, in the raid against Corlaer (modern Schenectady, New York). Rewarded with a land grant on the Baie de Chaleurs, d'Iberville quickly disposed of it. He preferred to spend the next few years trying to organize a seaborne expedition into James Bay, although he was often diverted. He finally succeeded in 1694.

AUGUST 1686. A galley and two piraguas bearing 100 Spaniards out of St. Augustine, plus native allies and mulattoes, descend upon the new Scottish establishment at Port Royal (South Carolina). Its settlers have been reduced to 25 able-bodied men because of disease and want so are easily overrun. Their capital of Stuart's Town is destroyed.

The Spaniards thereupon range northward to the Edisto, plundering plantations (including those of English governor Joseph Morton and his secretary Paul Grimbail). The raiders are eventually prevented from assaulting Charles Town by a hurricane, which destroys two of their vessels and drowns Capt. Tomás de León, obliging the remainder to retire toward St. Augustine. The English wish to retaliate by commissioning two French privateers but are forbidden by their newly arrived governor, James Colleton.

AUGUST 22, 1686. The Spaniards attempt a surprise attack against Townley's buccaneers by slipping three ships and 240 men out of Perico Island (Panama) to fall upon the raiders while at rest. This assault is fiercely beaten off, two of the Spanish ships being captured and only 65 Spaniards escaping either injury or death.

A furious Townley, himself wounded during this exchange, sends 20 more heads ashore to protest this violation of the truce. The Spanish promptly deliver an additional 10,000 pesos to the buccaneers on September 4, along with a conciliatory note from the archbishop of Panama, promising that all English prisoners will henceforth be considered Catholics and so enjoy protection from the Church. Yet Townley does not have long to savor his victory, dying of his wounds four days later. His body is then cast overboard (in accordance with his wishes) near Otoque Island, and he is succeeded in command of this freebooter band by George Hout (or Hutt).

NOVEMBER 16, 1686. An agreement is struck between James II of England and Louis XIV of France promising to restrict the activities of buccaneers in the New World. Three days later, they also sign the so-called neutrality pact to settle their conflicting claims over Hudson's Bay (Canada).

LATE NOVEMBER 1686. A squadron of Biscayan privateers—known collectively as the Vizcaya or Guipúzcoa squadron—arrives in the West Indies under Commo. Francisco de Aguirre, their recruitment having been approved by Madrid to supplement the ineffectual patrols of the Armada de Barlovento. Capt. José Leoz y Echalar commands the 34-gun, 180-man, 250-ton flagship Nuestra Señora del Rosario y las Animas, which is accompanied by the 24-gun, 142-man, 200-ton vice-flagship San Nicolás de Bari of Martínez de Landeche; the 66-man, 140-ton Nuestra Señora de la Concepción of Sebastián Pisón; the 36-man, 60-ton San Antonio of Silvestre Soler; and the 53-man, 30-ton, 32-oar galley Santiago of Fermín de Salaberría.

Unfortunately, the activities of this formation will prove equally disappointing, only a few foreign merchantmen and no pirates ever being detained during their four years of service.

DECEMBER 25, 1686. A second Spanish exploratory mission in search of de La Salle's Gulf coast colony departs Veracruz, 130 men aboard two specially constructed piraguas: the Nuestra Señora del Rosario under Capt. Martín de Rivas and the Nuestra Señora de la Esperanza under Pedro de Iriarte. They will fail to find any signs of the Frenchmen before reentering port on July 2.

JANUARY 23, 1687. Grognet rediscovers Townley's contingent (now commanded by Hout) in the Gulf of Nicoya, and after ravaging the area for a month, they weigh together for a surprise attack against Guayaquil.

FEBRUARY 7, 1687. Capt. Thomas Spragge enters Port Royal (Jamaica) with the English renegade Joseph Bannister and his accomplices dangling from HMS Drake's yardarms, having captured them on the Mosquito Coast.

MARCH 9, 1687. Governor de Cussy of Saint Domingue (Haiti) issues a decree commanding all French flibustiers to cease their depredations against Spanish targets in the New World.

APRIL 16, 1687. Sack of Guayaquil. The combined buccaneer force of Grognet and Hout appears opposite Puná Island and, two hours before dawn on Sunday, April 20, disembarks a landing force that marches overland in three columns: Grognet leads one company through a marsh directly toward the center of Guayaquil, Hout advances against a small bastion guarding its approaches, and Grognet's subordinate Picard directs his men against another bastion. The Spanish authorities have been forewarned about strange sails offshore, yet when no attack immediately ensued, they assumed this to be a false alarm.

Early on this rainy Sunday morning, therefore, the buccaneers are able to surprise Guayaquil and carry it after a vicious house-to-house contest in which 34–60 residents are killed—plus many others captured—during eight hours of fighting, compared to only nine pirate dead and a dozen wounded. Among the latter, though, is Grognet, who is carried back aboard his flagship when the triumphant raiders evacuate four days later. He dies of his wounds off Puná on May 2 while awaiting the payment of ransoms for his four principal hostages (including two aldermen). Picard assumes overall command of the flibustier contingent, and both buccaneer contingents distribute total plunder constituting

Phips's Treasure Hunt

William Phips was born on February 2, 1651 (O.S.), in the backwoods Maine hamlet of Woolwich. He was the youngest of 14 children of an immigrant gunsmith from Bristol in England. His father had co-owned the local trading post, bartering weapons for furs among the Wabanaki natives. When his father died, 14-year-old William became apprenticed to a carpenter for four years.

Upon completing his indenture, Phips went to Boston and took service with a ship's carpenter. According to Cotton Mather, he was "tall beyond the common set of men, and thick as well as tall, and strong as well as thick." He also had a friend in Capt. Roger Spencer's ship, so he began sailing to the Bahamas and West Indies. In 1673, he married the captain's sister Mary Spencer Hull, widow of the prosperous merchant John Hull. This union gave Phips the means to command his own ship.

During his travels, Phips learned of many Spanish wrecks in the Caribbean, some with treasure still aboard. He soon acquired a reputation for "continually finding sunken ships" and grew skillful at salvage. He visited a famous site in the Bahamas, whose wreck was being worked by other seafarers. Phips also heard rumors of another lost galleon that lay undisturbed on the north shoals of Hispaniola, but he could not raise money in Boston for an expedition. He therefore sailed to England early in 1683 to petition Charles II.

While in London, Phips contacted Sir John Narborough, commissioner of the Royal Navy, who had served in the West Indies and shared his enthusiasm for such ventures. Narborough helped Phips secure the loan of the 18-gun Royal Navy vessel Golden Rose of Algier, which he was to man with 100 men and sail to the Bahamas. By working a known wreck in the Bahamas, he raised enough funds for an expedition to Hispaniola. Phips returned to Boston in late October for his diving equipment and thus did not reach the Hispaniola site until March 1684, finding it largely picked clean. Yet while visiting Puerto Plata on the north coast of Santo Domingo that same year, Phips also met an elderly Spanish survivor of the 1641 wreck of the Nuestra Señora de la Pura y Limpia Concepción. He offered to guide Phips out to its site on the Ambrosian Bank.

Although Phips regained London without profit in August 1685, this lead allowed him to attract private funding. He reappeared at Samaná Bay by late November 1686 with the 23-gun, 200-ton ship James and Mary and 40-ton sloop Henry. They anchored over the wreck on January 12, 1687 (O.S.), and eight days later began bringing up huge clumps of bullion. By the time Phips left in mid-May, he had more than 34 tons of silver aboard worth £200,000. This enormous sum sparked a treasure-hunting frenzy in the West Indies.

Phips was rewarded with a knighthood and the title of provost marshal of New England. Three years later, he led a sea-borne assault against French Canada. In 1691, he allowed the Salem witchcraft trials to proceed, until his own wife was accused and a halt was called after two years.

"134,000 pesos, much precious jewelry, a large amount of wrought silver, and a great deal of merchandise and goods."

A few days later, the buccaneers are joined by Davis, bringing in word that a squadron of Peruvian privateers is on its way to drive them off. The Peruvians appear by May 27, 1687, consisting of the purchased vessels San José and San Nicolás of 20 guns apiece, commanded by the Biscayans Dionisio López de Artunduaga and Nicolás de Igarza, plus a small patache. The pirate formation includes almost 20 small- to medium-sized craft, mostly prizes, which the Peruvian privateers rather gingerly engage at long range over the next five days, eventually scattering the freebooters and recuperating some lost vessels. During these actions, the San Nicolás runs hard aground on a sandbank off Atacames, so limps back toward Callao taking on water. It is quickly replaced by the San Francisco de Paula and another patache, who join López de Artunduaga off

Ecuador and resume his distant pursuit of the re-treating buccaneers, at last compelling them to relinquish their largest prize (the San Jacinto) before making a final division of spoils off Cape San Francisco and dispersing northward 10 days later.

MAY 1687. In Veracruz, the crews of Spain's West Indian squadron (Armada de Barlovento) riot because of back pay, idleness, and the arrival of competing Biscayan privateers. Some 200 armada sailors and marines desert en masse, the rest being put down with three fatalities.

JUNE 13, 1687. The energetic governor general Brisay de Denonville of New France departs Montreal up the Saint Lawrence River toward Fort Frontenac with the first of four companies that, when the last leaves four days later, will comprise a major expedition against the hostile Seneca Indians. The force contains a total of 832 soldiers, more than 900

French Canadian militiamen, and 400 native allies. The purpose of this offensive is to prevent the Iroquois and English from uniting to take control of the lucrative fur trade. An additional 800 French regulars who have disembarked at Quebec City a few days earlier cannot be incorporated in time.

After seizing more than 200 neutral Iroquois men, women, and children as they advance (most of whom are later released), Brisay de Denonville's force intercepts two parties of English traders out of Albany, who are bound toward Michillimackinac. The Englishmen are incarcerated for deportation, while their turncoat French Canadian guides are summarily shot. The huge French force then ravages empty Seneca villages and farms along the south shore of Lake Ontario throughout July.

A blockhouse is then reerected on the site of de La Salle's old Fort Niagara, and a 100-man garrison is installed on July 31 under Captain Chevalier de Troyes. Brisay de Denonville will return into Montreal by August 13, but the occupiers of Fort Niagara will endure a difficult winter. Beset by Iroquois raiders and scurvy, the troops attempt a mutiny, and de Troyes dies of disease by May 8, 1688. With only 11 survivors left, the fort will have to be abandoned and demolished by September 15. The governor general negotiates a peace with the Iroquois.

JUNE 30, 1687. In a third attempt to locate de La Salle's Gulf coast colony, the Armada de Barlovento frigate Santo Cristo de San Román exits Veracruz under Captain de Pez, accompanied by a patache under Capt. Francisco López de Gámara. Each is manned by 40 seamen and 30 infantrymen. After pausing at Tampico on July 3–5 to take on two large launches for work close inshore, they resume their voyage. Over the next two months, they will comb the shoreline as far east as Pensacola without finding anything, then reenter Veracruz on September 4.

AUGUST 30, 1687. Picard's five French buccaneer vessels materialize off Tehuantepec (Mexico), setting 180 men ashore to capture it. After a brief occupation, the flibustiers depart, looking into Acapulco Bay a few weeks later.

NOVEMBER 3, 1687. A raid by 100–200 Iroquois warriors is repelled by the French garrison at Fort Chambly (Quebec).

JANUARY 2, 1688. After skirmishing with some Peruvian privateers in the Gulf of Fonseca, the French rover Picard scuttles his ships and leads 260 flibustiers inland to regain the Caribbean. They brush aside weak Spanish American resistance, proceeding into the central highlands and constructing rafts at the Coco River's headwaters to glide downstream, emerging at Cape Gracias a Dios by March 9.

MARCH 8, 1688. Captain de Pez quits Veracruz aboard the armada frigate Santo Cristo de San Román to make a fourth attempt to find de La Salle's Gulf coast colony. He is accompanied by the veteran pilot Barroto and a captive English buccaneer, who claims to have visited the elusive outpost with the flibustier Jean Rose.

The frigate crosses into the area of present-day Mobile Bay, but no trace is found. The captive finally confesses that he has lied in hopes of being released or of finding an opportunity to escape. De Pez sails back into Veracruz on April 24 with the man in irons.

The remains of de La Salle's colony will eventually be found in the vicinity of Matagorda Bay (Texas), all but two of its French settlers having succumbed.

JULY 28, 1688. Some 60 Dutch soldiers mutiny at Fort Zeelandia (Suriname), killing their hated, 41-year-old governor, Cornelis Aerssen van Sommelsdijk, with more than 50 shots. Their numbers soon swell to 140–150 disgruntled men. The mutineers elect their own leaders, disarm the local militia, and seize two ships in the roadstead in anticipation of sailing away, only to have their unity collapse and eventually be compelled to surrender.

Rum and the Royal Navy

Prior to being deployed in the West Indies, English warships traditionally carried cider, beer, and brandy for their men's consumption while operating in home waters, but these first two spirits decayed in the tropics. Local sugar-derived stimulants, therefore, were sporadically substituted. The policy of purchasing Barbadian rum was apparently made official after Adm. Sir John Narborough—the commissioner of the navy responsible for the Victualling Department in London—visited Bridgetown in November 1687 aboard his 48-gun HMS Foresight. He bought "600 odd gallons of rum to be served to our ship's company in lieu of brandy," thus recommending this practice throughout the service.

KING WILLIAM'S WAR (1688–1697)

In Europe, the megalomaniacal Louis XIV of France invades contested areas of the Palatinate in the Rhineland on September 27, 1688, escalating tensions on the continent. The Protestant Dutch rulers William, Prince of Orange, and his wife, Mary Stuart, nonetheless proceed with their plan to peacefully invade England, landing on November 15 to overthrow its unpopular pro-Catholic James II in a bloodless coup known as the “Glorious Revolution.” That same November 26, Louis declares war against Holland and, the following April, against Spain as well.

On May 12, 1689, England and the Netherlands join other members of the League of Augsburg to form the so-called Grand Alliance against France. Fighting breaks out between Louis and William as well within six weeks, a conflict that will take a total of nine years to run its course (therefore known variously to history as King William's War, the War of the League of Augsburg, the War of the Grand Alliance, or the Nine Years' War).

SUMMER 1688. The English adventurer Thomas Hewetson attempts to beat his way through the Strait of Magellan with his 50-gun flagship Lion and two other vessels to found a settlement on the Pacific coast of South America. He is eventually forced to retreat and, months later, limps into Tobago.

AUGUST 1688. A buccaneer sloop and piragua anchor off Barra de Dos Bocas (Tabasco, Mexico). Twenty men are sent up the Seco River to raid Chontalpa and are defeated upon their retirement.

SEPTEMBER 1688. The private English frigates Churchill of 18 guns and Yonge, bearing a total of 85 men under Adm. William Bond and Capt. John Marsh, arrive to reconquer the fur-trading outposts in Hudson's Bay (see “July 25, 1686” entry in “Irregular Warfare”). They blockade Pierre Le Moyne d'Iberville's 16-man frigate Soleil d'Afrique inside the Albany River, then all become icebound. Over this ensuing winter, the French starve their opponents into submission, 25 Englishmen dying from scurvy and exposure, another 3 due to combat.

JANUARY 28, 1689. As a show of support for their native allies, a French expedition departs Trois Rivières (Quebec) to attack British settlements along the border with New England.

FEBRUARY 1, 1689. A “Convention” meets at Westminster in London to resolve the matter of England's vacant throne. Fifteen days later, it is decided to offer the Crown jointly to Willem and Mary of Orange. The princess arrives in England by February 22, and next day (Ash Wednesday) they are acclaimed as “King William III and Queen Mary II” in the banqueting room at Whitehall Palace. They will actually be crowned in a ceremony held on April 21.

MARCH 7, 1689. Louis's declaration of war against Holland is promulgated on Martinique, being enthusiastically endorsed by flibustiers and colonists alike.

MARCH 28, 1689. Three French ships, a brigantine, a bark, and three lesser vessels quit Martinique under Governor General de Blénac and Intendant Dumaitz de Goimpy, pausing at Guadeloupe to add another ship, then another three barks and three brigantines at Saint Kitts. De Blénac's strength eventually rises to 17 sail and 1,200 men, which he uses to steer toward Sint Eustatius and fall upon that Dutch colony by surprise.

APRIL 3, 1689. Destruction of Sint Eustatius. Governor General de Blénac appears off this island, catching its tiny Dutch garrison completely unprepared. A couple of ships manage to flee out to sea with valuables, but otherwise the outnumbered defenders under Gov. Lucas Schorer can only watch the French approach. De Blénac, Col. François de Collart, and Pierre du Buc bring one contingent ashore at Interlopers Cove (facing Saint Kitts), while François le Vassor circles around to windward, landing an even larger detachment at Pointe Blanche. The Dutch contest from the clifftops de Blénac's disembarkation, wounding both the colonel and du Buc before being outflanked and chased back into

Glorious Revolution

Immediately after Charles II died in February 1685, his successor and younger brother, James II, was viewed with suspicion by his English subjects. A staunch Catholic, it was feared that he would attempt to reimpose his faith upon the Protestant kingdom. He lost the support of the dominant Anglican Tories in Parliament that first year. His removal of Protestants from key positions of power and his recruitment of a large peacetime army also seemed to be preludes to a seizure of absolute power.

As a result, a conspiracy was hatched to remove James in favor of his daughter Mary and her husband, the Dutch Stadhouder Willem of Orange (who would later Anglicize his name to William). Both were Protestant, and both were grandchildren of King Charles I of England. They stood second and third in line to the throne. Moreover, Willem had the reputation of being the main Protestant champion in Europe against French Catholic absolutism.

Events accelerated as of late 1687, after it was learned that James was expecting another child. This made the prospect of a Catholic dynasty on the English throne much more likely. When James signed a naval agreement with Louis XIV of France in April 1688, Willem began actively raising political and financial support to invade. He struck secret deals with the Holy Roman Emperor in Vienna, the Duke of Hanover, the Elector of Saxony, even Pope Innocent XI. All were united by their hostility to France. The Dutch Navy was mobilized, thousands of troops were mustered, and 400 transports were hired. But great care also went into a propaganda effort to convince the English people that Willem would be coming in peace to “save the Protestant religion.”

When Louis XIV warned the States-General in September 1688 against acting in England, his threat backfired. James was embarrassed, and the Dutch were convinced that a secret Franco-English alliance must exist. Their 21,000 troops boarded their transports by October 8, to be escorted by 53 warships under Lt. Adm. “Kees the Devil” Evertsen. Contrary winds kept them in Hellevoetsuis until November 11, at which time the so-called Protestant Wind carried them across to England. This enormous 60,000-man fleet, four times the size of the Spanish Armada and carrying 5,000 horses, sailed through the English Channel uncontested because Adm. George Legge, Lord Dartmouth, could not exit from the Thames against the prevailing winds.

Willem landed amid popular acclaim at Torbay on November 15, 1688. His banner read: “The Liberties of England and the Protestant Religion I Will Maintain.” His Dutch army behaved well, and he did not thrust inland. Instead, he let anti-Catholic riots and desertions sap James’s resolve. The king joined his 19,000-man army at Salisbury two weeks later, only to soon retreat. Willem began a triumphal advance on London, until James fled for France on December 21.

Captured the next day, James was nonetheless cheered by some people when brought back through the streets of London. Willem therefore arranged for a second escape so as not to complicate his own assumption of office. The Dutch called their venture the Glorieuze Overtocht or “Glorious Crossing.” English supporters dubbed Willem’s almost-bloodless ascension as the “Glorious Revolution.”

Fort Orange that same evening, leaving 20 dead and wounded upon the field.

Early next morning, le Vassor’s small army arrives overland and joins de Blénac’s detachment, after which siege guns are landed at Goimpy’s behest, to be used against the Dutch citadel. The French call upon Schorer to surrender, and he agrees. In the articles of capitulation, de Blénac orders Sint Eustatius evacuated, sending its colonists toward Nevis, while all shore establishments on Sint Eustatius are destroyed, booty gathered, and a tiny 40-man French garrison installed under Joseph d’Honon de Gallifet. (Schorer, however, proceeds only as far as Sabá to await relief.)

APRIL 14, 1689. Failure at Suriname. A junior French naval captain—the 42-year-old Huguenot

ex-slaver, Jean-Baptiste Ducasse—arrives at Cayenne with the 44-gun, 400-ton royal warship Hasardeux (flag); the 26-gun, 350-ton flûte Bretonne under de Ville and the 30-gun, 500-ton Loire under Damou; plus the 36-gun, 350-ton Émérillon of De Gennes, with instructions to mount an assault against neighboring Suriname. Having been ordered to assist and feeling this strength to be insufficient, Gov. François de la Barre adds the commandeered merchantman Diligence, along with the 40-gun, 180-man privateer Dauphin out of Dunkirk, plus most of Cayenne’s garrison under Guillouët d’Orvilliers and a host of volunteers—virtually denuding French Guiana of defenders.

This squadron sets sail by May 2 and intercepts the bark Amsterdam four days later off the mouth of the Suriname River; it then approaches the capital, Paramaribo, by May 9. However, the alerted Dutch defend Fort Zeelandia vigorously with 69 regular soldiers, 84 Jewish volunteers, and 78 Dutch militiamen under their newly installed governor, Johan van Scharphuysen, compelling the attackers to withdraw out to sea, leaving behind 34 prisoners.

Thus repulsed, Ducasse continues toward Martinique with his main force, while 200 of Cayenne's volunteer contingent attempt to return home aboard the Dauphin, only to be wrecked near Berbice and surrendering to the Dutch. Van Scharphuysen exchanges these few survivors, who do not regain Cayenne until November 3.

MAY 17, 1689. In Europe, William III of England officially declares war against France.

MAY 22, 1689. Leisler's Revolt. The inhabitants of New York City, already uneasy at their recent annexation into the dominion of New England, learn that Governor General Andros has been deposed at Boston and has sent a cryptic message to Lt. Gov. Francis Nicholson at New York. Fearing anti-Calvinist retaliation, a tumultuous assembly addressed by the wealthy, 48-year-old, German-born merchant Jacob Leisler urges recognition of the reign of William and Mary.

On May 31, Nicholson angrily threatens to “fire the town” to check this spreading sedition, to which Leisler's militia company unilaterally responds by seizing Fort James. Leisler joins them two days later and, on June 3, learns that the Protestant monarchs have in fact been crowned, hence he vows to hold the fort and New York until a new governor arrives appointed by William and Mary. In the meantime, Leisler convenes a provincial assembly that temporarily confers command of the fort to him on June 28 and the title of provincial commander in chief as of August 16. He gradually assumes more of the trappings of governor, even convening an intercolonial congress in May 1690 to plan concerted action against the French and Indians.

JULY 27, 1689. Capture of Saint Kitts. Having learned of the outbreak of Anglo-French hostilities thanks to a swift transatlantic crossing by the dispatch vessel Perle under Captain Chevalier d'Arbouville, Governor General de Blénac sails from Martinique with the recently arrived warships Hasardeux, Émerillon, Loire, Dauphine, Cheval Marin, plus 14 merchantmen and 23 sloops, appearing off Basseterre (capital of the French half of Saint Kitts) to lead its residents in a preemptive strike against their English neighbors. His army dashes ashore and quickly overruns the southern part of the island, driving its English governor, Col. Thomas Hill, and 400–500 defenders inside Fort Charles at Old Road Town. This structure, although built of stone atop a high cliff, is old and not very formidable, having few guns mounted, no moat, and gently sloping walls. Nevertheless, de Blénac institutes a formal siege, digging an approach trench while his 10-gun land-battery and warships patiently bombard the gate, expending more than 1,000 heavy rounds to little effect.

After two weeks of fruitless firing, the naval officer Ducasse—in command of 120 flibustiers—convinces de Blénac that another battery should be installed atop an adjacent hill, which overlooks the fort's interior. The governor general finally accedes, and during the night of August 14–15, Ducasse's men drag six heavy pieces to its summit. Next morning, they open fire, and the besieged surrender once they find that their counterfire cannot reach the peak. All English colonists are then ordered evacuated to Nevis, while their Irish Catholic vassals are given their freedom and Charles de Peychpeyrou Comminge de Guitaud is installed as governor of Saint Kitts. Ten days later, de Blénac sails toward Martinique, leaving Goimpy to wind up affairs.

AUGUST 5, 1689. The town of Lachine (near Montreal, Canada) is surprised and overrun by 1,500 Iroquois warriors—allies of the English—who kill two dozen residents and carry another 90 off into captivity.

AUGUST 15, 1689. Sir Timothy Thornhill reaches Antigua with a regiment of 700–800 militiamen raised on Barbados.

NOVEMBER 13, 1689. The town of La Chénage (near Montreal, Canada) is attacked by an Iroquois war party, and several settlers are killed.

EARLY DECEMBER 1689. Laurens de Graaf sorties from Saint Domingue (Haiti) with a flibustier flotilla to descend upon Jamaica. Eight to 10 English sloops are taken off its north shore, and disembarkations are made to plunder plantations. Port Royal's trade is consequently embargoed by worried Crown officials, and Capt. Thomas Spragge's HMS Drake is sent out with some auxiliaries to drive the intruders away. The embargo is not lifted until late May 1690.

DECEMBER 26, 1689. Thornhill's Counteroffensive.

On orders from Sir Christopher Codrington—new governor general for the English Leeward Islands—Major General Thornhill sets sail from Nevis with 500 troops aboard a brigantine and nine sloops, to attack the French on Saint Martin and Saint Barthélemy, thus securing the meat supply for beleaguered Nevis. The first island proves too difficult to assault, but Saint Barthélemy is easily overrun on December 30, some 600–700 prisoners surrendering on January 4, 1690, to be deported.

EARLY 1690. Capt. Martín de Rivas departs Veracruz with 190 men aboard two Spanish galliots (being reinforced off Coatzacoalcas by another 110 aboard a pair of piraguas from Tabasco and Campeche) to attack the foreign logwood cutters in the Laguna de Términos. His attack begins promisingly, two sloops being captured six miles from its entrance; but other baymen resist vigorously from behind tree barricades when the Spaniards come ashore that afternoon, eventually compelling them to withdraw the next day, and de Rivas is mortally wounded.

JANUARY 1690. On Saint Barthélemy, Thornhill—encouraged by his easy success in conquering and holding this island for three weeks—decides to make a second attempt against Saint Martin. Arriving off that island, he detaches some of his men under Capt. Walter Hamilton to disembark on its windward side and distract the 300 defenders, while bringing his main body ashore to leeward and marching across to take the enemy from the rear.

About two miles inland, Thornhill encounters a two-gun French breastwork, where the defenders make a stand. It takes a couple of days for the English to dislodge them, which they finally do by bringing artillery across the island from their ships to demolish this position. The French thereupon retreat into a tiny six-gun fort, only to be quickly driven out and dispersed into the jungle. Two or three more days of fighting ensue, with French resolve about to collapse when Ducasse appears offshore with a relief force of three ships, a brigantine, and a sloop bearing a total of 700 men.

Thornhill now finds the roles reversed, his own forces scrambling to fend off this French disembarkation. Ducasse scatters the anchored English vessels, captures one, then next midday lands several hundred men and guns. The reinvigorated French defenders recapture their little fort and crowd Thornhill's small army into a defensive position.

Three days later, a further trio of French ships appears from Saint Kitts with 500 men, seriously complicating Thornhill's predicament.

JANUARY 9, 1690. The English rover Hewetson (see "Summer 1688" entry) arrives off Marie-Galante with three ships, two sloops, and more than 400 men, armed with a privateering commission from Governor General Codrington. Among Hewetson's captains is Scottish-born William Kidd, commanding the 20-gun Blessed William of 80–90 men. The English plunder this tiny French outpost over the next five days before returning into Nevis.

LATE JANUARY 1690. Stung by criticisms of his conduct of West Indian affairs by Goimpy, Ducasse, Guitaud, and Gémosat, Governor General de Blénac resigns his office and returns to France aboard the Pont d'Or, seeking vindication. He is temporarily replaced by François d'Alesso, Marquis d'Eragny, who is officially confirmed from Paris on May 1.

EARLY FEBRUARY 1690. Hewetson's Rescue. Having returned to Nevis from ransacking Marie-Galante, Hewetson's privateers are hurried out again by Governor General Codrington to rescue Thornhill's expedition on Saint Martin. Hewetson recaptures an English sloop en route, gaining valuable intelligence as to French dispositions.

Arriving off Saint Martin at daybreak of January 30 (O.S.), Hewetson's 50-gun Lion, Kidd's 20-gun Blessed William, and one other English ship are immediately challenged by Ducasse's five men-of-war, who slip their cables and stand out to engage by noon. Both squadrons pass each other at least twice in line-of-battle formation over the next four hours, exchanging broadsides before Hewetson closes and attempts to board. Ducasse sheers off, allowing his opponents to contact Thornhill ashore next morning, urging the English general to gather his troops for reembarkation. Before this can be accomplished, however, Ducasse returns, outmaneuvering the English squadron and anchoring opposite their chosen embarkation point.

Next morning, Hewetson's force bears down to fight again, but Ducasse retires northwest toward Anguilla, leaving Thornhill's men and artillery to be freely evacuated and restored to Nevis by February 2 (O.S.). Despite this successful operation, the English freebooters are unhappy at being used in a set-piece battle at high risk and no profit. When Kidd goes ashore that same February 12, his crew makes off with the Blessed William. Hewetson soon after quits the Crown service as well, transferring to Barbados.

FEBRUARY 18, 1690. Shortly after midnight, 114 French Canadian militiamen and 96 Indian allies under Nicolas d'Ailleboust, Sieur de Manthet, and Jacques Le Moyne, Sieur de Sainte Hélène, slip into the English settlement of Corlaer (modern Schenectady, New York), attacking two hours before dawn. Some 60 inhabitants are slaughtered, another 25 are captured, while 50 are spared. The victors withdraw this same day, taking 50 horses loaded with plunder, but are overtaken almost within sight of Montreal by Mohawk warriors, losing 18 stragglers.

FEBRUARY 20, 1690. The private English salvor John Strong enters the Strait of Magellan with his 270-ton ship Welfare of 40 guns and 90 men, supposedly to trade with South America but actually to work the wreck of the 900-ton Jesús María de la Limpia Concepción (flagship of Peru's Armada del Mar del Sur, which went down off Puná Island on the night of October 26, 1654, with millions aboard). Despite Britain's alliance with Spain, Strong's first contacts prove hostile. The Welfare reaches Puná by August 20, where Strong learns the location of its wreck, anchoring over the spot by September 7. He is unable to find any trace of its remains, however, so he stands away for the Juan Fernández Islands, where on October 21 he rescues 4 English buccaneers who were marooned three years previously.

The Welfare thereupon continues down Chile, suffering 11 killed when one of Strong's landing parties is slaughtered in the surf by Spanish lancers. The English eventually return through the Strait and head north toward the Caribbean.

MARCH 1690. The deposed James II lands in Ireland at the head of a French army, hoping to reclaim his throne from William and Mary. This action gives heart to his adherents in the New World—a distinct minority—while at the same time spreading unease among England's American colonies. Eventually, Londonderry withstands a prolonged siege by James's army, who is then defeated by William on July 11 at the Battle of the Boyne and is forced back to France.

MARCH 28, 1690. Two months after departing Trois Rivières (Quebec) under Joseph-François Hertel de La Fresnière, a party of 25 French Canadian militiamen, 20 Sokoki, and 5 Algonquin warriors mounts a three-pronged dawn attack against Fort Rollinsford and its adjacent English settlement of Salmon Falls (near modern-day Portsmouth, New Hampshire). At a cost of 2 killed and 1 captured, the raiders slay 30 residents and capture 54 within the next two hours before razing all its buildings and departing with much booty.

While retiring toward Canada, Hertel finds himself pursued by more than 100 English militiamen, so he ambushes them at a narrow bridge over the Wooster River, slaying another score.

MAY 3, 1690. Acadian Campaign. New England's 40-year-old provost marshal, Sir William Phips, acting on his own responsibility, impresses the private ships Six Friends of 42 guns and 120 men of Gregory Sugars, the 16-gun Swan of Thomas Gilbert, the 8-gun Mary of Cyprian Southack, plus 5 lesser vessels, for a raid against French Acadia (Nova Scotia). Approximately 500 draftees are taken aboard at Nantasket, raising total strength to 700 men, and the expedition puts to sea five days later.

On May 10, it anchors off Mount Desert and the next day attempts to bear down upon the French within Penobscot Fort, only to have the wind die away. It is not until the following day that the New Englanders can get ashore, and upon attacking this fort at dawn on May 14, they find it deserted. Further reinforcements then join Phips's expedition from Salem and Ipswich, together plundering the settlement of Passamequoddy on May 16, then capturing Port Royal (modern Annapolis Royal) three days later without resistance. Phips returns into Boston by May 30 (O.S.).

MAY 21, 1690. Commo. Lawrence Wright reaches Barbados, having escorted 56 storm-tossed merchantmen from Plymouth with his 62-gun, 830-ton flagship Mary; the 54-gun, 522-ton Foresight; the 48-gun Assistance, Bristol, and Jersey; the 46-gun Antelope, Hampshire, and Tiger; the 28-gun frigate Guernsey and Swan; the 10-gun fireships Saint Paul and Richard & John; plus the ketch Quaker. Col. James Kendall, the new governor of Barbados, is also traveling aboard the Mary as a passenger.

The transatlantic crossing has been difficult, and Wright's crews are very sickly, so he cannot join Governor General Codrington at Antigua until June 10. The commodore's orders state that Codrington is to have precedence "in all things relating to the land service," while naval matters are to be mutually agreed on. An expedition is therefore marshaled at Nevis over the next couple of weeks from all the surrounding English islands, eventually comprising 700 men of the Duke of Bolton's regiment, 500 from Thornhill's, 400 from Antigua, 300 from Montserrat, 600 from Nevis, 400 Royal Marines, plus 100 of Codrington's "Captain General's Guard." It is decided to use this force to recover Saint Kitts, therefore 10 men-of-war, 2 Royal Navy fireships,

Lawrence Wright

Little is known about Wright's early life beyond the fact that he was of humble birth. He was first appointed in 1665 by George Monck, the 1st Duke of Albemarle, as lieutenant of the hired merchantman Baltimore. Next year, Wright served aboard the duke's flagship, the Royal Charles, against the Dutch in the Four Days' Fight and St. James' Day Battle. He also served as a lieutenant aboard four other warships over the next two years.

In 1670, Wright was assigned to HMS Newcastle in Vice Adm. Sir Edward Sprague's Mediterranean squadron. On his return to England two years later, Wright was briefly named as first lieutenant of the royal yacht Mary, before being promoted to captain of HMS Nonsuch late in 1672. His lack of influence made it difficult to keep this 42-gun warship properly provisioned and at sea. When hostilities ceased and the Nonsuch returned from Spain to be paid off in October 1674, Wright was also charged with wrongdoing. The king was present at a meeting of the Admiralty Commission on November 14 (O.S.), where Wright and eight other captains were found guilty of transporting merchandise from Spain aboard their warships. Charles ordered all their wages stopped until this value was repaid.

Wright complied, and on January 28, 1676 (O.S.), was given command of HMS Phoenix. He left Woolwich in April, pausing at Portsmouth to pick up gunpowder and passengers for Jamaica. But although the Phoenix was to have been stationed at Port Royal, the Governor Lord Vaughan found it "leaky and of little use," so Wright sailed it home by August 1677. After three brief assignments, he was ordered on May 27, 1679 (O.S.), to relieve Capt. David Lloyd of HMS Reserve. Wright did so a week later, and that same year he escorted a merchant convoy and fishing fleet to Newfoundland.

On June 19, 1682 (O.S.), he was again given command of the royal yacht Mary, which he retained until Charles's death two and a half years later. James II confirmed Wright in this position on April 27, 1685 (O.S.), but he gave it up to assume command of HMS Foresight on March 6, 1687 (O.S.), which was to carry Christopher Monck, 2nd Duke of Albemarle, out to Jamaica as its new governor. Wright also shifted into HMS Assistance that same July 27 (O.S.), so as to remain at Port Royal. And when Albemarle died in office in October 1688, Wright sailed his remains and widow home.

He arrived at the end of May 1689 to find William III on the throne and war declared against France. Wright briefly commanded HMS Exeter and Dunkirk, before being named commodore aboard HMS Mary that October, with orders to prepare for a West Indian campaign. He was also made a member of the councils of Barbados and the Leeward Islands. But his first major command ended in bitter disputes, therefore Wright faced several charges on his return. Although acquitted at his court-martial in May 1693, he was never again employed at sea. He served as commissioner at Kinsale, the smallest of the Royal Navy dockyards, until it was closed in May 1713. Six months later, he died in London.

and 20 island brigantines and sloops get under way by the evening of June 29.

SUMMER 1690. The Spaniards send a second expedition from Veracruz against the logging establishments in the Laguna de Términos, surprising the baymen, burning 80 vessels, and destroying their camps.

EARLY JUNE 1690. In the Caymans, Laurens de Graaf captures a coast-guard sloop out of Jamaica, learning that the English are contemplating a joint operation with the Spaniards of Santo Domingo against French Saint Domingue (Haiti). De Graaf immediately carries a warning to Governor de Cussy, arriving before July.

JUNE 29, 1690. On Saint Domingue, Governor de Cussy leads 400 militia cavalrymen, 450 buccaneers, and 150 blacks through the Plains of Artibonite toward the Spanish frontier town of Santiago de los Caballeros. After a lengthy march through the jungle, the French are ambushed on July 5 within a mile and a half of this objective, their rearguard suffering more than 40 killed before the Spaniards can be driven off. Santiago is nonetheless occupied the next day but found to be empty, so de Cussy burns it to the ground and retires by July 7. Reaching Artibonite on the 14th, he disbands his army the next day.

JUNE 30, 1690. Reconquest of Saint Kitts. At 1:00 a.m., a large expedition appears before Frigate Bay, south of this island's French capital of Basseterre. Governor de Guitaud has been forewarned of the English plan, so deploys 1,000 troops in trenches opposite this beach to dispute Codrington's disembarkation. The English governor general consequently orders his troops at sunrise to remain aboard while a naval bombardment is essayed, which proves unable to dislodge the defense—Capt. Richard Kegwin of the 50-gun HMS Assistance dies during this action. Therefore, Codrington alters tactics toward evening, stealthily setting 600 men ashore overnight south of Frigate Bay at Petite Saline under Thornhill and Gov. Nathaniel Blakiston of Montserrat. The governor general assists this flanking maneuver by sending his frigates in a diversionary attack north against Basseterre, drawing off 300 French defenders.

On the morning of July 1, Thornhill's men march down a hill upon the French rear, while Codrington simultaneously lands another 600 men in Frigate Bay. Caught between two fires, de Guitaud's followers break and flee, allowing the entire English army ashore at a cost of only 10 killed and 30 wounded. Codrington immediately strikes out along the beach toward Basseterre at the head of the Duke of Bolton's regiment, while Thornhill parallels his advance inland. About a mile from Frigate Bay, 1,100 French defenders make a stand, but after a half-hour's desperate fight they are defeated, streaming off into the interior. Codrington occupies deserted Basseterre, then lands artillery from his ships.

Next day, the English advance and reoccupy their former capital of Old Road Town and, on the morning of July 3, encircle the last remaining French stronghold: the 20-gun Fort Charles at Cleverley Point, just north of Brimstone Hill, near Mount Misery. De Guitaud has sought refuge inside this rectangular stone fort with 150 soldiers, 250 planters, and 80 other individuals. Codrington's gunners manhandle two large siege pieces atop Brimstone Hill and open fire by July 10, seconded by the fleet offshore. Approach trenches are dug, and at least two dozen more artillery pieces are installed over the next fortnight before the French eventually sue for terms on July 22. Their surrender is finalized four days later, and the French are obliged to evacuate their half of Saint Kitts for Saint Domingue (Haiti).

JULY 22, 1690. The veteran French rover Pierre le Picard leads a flotilla against Rhode Island in retaliation for Phips and Jacob Leisler's strikes against Canada. These raiders disembark at Block Island, where they plunder its inhabitants. News of this attack reaches the mainland, and a reconnaissance sloop sets out from Newport next day. The following night, Picard attempts to penetrate Newport itself, drawing off when his forces are detected.

Three days later (July 27), Rhode Island's governor, John Easton, commandeers the 10-gun sloop Loyal Stede in the Newport roadstead, placing it and 60 men under the retired privateer Thomas Paine, who sorties on July 30 accompanied by a smaller consort under Capt. John Godfrey, as well as with numerous soldiers on board. Picard has meanwhile moved off to attempt New London, so Paine and Godfrey gain Block Island without sighting the French. Next afternoon, though, the two New England sloops see Picard's large bark and a large and smaller sloop bearing down upon them. Paine retreats into a defensive position in Block Island's shallows so as to be able to concentrate his gunners upon a single side. The French, mistaking the two vessels for coastal traders, hurry a piragua before them. Paine's gunner opens fire too soon, missing the leading boat and thus warning Picard that his opponents are armed. The French piragua retreats, and Picard's ships bear down together, initiating a brisk firefight at 5:00 p.m. that lasts until nightfall, in which the French suffer 14 killed, including Picard's second-in-command. Paine has 1 dead and 6 wounded, and Picard makes off next morning with both New England sloops in hot pursuit, compelling the raiders to scuttle their merchant prize.

JULY 29, 1690. After Saint Kitts's fall, Governor General Codrington detaches Thornhill to attack the isolated French garrison on Sint Eustatius. This force arrives and calls upon its 60 French defenders to surrender. They refuse, so Thornhill disembarks 350 men next morning and, while advancing upon Fort Orange, perceives Dutch flags in a nearby wood. The former governor, Lucas Schorer (see "April 3, 1689" entry), has earlier arrived from Sabá with 100 men on a foraging expedition, but he now withdraws rather than join his English allies in the forthcoming siege.

Five days later, the French garrison surrenders without losses on either side, the inhabitants being transported to Saint Domingue (Haiti). The English retain Sint Eustatius until 1693, when they are obliged by William III to restore it to Dutch rule.

AUGUST 19, 1690. Quebec Campaign. In Massachusetts, Sir William Phips sails northeast from Hull with 32 vessels and 2,000 men, determined to assault Quebec City on his own and thereby secure New England's borders from French raids (despite the fact that the campaigning season is far advanced and the expected arms and ammunition have not yet arrived from England). Another large force of militia and Indians is to advance up the Hudson River, threatening Montreal.

Eleven days later, Phips's 32 vessels and 2,000 men sight Cape Breton, and on August 31 (O.S.), Eldridge's America Merchant captures a French fishing boat near Île Percé, where Phips disembarks and burns some houses. A few more prizes are taken as this fleet slowly gropes its way up the Saint Lawrence Seaway, Clutterbuck and Ingerston taking soundings in the lead as the New Englanders lack knowledgeable pilots. Tadoussac is not reached until September 23 (O.S.), and the expedition does not crawl within sight of its objective until October 15.

They find that Quebec's garrison of fewer than 200 men and 12 guns under 70-year-old Gov. Louis

Flight of the Wild Geese

When the Protestant Willem of Orange landed in southern England to depose James II in November 1688, most towns in Ireland were taken over by Irish Catholic troops. Only the Protestant garrison at Derry resisted and became besieged. After James fled London, he was supported in his efforts to regain the throne by Louis XIV of France. The exiled monarch therefore landed at Kinsale on March 12, 1689 (O.S.), to initiate his campaign with the help of 6,000 French troops. James promised to send Louis an equal number of Irish recruits.

The ensuing struggle was remembered in Ireland as the "War of the Two Kings" or the Jacobite War. James marched to Dublin, then led his army to join the 1,200 besiegers outside Derry by April 18 (O.S.). English warships appeared offshore by June 11 (O.S.), while a strong Protestant militia out of nearby Enniskillen harried the Catholic forces. A major Protestant victory at Newtonbutler on July 28 (O.S.) caused the Catholic forces to retreat and lift their siege of Derry. A Williamite army under the marshal Frederick Schomberg then landed in Ballyholme Bay on August 13 (O.S.) and advanced inland. Winter brought a halt to fighting.

Impatient, William reached Belfast in June 1690 with 300 vessels, disgorging troops to create an army 36,000 strong. He bested James on July 1 (O.S.) at the Battle of the Boyne River, thus the Catholic monarch once more fled to France. His embittered supporters retreated back through Dublin, while many deserted. The rebellion might have ended there if William had not dictated such harsh terms. Jacobite foot soldiers were pardoned, but Catholic officers and gentry were to be stripped of all their rights. They fought on from behind the Shannon River in western Ireland and repulsed an assault on Limerick. William left late that year, giving command to his Dutch general, Godert de Ginkell.

In 1691, 20,000 Williamite troops advanced and won a crushing victory in July at Aughrim. Galway fell without a struggle, and Limerick was besieged. Its despairing Irish defenders under Patrick Sarfield, Earl of Lucan, removed the French garrison commander on September 23 (O.S.) and requested terms from Ginkell. He proved generous. Jacobites could stay in Ireland by swearing loyalty to William or go into exile in France along with their families.

About 14,000 troops choose to emigrate, leaving along with 10,000 civilians. Their departure became known as the "Flight of the Wild Geese." Many of these troops served with distinction in the armies of France, and later in Spain. Their descendants attained high positions in the Spanish American empire. Those who remained were betrayed, as the Protestant-dominated Irish Parliament refused to honor Ginkell's generosity.

de Buade, Comte de Frontenac et Palluau, has recently been reinforced by troops from Montreal (no longer threatened because the Americans' Hudson River expedition has advanced no closer than Lake George before turning back due to desertions and indiscipline). His own ships now suffering from smallpox and increasing cold, Phips anchors three miles below Quebec City on October 16 and sends an officer to demand its surrender, which Frontenac refuses. Next morning, Phips advances upriver with four ships to create a diversion by bombarding its battlements, while 1,300 New Englanders are disembarked at Beauport under Maj. John Walley. A one-sided duel ensues between Phips's wooden ships and Frontenac's stone ramparts, until the former is obliged to cut his cables and drift out of range. Walley fares no better, his poorly supplied troops suffering bitterly from the elements and being unable to puncture the French defenses. By October 22, their plight has become so desperate that Walley reembarks.

Phips hopes for a second chance but is left with no other choice than to retreat when heavy gales begin blowing up a few days later. After pausing off northern Île d'Orléans to repair his most-damaged ships—and fortuitously obtain supplies when the French bark Nôtre Dame de la Conception is intercepted arriving from La Rochelle with pork, flour, and salt—the New Englanders are remorselessly swept back out to sea. Three other French merchantmen are chased a few days later but disappear in a blinding snowstorm. During their return passage toward Massachusetts, Captain Rainsford's Mary is wrecked on Anticosti Island with 60 men, while Phips limps into Boston at the end of November with six ships missing (all but three eventually reappearing).

AUGUST 23, 1690. Commodore Wright returns to Barbados with his fleet in anticipation of the hurricane season.

LATE AUGUST 1690. D'Iberville appears off York Fort (Hudson's Bay) with three small French ships bearing 30 guns and 80 men, only to be driven off by a 36-gun English frigate. He then attacks the New Severn outpost, 250 miles southeast, which is blown up by its commander, Thomas Walsh, before he flees without offering resistance.

OCTOBER 1690. Wright's fleet rejoins Governor General Codrington at Saint Kitts to assault Guadeloupe, but he instead is ordered home to England. Wright therefore clears for Barbados again, arriving by January 9, 1691, to prepare for his transatlantic crossing.

NOVEMBER 9, 1690. Spain's West Indian squadron—the 300-ton flagship San José (alias Marabuto) of Adm. Jacinto Lope Gijón; the 250-ton vice-flag San Francisco Xavier of Francisco López de Gámara; the 300-ton San Nicolás of Bartolomé de Villar y Aguirre; plus the auxiliary Santo Cristo de San Román—reaches Santo Domingo with the 16-gun, 140-ton French prize Saint Joseph (soon renamed Nuestra Señora de la Concepción y San José), which is placed under the admiral's son, Sebastián Gijón.

The squadron finds Santo Domingo's inhabitants alarmed by the recent French incursion against Santiago de los Caballeros (see "June 29, 1690" entry). Some 2,600 militiamen having already mustered at the capital, they now troop aboard the Spanish warships, swelling their complement of 827 sailors and marines. This expedition then departs on December 21, circling east around the island, while another 700 Spanish cavalymen advance overland under Gov. Francisco de Segura Sandoval y Castilla to reoccupy Santiago and meet this first contingent on the north coast.

Both units rendezvous near Manzanillo Bay by January 14, 1691, pressing farther west toward the French frontline town of Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien).

JANUARY 21, 1691. La Limonade. When news of this Spanish invasion reaches Governor de Cussy, he rushes forth to give battle with only local forces, not waiting for reinforcements from the rest of Saint Domingue. Completely underestimating the Spaniards' abilities and resolve, the defenders make a stand at Savane de la Limonade ("Lemonade Plain") outside Cap François, relying on their superior musketry—despite being outnumbered 3,000 to 1,000.

The invaders crush the buccaneers in an hour-and-a-half confrontation on the morning of January 21, springing 300 hidden lancers out of the tall grass at the battle's height—while the French companies are reloading—to achieve a close-quarters melee in which they kill the French governor and more than 400 followers, against 47 Spanish dead and 130 wounded. The attackers then rampage through Cap François and its district on the next day, eventually making off with 130 slaves and the Spanish offensive in 1691 against the French establishments of northwestern Hispaniola.

300-ton Saint-Malo vessels Saint Thomas and Triomphant of 22 and 24 guns, respectively (renamed Nuestra Señora de Atocha and Nuestra Señora de la Concepción), while destroying much more.

EARLY FEBRUARY 1691. The Marquis d'Eragny, new governor general for the French West Indies (see "Late January 1690" entry) reaches Fort Royal (modern Fort de France, Martinique) with 14 men-of-war and other reinforcements.

LATE FEBRUARY 1691. Commodore Wright, having received fresh counterorders against returning to England from Barbados, rejoins Governor General Codrington at Antigua. The two leaders then quarrel over the latter's proposed invasion of Guadeloupe, as the commodore's crews remain weak and sickly, his four best ships having already been detached and replaced by six hired merchantmen.

Nevertheless, a large expedition gathers at Codrington's insistence, to be escorted by Wright's Mary (flag), Tiger, Assistance, Bristol, Antelope, Hampshire, and Jersey; the frigates Guernsey and Swan; the fire-ship Saint Paul; the ketch Quaker; plus the hired merchantmen Success, Princess Ann, Wolf, Experiment, and Dumbarton. Three Brandenburg privateers with 400 men also join this enterprise, bringing its total numbers to 3,000 men. The fleet gets under way by March 31, intending to occupy Marie-Galante as a preliminary step toward assaulting Guadeloupe.

MARCH 1691. In New York City, Maj. Richard Ingoldsby's troops, having arrived from England in January, begin restoring Crown rule from self-appointed Jacob Leisler. The latter refuses to vacate Fort James, provoking an armed confrontation on March 17 (O.S.) in which two soldiers are killed and several others wounded. Two days later, the new royal governor designate, Col. Henry Sloughter, arrives, to whom Leisler hastily surrenders his fort. Having created numerous enemies during his year-and-a-half reign, Leisler and his son-in-law Jacob Milborne are subsequently tried for treason and executed on May 16 (O.S.)—although their estates are later restored to their families and the attainder reversed.

APRIL 6, 1691. Governor General Codrington and Commodore Wright materialize before Marie-Galante. Next day, the Duke of Bolton's regiment disembarks under Maj. Edward Nott to subdue the 240-man French garrison under Gov. Charles Auger, while Wright's squadron circles northwestward to reconnoiter Guadeloupe, 16 miles away. After a week's skirmishing, Nott rounds up all of Auger's followers, deporting them to Martinique. The entire English expedition thereupon steers for Guadeloupe.

MAY 1, 1691. Defense of Guadeloupe. Appearing off the west coast of this island, Codrington's and Wright's fleet bombards the town of Le Baillif in passing (four miles north of its capital, Basse-Terre), before proceeding toward Anse à la Barque to effect their disembarkation. The French governor, Pierre Hencelin, sick in bed, misconstrues this maneuver as a feint so detaches his aide de Bordenave with only 25 riders to shadow this movement. However, Codrington leads his army ashore two to three miles south of the Anse and sends Major Nott ahead with 500–600 men to secure its heights. De Bordenave ambushes this vanguard from above, checking its advance for three hours before finally being outflanked, killed, and his riders scattered.

Next day, Codrington's main body encounters 500 Frenchmen drawn up behind a barricade at Rivière des Vieux-Habitants under Major Le Cler. Distracting the defenders with a 250-man frontal assault, Codrington sends Col. Rowland Williams in an encircling maneuver, which surprises the French in the evening and sends them fleeing toward Le Baillif. At 10:00 a.m. on May 3, the English encounter another barricade at the Duplessis River, carrying it after four hours of heavy fighting. The demoralized French thereupon stream back past Fort La Madeleine, Le Baillif, and Basse-Terre without making another stand.

Nathaniel Blakiston enters the abandoned capital with 400 men by May 4, and Codrington orders it set ablaze, while making his headquarters just outside. He then initiates a protracted siege against the last remaining French stronghold, Fort Saint Charles. By May 23, with his sick lists grown alarmingly long, the English commander receives word from HMS Antelope that a French squadron has appeared off the coast with reinforcements for the defense. They prove to be the royal warships Hasardeux of Jean-Baptiste Ducasse, Mignon of the Chevalier d'Arbouville, Émerillon, and Cheval Marin, accompanied by three hired 20-gun merchantmen and four lesser craft, bearing two infantry companies and 600 flibustiers from Martinique. Having passed to windward of Dominica, Ducasse frees Marie-Galante from English occupation during his passage, then stealthily begins depositing reinforcements at Gosier in the Grande-Terre section of Guadeloupe by the evening of May 23.

Next morning, Wright removes his sailors from Codrington's siege operation and, after viewing Ducasse's squadron from a distance, suggests that the governor general reembark his army and forsake the conquest of Guadeloupe. Codrington's staff—their morale sapped by disease and torrential rain—concurs, obliging the governor general to comply. On May 25, Codrington's expedition stands away from Guadeloupe in defeat, Wright's squadron now being reduced to the vessels Mary, Assistance, Jersey, Antelope, Hampshire, Tiger, and the fireship Saint Paul. After two days beating about the Saintes, Codrington sails for Antigua with his remaining transports, escorted by the Antelope and the Jersey, while Wright steers for Barbados with the remainder of his squadron. Arriving there sick, the commodore will turn over command to his flag captain Robert Arthur and sail for England by June 28, 1691 (O.S.). Codrington will send charges after him, accusing Wright of "cowardice and falseness" as well as of sympathizing with the French. Others will also severely criticize his actions, attributing the failure at Guadeloupe to him.

(Wright will land at Kinsale in Ireland to recuperate, writing in September to say that he will proceed to London as soon as he is well enough to travel. An arrest warrant on suspicion of high treason is issued on September 22, 1691 (O.S.), and Wright is eventually brought to trial. He is acquitted, however, at his court-martial on May 20, 1693 (O.S.), the court pronouncing the charges "malicious and rising out of private resentment." Yet Wright will never again be employed afloat and will not be named as commissioner of the navy at Kinsale until May 1702.)

Ducasse meanwhile proceeds back into Martinique, then transfers his ships to Saint Croix on August 2, 1691, to avoid a yellow fever outbreak, which kills the French governor general d'Eragny and many others in the Windward Islands. By August 7, Ducasse sails again for Port-de-Paix (Haiti), where his two warships and single corvette lose 250 men before this disease finally abates. On October 1, a letter reaches him from Paris, appointing him governor of Saint Domingue in succession to de Cussy.

AUGUST 11, 1691. The 34-year-old major Peter Schuyler, with 300 New York militiamen and Iroquois warriors, fails to carry the French outpost at Fort Laprairie (Quebec), although inflicting heavy casualties upon its garrison. While retiring southward, the attackers are then overtaken by 700 pursuers, who kill 83 of the invaders before Schuyler's survivors can win free.

JANUARY 26, 1692 (O.S.). A band of Penobscot and Kennebec Indians—incited by Gov. Joseph Robinau de Villebon of French Acadia—make a surprise winter raid against the English frontier outpost of York (Maine), killing or capturing about half its people before withdrawing.

FEBRUARY 27, 1692 (O.S.). In Nassau (Bahamas), a mob of "desperate rogues, pirates, and others" free the rough-hewn colonel Cadwallader Jones from prison, restoring him to office as governor.

MARCH 2, 1692. A Jamaica-bound merchant convoy appears between Guadeloupe and Désirade, escorted by Commo. Ralph Wrenn, new commander in chief at Barbados (having arrived January 26 in succession to Wright). Wrenn has earlier made one sweep vainly searching for enemy ships. He then detached two of his vessels to cruise independently against the French before quitting Barbados on February 27 with his 48-gun flagship Norwich; the 62-gun Mary under the acting captain Richard Wyatt; the 48-gun Diamond of Clinton (or possibly Christopher) Maund; the 46-gun Mordaunt of Henry Boteler and Antelope of Henry Wickham; the hired frigate England of Captain Stubbs; plus an unnamed merchantman.

In light weather, the English sight the Comte de Blénac—now restored to office as French governor general for the West Indies following the death of d'Eragny—barring their path with his 62-gun flagship Vermandois (named in honor of the admiral of France, Comte de Vermandois), as well as Vaudricourt's Vaillant, Contré-Blénac's Léger, Pontac's François, de la Floclière's Émerillon, Sainte-Marie's Faucon, Vieuxpont's Droite, Roussel's Basque (or possibly Brusque), Valbelle Saint-Symphorien's Chasseur, Pradine's Solide, Julien's Bouffone, Du Buisson's Jersey (English prize), de La Caffinière's Neptune, and five lesser craft. Heavily outnumbered, the English edge away to leeward, hoping to protect their convoy.

Next morning, de Blénac bears down and engages at 8:00 a.m. Mistaking the Mary for Wrenn's flagship, the French commander assaults it with four men-of-war, while the Mordaunt and the frigate England also become hard-pressed. Through skillful handling, Wrenn works his convoy free by noon, then stands away southward, regaining Barbados three days later without losing a single vessel. The English commodore, like many other new arrivals, subsequently dies of illness on March 26 (O.S.).

JUNE 30, 1692. Seven corsair vessels appear off Campeche and drop anchor 18 miles northeast to occupy the smaller port of Jaina for 19 days.

JULY 1692. Santa Marta (Colombia) is sacked by a band of French flibustiers.

AUGUST 19, 1692. Le Moyne d'Iberville reaches Quebec City, having escorted a French convoy across the Atlantic with his two frigates. His hope of continuing around into James Bay to eradicate its English outposts is dashed when Governor General de Frontenac judges the season too far advanced.

Le Moyne d'Iberville must instead prowl the coast of New England, taking three prizes, before sailing for France that November.

AUGUST 29, 1692 (O.S.). A Hudson's Bay Company captain, 52-year-old James Knight, reaches York Fort (Ontario) with the vessels Royal Hudson's Bay, Dering, Pery, and Prosperous, bearing 213 men.

Port Royal Cataclysm

When the British fleet hurried away from Jamaica in late June 1655, it left behind thousands of sickly soldiers. Uneasy because of their precarious grip on the island, the dwindling number of healthy Englishmen decided a couple of weeks later to create a defensible base. A site was chosen at the westernmost tip of the narrow land spit enclosing Caguaya Bay, which the English dubbed "Cagway Point." By ferrying limestone out of the Port Henderson Hills opposite the spit, a 20-gun, rectangular stronghold soon began to take shape. It was named Fort Cromwell that same October.

The stone citadel was complete enough to receive a regiment withdrawn from the mainland by January 1656. These troops had to bivouac amid the spit's low scrubland dunes in tents. Still, it was healthier because of the cool sea breezes and sandy subsoil that prevented puddles. As fears of a Spanish reconquest faded, thousands of settlers began arriving from the Leeward Islands. Huts and shacks gave way to more permanent structures, most clustered around Cagway's anchorage.

By July 1657, the Commonwealth Commissioner William Brayne noted that there was "the fair beginning of a town upon the point of this harbor," where he intended "all our storehouses and trade shall be, which will soon make it a flourishing place." A governor's residence and state storehouse were erected, while private plots were surveyed in 60-foot widths to face the inner harbor. A church was started by early January 1658, and a smith's forge was built the next month. By August, there were at least three rows of houses on the point, and land was becoming scarce by the next year.

When it was learned from London in August 1660 that the Commonwealth had collapsed and Charles II was on the throne, Fort Cromwell was renamed Fort Charles, and Cagway became Port Royal. Privateering helped boost its prosperity, until merchant trade rose. By 1680, the city's population had grown to almost 3,000 people. Many African slaves were imported to clear and operate ever-larger estates inland. Despite being hit by hurricanes in 1683 and 1684, Port Royal continued to blossom. Naval activity and the erection of three more forts added to its growth.

But at 11:40 a.m. on Wednesday, June 7, 1692 (O.S.), an earthquake struck Port Royal with such ferocity that most of its northern section slid into the water. Two rows of houses and 2,000 of 6,500 residents were swallowed up. Another 2,000 people died from the ensuing tidal wave, which even burst open the graveyard. Such a dramatic catastrophe was widely seen as divine punishment. Port Royal's role as a buccaneer haunt even led some moralists to label it "the wickedest place on earth," although it had not been all that licentious compared to other seaports.

Frightened survivors nonetheless shifted over to the mainland, while the council considered sites along the harbor's inner shoreline for a new city. A hog crawl was purchased for £2,000 from its absentee owner, Col. William Beeston. Within six weeks of Port Royal's destruction, this new settlement was named "Kingston" in the council's minutes. Yet little construction immediately began, as many Port Royal residents chose to rebuild on their original land spit. And the loss of all harbor defenses except for Fort Charles and part of Morgan's Line tempted the French of Saint Domingue (Haiti) to mount an assault in June 1694.

A Draught of the Harbours of Port Royal and Kingston, by Richard Jones. Port Royal is at the westernmost tip of the land spit.
(Patrick Browne, The Civil and Natural History of Jamaica, 1756)

OCTOBER 16, 1692. In the Windward Islands, the 48-gun HMS Norwich of Capt. Richard Pugh explodes at anchor, going down with all hands.

JANUARY 28, 1693. In upper New York State, a force of Caughnawagas led by the Frenchman Nicolas d'Ailleboust de Manthet captures 300 Mohawks during a raid against their villages. They are forced to withdraw after the appearance of a relief column under Schuyler.

MARCH 10, 1693. The 37-year-old Sir Francis Wheler, recently promoted Rear Admiral of the Blue, reaches Barbados from England with his 68-gun flagship HMS Resolution; the 52-gun Dunkirk of James Ward; the 42-gun Advice of Charles Hawkins, Chester of Thomas Heath, Ruby of Robert Deane, and Tiger of Thomas Sherman; the 40-gun Dragon of William Vickars; the 36-gun frigate Falcon of Nathaniel Browne; the 32-gun frigates Experi- ment of James Greenaway, Mermaid of William Harman, and Pembroke of George Warren; the hired merchantman London of William Orton; the store-ship Canterbury of Robert Leonard; the 10-gun ketch Quaker of John Anderson; an unnamed bomb vessel; plus three fireships. (HMSS Diamond and Mordaunt are still on this station, along with the 28-gun frigate Guernsey of Edward Oakley and the 24-gun Henry Prize under Richard Finch.)

Wheler's fleet is accompanied by 28 troop transports bearing Gen. John Foulke's and Colonel Godwin's regiments, intended to eliminate the last enemy holdings in the Lesser Antilles, to unite with the Spaniards to drive the French out of Saint Domingue (Haiti), then to continue north to New England to aid its colonials in assaulting Canada.

Gov. James Kendall immediately begins raising 900 volunteers on Barbados, as well as sends a sloop to Antigua to advise Governor General Codrington of the expedition's arrival. It is then agreed among these leaders to attack Martinique, for which purpose the Chester and the Mermaid are detached from Barbados to escort Codrington's contingent toward a rendezvous.

MARCH 25, 1693. To assert Spain's claim to the entire Gulf of Mexico coastline, Captain de Pez sets sail from Veracruz to identify suitable sites for a stronghold and town. He is accompanied by the cleric and cosmographer Dr. Carlos de Sigüenza y Góngora, a professor at the Royal University of Mexico, who is to conduct the actual survey. They choose uninhabited Pensacola Bay, erecting a large wooden cross at its entrance, before returning into Veracruz by May 13.

Two days afterward, a second 25-man Spanish reconnaissance party under Laureano de Torres y Ayala and Fr. Rodrigo de la Barreda also arrives from Havana at Apalache, traveling overland into Pensacola Bay by July 2 for a second probe.

De Pez meanwhile departs Mexico for Spain aboard the plate fleet in July, arriving by December to obtain authorization for a large-scale occupation of the bay. He will not return until two years later.

APRIL 9, 1693. Repulse at Martinique. Wheler and Foulke's expedition departs Barbados, augmented by 10 island sloops bearing 900 volunteers (bringing total strength to 32 ships of various sizes, 9 barks, 3 brigantines, 2 ketches, and a galliot). Two days later, this formation circles north around Martinique and heads down its western shoreline, shadowed on land by French militia cavalymen under Col. François de Collart. Governor Gabaret concentrates his forces at Fort Saint Pierre, yet much to his surprise, the English then sweep past Pointe d'Arlet and Pointe du Diamant and stand into Cul de Sac Marin, where there are no defenses and scarcely 60 militiamen on duty under Capt. Charles Auger.

Next morning, April 12, Foulke disembarks 1,000 troops at nearby Anse de Sainte-Anne, followed by another 1,300 soldiers and 1,500 sailors before sunset. The English intend to get their land forces safely ashore, then approach the island's defenses from the rear. Wheler and Foulke begin this process on the morning of April 13 by sending 30 boats, supported by a galliot and two barks, to overrun the Rivière Pilote settlement. After being briefly checked by 60 reinforcements hurried down from Saint Pierre under Capt. Henri de Saint-Amour, the invaders ravage the surrounding countryside. At noon of April 15, the English again use 5 barks, 3 brigantines, and 28 boats to leapfrog farther west and devastate more plantations.

By April 19, Governor General Codrington arrives from the Leeward Islands with another four English ships, four brigantines, and two barks, bringing 1,300 volunteers in three regiments under Rowland Williams, Nathaniel Blakiston, and Godfrey Lloyd. Foulke's army is already becoming sickly, therefore the English decide to abandon their land strategy and reembark their troops by April 22. After failing to find any safe disembarkation points near Cul de Sac à Vaches, Wheler proceeds farther northward on April 27, throwing his marines ashore just north of Fort Saint Pierre at Canouville two days later. They try to expand this landing zone by advancing southward but are checked by Collart's cavalry and militia that are hastening up under François le Vassor and Giraud du Poyet. Further French reinforcements arrive this same night under Governor General de Blénac, whose 100-man contingents under Saint-Amour, Christophe Renaudot, and Nicolas Le Febvre de Méricourt foil another attempted marine breakout the next morning. Codrington's men then try probing southward, only to be thrown back by Collart and Auger.

Defeated at every turn, the English eventually reembark by the evening of April 30, abandoning Martinique. This operation has cost them 800 killed, wounded, or captured, with many others remaining ill. Codrington hopes to salvage something from this debacle by attacking Guadeloupe, yet Wheler refuses once his fleet staggers into Dominica, citing orders against remaining in the Caribbean later than the end of May. The volunteers disperse, and Wheler escorts Codrington back to Saint Kitts, dismissing the notion of uniting with the Spaniards to attack Saint Domingue and instead proceeding directly toward New England.

JUNE 22, 1693. Wheler arrives in Boston from the West Indies with a sickly fleet, supposedly to cooperate in a venture against Quebec. However, disease is so rife among his crews and no colonial contingent has assembled, so after a series of consultations with Governor Phips and other members of the council, it is decided to forego the invasion scheme.

JULY 2, 1693. Capt. James Knight attacks Fort Sainte Anne (formerly Albany Fort in James Bay, Ontario) with the Royal Hudson's Bay, the Pery, and the Prosperous, taking it with little opposition.

AUGUST 13, 1693. Wheler's squadron exits Boston, continuing northeastward to overrun the tiny French island of Saint Pierre off Newfoundland. However, his strength is by now so enfeebled that the French positions in Placentia Bay cannot be assaulted, so he circles around to Newfoundland's eastern coast to replenish supplies before striking out into the North Atlantic by September 22 (O.S.).

SEPTEMBER 20, 1693. In the West Indies, the 48-gun HMS Diamond of Capt. Henry Wickham is captured by the French. (Wickham is subsequently court-martialed and sentenced to life imprisonment, eventually being released on the accession of Princess Anne in March 1702, although never reinstated into the Royal Navy.)

DECEMBER 1, 1693. In the Lesser Antilles, the 46-gun HMS Mordaunt of Capt. Francis Maynard is lost with all hands.

JANUARY 16, 1694. The French missionaries Louis Pierre Thury and Sébastien de Billie lead 230 Indians in an attack against Oyster Bay (Maine), killing 100 English settlers.

JANUARY 23, 1694. After decades of nuisance raids against their sugar plantations by bands of cafuzos or renegade slaves, 1,000 Portuguese militiamen under Domingos Jorge Velho and Bernardo Vieira de Mello assault the main quilombo or settlement of these runaways at Macaco (modern União dos Palmares, Alagoas) in the densely jungled Serra da Barriga range in northeastern Brazil. The defenders, under their 39-year-old leader Zumbi, successfully resist the initial attack from behind their triple palisades, as well as a second assault six days later. However, the Portuguese bring up artillery and breach the palisades at dawn of February 6, massacring several hundred inhabitants. Zumbi, despite two wounds, manages to escape—only to be betrayed eventually and captured on November 20, 1695, with a score of his adherents, and executed.

APRIL 1694. Off Dominica, the 42-gun HMS Chester of Capt. William Julius drives an 18-gun French privateer ashore, which takes fire and explodes.

LATE APRIL 1694. The French privateer Charles François Le Vasseur de Beauregard departs Saint Domingue (Haiti) with 400 flibustiers aboard six small vessels to probe eastern Jamaica. He takes a

New England ship but the next day is sighted by the 36-gun coast-guard frigate HMS Falcon and is chased until he loses his prize.

When Beauregard reenters Petit Goâve shortly thereafter, he finds the 54-gun, 900-ton royal warship Téméraire; the 50-gun, 550-ton Envieux; and the Solide, recently arrived with a merchant convoy from France. Governor Ducasse decides to employ them against the English, dispatching this powerful trio into the Falcon's patrol area to seize the Royal Navy vessel—despite a stout resistance—before marshalling all his forces for a surprise invasion.

EARLY JUNE 1694. Ducasse sorties from Petit Goâve aboard the Téméraire under its flag captain Chevalier du Rollon, accompanied by the Envieux and the 44-gun, 400-ton royal warship Hasardeux. Off Cape Tiburon (southwestern Haiti), he gathers a fleet totaling 22 sail and 3,164 men to steer west against Jamaica.

JUNE 27, 1694. Assault on Jamaica. Ducasse's expedition appears off the eastern tip of this island in a fresh morning gale. Eight of his vessels remain off Port Morant, while the 14 others anchor in Cow Bay, 15 miles east of Port Royal. Here, the French learn that the English have been forewarned of their invasion scheme by the escaped privateer captain Stephen Elliott, so Ducasse's plan of storming directly into Port Royal has to be altered because du Rollon refuses to risk the king's ships in such a hazardous undertaking. Consequently, 800 men are landed under Beauregard to march eastward, plundering and destroying everything in their path. Boats are also sent around from Port Morant to ravage the northeastern shores, the English under their 58-year-old governor, Sir William Beeston, being reluctant to sally for fear of dividing their smaller forces with the enemy host still to windward.

On July 1, the elderly Téméraire drags its anchors, being carried downwind to Bluefields Bay along with another French vessel. Ducasse is encamped ashore so continues directing land operations until July 27, when he musters the bulk of his fleet in Cow Bay, threatening Port Royal. Beeston sorties to counteract this French deployment, at which Ducasse quickly reembarks his men under cover of darkness and sends all but the three largest ships with his deputy Laurens de Graaf to assault Carlisle Bay (35 miles farther west). This contingent anchors by the afternoon of July 28, landing 1,400–1,500 flibustiers that same night. Next morning, they assail its 250-man English garrison under Col. Thomas Sutton; Beauregard commands the van, while de Graaf directs the main body. After driving the defenders back, foraging parties are sent out to scour its countryside, and when Ducasse joins a few days later, booty is transferred aboard his flotilla. The French then weigh anchor on August 3 and, by August 14, are back in Petit Goâve.

AUGUST 14, 1694. Less than a month after escorting a convoy from La Rochelle into Quebec City, Le Moyne d'Iberville departs in command of his loaned royal ship Poli, accompanied by the Salamandre under his younger brother Joseph, Sieur de Sérigny. After three years of frustrated attempts, they intend to circle around and attack the English fur-trading outpost of York Fort in Hudson's Bay.

AUGUST 31, 1694. Seven French ships are defeated off Ferryland (Newfoundland) by the English ships William and Mary.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1694. D'Iberville appears off the Hayes River (in Hudson's Bay, Canada) with the Poli and the Salamandre. They disembark a force to besiege the English fur-trading outpost of York Fort and call upon it to surrender October 13. Gov. Thomas Walsh and his 56 men capitulate next day, despite being well armed.

York Fort is renamed Fort Bourbon, and the victors spend the winter there.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1694. Governor Beeston sends the only three Royal Navy warships at Jamaica—the Advice of Capt. William Harman, the 46-gun Hampshire, and the 32-gun Experiment—plus a fire-ship and two barks, to beat upwind toward Saint Domingue to exact some measure of vengeance for Ducasse's raid. The village of L'Esterre near Léogâne is bombarded between 8:00 a.m. and 3:00 p.m. of October 11, during which Harman is wounded; his formation then bears down upon Petit Goâve, only to sheer off when they realize Beauregard is prepared to receive them. A few huts are burned on Ile à Vache (southwestern Haiti) before the Jamaicans disappear back over the horizon, Harman dying on October 16.

APRIL 10, 1695. An expedition begins arriving at Saint Kitts under Commo. Robert Wilmot, comprised of the 60-gun, 350-man warships Dunkirk (flag) and Winchester of Capt. Thomas Butler, the 48-

Robert Wilmot

Nothing is known about Wilmot's birth and early life. He must have already been a veteran sea officer when he received his first naval commission on July 1, 1689 (O.S.), from the Earl of Torrington. Wilmot rose rapidly through the ranks during King William's War. After serving briefly as second lieutenant aboard Torrington's flagship HMS Exeter, then on HMS Breda, Wilmot was given command of the fireship Cygnets on May 10, 1690 (O.S.). He was present at the Battle of Beachy Head, then was named captain of the fireship Hopewell that August. While sailing the elderly, 62-gun HMS Dreadnought from Portsmouth to the Nore, it "foundered by her leakiness." Wilmot was acquitted for its loss at his court-martial on December 8, 1690 (O.S.), and appointed next January to the equally aged HMS Crown of 48 guns.

In command of the hired ship Wolf, he escorted convoys to Newfoundland and Virginia in 1692. The next April, he was appointed to HMS Elizabeth of 70 guns, which helped bring Sir George Rooke's Mediterranean squadron into Torbay by June 22, 1693 (O.S.). Two days later, Wilmot fought a duel ashore with Ens. Matthew Roydon of Col. Richard Ingoldsby's 23rd Regiment of Foot, who was serving aboard as part of a marine contingent. The challenge occurred because Roydon had insulted Wilmot many times; Wilmot killed Roydon and was arrested.

He was apparently released on April 25, 1694 (O.S.), to return aboard the Elizabeth and take part in the bombardment of Dieppe. Wilmot then left his ship again on July 31 (O.S.) to stand trial at Exeter. He was acquitted and returned aboard the Elizabeth by August 18 (O.S.). Two months later, he was named commodore for the expedition to the West Indies. He was given HMS Dunkirk as his flagship on November 1 (O.S.) and set sail from Plymouth with his fleet by January 22, 1695 (O.S.).

It was hardly surprising that such a vigorous, able officer argued with his well-born army counterpart, Colonel Lillingston.

gun Ruby and Reserve, the frigate Swan, the fireships Terrible and Firebrand, 14 transports, a store ship, a hospital ship, and 3 hired merchantmen, all of which bear more than 1,200 soldiers under the veteran, 42-year-old colonel Luke Lillingston. The fleet has been rushed across the Atlantic in response to Ducasse's descent upon Jamaica (see "June 27, 1694" entry).

During his crossing, Wilmot has detached the Swan to call upon the president of the audiencia of Santo Domingo, proposing a joint Anglo-Spanish assault against the French half of the island. Meanwhile, Lillingston's small army disembarks at Saint Kitts to recuperate, 130 of its members already being dead and another 400 ill, leaving 700 effectives. After arguing over strategy, Wilmot and Lillingston reembark and continue their voyage by May 8, making toward Saona to receive the Spaniards' reply.

The Swan is awaiting them off that island, along with the 46-gun HMS Hampshire, which has earlier conveyed Col. Peter Beckford from Jamaica to visit the Spanish and, on London's suggestion, also proposed a coordinated operation. The Spaniards have accepted, and Wilmot and Lillingston travel to Santo Domingo's capital aboard three men-of-war and a fireship to confer with their newfound allies, while the main English fleet circles north through the Mona Passage into Samaná Bay. An agreement is struck with Gov. Gil Correoso Catalán, whereby he will lead 1,500 Spanish troops across the island to rendezvous with the English expedition at Manzanillo by May 12.

MAY 10, 1695. Having circled around from the capital of Santo Domingo, Wilmot and Lillingston sail westward out of Samaná Bay to unite with their Spanish allies. The Swan takes soundings in the lead, and two days later the Hampshire, the Reserve, and the Terrible are sent ahead to blockade Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien), where some French ships are believed to lie. The main English expedition meanwhile anchors off Monte Cristi, and a day or so afterward contacts Correoso's Spaniards at Bayahá.

Wilmot proceeds to Bayahá to disembark Lillingston's troops and also join Spain's West Indian squadron or the Armada de Barlovento under Commo. Francisco Cortés—being comprised of the decrepit 450-ton flagship Santo Cristo de Maracaibo, the 300-ton frigate San Nicolás, and the auxiliary Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe (alias Tocoluta).

MAY 24, 1695. Invasion of Saint Domingue. The combined Anglo-Spanish force crosses the border, shouldering aside 300 heavily outnumbered French defenders under the district's flibustier chieftain and lieutenant du Roi or "King's lieutenant," Laurens de Graaf. Two frigates and two fireships meanwhile enter the harbor and occupy deserted Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien) on May 29, so when the allied army arrives overland, it finds the buildings already pillaged. They will therefore continue their march along the coast, resentfully wreaking destruction among its plantations.

Wilmot's warships—reinforced by two Jamaican privateers and a galliot—keep pace by weighing anchor on June 10, pausing at Baie de la Cul six miles west of Cap François, then blockading Port-de-Paix three days afterward. Wishing to beset its defenders before they can mount an organized resistance, Wilmot sets 400–500 men ashore at nearby Saint Louis, driving the enemy inside the walls, until the combined army arrives overland on June 25. The French garrison under Maj. Jean Bernanos remains besieged, until they eventually attempt to break out two hours before dawn of July 15. This evacuation is betrayed to the foe, who ambush the heavily laden French column—hampered by 150 terrified women and children—and massacre many members in the darkness, including Bernanos.

Having thus secured Port-de-Paix, the victorious commanders fall out among themselves over the division of spoils, marking an end to this joint enterprise. When Wilmot suggests resuming the offensive farther south against Léogâne and Petit Goâve, Lillingston seconds the Spaniards' refusal. Disappointed and with sickness thinning their ranks, the allies part company on July 27, the English heading for Jamaica to refit while the three Spanish warships touch first at Santo Domingo before proceeding to Cuba.

SEPTEMBER 1695. Le Moyne d'Iberville leaves a 70-man garrison under Gabriel Testard de La Forest to hold Fort Bourbon in Hudson's Bay (Canada), while he sails for La Rochelle with a rich cargo of pelts. He arrives there by October 9.

SEPTEMBER 13, 1695. After recuperating at Port Royal (Jamaica) and delegating four warships to remain behind, Wilmot decides to return to England with the remnants of his sickly squadron: the vessels Dunkirk, Winchester, Experiment, Terrible, and Firebrand. He encounters dreadful weather and dies at sea off the Cuban coast on the afternoon of September 25.

Nine days later, HMS Winchester under the acting captain John Soule runs aground in the night on the Florida Keys and is wrecked. A brigantine in company, bound for New York, rescues 110 survivors, only 10 of whom are healthy. The rest of the squadron struggles into the James River in Virginia by October 16 to recuperate. They will resume their homeward passage one month later and eventually reach home, much depleted.

FEBRUARY 1696. A private expedition under the naval officer Jean-Baptiste Gennes staggers through the Strait of Magellan to raid the Spaniards in the Pacific. Upon its departure from La Rochelle on June 3, 1695, his squadron consisted of a half-dozen ships bearing 720 men; it is now so reduced by diseases contracted in Africa that the French shortly thereafter quit the South Seas, returning to Europe via Ilha Grande (Brazil) and the West Indies.

LATE MAY TO EARLY JUNE 1696. The 44-year-old French captain and naval inspector general Bernard Renau d'Elissagaray—better known as “Petit-Renau”—reaches the West Indies with his 98-gun flagship Intrépide; the 54-gun, 850-ton Gaillard; the Pontchartrain; plus the frigates Inconnu and Renau. Henri Louis's (the Marquis de Chavagnac) Gaillard captures a rich 36-gun Cartagena merchantman on June 29 after a hard-fought, five-hour battle 50 miles outside Havana, during which it suffers 30 casualties while disabling a third of the Spaniard's 260-man crew.

Aside from this isolated victory, plus a couple of English prizes taken, Petit-Renau's primary mission—being a skilled military engineer trained under Vauban—remains to assess France's military fortifications in the Caribbean before returning home that same summer, without participating in any further offensive operations.

JULY 14, 1696. D'Iberville and naval captain Simon de Bonaventure arrive from France with two frigates, capturing the English frigate Newport near Saint John's (Newfoundland).

EARLY AUGUST 1696. D'Iberville relieves French Acadia by lifting the blockade of Fort La Tour at the Saint John River mouth (modern Portland Point, New Brunswick), capturing an English frigate and driving off two others.

AUGUST 4, 1696. Admiral de Pez departs Veracruz with his Armada de Barlovento, which consists of his flagship Santísima Trinidad of 56 guns and 350 men; Vice Adm. Guillermo Murphy or Morfi's vice-flagship Maracaibo of 46 guns and 250 men; the Rosario with 42 guns and 240 men; the Guadalupe with 26 guns and 130 men; and the Jesús, María y José with 22 guns and 100 men. These vessels will escort two combined plate fleets across to Havana, arriving on August 25. Rather than wait to accompany them into the Strait of Florida, as is customary, de Pez prefers to sally with his squadron alone, which has been laid up for a long time.

AUGUST 15, 1696. D'Iberville besieges the English garrison at Fort William Henry (Pemaquid) with 25 Acadian regulars and 240 Abenakis under 44-year-old Jean-Vincent d'Abbadie, Baron de Saint Castin. The English commander, Capt. Pascoe Chubb, surrenders almost as soon as the French set up their batteries and is restored to Boston along with his 92 followers, while Fort William Henry is destroyed.

AUGUST 28, 1696. Capt. William Allen recaptures Fort Bourbon (originally York Fort, in Hudson's Bay, Canada) with three Royal Navy frigates, two lesser vessels, and 400 men.

OCTOBER 3, 1696. The 68-gun, 1,100-ton French warship Bourbon; the 36-gun, 300-ton Aigle and its sister ship the Favori; the 32-gun, 300-ton frigate Badine; and the 30-gun, 500-ton flûte Loire arrive at Martinique in the West Indies under Comodore Chevalier des Augiers. Guided by the renegade English privateer John Philip Beare, they will slip into the roadstead at La Guaira on October 26, masquerading as Spain's West Indian squadron or Armada de Barlovento. They will capture the 40-gun Spanish ship, used to resupply nearby Margarita Island, by cutting it out before the batteries can react.

OCTOBER 29, 1696. Newfoundland Offensive. The 45-year-old governor Jacques François de Mombeton de Brouillan departs Placentia Bay with three ships to destroy the English settlements farther northeast, in grudging cooperation with Pierre Le Moyne d'Iberville, who sets off overland with another contingent on November 1. Both units rendezvous at Ferryland, 50 miles south of Saint John's, and destroy the coastal fisheries while advancing upon the English capital.

Saint John's surrenders on November 30 after a brief siege and is put to the torch while d'Iberville's subordinate, Capt. Jacques Testard de Montigny, continues obliterating fishing settlements. By the end of that winter, late in March of 1697, only Bonavista and Carbonear remain in British hands, the French having killed 200 Englishmen, captured 700, and destroyed three-dozen villages during this campaign.

NOVEMBER 11, 1696. Spanish admiral de Pez stands out of Havana with the five ships of his Armada de Barlovento, reaching Puerto Rico by December 15. Two weeks later, his squadron puts out to sea once more, bound for Santo Domingo, en route intercepting the French merchantmen Saint-Louis and Americaine.

JANUARY 6, 1697. This morning off Caucedo Point, Admiral de Pez's five armada warships sight four large sail. When the Spaniards bear down upon them, the strangers hoist the colors of England and Holland, Spain's allies. After sending an officer aboard to make a brief inspection, de Pez continues his cruise.

He has been duped, however; the ships are actually the French royal warships Bourbon, Bon, Favori, and Badine under the Chevalier des Augiers. Having gained the weather gauge and the advantage of surprise, they steal down upon de Pez's formation that same night and open fire. The armada scatters in panic, de Pez himself making directly for Cuba while his vice-flagship Maracaibo is captured, the Guadalupe and the Jesús María flee inshore, and the Rosario heads for Santa Marta.

An embarrassed admiral returns into Veracruz on April 5, having lost his vice-flagship and failed to deliver his situados to the Spanish Main.

Over and above their regular complements of 2,300 sailors, these ships are carrying 1,750 soldiers and a large siege train for a projected assault against Cartagena. Although late in the war, this venture has been authorized with the aim of securing a major prize before peace can be concluded. France's bankrupt royal government has provided Pointis with warships and men, yet his financing has been raised by private investors who expect to be reimbursed out of his booty. The fleet is to be further augmented by a contingent of local flibustiers, but when Pointis's flagship arrives before Petit Goâve on March 16, he is infuriated to learn that only a few hundred await him, the rest having dispersed because of lengthy delays attending his European departure. Relations worsen a day later when a French naval officer arrests an unruly boucanier ashore, touching off a riot in which two or three others are killed. Only the personal intervention of Governor Ducasse succeeds in calming this mob.

The freebooters are then further offended to learn of the secondary role they are being offered in this enterprise, the question of their shares being kept especially vague, and Ducasse is excluded from any position of command. Nevertheless, they enlist in goodly numbers once Pointis publishes a proclamation stating that they will participate "man for man" with his royal crews, while Ducasse offers to go as an individual ship captain aboard his 40-gun Pontchartrain, commanding only his island contingent. Pointis therefore sails on March 19 to rejoin his fleet (which has meanwhile entered the Golfe de la Gonâve), as Ducasse prepares his followers to meet at the agreed rendezvous off Cape Tiburón.

Some 170 soldiers, 110 colonial volunteers under Joseph d'Honon de Gallifet, 180 free blacks under Jean-Joseph de Paty, and 650 buccaneers are raised, sailing aboard the 20-gun Gracieuse; the 18-gun Cerf Volant, Saint Louis, and Serpente; the 16-gun Dorade; the Pembroke (English prize); the Marie-Françoise of Captain La Villeauglamats from Saint-Malo; plus other vessels (among them, apparently, the ex-HMS Jersey and Augiers's prize "Christe," being the ex-Spanish Santo Cristo de Maracaibo; see "January 6, 1697" entry). After weathering a brief storm, this contingent joins the main French fleet off Cape Tiburón by March 28, then on April 8 both sight the Spanish Main.

APRIL 13, 1697. Siege of Cartagena. The French expedition arrives, and an immediate disembarkation by the buccaneers is proposed at Playa Grande, near Hicacos Point northeast of the city, but is cancelled after Ducasse and Pointis personally reconnoiter its shoreline, finding it lined with dangerous reefs. The attackers therefore decide to force the Bocachica harbor entrance farther to the south, and on the afternoon of April 15, Ducasse and Pointis go ashore at Los Hornos with 1,700 troops and 1,100 buccaneers.

While preparing to besiege Bocachica's 33-gun, 150-man (only 15 being regulars under Capt. Sancho Jimeno de Orozco) Fort San Luis, the buccaneers capture a coaster arriving from Portobelo and drive off Spanish reinforcements stealing down from the defenders' main concentration at Cartagena in boats. San Luis surrenders after being stormed on April 16; 6 French soldiers and seven buccaneers die during this assault and another 22 are wounded—including Ducasse. His flibustiers continue temporarily under the orders of his second-in-command, Honon de Gallifet.

Pointis installs 170 men into Fort San Luis, works his fleet into its bay, then continues his drive north by both land and sea toward Cartagena, finding its next redoubt—Fort Santa Cruz, also nicknamed Castillo Grande or “Big Castle”—abandoned by the Spaniards, as Gov. Diego de los Rios y Quesada has only 750 regulars with which to defend his city. At this point, the French admiral orders his buccaneers to traverse the bay and circle behind Spanish lines, seizing the Nuestra Señora de la Popa high ground, while his own 2,000-man army advances overland. The buccaneers occupy the heights unopposed, and Fort San Felipe is outflanked by a landing at San Lázaro Beach, then stormed by Pointis and his rear admiral de Coëtlogon. The attackers' two contingents thus reunite by April 20 and institute siege proceedings against Cartagena's Getsemaní suburb, defended by aged, gout-ridden Capt. Francisco Santarén with 700 men.

Approach trenches are dug, and artillery is landed from the French fleet. Pointis has been wounded in a leg by a sharpshooter's round, so he supervises this work from a litter. On April 28, the bombardment begins against Getsemaní's walls, and during a lull on April 30, Ducasse (now recuperated from his own injury) visits a Spanish officer at the gate and notices that a breach has been made. At Ducasse's urging, Pointis orders a general assault for 4:00 p.m., and in bloody fighting, French grenadiers and buccaneers fight their way into the suburb and right up to the very edge of Cartagena. The defenders' morale collapses, and by evening of May 2, white flags are hoisted upon the walls. While finalizing terms, Pointis learns that a 1,000-man Spanish relief column is approaching, so he sends Ducasse's buccaneers with several hundred soldiers to oppose them.

Pointis occupies Cartagena on May 4. The relief column never appears, and by the time Ducasse and his men return, they find the city gates closed and learn that they are to be billeted in the impoverished, devastated suburb of Getsemaní. The French commander in chief fears that the unruly buccaneers will violate his carefully arranged capitulation terms, so he keeps them outside the walls, away from where the booty is being tallied. The few surviving Spanish inhabitants are obliged to surrender most of their riches, and the plunder eventually totals 8 million French crowns. The buccaneers expect a quarter and are outraged on May 25 to discover that they are to receive only a paltry 40,000 crowns. Unknown to them, the crews aboard Pointis's royal warships have been serving for only a small percentage, which explains what the admiral meant when he deceitfully offered them shares “man for man.” By now, the plunder is aboard Pointis's men-of-war, ready to depart.

Furious at being duped, the buccaneers argue for several days, then swarm back into Cartagena on May 30—over Ducasse's protests—to round up every Spaniard they can find, inflicting tortures until they extort an additional 1,000 crowns per buccaneer. Pointis meanwhile quits the scene on June 1 with his heavily laden fleet, but the buccaneers do not return aboard their ships until June 3, weighing four days later.

JUNE 6, 1697. Five days after quitting Cartagena, Pointis's 10 warships and 2 auxiliaries are sighted at sundown by an Anglo-Dutch battle fleet under the 53-year-old vice admiral John Neville, sent specifically into the West Indies with his flagship HMS Cambridge and other vessels to counter this French expedition. After rendezvousing with Commo. George Mees's squadron and 8 Dutch ships under Commodore Hoogenhoeck at Barbados on April 27, Neville's fleet has prowled as far west as Jamaica, searching for the French.

Departing Port Royal on June 4, they at last spot their quarry, and the next morning, June 7, they give chase. The allied fleet totals almost 30 sail, among them the Monmouth of 66 guns; the Rupert of 64; the Pembroke under Capt. James Studley (later John Litcott) and the Sunderland under Capt. Roger Bellwood, both of 60 guns; the Trident of 54; the Newcastle of 52; the Colchester, Lincoln of Capt. Nicholas Dyer and Warwick of 50 each; the Bristol of 48; the hired ships Princess Anne, Gosport, and Virgin; as well as Hoogenhoeck's 72-gun Hollandia, 4 fire-ships, and the bomb ketch Lightning. Pointis's outnumbered, overburdened vessels—most of their crews dead or diseased following Cartagena—are in no condition to fight, so reverse course and run. HMS Warwick of Capt. Anthony Tollet gets near enough to exchange shots with the rearmost French ship and takes a small auxiliary laden with slaves and booty. Pointis eventually forms a line of battle, expecting a full engagement, but only duels with Capt. Stephen Elliott's Bristol before succeeding in pulling away.

Over the next two days, the French succeed in outrunning their pursuers, until Pointis estimates that he is only 60 miles from Cartagena, so he steers due west during the night. By dawn of June 10, he has eluded his enemies, the only losses being a Spanish prize that lags behind and is recaptured by the Princess Anne of Capt. William Wakelin and Hoogenhoeck's Hollandia. Because the chase has also carried Neville so near to Cartagena, the British admiral pays a visit before roaming northeastward again and, on June 25, sights Ducasse anchored with eight buccaneer vessels off Sambay. The English and Dutch pursue once more, capturing the Gracieuse and the 50-gun Christe (ex-Spanish Santo Cristo de Maracaibo), while driving the Saint Louis of Capitaine Charles hard aground, although he and his crew escape ashore—only to be hunted down by the Spaniards, captured, and put to work rebuilding Cartagena's defenses.

Meanwhile, Neville detaches four men-of-war to pursue Ducasse's remaining vessels, which scatter toward Saint Domingue (Haiti). The 40-gun Cerf Volant of Capitaine Macary is driven on to Saint Domingue's coast by Royal Navy captain Thomas Dilkes, but the rest of the French raiders arrive safely—complaining bitterly of Pointis's deceitfulness. (A prolonged litigation ensues, eventually resulting in slightly larger shares being paid by Pointis's backers to the defrauded buccaneers.)

JUNE 29, 1697. After chasing Ducasse, Neville visits Spanish Santo Domingo to regroup.

JULY 1697. The 37-year-old commodore John Norris reaches Saint John's (Newfoundland) from England aboard his 70-gun flagship HMS Content—captured from the French in January 1695—accompanied by four fourth rates, four frigates, two bomb ketches, and two fireships, plus 2,000 troops under 60-year-old Scottish general Sir John Gibsone. This expedition is intended to recover the English fisheries that have been destroyed by the French the previous autumn.

But on August 2, a report arrives that five French ships of the line are in nearby Conception Bay under the 57-year-old vice admiral André, Marquis de Nesmond, prompting the local English authorities—over Norris's objections—to order his expedition to remain inside Saint John's Bay and strengthen its defenses. The English commodore is therefore unable to fulfill his mission and sails for England by October.

JULY 3, 1697. From Santo Domingo, Neville detaches Commodore Mees with nine vessels to raid the French half of this island. Before daybreak of July 8, the latter disembarks several hundred men a mile east of Petit Goâve and advances with a pair of smaller craft and numerous boats in support offshore, to take the town by surprise. Their approach proves so effective that Governor Ducasse barely manages to escape, bolting from bed out a window directly into the jungle. The French island capital is overrun and looted, and the raiders cause considerable damage before their men become inebriated and are obliged to repair back aboard ship by the appearance of a French relief column.

Mees sails away to rejoin Neville a few days later, and after touching briefly at Jamaica, the reunited English fleet proceeds toward Havana to escort the Spanish treasure convoy across the Atlantic. Mees dies aboard his flagship Breda on July 30, two days before the Cuban capital is reached. Cuba's Spanish governor indicates that there is no need for Royal Navy protection, so Neville continues to Virginia, where he, too, succumbs aboard the Cambridge on August 17 (O.S.). Eventually, Dilkes conducts the surviving vessels home.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1697. D’Iberville reappears off the Hayes River mouth (in Hudson’s Bay, Canada) with his 44-gun frigate Pélican, having become separated from three other French consorts. Next day, he is attacked by the 56-gun HMS Hampshire of Capt. John Fletcher, the 36-gun private frigate Dering, and the 32-gun Royal Hudson’s Bay, resisting them for four hours. The Royal Navy ship strikes a shoal and sinks with all hands, while the Royal Hudson’s Bay surrenders, only to be driven aground by a sudden storm, along with the Pélican. Eighteen of d’Iberville’s men drown while attempting to swim through the icy waters, and Capt. Michael Grimington’s Dering escapes.

D’Iberville’s three consorts appear by September 8, and five days later Gov. Henry Baley surrenders York Fort. The French leader installs his brother Joseph, Sieur de Sérigny, as its new governor, then departs later this same month, before winter can set in. D’Iberville will reach France in November.

SEPTEMBER 9, 1697. The 39-year-old major John March repulses a war party of 200 Indians and several Frenchmen on the banks of the Damariscotta River and thus prevents a descent upon eastern Maine.

In Europe, Britain and France sign the Treaty of Rijswijk on September 20, 1697, which brings an end to this war. By its terms, both countries largely agree to restore each other’s possessions in the New World, although Newfoundland and Hudson’s Bay are generally conceded to England and Acadia to France.

DARIEN DISASTER (1698–1699)

On October 11, 1698, the Scottish ship Unicorn and its tender Dolphin drop anchor at Saint Thomas in the Danish Virgin Islands, being part of a larger flotilla that is conveying 1,200 people to establish a Scottish commercial settlement at Darien. Robert Pennecuik, Robert and Thomas Drummond, William Paterson, and other leaders of this ill-conceived venture are so unfamiliar with the Spanish Main that they must hire the retired privateersman Robert Allison (see “April 15, 1680” entry in “Irregular Warfare”) to pilot them on to their destination. Both ships rejoin the main body off Vieques Island, where Allison goes aboard the flagship Saint Andrew to direct its helmsmen, getting under way again by October 18.

NOVEMBER 10, 1698. The Scots sight Golden Island (Panama) at dusk and the next day begin exploring the mainland nearby. After establishing friendly relations with the natives, the flotilla enters a harbor on November 15 to erect their settlement, christening the anchorage as Caledonia Bay, with the town of New Edinburgh to be added later. Disease is already thinning their ranks, and the Scots build their first fort on a sandy promontory too deep within the bay and are compelled to relocate two months later. Living conditions prove extremely difficult, no trade appears, and by mid-December rumors of a Spanish counterexpedition reaches their ears.

JANUARY 16, 1699. Andrés de Pez, commander of Spain’s West Indian squadron (the Armada de Barlovento), reaches Portobelo from Cartagena with the warships Trinidad, Rosario, Guadalupe, and the 6-gun sloop San José y las Animas to eradicate the new Scottish settlement near the Gulf of Darien. Convinced his four warships are inadequate for a sea-borne descent upon that outpost, he proposes to the president of the audiencia of Panama—Pedro Luis Enríquez de Sevilla, Conde de Canillas de los Torneros de Enríquez, ennobled more than six years previously while serving as corregidor of the wealthy Bolivian mining center of Potosí—that 500 seamen be marched across the Isthmus and reinforced for an attack against the Scottish groups’ rear. This strategy is agreed to by the president, who contributes two companies of regulars toward the venture.

De Pez and his men leave Panama City by March 9 and gather volunteers as they advance; but the jungle trails grow increasingly difficult, particularly when seasonal rains set in, bringing progress to a halt six miles short of their objective. De Pez is obliged to retreat, further hurried along by rumors of an English squadron bearing down upon Portobelo, where only anchor watches remain, careening his vessels.

This English threat never materializes, nonetheless, de Pez loses 90 men through desertion during his campaign plus another 80 because of illness. Despite being ordered by Canillas to remain at anchor off Portobelo, de Pez sails for Cartagena that same summer and arrives in late July. News is then received that the Scots have abandoned Darien because of disease, internal strife, and lack of profitability.

JANUARY 17, 1699. Rear Adm. John Benbow arrives in Carlisle Bay (Barbados) with a small squadron from England to conduct peacetime patrols and diplomatic overtures with the Spaniards at Portobelo and the Danes on Saint Thomas. His crews suffer a heavy mortality rate from disease before returning home.

JUNE 24, 1699. The private ships Maurepas of 50 guns and 180 men and Phéypeaux of 44 guns and 150 men, both commanded by Jacques Gouin de Beauchesne, reach the tip of South America to penetrate the Strait of Magellan and trade along the Spanish empire's Pacific coast. Over the next year and a half, Beauchesne will conduct business in these forbidden waters, at times resorting to force, thereby establishing a precedent for other French imitators.

High Tide of Empire (1700–1777)

One must admit that we have been very unfortunate;
just when we could hope to see the campaign end with glory, everything turned against us.

QUEEN ANNE'S WAR (1702–1713)

In Europe, King Charles II of Spain dies on November 30, 1700, leaving the Habsburg archduke Charles of Austria and the 16-year-old French Bourbon princeling Philip of Anjou, grandson to the expansionistic King Louis XIV of France, as nearest claimants to the throne. The French prince disembarks at Fuenterrabia on January 23, 1701, to be acclaimed by May as King Felipe V. Upon entering Madrid, he proclaims: “The Pyrenees are no more.” But rather than see Spain’s vast overseas territories added to the French empire, other European powers maneuver to contest this succession by championing the archduke’s claim. Clashes occur in the Low Countries.

Anglo-French tensions are further exacerbated when the exiled King James II dies at Saint Germain outside Paris on September 17, 1701. Louis XIV promptly recognizes the Stuart pretender’s son, James Edward, as the new king of England, despite angry protests from London. The English ambassador withdraws, and matters become even more complicated in March 1702 when the 51-year-old King William III of England breaks his collarbone while trying out a new horse, catches a chill, then dies shortly thereafter. As William III’s wife, Mary, has predeceased him, he is succeeded by his 37-year-old sister, Princess Anne. The hostilities that will erupt that ensuing summer, called the War of the Spanish Succession in England and on the Continent, will thus become known in England’s New World colonies as Queen Anne’s War.

JUNE 18, 1701. Spain and Portugal sign the Alfonso Treaty, whereby Colonia del Sacramento (Uruguay) is to be restored to Portuguese control.

OCTOBER 1701. Gov. Elias Haskett of the Bahamas is deposed by a mob for having arrested his popular predecessor, the mulatto privateer Read Elding.

NOVEMBER 14, 1701. In anticipation of European frictions spreading to the West Indies, 48-year-old John Benbow—now Vice Admiral of the Blue—returns to Barbados with 10 Royal Navy warships, then visits Martinique, Dominica, and Nevis, before reaching Port Royal (Jamaica) on December 16 to spend the winter.

JANUARY 2, 1702. In response to Benbow’s deployment, 64-year-old Vice Adm. François Louis de Rousselet, Comte de Château-Renault and Knight Grand Cross of the Order of Saint Louis, and his subordinate the Marquis de Nesmond, Knight of the Order of Malta, arrive at Fort Royal (modern Fort de France, Martinique) with a large fleet.

Both Paris and Madrid fear that Benbow’s West Indian foray is intended to capture a Spanish American treasure convoy, thereby inaugurating hostilities with a preemptive coup. They have therefore furnished Château-Renault with a Spanish commission, in addition to his French one, to defend the silver shipments.

After three weeks at Martinique, the French admiral is instructed to attack Barbados. Feeling such an enterprise to be beyond his fleet’s capabilities—having only 2,200 troops, a third of the English strength on Barbados—Château-Renault instead decides to sail for Havana to escort the Mexican plate fleet across to Spain.

JANUARY 13, 1702. An expedition of 235 Spaniards aboard nine coastal vessels returns into Campeche after having attempted to sweep the English logwood establishments from the Laguna de Términos. They were repelled, and their commander, the coast-guard captain Francisco Fernández, was wounded in a shoulder.

FEBRUARY 22, 1702. Château-Renault gets under way from Martinique, his flag transferred aboard the Fort. Upon reaching western Puerto Rico 10 days later, he detaches his weakest ships—the Merveilleux, the Invincible, the Monarque, the Orgueilleux, the Capable, the Juste, the Vainqueur, the Fourbe, the Constant, the Bizarre, the Saint Louis, and the Trident—toward France under de la Harteloire, while leading the remaining 15 ships of the line, 5 frigates, and 10 smaller craft into Léogâne (Haiti) by the next evening.

Earlier, his expedition has been augmented at Martinique by the frigates Naiade of Captain Belleville and Nieuport of Captain d'Aubigny; the corvettes Choquante of de Rochambault and Émeraude of de Sainte Osmanne; the transport Mercure of Comte d'Hautefort; and the dispatch-vessel Cheval Marin of du Dresnay.

After corresponding with the Spaniards in Cuba and Mexico for a month, Château-Renault puts out to sea again on March 19, seizes a New York sloop and two English brigantines in the Old Bahama Channel four days afterward, then reaches

Havana by April 9. Leaving his main body there under Nesmond, the French admiral exits on April 25 with the Bourbon (flag), four ships of the line, a frigate, and a fireship to traverse the Gulf of Mexico and meet the outward-bound Mexican convoy under its commander in chief, Luis Manuel de Velasco y Tejada, aboard his 70-gun flagship Jesús, María y José; Vice Adm. José Chacón Medina Salazar y Villaseñor, Marqués de la Peñuela, aboard the 54-gun Bufona; and the latter's younger brother, Rear Adm. Fernando Chacón Medina Salazar aboard a 54-gun hired merchantman. (Less than five years later, José Chacón becomes governor of New Mexico.)

The French contingent reaches Veracruz by May 5 and departs with the 14-ship Spanish formation on June 10–11. Upon reentering Havana on July 7, Château-Renault finds his main force decimated by death, disease, and desertion—Nesmond, Rosmadec, Pallas, and Château Morant being among the dead. Nevertheless, he sets sail by July 23–24 with 18 ships of the line, 6 frigates, and a half-dozen smaller vessels, escorting 3 Spanish warships and two-dozen merchantmen across the Atlantic toward Cadiz.

SPRING 1702. Spanish troops in Chile mutiny because of their eight years' arrears in pay, only to be subdued on orders from Gov. Francisco Ibáñez de Peralta, a knight of the orders of San Juan and of Malta.

MARCH 1702. Zambo and English raiders from the Mosquito Coast ravage Spanish settlements in Costa Rica's Matina Valley.

APRIL 1, 1702. An expedition of 128 Spaniards departs Villahermosa de Tabasco (Mexico) to attack the logwood settlements in the nearby Laguna de Términos, guided by a renegade Irish bayman named Archibald Macdonell. They return 18 days later with numerous captives, having successfully swept through the interloper camps.

MAY 15, 1702. In Europe, England and Holland officially declare war against the Franco-Spanish union, which reciprocates by July.

LATE MAY 1702. Between Spanish Florida and English Carolina, a Creek war party—armed and abetted by English traders—exterminates the Timucuan mission of Santa Fe de Toloco. St. Augustine's governor, José de Zúñiga y la Cerda, retaliates by dispatching 800 Apalaches into Creek territory later that same summer under Capt. Francisco Romo de Uriza. Anthony Dodsworth and other Carolina traders get wind of this plan at Coweta and quickly marshal 500 Creeks, who ambush the column on the Flint River and inflict heavy casualties.

JULY 3, 1702. Austria declares war against France and Spain.

JULY 14, 1702. Conquest of Saint Kitts. Learning of the official outbreak of hostilities, the new governor general for the English Leeward Islands—Christopher Codrington, son of the previous governor general who has passed away on July 30, 1698—descends upon the shared island of Saint Kitts with 1,200 men from Antigua and Nevis, disembarking south of its French capital of Basseterre.

The French colonists have only recently resettled their half of this island, after their expulsion during King William's War (see "June 30, 1690" in "King William's War"). Their new governor, Jean-Baptiste,

Vigo Bay

When the Mexican plate fleet and its French escorts emerged out of the Atlantic near Spain, they were warned that a huge Anglo-Dutch force was besieging Cadiz. The British admiral Sir George Rooke and Dutch lieutenant admiral Philips van Almonde had appeared before that port on August 23, 1702, slowly disembarking almost 14,000 troops. But ineptitude, discord, and cruelty toward the inhabitants prevented the allies from carrying the lightly defended city.

Since Cadiz was their destination, Château-Renault and Velasco altered course to enter Vigo Bay on September 23, 1702. Despite the frail and decayed defenses there, the Spanish treasure ships dropped anchor at the deepest point possible inside the bay. They began offloading their silver and merchandise, which eventually was carried inland by 1,200 carts. Their French escorts meanwhile formed a defensive line between the two harbor forts behind a temporary boom of masts. Local militiamen manned shore defenses and dug trenches.

When the Anglo-Dutch fleet left Cadiz six days later in defeat, Château-Renault and Velasco believed that all danger was past. But Capt. Thomas Hardy's 60-gun HMS Pembroke paused in the Portuguese port of Lagos on October 17, 1702, to take on water and learned of the fleet hidden in Vigo. When Rooke was told, he realized that it was a golden opportunity to offset his setback at Cadiz. By the afternoon of October 19, word reached Vigo that 150 enemy sail were bearing down upon the defenders.

The powerful Anglo-Dutch fleet pushed into Vigo's outer bay on the morning of October 22, 1702, led by Vice Adm. Thomas Hopsonn's 80-gun HMS Torbay. The inner defenses were overwhelmed the next morning when Gen. James Butler, Duke of Ormonde, landed with some 10,000 troops. Rooke's ships then fought their way past the boom and Château-Renault's line, only to find most of the Franco-Spanish vessels already ablaze. The defenders suffered some 2,000 killed and a like number wounded, compared to 800 dead and 500 injured among the attackers. Despite the crushing nature of Rooke's victory, he came away with only 15 prizes and a paltry £14,000 in booty. The millions in Mexican silver had been saved.

Comte de Gennes, can muster barely 160 men in the southern quarter, with another 240 under his subordinate de Courpon in the north around Pointe de Sable. Their English neighbors already have 1,300 volunteers under arms, and they assault the Ravine Guillon north of Basseterre, while Codrington's army closes in from the south and 24 British ships anchor offshore. De Gennes capitulates by July 16, and the French are once more expelled.

JULY 22, 1702. Benbow sorties from Port Royal (Jamaica) with his flagship Breda and a portion of his fleet to commence hostilities against the nearby French base of Léogâne (Haiti). Arriving 16 days later, he drives the 46-gun, 600-ton French troop transport Gironde aground, where it is burned by its crew. The English raiders destroy another two large merchantmen, as well as capturing another pair, along with a brigantine and a sloop. After cruising offshore for several days, the British learn of a French squadron reputedly bound for Cartagena and Portobelo under the 56-year-old French commodore Jean-Baptiste Ducasse (former governor of Saint Domingue; see "Intercolonial Friction"), so they set sail south to intercept it on August 21.

AUGUST 4, 1702. The privateer Captain Brown quits Jamaica with his 10-gun Blessing and 79 men—including the famous Edward Davis (see "June 12, 1684" entry in "Irregular Warfare")—to attack Tolú (Colombia). This town is apparently plundered, but Brown is shot mortally through the head and is succeeded by Captain Christian.

AUGUST 5, 1702. Some 40 Englishmen aboard a pair of launches attempt to disembark from two ships anchored off Arecibo (Puerto Rico), only to be surprised and repulsed by 11 Spanish troops and 20 mounted militiamen under Capt. Antonio de los Reyes Correa emerging from among the sand dunes. The Spanish slaughter 22 of the invaders at a cost of only one dead and three wounded among their own ranks.

AUGUST 8, 1702. Ducasse reaches Puerto Rico from Spain with a half-dozen ships of the line. Like Château-Renault, Ducasse has been promoted and given a Spanish commission in addition to his French one to be able to escort the Mexican viceroy designate, Francisco Fernández de la Cueva Enríquez, Duque de Albuquerque, across the Atlantic, along with eight Spanish transports bearing 2,000 troops.

After pausing at Puerto Rico, Ducasse detaches two men-of-war toward Mexico with the new viceroy, while touching at Santo Domingo to deposit the Spanish troops and collect important passengers. His next port of call is to be Santa Marta (Colombia), followed by Cartagena and Portobelo. He sets sail on August 28 with his 68-gun, 450-man, 1,100-ton flagship Heureux under Captain Bennet; the 50-gun, 350-man 1,000-ton Agréable of the Chevalier de Rency or Roussy; the 60-gun, 350-ton, 1,000-ton Phénix of the Chevalier de Poudens; the 50-gun, 300-man, 900-ton Apollon of de Muin; the 30-gun, 550-ton transport Prince de Frise of Lieutenant de Saint André; the fireship Marin of Cauvet; the merchant frigate Auguste of Saint Marc; the English prize galley Anne, and two other unknown auxiliaries.

AUGUST 30, 1702. Benbow's Last Fight. This morning, Ducasse's 10 sail are sighted off Santa Marta, just east of the Magdalena River mouth (Colombia), by Benbow's 70-gun, 460-man flagship Breda under the flag captain Christopher Fogg; the 64-gun, 445-man Defiance of Richard Kirkby; the 60-gun, 340-man Windsor of John Constable; the 54-gun, 280-man Greenwich of Cooper Wade; as well as the 48-gun, 230-man Falmouth of Samuel Vincent, the Pendennis of Thomas Hudson, and the Ruby of George Walton.

The Royal Navy squadron's strength is far superior to that of the French, who try to avoid action. By 4:00 p.m., the lead English ships overtake the French Apollon and Prince de Frise, opening fire briefly before the Defiance and the Windsor luff out of line. Over the next few days, the low-born English admiral will discover that Captains Kirkby, Hudson, Constable, and Wade are reluctant to obey his orders, thus hampering his efforts to overwhelm Ducasse's force.

Both formations steer westward this night, Benbow re-forming his line and giving instructions for all ships to close next dawn. Yet again, only the Breda and the Ruby join the fighting at sunrise; the latter becomes badly cut up and soon has to be towed off. Some broadsides are also exchanged this afternoon, and the English flagship sustains considerable damage aloft before night falls. The other captains still show little resolve on September 1, when the French moreover gain a favorable wind, allowing Ducasse to run with his lighter vessels in the van, the Phénix and the Agréable protecting his rear. Benbow pursues alone and fights this rearmost pair from 11:00 a.m.–2:30 p.m. Little occurs on September 2, but at 10:00 a.m. of September 3, the Breda and the Falmouth overhaul Ducasse's squadron—which has meanwhile detached the Prince de Frise—and at about noon recapture the English galley Anne.

Yet the French commodore persists on his southeasterly heading, now coming within 50 miles of Cartagena. This prompts Benbow to once more overtake and fight a night action with the Apollon, but his right leg is smashed by a French chain shot at 3:00 a.m. of September 4. Although carried below, Benbow returns to his quarterdeck to continue directing the action from a cot. Dawn reveals the Apollon dismasted and in danger of being boarded, thus obliging Ducasse to turn back to its rescue. The Defiance, the Windsor, the Pendennis, and the Greenwich again refuse to fight, sheering off to leeward after a token broadside. Only the Breda makes a stand, being severely mauled while the Apollon is towed off.

Ducasse enters Cartagena triumphantly on September 5, leaving a badly injured Benbow to limp back to Jamaica and court-martial his officers. Kirkby and Wade are condemned to death, Constable is cashiered and imprisoned, and Hudson dies on September 25 (O.S.). The admiral's leg is amputated, but he, too, succumbs on November 15. Rear Adm. Sir William Whetstone assumes temporary command over the Jamaica station until Vice Adm. John Graydon can come out from England. As for the French, the Agréable's commander, Louis de la Roche-foucauld Roye, Chevalier de Roussy, is rewarded by being elevated to lieutenant general and Marquis de Roye in December 1703—largely because he is the brother-in-law of France's navy minister.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1702. This morning, the 46-year-old commodore John Leake arrives off Bay Bulls (Newfoundland) escorting an English convoy with his 60-gun flagship HMS Exeter, the Assistance, the Montague, the Lichfield, and the Medway of 50–60 guns; two galleys of 32 guns; a fireship; and a sloop. Being informed by boat that there are two French ships loading at nearby Trepassey Bay and another

Admiral John Benbow

John Benbow was born on March 10, 1653 (O.S.), at Shrewsbury in England. The son of a tanner, he apparently went to sea aboard a merchantman at a young age. Few details of his early life are known prior to his joining the Royal Navy in the spring of 1678 as an experienced master's mate aboard the 66-gun HMS Rupert. He served so well against Algerian rovers in the Mediterranean that he was promoted to master of the 42-gun HMS Nonsuch on June 15, 1679 (O.S.).

While serving off North Africa in April 1681, Benbow was court-martialed for disrespect and sentenced to lose three months' pay. He left the Royal Navy after his ship returned to England and resumed his merchant career. While trading in the Mediterranean with his own frigate in 1686, Benbow beat off an attack by Sallee rovers, allegedly leaving 13 of their heads in Cadiz. When King William's War broke out against France in the spring of 1689, he immediately rejoined the navy and was commissioned on June 1 (O.S.) as third lieutenant aboard HMS Elizabeth. Despite his humble birth, he was appointed captain of the elderly 54-gun HMS York by September 20 (O.S.).

Benbow evidently won the favor of the new First Lord of the Admiralty—the influential Arthur Herbert, Earl of Torrington—because he began a rapid rise through the ranks. On November 12, 1689 (O.S.), Benbow was transferred to the problem-plagued, 100-gun flagship HMS Britannia. He was also named master attendant of the important Chatham Dockyard the next March and continued to serve at sea. That same summer of 1690, he was Torrington's master of the fleet aboard HMS Sovereign in the defeat off Beachy Head. His evidence helped acquit his patron at the subsequent court-martial.

Despite Torrington's fall from favor, Benbow remained employed at sea. He took part in the hard-fought victories at Barfleur and La Hogue in 1692, blasted Saint Malo with an explosive ship the next year, and then shelled Dunkirk in 1694. Rewarded by being named master attendant at Deptford, Benbow was promoted to rear admiral in 1695 and the next year helped blockade Dunkirk.

After hostilities ceased, Benbow was appointed commander in chief for the West Indies in March 1698. His tenure proved so satisfactory that he was given command of HMS Downs upon his return to England. When the War of the Spanish Succession threatened, he was promoted to Vice Admiral of the Blue on June 30, 1701 (O.S.), and sent back to the Caribbean with a fleet.

The reluctance of his subordinates to obey his orders off Santa Marta was attributed to his low birth. Having risen through the ranks, Benbow was remembered fondly by his seamen as "Brother Tar." Robert Louis Stevenson even gave his name to the fictional tavern in his classic novel Treasure Island.

pair of enemy warships lying at Plaisance (modern Placentia) Bay, he continues southward that same evening with his squadron.

On the morning of September 8, a small French ship is intercepted arriving from Martinique and four other sail are sighted off Cape Pine, so the commodore detaches the 60-gun Montague and 50-gun Lichfield in pursuit, which overhaul them by nightfall. Meanwhile, Leake and the rest of his squadron proceed into Trepassey Bay and cut out two anchored French ships at noon, before exiting and regrouping overnight. The next day, Leake detaches the Medway, the Lichfield, and the galley

Charles to raid Colinet Bay, while he stands toward St. Mary's that same afternoon to set landing parties ashore and burn all its French fishing installations. The English squadron continues prowling Newfoundland's southwestern coast for another week before Leake proceeds toward the Saint Lawrence Seaway and hovers outside the harbor of the French island of St. Pierre on September 12–13. He makes a few small captures there. The dispersed English warships eventually regroup and return into Saint John's by September 30.

OCTOBER 7, 1702. The 60-gun HMS Assistance and 32-gun galley Charles appear off Saint Pierre Island, south of Newfoundland, disembarking a force that burns its church and two houses. The 45-year-old governor, Sébastien Le Gouès, Sieur de Sourdeval, drives these attackers off with a cannon, yet the next day the English land several hundred men who besiege the French within their tiny keep. Sourdeval surrenders, and his colony is stripped bare. The English dump 52 other French prisoners ashore before sailing away to rejoin Leake at Saint John's.

Once reassembled, Leake's squadron departs for England, arriving on November 10 (O.S.). During his campaign in Newfoundland, his warships have sunk or captured 51 French vessels and leveled several settlements, for which he is promoted to rear admiral upon his return and offered a knighthood, which he initially declines.

OCTOBER 12, 1702. The hired French merchant frigate Auguste, detached from Ducasse's squadron, sustains a vigorous encounter with a Jamaican privateer in the West Indies before winning free and continuing toward France with dispatches.

OCTOBER 27, 1702. Approximately 580 English militiamen and 370 Yamasee warriors set sail aboard 14 vessels from Port Royal (Carolina) under Gov. James Moore and Col. Robert Daniel, coming ashore in Guala—the Spanish name for eastern Georgia—a few days later. At midnight on November 3, they surprise the guardhouse at San Pedro de Tupiqui at the northern extremity of Santa María or Amelia Island and kill its two sentries.

The English then rampage unchecked throughout these advance Spanish settlements, overrunning San Juan del Puerto by November 5, for Lt. Gov. Francisco Fuentes de Galarza is unable to mount any effective resistance. Finally, Moore sails with his flotilla to fall upon St. Augustine from out at sea, while Daniel takes the military contingent by boat up the Saint Johns River to approach this same place from overland.

NOVEMBER 4, 1702. The Jamaican privateer Charles Gant disembarks 300 men at Casilda on south-central Cuba and marches upon the nearby town of Trinidad, whose Spanish inhabitants flee. The buccaneers ransack its empty buildings and withdraw next day with more than 100 black slaves, plus considerable booty.

NOVEMBER 7, 1702. Repulse at St. Augustine. At 8:00 a.m., Spanish lookouts sight three English vessels heading south. Gov. José de Zúñiga has already learned of Moore and Daniel's attack farther to the north, so he braces for an assault. The next morning, 13 English sail are seen bearing down upon St. Augustine's bar, which prompts Capt. Luis Alfonso to remove his 16-man anchor watch from the royal frigate Nuestra Señora de la Piedad y el Niño Jesús and scuttle it to prevent capture. The 400 Spanish defenders under the elderly sargento mayor or "garrison commander" Enrique Primo de Rivera also stand to their arms, while the smaller frigate Gloria slips downriver toward the Matanzas exit that same evening, hoping to carry word to Havana.

On November 9, de Zúñiga learns from two Apalache scouts that another English force is approaching overland under Daniel, so he orders all inhabitants into St. Augustine's main citadel, San Marcos Castle. The English army appears the next day and occupies the deserted town, establishing their headquarters in its Franciscan mission; yet they are unable to carry the citadel, which shelters 1,500 people, plus several hundred cattle and other animals. San Marcos's artillery bombards the English until one of its pieces bursts, killing three Spaniards and wounding five others. Moore and Daniel meanwhile institute a loose siege, prompting de Zúñiga to raze many buildings around his fort to clear his field of fire.

Unable to damage San Marcos's ramparts with his light pieces, Moore detaches Daniel toward Jamaica to secure siege artillery. A lengthy pause ensues, during which the Carolinians dig emplacements and trenches while exchanging desultory bombardments with the fort. By December 19, approach lines are so close that 58 Spanish troops sally at midday and smash numerous gabions before being driven back inside with one dead and several wounded. On the afternoon of December 24, a British brigantine and sloop arrive and disembark fresh supplies the next day. Morale within the beleaguered citadel begins to sag but is revived two days later when a pair of Spanish ships and two frigates are sighted offshore between 2:00 and 3:00 p.m., led by Estéban de Berroa's flagship Águila Negra.

These ships have been dispatched by Havana's governor Pedro Nicolás Benítez de Lugo, and they bear 212 troops under Capt. Lope de Solloso. The smaller English vessels now find themselves blockaded within St. Augustine's harbor. Moore is compelled to order the town's buildings set ablaze, to abandon his flotilla, and to make an overland retreat at dawn on December 30 from Vilano Beach. About 500 Englishmen march north toward the Salamoto River mouth, where they are eventually rescued by their remaining vessels and conveyed back to Charles Town. Losses prove light on both sides; the Spaniards retain three Carolina sloops, a brigantine, eight artillery pieces, plus other matériel.

DECEMBER 1702. The English Council of Trade and Plantations in London complains that "the Dutch from Curaçao drive a constant trade with the Spaniards, as if there was no war.” The Dutch West India Company (WIC) Directorate will consequently make a few conciliatory gestures while secretly instructing the island’s governor, Nicolaas van Beek, to recall all his privateering commissions for fear that too zealous a blockade of Spanish America might alienate its clients.

JANUARY 12–13, 1703. The 70-gun flagship HMS Burford and five other English warships reach Barbados under the 37-year-old commodore Hovenden Walker, escorting 10 transports bearing 4,000 soldiers. This force is to subdue French strongholds in the West Indies, then sail northward to assault Placentia Bay (Newfoundland). Six weeks later—after a quarter of his men have died, deserted, or fallen ill—Walker proceeds toward Antigua to join Governor General Codrington, arriving early in March. The latter has raised 14 companies of militia among the Leeward Islands, thereby replacing Walker’s losses.

MARCH 16, 1703. At 5:00 p.m., Walker and Codrington quit Antigua with 18 armed merchantmen and 17 smaller vessels bearing 4,000 troops, escorted by the 80-gun HMSS Boyne (flag), Chichester, and Cumberland; the 70-gun Burford, Edgar, and Yarmouth; the 60-gun Sunderland; the 50-gun Anglesea; the 24-gun frigate Maidstone; plus the auxiliary James and Sarah. Two days later, most of the ships have rendezvoused off Marie-Galante. The next dawn, the expedition steers northwestward to attack Guadeloupe.

MARCH 19, 1703. Failure at Guadeloupe. This morning, Walker and Codrington’s expedition is sighted, and the 62-year-old French governor Charles de la Motte Auger, Knight of the Order of Malta, and his second-in-command, Hémon Coinard de la Malmaison, alert their 1,400 militiamen. The invaders pause briefly off Les Saintes before rounding the southern tip of Guadeloupe and striking north toward its capital of Basse-Terre. The English heave-to before this place and split into two divisions around noon, with warships threatening Fort La Madeleine at the Baillif River while troop transports proceed six miles farther north. After a couple of days spent probing its defenses, Walker disembarks 400–500 men at 3:00 p.m. on March 21 opposite the Goyaves Islands, only to be driven off by a French counterattack. An English frigate then accidentally drifts under the guns of Val de Lorge the next day and suffers 37 deaths before it can be rescued.

Prior to sunrise on March 23, Walker and Codrington disembark 4,000 troops at three places—Gros François Cove north of Fort La Madeleine, Val de Lorge, and Vieux Habitants Inlet—overrunning the outnumbered defenders in heavy fighting. The French make an orderly retreat through Basse-Terre and dig in behind the 370-man garrison of Fort Saint Charles on the south shore of the Galions River. Codrington meanwhile occupies the French capital, then spends nine days installing an 11-gun siege battery, which opens fire against Fort Saint Charles by April 2. Next day, 3 French warships and 12 lesser vessels arrive at the port of Sainte Marie north of Capesterre, bearing 820 men from Martinique in 12 companies—2 of marines, 4 of militia, and 6 buccaneers—under Jean Gabaret, recently promoted to lieutenant general for the French West Indies, plus his subordinates Governor de Boisfermé of Marie-Galante, Louis Gaston Caqueray de Valmenière, Jean Clair Dyel du Parquet, François de Collart, and Jean du Buc.

reorganizes the defenses and launches a flanking attack on April 6, engaging the bulk of Codrington's army throughout much of the morning before retiring in the afternoon. Despite this sally, the French are compelled to abandon Fort Saint Charles two hours before dawn on April 14. They blow its magazine and are pressed farther east.

On the morning of April 27, a large flotilla of English boats circles around the southern tip of Guadeloupe and attempts to capture Trois Rivières but are hampered by heavy seas. Disease and hunger are now sapping the attackers' resolve, and Codrington himself falls ill and sails away toward Nevis to recuperate. By May 5, the remaining English commanders agree to evacuate Guadeloupe, and over the next fortnight, 2,277 troops are reembarked. On the evening of May 15, Basse-Terre is set ablaze, and Walker's fleet departs. Although this invasion leaves behind enormous damage, only 27 Frenchmen have been killed and 50 wounded during the campaign.

EARLY APRIL 1703. English buccaneers disembark at Tonalá (Mexico), occupying nearby Tancochapa. A Spanish brigantine, sloop, and launch with 100 men from Veracruz surprise these raiders while still ashore, capturing 42 Englishmen, 4 black slaves, one sloop, and two piraguas.

LATE APRIL 1703. Some 120 English raiders land at the Bar of Chiltepec (Mexico) and plunder the countryside before retiring aboard their ships.

MAY 1703. In Louisiana, its neighboring Alabama Indians inaugurate a series of attacks, encouraged by English traders out of Carolina. The 23-year-old French governor Jean-Baptiste Le Moyne de Bienville (younger brother to Pierre Le Moyne d'Iberville) leads a number of counterraiders out of Fort Saint Louis at Mobile, starting in December.

MAY 17, 1703. Three English privateer sloops and eight piraguas anchor off the Tecoluta River (Mexico) and send a column inland to plunder Jalpa. While ransacking this town, the buccaneers are surprised by 80 Spanish cavalrymen under Capt. Tomás Laureano de Alarcón, who have made a three-hour ride from Villahermosa de Tabasco to reinforce Jalpa's 60 defenders.

Together, the Spanish forces besiege the raiders inside its church for 24 hours, until Jerónimo Álvarez del Valle can arrive with Villahermosa's main infantry force, plus two fieldpieces. After twice attempting to cut their way out, 108 Englishmen surrender, and another 8 are captured when their piraguas are taken offshore. Only the three sloops escape.

JUNE 15, 1703. The 37-year-old John Graydon, recently promoted Vice Admiral of the White, arrives at Port Royal (Jamaica) with his 70-gun flagship HMS Resolution under Capt. Thomas Lyell, the 60-gun Montague of William Cleveland, plus the 50-gun warships Blackwall of Thomas Day and Nonsuch under Robert Thompson. Seventeen days later, after having incorporated Commo. William Whetstone's vessels into his squadron, Graydon takes on water at Bluefields Bay, then sails northward to attack the French in Newfoundland.

After peering into Havana on July 20, Graydon and Whetstone arrive off Newfoundland on August 13, holding a council aboard the 80-gun HMS Boyne in Saint Mary's Bay in conjunction with Saint John's garrison commander, Capt. Michael Richards. Feeling insufficiently strong to attack the French within Placentia Bay, the fleet is furthermore dispersed by fog and does not reassemble until one month later, when the campaigning season is far advanced. The Royal Navy formation therefore agrees to return to England without attempting action, Graydon subsequently being cashiered from the service.

JULY 1703. A force of 600 French buccaneers descends upon the Dutch half of Sint Maarten, forcing many of this island's inhabitants to emigrate.

AUGUST 21, 1703. The 37-year-old French Canadian naval captain Alexandre Leneuf de la Vallière de Beaubassin surprises the English settlement at Wells (Maine) with an Abenaki war party, laying waste to a vast swathe of territory and killing or capturing more than 300 persons. The main English stronghold at Casco (Fort Loyal, Falmouth; near modern Portland) is able to resist thanks to Maj. John March (who is wounded and loses most of his property during this attack) as well as to his veteran subordinate, Capt. Cyprian Southack.

OCTOBER 1703. Destruction of Nassau. A Franco-Spanish expedition organized by Gov. Juan de Chaves of Santiago de Cuba, comprised of 150 soldiers and a large number of boucaniers aboard two frigates and commanded by Blas Moreno Mondragón and Claude Le Chesnaye, reaches the Bahamas. They surprise the 250 English settlers at the capital of New Providence (modern Nassau) and slaughter more than 100, plus they seize 22 guns and throw down the half-rotted palmetto-and-lime fortification. They depart two weeks later and return to Santiago a few days afterward with 13 prizes and 80–100 captives—among them, Acting Gov. Ellis Lightwood.

JANUARY 25, 1704. Ayubale Massacre. Having failed to conquer St. Augustine, Governor Moore of Carolina marshals 50 whites and 1,500 Creeks at Okmulgee by December 1703 to assail Spanish Apalache. His column reaches the main fortified mission of Ayubale by January 25 and assaults its wooden stockade, only to be repelled by the Franciscan friar Ángel de Miranda and his flock. After a nine-hour siege, the priest emerges under a flag of truce and tells Moore that the defenders have no more ammunition, so they must throw themselves upon the invaders' mercy. Miranda is murdered by the Yamasee, however, and his congregation is cruelly butchered, while the mission burns.

Next day, a Spanish relief column of 30 riders and 400 Indian auxiliaries arrive under Capt. Juan Ruiz Mexía, commander of Fort San Luis 24 miles farther southwest, as well as Fr. Juan de Parga. They, too, are defeated by Moore; 5 of Ruiz Mexía's soldiers are killed and another 8 captured, plus 168 Indians slaughtered, as opposed to 6 or 7 English casualties and 100 Yamasees. Parga dies, and Ruiz Mexía is wounded and captured, after which the Anglo-Creek raiders rampage unchecked throughout most of this region. Some 325 Apalache men are carried off as slaves along with their families, while another 1,300 agree to emigrate to Savannah and many others flee into the wilderness. Spain's hold is broken—Fort San Luis is abandoned by mid-July—in a campaign costing Moore only 4 militiamen and 15 Indian dead. Such an easy victory encourages other incursions, which soon win over this territory for English traders.

FEBRUARY 1704. The former buccaneer William Dampier rounds Cape Horn and reaches the uninhabited Juan Fernández Islands with the privateers Saint George of 26 guns and 120 men and the 16-gun, 63-man, 96-ton galley Cinque Ports. After departing on February 29 (O.S.) in pursuit of a sail, then patrolling up the Pacific coast with little success, the two vessels will part company in the Bay of Panama. The Cinque Ports returns to the Juan Fernández Islands by September under its acting captain, Thomas Stradling (who quarrels with his 26-year-old Scottish sailing master Alexander Selkirk and maroons him there). The Cinque Ports eventually becomes wrecked on the Peruvian coast, where Stradling and seven survivors surrender to the Spaniards.

Dampier meanwhile is deserted by 22 men under his first mate, John Clipperton, then by another 34 in December 1704 under his steward, William Funnel, who strike out across the Pacific for England aboard the Spanish prize Victoria. Finally, the old rover is compelled to abandon his rotten Saint George at the Lobos de Afuera Islands (Peru) and sail across the Pacific in the brigantine prize Dragón.

FEBRUARY 28, 1704. Some 250 French and Abenaki Indian warriors led by Jean-Baptiste Hertel de Rouville raid Deerfield, the northwesternmost outpost of Massachusetts, killing 54 English settlers and capturing 120 who are marched off the next day into Canada.

APRIL 30, 1704. Spain declares war against Portugal.

JUNE 20, 1704. In retaliation for the Deerfield raid (see "February 28, 1704" entry), an Anglo-American force of 500 men led by Maj. Benjamin Church advances up the Maine coast and on July 1 destroys the French Acadian fishing settlement of Minas (near modern Truro, Nova Scotia), followed by the destruction of Beaubassin in Chignecto Bay on July 28. The force then returns to the Massachusetts Bay Colony.

JULY 16, 1704. Coast-guard captain Francisco Fernández departs Campeche with 62 soldiers under Capt. Antonio de Alcalá and 122 volunteers, all crammed aboard 13 small craft to raid the English logwood establishments in the Laguna de Términos. They come ashore a mile and a half from its entrance at Puerto Escondido on the afternoon of July 18, advancing by both land and sea to capture the Laguna's bar next day. Two guard sloops, a ketch, and 25 prisoners are taken by the evening of July 20, although another 30–40 Englishmen escape into the jungle.

Having thereby secured the Laguna entrance, Fernández and Alcalá request reinforcements from Yucatán's interim governor, Álvaro de Rivaguda Enciso y Luyando, who dispatches a frigate with 80 men that arrives by July 24. The Spaniards then use their increased strength to sweep the bay's interior and capture another 110 interlopers, 9 more ships, 3 sloops, 2 brigantines, 2 ketches, and 50 lesser craft, before retiring.

Gibraltar

In the Mediterranean, Admiral Rooke's huge Anglo-Dutch fleet was retiring in the summer of 1704 from a failed attempt to take Barcelona. Near the Strait of Gibraltar, it instead decided to attack the small fortified Spanish town on its north shore. On August 1, this strategic position on a narrow peninsula was hailed to surrender in the name of Archduke Charles. When Gov. Diego de Salinas refused, 1,800 Dutch and British marines landed under Fld. Mar. Prince George of Hesse-Darmstadt. They had the support of a host of naval gunners and sailors.

Although Austrian born, the prince had served for years in Catalonia, was fluent in the language, and popular. His siege lines and batteries cut off Gibraltar by August 3, 1704. At 5:00 a.m. the next morning, Royal Navy warships joined the bombardment. After six hours of pounding, Salinas and his 500-man garrison capitulated to the prince. The defenders and a few thousand inhabitants fled out three days later, while George and his English allies took over the battered town in the name of the Habsburg pretender. Rooke then left 2,000 Royal Marines and sailors to work on its defenses, while he sailed his fleet southward across the strait to Tetuán to refresh water and supplies.

On August 22, 1704, the British admiral heard from one of his patrols that a Franco-Spanish fleet of 50 ships of the line and 15 smaller vessels was approaching from Toulon under Adm. Louis Alexandre de Bourbon, Comte de Toulouse. Rooke picked up his gunners and half his marines from Gibraltar, then met this enemy fleet with his own 51 ships of the line and 13 auxiliaries two days later off Málaga. Although no ships were sunk, this battle cost 3,048 French casualties and 2,719 among the Anglo-Dutch fleet before Toulouse retreated.

A Spanish army under Gen. Francisco Castillo Fajardo, Marqués de Villadarias and Captain General of Andalucía, then arrived overland on September 5, 1704, to besiege Gibraltar. Prince George and a Royal Marine brigade under Vice Adm. Sir John Leake repelled numerous assaults. After one last major thrust on February 7, 1705, the besiegers withdrew by March 31. The archduke made a brief visit to Gibraltar on August 2, taking away Prince George, and he named the English major general John Shrimpton governor. On February 17, 1706, Queen Anne also declared Gibraltar a free port, to ensure a flow of supplies from the Sultanate of Morocco.

Although Gibraltar was surrendered to the archduke, it was utterly dependent on Britain. The displaced Spanish citizenry created a new town around the San Roque Hermitage and revived the abandoned Algeciras to serve as their anchorage. Gibraltar soon became an exclusively English enclave. When the war was winding down in 1711, London even secretly instructed its governor to remove any foreign troops, so as to bolster the British claim. The British were granted Gibraltar in perpetuity in the treaty signed by Spain's new Bourbon rulers two years later. Its rocky promontory and dominant position at the mouth of the Mediterranean resisted all efforts at reconquest.

AUGUST 3, 1704. In the West Indies, the 48-gun, 670-ton HMS Coventry of Capt. Henry Lawrence is captured by the brand-new French 58-gun, 800-ton Jason of the squadron of Duguay Guerin. A year later, Lawrence is court-martialed for this loss and dismissed from the Royal Navy.

AUGUST 18, 1704. A Franco-Indian war party out of Placentia attacks the English settlements at Bonavista (Newfoundland) and remains in the vicinity for 11 days, although eventually driven off thanks to the example of the New England trader Capt. Michael Gill, which inspires the townspeople to fight.

OCTOBER 2, 1704. Sacramento Occupation. A Spanish expedition leaves Buenos Aires, dispatched by Gov. Alonso Juan de Valdés Inclán to attack the Portuguese outpost at Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay), which for 25 years has been a point of contention between both nations. Gen. Baltasar García Ros leads 800 Spanish regulars, 600 militiamen, and 300 native auxiliaries, to be joined once he crosses the River Plate estuary by another 4,000 Guaraní tribesmen. After marching north and east through marshy bayous, his host closes in on the Portuguese settlement by October 17 and lays siege to its outnumbered defenders.

On October 30, the 12-gun, 55-man Portuguese ship Nossa Senhora da Madre de Deus e Santa Thereza (alias "Poupa Verde") slips into Colônia, bringing 40 reinforcements from Rio de Janeiro. García Ros begins constructing his siege batteries by November 4; his first guns open fire six days later. At dawn on November 23, the Spaniards storm Colônia's ramparts, seconded from out at sea by Capt. José de Ibarra Lezcano's 36-gun flagship Nuestra Señora del Rosario, a 40-man auxiliary under Capt. Juan Bernardo Zelaya, a 26-man launch under José Ilumbe, plus three boats. Although the land assault is repelled, the Spanish men-of-war cut out the Santa Thereza and incorporate it into their squadron.

García Ros is subsequently superseded by Governor de Valdés Inclán, who does not mount another major Spanish effort until February 1, 1705, when he pounds Colônia all day before calling at 4:00 p.m. for its garrison commander, Brig. Gen. Sebastião da Veiga Cabral, to surrender. When this demand is rebuffed, de Valdés Inclán vainly attempts to assault the ramparts again on February 8, although eventually he is obliged to desist.

A seaborne Portuguese relief force appears off Montevideo from Rio de Janeiro on March 5, consisting of Amaro José's 44-gun flagship; a 30-gun, Dutch-built vice-flagship; the 20-gun hired merchantman Esterlina; and the 8-gun auxiliary Santa Joana. De Ibarra sorties from the Spanish besiegers' anchorage with the Nuestra Señora del Rosario, the Santa Teresa—now renamed, mounting 16 guns, and commanded by Zelaya—plus a fireship, to attempt to dispute this quartet's entry into Colônia. After a four-hour gun duel, the Portuguese squadron gains the harbor, only to find its garrison on its last legs. It is therefore decided to abandon the outpost; Veiga Cabral departs with his exhausted survivors aboard the four Portuguese ships on the night of March 14–15, regaining Rio by April 23. The victorious Spaniards meanwhile raze Colônia for a second time.

JANUARY 8, 1705. In the bitter cold, a 450-man Franco-Indian expedition leaves Placentia (Newfoundland) under the 43-year-old governor Daniel d'Auger de Subercasse, Captain de Beaucourt, Jacques Testard de Montigny, and Jacques l'Hermitte to march overland and attack the English settlement at Saint John's. A brigantine carrying a mortar and ammunition simultaneously sets sail to rendezvous with this small army at Bay Bulls.

The latter place is overrun along with Petty Harbor, and by January 31 the French are within three miles of their objective and decide to attempt a surprise attack the next dawn. Snow and other problems hamper their approach, so only the advance guard arrives within sight of Fort William, which opens a heavy counterfire under its commander, Lt. John Moody, along with the south battery (or South Castle) under Robert Latham. D'Auger is obliged to fall back upon Saint John's waterfront and houses, besieging the English citadels for 33 days but unable to storm them because his brigantine with the ordnance fails to arrive.

After vainly trying an assault on March 6, the French withdraw from Saint John's the next day, although d'Auger subsequently detaches Testard de Montigny with 70 men to ravage the English settlements farther north in Conception and Trinity bays. Eventually all English outposts are destroyed as far as Bonavista, except Carbonear. During this three-month campaign, d'Auger's expedition spikes or destroys 40 cannon, burns a ship, ruins several hundred boats and 200 wagons, as well as captures 1,200 Englishmen—releasing all but 80 for lack of provisions.

MARCH 1705. Recently knighted and promoted to rear admiral, William Whetstone returns into the West Indies with his flag aboard the 70-gun HMS Suffolk to assume command at Jamaica. His flagship accidentally explodes at anchor that same autumn, killing almost 100 crew members.

APRIL 19, 1705. Martial law is proclaimed at Havana amid fears of a popular uprising against the growing French influence over Spanish affairs.

AUTUMN 1705. An army of 3,000–4,000 Chickasaw Indians under English leaders out of Carolina cuts a swathe of destruction through Choctaw territory, carrying away many captives. Survivors retreat upon French Mobile, thus English influence is extended inland from the Atlantic Seaboard.

LATE JANUARY 1706. Chavagnac's Campaign. The veteran 42-year-old commodore Henri, Comte de Chavagnac, arrives at Martinique with his 64-gun, 1,100-ton flagship Glorieux; the 58-gun, 900-ton Apollon; the 64-gun, 1,000-ton Brillant; the 58-gun, 800-ton Fidèle; the 30-gun, 250-ton English prize Ludlow (captured three years previously by the 44-gun, 350-ton Adroit), and the 26-gun, 200-ton Nymphe. While waiting for his superior d'Iberville to come out from France, Chavagnac recruits 400 Martinican volunteers under Jean du Buc, plus 300 buccaneers under François de Collart, for an attempt against English Saint Kitts—to which the governor general, Charles François de Machault, Sieur de Bellemont, contributes another four companies of Martinican militiamen.

Late on the afternoon of February 4, Chavagnac sets sail for Guadeloupe, detaching the Nymphe to maintain watch upon Barbados. An additional 300 volunteers under Major Poullain join his expedition at Guadeloupe's capital of Basse-Terre, and by the time the French finally put to sea again on February 16, their 5 warships are accompanied by 2 merchantmen and 24 buccaneer craft, bearing a landing force 1,200 strong.

Contrary winds prevent this force from assaulting Antigua, so when the French veer round and anchor three miles off Nevis's capital of Charlestown, it is already the evening of February 16. The next morning, Chavagnac orders his boats inshore, but the surf is running high and its English defenders under Col. Richard Abbott are prepared to repel the invasion. Counterfire from Mathew's, Old Road, and Cotton Tree forts strike the French ships, killing the Glorieux's captain; therefore, the attackers sail away four days later for Saint Kitts.

That same afternoon, February 21, the island is sighted, although the garrison under Gov. Walter Hamilton is already alerted. Chavagnac's flotilla nonetheless anchors opposite Basseterre, except for a half-dozen vessels that drop down to Palmetto Point and open fire upon its fortifications. Past midnight, Chavagnac disembarks his troops in Frigate Bay, and at dawn of February 22, they move toward Basseterre. Poullain and his 300 Guadeloupans simultaneously circle around by sea to disembark at the northern outpost of Pointe de Sable, advancing east toward Cayonne while laying waste its countryside. They are opposed by 200 English colonists, who are quickly driven back upon Col. Stephen Payne's regular garrison at Fort Charles, which checks this northern incursion.

Chavagnac meanwhile presses on toward Basseterre, his subordinates du Buc, Collart, and Jean Clair du Parquet scattering Hamilton's 300 infantrymen and 100 riders. Retreating through his capital, the English governor decides to make a stand at Palmetto Point. On February 23, Poullain bypasses Payne's defenses at Fort Charles to raid as far south as Goodwin's Gut. Chavagnac does the same in his area, pillaging the English plantations for several days, while avoiding heavily armed citadels. On February 26, the French begin their withdrawal, loading 300 black slaves and considerable booty. At the cost of 20 casualties, Chavagnac has devastated Saint Kitts and retires toward Martinique.

EARLY MARCH 1706. In Alabama, a Chickasaw war party makes a nocturnal descent upon a Choctaw village, carrying off more than 150 captives to be sold as slaves in South Carolina. The French governor Bienville is subsequently obliged to support his Choctaw allies in a war against the English-backed Chickasaw.

MARCH 7, 1706. D'Iberville Overruns Nevis. Pierre Le Moyne d'Iberville reaches Martinique with his 64-gun, 1,200-ton flagship Juste; the 56-gun, 950-ton Prince; the 36-gun, 300-ton Aigle; and the 16-gun, 120-ton frigate Sphère (formerly the English galley HMS Jean), to find his subordinate Chavagnac recently returned from ravaging Saint Kitts. Together, their squadrons total a dozen men-of-war and two-dozen buccaneer craft, bearing 2,000 soldiers and freebooters.

They depart within a couple of weeks, touching at Guadeloupe to gather even greater strength before proceeding northward on March 31 to assail Nevis. Steering between Montserrat and Antigua, d'Iberville materializes before the north coast of Nevis on the afternoon of April 2 and catches Governor Abbott completely off guard. As a result of Chavagnac's earlier raid (see "Late January 1706" entry), the English have only 35 regular soldiers still on the island, plus 430 militiamen. Dividing their fleet into two, the French bear down upon the island's northern and western shores simultaneously, thereby splitting the defenders' slender strength. Chavagnac disembarks 3,000 men unopposed at Green Bay, just above the capital of Charlestown, while d'Iberville anchors his contingent at Nevis's southernmost extremity (today French Bay, named in memory of this invasion), bringing his own men ashore before sunrise on April 3. Some 25 anchored merchantmen are seized in the Charlestown roadstead, while the panic-stricken English fall back upon a small hilltop fort behind their capital. Beholding the throng of buccaneers that d'Iberville deploys to assault this frail stronghold, Abbott capitulates on April 4.

The French leader departs 17 days later, carrying away 3,187 black slaves—another 1,400 are to follow later—plus countless other booty. He has also wreaked havoc among the plantations and torched two-thirds of Charlestown. He returns into Martinique by April 26 and shortly thereafter transfers to Saint Domingue (Haiti) in hopes of organizing another such venture, but he dies of disease in Havana on July 8.

JULY 1706. Commo. William Kerr escorts an English convoy into Port Royal (Jamaica) to succeed Admiral Whetstone as commander in chief. After cruising together briefly, the latter sails for England, while Kerr leads an unsuccessful operation against Saint Domingue (Haiti).

Kerr eventually goes home as well the next year, is accused of accepting bribes for protecting contraband trade and sparing enemy properties, and is cashiered.

AUGUST 16, 1706. Six French privateers under Capt. Jacques Lefebvre (a subordinate of the deceased d'Iberville; see "March 7, 1706" entry) depart Havana with 200 Cuban troops and two fieldpieces under Estéban de Berroa to sail northeastward to St. Augustine for a combined venture against Charles Town (modern-day Charleston, South Carolina).

Upon arriving, Florida's governor, Francisco de Córcoles y Martínez, furnishes Lefebvre with an additional pair of canoes, a demi-galley, 30 regular infantrymen, and a few Indian volunteers, and the whole expedition sets sail by August 31. Shortly thereafter, a Dutch sloop separates the Brillant—bearing the French land commander Arbousset and 200 of his best troops—from Lefebvre's squadron, but the rest of this formation nevertheless presses on toward its objective.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1706. Defense of Charles Town.

The Franco-Spanish expedition of Lefebvre and Berroa arrives off South Carolina's capital and is sighted from Sullivan's Island by lookouts, who put up five smoke signals to indicate the number of enemy ships. Despite an epidemic of yellow fever raging within the city, militiamen rally from throughout the district. Lefebvre's ships anchor off Sullivan's Island that same evening, then next morning send a surrender demand inshore. Gov. Sir Nathaniel Johnson rejects it, and on the morning of September 9, the invasion commences.

One party lands on James Island and sets fire to a house but is driven back to their demi-galley by a counterattack of Carolina militiamen and Indians. Another 160 Spanish soldiers disembark on a narrow stretch of land between the Wando River and the Atlantic and burn two small launches and a storehouse. They then encamp overnight, only to be surprised while eating chickens by 100 English militiamen under Captain Fenwick, who kill a dozen Spaniards, capture 60, and drown 6 or 7 as the survivors attempt to swim back out to their craft.

On September 11, Johnson orders six small launches and a fireship under Col. William Rhett to bear down upon the five enemy vessels anchored off Sullivan's Island and scatter them farther out to sea, thus finally convincing Lefebvre and Berroa to retire toward St. Augustine. No sooner has this Franco-Spanish expedition sailed over the horizon than the separated Brillant appears, disembarking Arbousset and his 200 soldiers east of Charles Town. Unaware that its defense is already fully roused, this contingent is intercepted near Holybush Plantation by a body of Carolina militia and soundly defeated. At the same time, another group of British defenders rows out to the Brillant and secures it. Thus in four days of action, Johnson's garrison kills 30 invaders and captures another 320.

JUNE 6, 1707. Some 23 New England sloops and transports appear off Port Royal (today Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia), escorted by the 50-gun, 669-ton HMS Deptford of Captain Stukely. Its military contingent is led by the 49-year-old veteran Indian fighter Col. John March of Casco Bay (Portland, Maine), with lieutenant colonels Francis Wainwright and Winthrop Hilton as his regimental commanders. With a total strength of 1,100 men, March disembarks 750 Massachusetts and Rhode Island militiamen on the south side, below Port Royal's French fort (which is under the command of d'Auger de Subercasse). The latter only has a 260-man garrison, so an English victory seems imminent; but after advancing to the very gates of this outnumbered and surprised French outpost, March hesitates.

Following a few days of desultory long-range exchanges, a party of Abenaki natives arrives under Bernard Anselme d'Abbadie de Saint Castin to bolster Port Royal's defenses. The French and Indians offer up a spirited resistance, so after a series of gloomy consultations, the New Englanders reembark on June 15. March retires into Casco and the bulk of his troops disperse into Boston, where they are accused of cowardice.

JULY 1, 1707. The 41-year-old commodore Charles Wager arrives at Jamaica with nine warships and an English convoy to assume command over that station. Shortly thereafter, he conceives the plan of attacking the Spanish treasure convoy that is to depart Portobelo and cross into Cartagena.

In mid-January 1708, Wager sorties to hunt for these Panamanian galleons, yet after a two-month cruise retires into Port Royal (Jamaica), hoping to lull the Spaniards into believing all danger is past. The English commodore then sets sail again on April 25, and despite a heavy storm, he maintains a stealthy watch upon Cartagena for more than a month.

AUGUST 1707. Several hundred Talapoosa Indians, led by a few Englishmen out of Carolina, surprise the small Spanish settlement of Santa María de Galve inside Pensacola Bay (Florida). Its houses are burned and pillaged right up to the Spanish citadel—a 16-gun, pine-log stronghold named Fort Carlos de Austria—which the attackers also penetrate before its garrison can rally and expel them. Eleven Spaniards are nonetheless killed, 15 captured, and a dozen slaves are carried away when the raiders finally depart the region a couple of months later.

AUGUST 13, 1707. The 21-year-old French privateer captain Pierre Morpain arrives at Port Royal (Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia) from Saint Domingue with the Intrépide, bringing in a captured English slaver and a merchant frigate loaded with food. This refreshment is especially welcome to Governor Subercasse and his small garrison, having recently undergone an English siege.

One week later, a second abortive attempt is made to overrun this French outpost by 1,600 New England troops under Colonel March. Once more their attack becomes bogged down, with March falling ill and turning over command to his subordinate Wainwright. Subercasse, Saint Castin, and Morpain put up a stout fight, eventually forcing the New Englanders to withdraw. The failure of this second expedition convinces the Anglo-American authorities of their need to pressure London for support for future ventures by sending regular troops and warships out from England.

LATE NOVEMBER 1707. An English vessel attacks Saint Pierre Island south of Newfoundland, obliging its governor, Sourdeval, and a few settlers to seek shelter in its woods. After one of his landing parties is ambushed, the English commander furthermore threatens to burn everything in sight, but he sails away after setting a few prisoners ashore.

In the Gulf of Mexico, Spanish Pensacola is once more besieged by 1,500 Indians and Carolina frontiersmen. Dissensions soon arise among the attackers, though, and three-quarters disperse without attempting any assault. When French governor Bienville arrives on December 8 to relieve his Spanish allies with a contingent from Mobile, the remaining 13 Englishmen and 350 Indians retire.

JANUARY 18, 1708. Four privateer vessels under a commander nicknamed Barbillas or Bigotes (Spanish for “Little Whiskers” or “Moustache”) sack and burn the town of Lerma, near Campeche (Mexico).

JUNE 8, 1708. Wager versus the Spanish Galleons. At daybreak, the English squadron prowling off Baru Island sights two sail standing in toward Cartagena. By noon, the entire 17-ship silver convoy of the 71-year-old admiral José Fernández de Santilán, Conde de Casa Alegre, comes within view of Wager's warships. Although numerous, only Casa Alegre's 64-gun, 600-man, 1,037-ton flagship San José and the 64-gun, 500-man vice-flagship San Joaquín are actually men-of-war. The remaining Spanish vessels consist of the 44-gun hired merchantman Santa Cruz, serving as the third-in-command's flagship (hence referred to as a gobierno, in this case bearing 400 men under naval captain Nicolás de la Rosa, Conde de Vega Florida); a 40-gun merchantman under Francisco Fernández Nieto, reinforced by the crew of Capt. José Canis Alzamora's warship Almudena (scuttled earlier); plus the 24-gun merchantman Nuestra Señora del Carmen and seven lesser craft. Casa Alegre is moreover accompanied by the 36-gun French privateer Saint Esprit of Capt. Claude Raoul out of Saint Malo, plus the 24-gun Saint Geneviève, two sloops, and a brigantine.

To oppose them, Wager has his 70-gun, 1,103-ton flagship Expedition under Capt. Henry Long; the 60-gun, 923-ton Kingston of Timothy Bridges; the 50-gun, 636-ton Portland of Edward Windsor; and the fireship Vulture of Cmdr. Caesar Brooks. The English realize that they can concentrate their efforts against the three Spanish capital ships while ignoring the rest, so Wager orders the Portland to attack the Spanish man-of-war in the van, the Kingston to seek battle with the San Joaquín toward the rear, while his own flagship closes upon Casa Alegre's flagship in the center. The afternoon proves fine, with a brisk wind out of the north-northeast, so the Expedition gradually gains upon the San José, while the entire Hispano-French convoy attempts to escape northward around Baru Island into Cartagena. Around sunset at 5:30 p.m., Casa Alegre opens fire upon Wager's flagship, which replies a half hour later. One-and-a-half hours of hard fighting ensue, ending abruptly when Casa Alegre's San José explodes, going down with almost all hands. Fewer than a dozen survivors are plucked from the water by English boats, only five living for very long.

Toward 10:00 p.m., the Expedition overhauls the Spanish rear admiral and cripples it with a broadside through its stern windows, obliging de la Rosa to strike by 2:00 a.m. of June 9, just as the moon begins to rise. The next dawn, Wager sends the Kingston and the Portland in pursuit of the Spanish vice-flagship San Joaquín, which outstrips them as the afternoon wears on, finally winning free by running through the dangerous Salmedina Channel where the English dare not follow.

When captains Bridges and Windsor rejoin the commodore on June 10, Wager detaches them along with the Vulture to probe behind Baru Island, where the 40-gun Spanish merchantman is hiding. Upon seeing the Royal Navy trio draw near, the Spaniards beach their ship and set it ablaze, escaping ashore. Wager thus returns into Port Royal (Jamaica) on July 19, angry at obtaining only a single prize because of his subordinates' lackluster performance. Fifteen days later, both Bridges and Windsor are court-martialed and eventually cashiered.

JULY 20, 1708. Commo. Andrés de Arriola's Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe y San Antonio, flagship of Spain's West Indian squadron, intercepts a 12-ship English convoy off Cape San Antonio (western Cuba) and carries half the convoy into Veracruz by August 3.

JULY 26, 1708. Captains Jean-Baptiste Hertel de Rouville and Jean-Baptiste de Saint Ours Deschailons depart Montreal with 200 men to mount a Franco-Indian attack one month later, on August 29, against Haverhill (Massachusetts). The raiders slay 15 of the English settlers and destroy the village but are then ambushed by 60 pursuers under Captain Ayer as they retire, suffering 10 killed and 19 wounded before regaining Canada.

OCTOBER 29, 1708. Off Saint Domingue (Haiti), the 24-gun Dunkirk's Prize of Capt. George Purvis runs hard aground while in pursuit of a 14-gun French vessel; nonetheless, it seizes the French ship and uses it to return safely into Jamaica.

NOVEMBER 25, 1708. The Dorset captain Woodes Rogers arrives off Brazil, anchoring five days later in Baía da Ilha Grande to replenish supplies for a raid into the South Pacific via the Strait of Magellan. His expedition consists of 183 men aboard his 30-gun, 320-ton frigate Duke, and 150 aboard Capt. Stephen Courtney's 26-gun, 260-ton Duchess (piloted by the veteran rover Dampier and accompanied by the 48-year-old physician Thomas Dover, who has no medical charge during this cruise but is along as a major shareholder).

JANUARY 1709. Rogers's Pacific Incursion. The English privateers Duke and Duchess round Cape Horn in heavy weather, clawing their way to the Juan Fernández Islands by February 12. Here they find the Scottish master Alexander Selkirk, who has been left behind four years and four months earlier by Captain Stradling (see "February 1704" entry). (Selkirk's account will inspire Daniel Defoe to write Robinson Crusoe.) After recuperating, Rogers's expedition advances north toward Peru.

JANUARY 1, 1709. After an investment lasting several days, the English settlement at Saint John's (Newfoundland) surrenders to a contingent of 170 French soldiers, Canadian militiamen, and Indian warriors under Capt. Joseph de Saint Ovide, dispatched by Placentia's Governor Philippe de Costebelle.

MARCH 11, 1709. The 44-gun HMS Adventure of Capt. Robert Clark is taken by the French off Martinique and its commander killed.

APRIL 25, 1709. The 40-year-old captain Stephen Hutchens of the 50-gun HMS Portland reaches the smuggling port of Bastimentos in northern Panama with an English trading convoy. He learns that four large enemy vessels are anchored 10 miles southeast at Portobelo. One week later, having reconnoitered that harbor, Hutchens is informed by a scout that two of these ships have sailed, a large French merchantman and a Dutch prize, while the remaining pair is the 50-gun former HMS Coventry (captured by the French almost five years previously; see "August 3, 1704" entry) and the 40-gun, 500-ton Mignon.

On May 11, Hutchins learns that the latter two have also sailed that previous evening, so he weighs anchor from Bastimentos in pursuit. He sights them two days later at 8:00 a.m., becoming engaged by both the Coventry and the Mignon that same afternoon at extreme long range. The Portland continues chasing until noon of May 16, when the Coventry's mainmast falls overboard and the Mignon makes off. The Portland's victory costs 9 killed and 12 wounded out of a crew of 232; French deaths are estimated at 70 men.

MAY 2, 1709. At daybreak, several boatloads bearing 238 men from Rogers's Duke and Duchess are spotted off Guayaquil, setting a flag of truce ashore to call upon its 24-year-old corregidor Jerónimo Boza y Solís to surrender. After two days of tense negotiations, during which the English seize two newly launched, 300-ton ships and other lesser prizes in the river, they finally storm Guayaquil's beach at 4:00 p.m. on May 4 and carry the city at a cost of three dead and four wounded. The Spaniards continue galling the occupiers with long-range sniping until the afternoon of May 6, when they agree to pay a ransom of 30,000 pesos for the invaders to withdraw to Puná Island, which they commence to do the next evening.

(During their brief occupation, the English have allegedly stored their plunder in Guayaquil's churches, where they also sleep, despite the stench of recently buried plague victims. Upon regaining their anchorage on May 8, therefore, 180 rovers fall ill within 48 hours. Dr. Dover instructs the surgeons to bleed all in both arms, then give them "dilute sulphuric acid to drink." Only eight die—either from the disease or from its remarkable treatment.)

When the entire ransom cannot be paid, the English sail away on May 18 with their hostages, captains Manuel Jiménez and Manuel de la Puente. Rogers also incorporates the captive 20-gun French Marquis and Spanish San Dimas into his flotilla, spending two months careening on Gorgona Island and dismantling the latter prize before proceeding north-northwest toward Mexico.

LATE JULY 1709. Failed Offensive against Canada.

The veteran 53-year-old militia colonel Francis Nicholson leads an expedition of Connecticut, New York, and New Jersey colonials up the Hudson River, deploying his troops into stockaded forts from Stillwater (north of Albany) to the foot of Lake Champlain and threatening Montreal.

His colleague Samuel Vetch is also to lead a similar force of volunteers around by sea from Boston into the Saint Lawrence, although this latter arrangement is eventually cancelled. Learning of Nicholson's encroachment, Canada's Governor General Pierre de Rigaud de Vaudreuil dispatches a reconnaissance force south under Claude de Ramezay, who skirmishes with the colonials off Scalping Point (opposite Crown Point, New York). Fatigue, short supplies, and disease prove to be greater enemies to Nicholson, so demoralizing his army that within a few weeks they abandon their outposts and stream home. Still determined to persist with this strategy, Nicholson subsequently sails for England to press its ministers for support in future ventures.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1709. In Talamanca (Costa Rica), the natives under their leader Pablo Presbere rise against Spanish rule and are put down a few weeks later.

JANUARY 1, 1710. After almost two months' wait off Cabo San Lucas (Baja California) for the Manila galleons, Rogers's Duke, Duchess, and the French prize Marquis sight a sail 20 miles out at sea. The Duke intercepts it at 10:00 a.m., engaging this 20-gun Spanish ship, which surrenders by noon and is revealed to be the Nuestra Señora de la Encarnación (alias the Desengaño), under the French commander Jean Presberty. Nine Spaniards lie dead and 10 wounded among the 193 people aboard, compared to only a single serious injury among the English: Rogers himself, whose upper jaw is shot away.

The Encarnación has sailed from the Philippines as the consort for the much larger, wealthier Nuestra Señora de Begonia but has become separated during the crossing. Rogers therefore stations the Duchess and the Marquis to keep watch, while anchoring inshore to begin looting his prize. Some 142 of its passengers and crew are released aboard a captive coastal trader to continue toward Acapulco; only its pilot and about 40 Filipino sailors are retained.

Three days later (Christmas Day 1709 [O.S.]), Rogers's lookout signals from high atop a hill that the Duchess and the Marquis are pursuing another sail, which they delay until Rogers's Duke can join after midnight. Dawn of January 5 reveals the 900-ton Begonia, manned by 450 men under Capt. Fernando de Angulo, pierced for 60 guns (although only mounting 40). Its immensely stout bulwarks resist the English shot. The Spaniards suffer only eight men killed and a slightly larger number injured, hence Rogers's outnumbered crews hesitate to board. After having their rigging cut up, the English break off the action.

The Encarnación is subsequently renamed the Bachelor, with Dover appointed as its captain and Selkirk as first mate. It then sails for England along with the rest of Rogers's squadron by way of Guam and the Cape of Good Hope.

JULY 26, 1710. After visiting London, Colonel Nicholson returns into Boston with the 50-gun, 700-ton ships Dragon (flag) of Commo. George Martin, Falmouth of Walter Riddell, and Chester of Thomas Mathews, as well as the bomb vessel Star under Cmdr. Thomas Rochfort. A couple of months later, they are joined by the 36-gun frigate Feverisham of Capt. Robert Paston and the 32-gun frigate Lowestoft of George Gordon, which escorted a merchant convoy into New York. This force furthermore boasts 400 marines over and above their regular complements.

Although the season is far advanced and rumors of peace negotiations back in Europe are widespread, New England nonetheless musters a large expedition to assault the nearby French outpost of Port Royal (Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia). An expected army of English regulars under Maj. Gen. Viscount Shannon fails to appear, yet by September Nicholson is able to fill 31 transports with 3,500 troops, divided into two regiments from Massachusetts, plus one each from Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island.

AUGUST 16, 1710. Du Clerc at Rio de Janeiro. A privately financed squadron of six French ships, a frigate, galliot, and 1,500 men appears outside Rio de Janeiro under Jean-François du Clerc, recently promoted capitaine de frégate in France's Royal Navy as well as a knight of the Order of Saint Louis. Although flying false English colors—those of Portugal's ally—his vessels are nonetheless fired upon by Fort Santa Cruz as they attempt to stand into Rio's harbor, so they veer farther westward and instead anchor in Ilha Grande Bay.

After a few desultory disembarkations in the region of Guaratinguetá and Sepetiba Bay on August 27, du Clerc returns eastward and, four days later, lands 1,200 men six miles southwest of Rio at Barra da Tijuca, hoping to circle around its Orgãos Range. Fighting their way up the Desterro road past Praya Vermelha, his small army attempts to storm the capital by September 18, only to be thrown back from Carmo Square by Gov. Francisco de Castro Morais's militia hordes—spearheaded by Bento do Amaral's student company—plus artillery fire from Fort São Sebastião on nearby Cobras Island. Having lost 380 men, the French next try to occupy São Bento Hill (called La Bénédicte by the invaders), only to again be repulsed and forced to seek shelter in a sugar plantation. Cornered, outnumbered, and threatened with being burned alive, du Clerc has no choice but to surrender his army's remnants and face imprisonment.

Three of his warships materialize outside Rio's entrance on September 21 and open fire, desisting when the captive French commander sends them a message advising them of his fate. They thereupon sail away, and du Clerc is eventually murdered on March 11, 1711, by an enraged Brazilian mob, while his senior commanders are manhandled. (Word of this mistreatment helps fuel René Duguay-Trouin's subsequent strike; see "September 12, 1711" entry.)

SEPTEMBER 21, 1710. HMS Chester sets sail from Massachusetts to blockade Port Royal (Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia) in advance of 31 New England transports and a half-dozen men-of-war under Nicholson and Martin, which leave Nantasket eight days later.

OCTOBER 1710. To help finance a stronger Portuguese naval presence in Brazil, the recently arrived governor general Pedro de Vasconcelos de Sousa announces a tax increase at the capital of Salvador (Bahia) on all imported goods. Riots erupt instead, and mobs led by the merchant João "Maneta" de Figueiredo da Costa ransack Salvador's warehouses. They are joined by the city's royal garrison, until a religious procession led by Archbishop Sebastião Monteiro de Vide restores calm. Nonetheless, the governor general—temporarily deposed in favor of Judge Lourenço de Almada—retracts his promulgation.

OCTOBER 4, 1710. Nicholson at Port Royal. Having arrived outside Port Royal (Nova Scotia) and surprised its 300 French defenders under Governor Subercasse, the expedition of Nicholson and his adjutant general Samuel Vetch lands in two divisions the next day. They close upon Port Royal's works by October 6, installing batteries within 100 yards of the French ramparts, which open fire that same night. Beyond hope of relief, Subercasse offers to surrender on October 13, and the actual capitulation is finalized two days later. Nicholson then renames the town “Annapolis Royal” in honor of the English queen, leaves Vetch with 500 troops as garrison commander on October 30, and returns into Boston one week later with Martin.

Nicholson eventually sails to London to persuade the British government that yet another, larger military effort should be mounted against French Canada.

EARLY NOVEMBER 1710. In Pernambuco (Brazil), Gov. Sebastião de Castro Caldas—who nine months previously chose to install his offices at the seaport of Recife rather than the traditional highland capital of Olinda—is wounded in an assassination attempt. He then flees to Bahia when a rural rebellion sweeps into Recife and substitutes Bishop Manoel Álvares da Costa into office as of November 15. However, more conservative elements soon besiege the rebels inside Recife.

NOVEMBER 12, 1710. In the West Indies, the 34-gun frigate Scarborough of Capt. Edward Holland is taken by the Comte de Revel and renamed the Duc de Chaulnes. Early the next year, it will be recaptured by the 50-gun, 620-ton HMS Anglesea of Capt. Thomas Legge and the 40-gun Fowey of Robert Chadwick. (On February 20, 1711 [O.S.], Legge dies at Barbados.)

APRIL 17, 1711. In Europe, the 32-year-old Holy Roman emperor Joseph I dies of smallpox and is succeeded by his younger brother, Archduke Charles of Austria (whom Great Britain and the Netherlands have been attempting to install upon Spain’s throne). Such a prospective Austro-Spanish amalgamation is scarcely more palatable to these maritime powers than the Franco-Spanish union they are fighting to impede, therefore tentative peace feelers are begun with Paris and Madrid and plenipotentiaries are delegated to meet in Utrecht as early as January 1712.

LATE APRIL 1711. A 200-man Spanish expedition sweeps through the English logwood establishments in the Laguna de Términos, returning into Campeche with an 18- and a 14-gun English frigate, a store ship, two sloops, and a brigantine.

MAY 5–6, 1711. This night, the 44-gun, 550-ton royal frigate Thétis of Jean-François de Choiseul, Comte de Beaupré and governor of Saint Domingue (Haiti), is intercepted three miles outside Havana by the 60-gun HMS Windsor of Capt. George Paddon and the 48-gun Weymouth of Richard Lestock. They batter their French opponent into submission and kill or wound 65 of its 180 crew members. Captives are then set ashore at the Cuban capital, including a wounded Choiseul, who dies shortly thereafter.

JUNE 1711. The French freebooter Jean du Buc descends upon English Montserrat with his 36-gun Roland and other consorts and overruns a battery before his men are ambushed, suffering some 60 casualties, which obliges them to retreat.

JUNE 19, 1711. Nicholson returns to New England from London, having convinced the English government to dispatch an expedition to spearhead the colonists' attempt against French Canada. This force appears two-and-a-half weeks later, comprised of 11 Royal Navy warships and 51 troop transports under the recently promoted Rear Admiral of the White, Sir Hovenden Walker. His convoy bears seven regiments of foot—five of them veteran units from the Duke of Marlborough's victorious Continental Army—under Brig. Gen. John ("Jack") Hill. New England will furnish an additional 1,300 militiamen to supplement the 5,300 soldiers and 6,000 seamen and marines brought from England.

JUNE 21, 1711. Off Martinique, the 50-gun HMS Newcastle of Capt. Sampson Bourne engages a 36-gun French ship, a 24-gun auxiliary, nine privateer sloops, plus two other vessels, driving them into Saint Pierre's harbor and thereby ending a filibuster expedition against Antigua and Montserrat. (Most likely this engagement involves the same French craft as mentioned in the preceding "June 1711" entry.)

JULY 26, 1711. Commo. James Littleton sorties from Port Royal (Jamaica) with five two-deckers and a sloop, having learned that the homeward-bound Spanish plate fleet is soon expected from Portobelo at Cartagena.

He arrives off this latter place 11 days later, chasing five large vessels, which run in through its Boca-chica entrance. The next morning, August 7, another four sail are pursued, the 50-gun HMS Salisbury of Capt. Francis Hosier and the 50-gun Salisbury Prize (ex-French Heureux) of Robert Harland overtaking the 60-gun Spanish vice-flagship and engaging it until Littleton can join. The Spanish vessel is thereupon secured at a cost of one British seaman killed and six wounded, while a second is captured by Edward Vernon's 48-gun HMS Jersey. Littleton subsequently blockades Cartagena, although he is obliged to withdraw a few weeks later and thus allows the remaining Spanish galleons to exit for Havana, escorted by Ducasse's French warships.

AUGUST 9, 1711. The newly appointed governor Félix José Machado de Mendoça arrives at Recife (Brazil) with a small Portuguese fleet and reimposes royal rule without opposition. Numerous arrests ensue among the rebel ranks.

AUGUST 10, 1711. Early this morning, Walker and Hill get under way from Boston to assault Canada, their 67 auxiliaries and transports being escorted by the 70-gun, 1,120-ton, 440-man flagship Edgar of Capt. Joseph Soanes; the 80-gun, 1,300-ton, 520-man Humber of Richard Culliford and Devonshire of John Cooper; the 70-gun, 965-ton, 400-man Swiftsure of John Cooper and Monmouth of John Mitchell; the 60-gun, 910-ton, 365-man Windsor of Robert Arris, Montague of George Walton, Sunderland of Henry Gore, and Dunkirk of Captain Butler; plus the bomb vessels Basilisk and Granada. This convoy is manned by 4,500 sailors and marines and bears 7,500 troops under Lt. Gen. William Seymour, with colonels Peircy Kirk, Jasper Clayton, Richard Kane, William Windress, Henry Disney, and Samuel Vetch. One month after this expedition sets sail, another 2,300 volunteers—mostly Palatine Germans and Indian warriors—march north from Albany under Colonel Nicholson to advance up the Hudson River and threaten Montreal.

AUGUST 24, 1711 (O.S.). Walker's Shipwreck. After anchoring in Gaspé Bay on August 18 (O.S.), then gingerly probing into the Saint Lawrence Seaway, Walker's expedition sails too far northward. Strong currents confuse the English pilots, so that at 10:30 p.m. on August 23 (O.S.), his fleet blunders onto the breakers surrounding Ile aux Oeufs (near modern Baie Trinité, Quebec). The next dawn, eight transports are reported lost.

After rescuing survivors, Walker and Hill confer on August 25 (O.S.) and opt to abandon their attempt against Quebec. The 40-gun frigate Sapphire of Capt. Augustin Rouse is sent toward Boston with a dispatch recalling Nicholson's army from its Hudson River advance, while Walker's unwieldy formation retreats into "Spanish River Road" (Sydney, Nova Scotia) by September 25 to consider seizing the French fisheries in nearby Placentia Bay (Newfoundland). Even this action is judged too risky, however, so, after four days, Walker and Hill decide to give up their North American campaign altogether and return to England. Aside from sending a colonial detachment to relieve the Annapolis Royal garrison, nothing else is achieved.

(For political reasons, neither Walker nor Hill is held responsible for this failure upon their return to London, blame being heaped instead upon ineffective colonial cooperation. It is not until the government changes with the accession of the Hanoverian George I in September 1714 that both officers are cashiered.)

Duguay-Trouin

René Trouin, Sieur du Gué, was born at Saint Malo on June 10, 1673, the fourth child of a Breton shipowner named Luc Trouin, Sieur de la Barbinais. Young René was destined for the church, so his youth was spent studying at Rennes and Caen. But he was much more inclined to the sea, therefore, against his parents' wishes, he withdrew from the Jesuit school when the War of the Grand Alliance or King William's War erupted in the summer of 1689.

Trouin first shipped out on one of the family's vessels. Then the next year, he set sail as a volunteer on December 16, 1690, aboard the 28-gun privateer Trinité of Captain Legoux. The teenaged Trouin proved so adept at naval warfare that he was given command late the next year of the 14-gun family frigate Danycan. In the crowded sea lanes around western Europe, he proved an audacious and tireless rover. Soon, the mounting number of his captures made him famous as "Duguay-Trouin."

Coming to the attention of King Louis XIV, the young privateer was entrusted with a series of royal warships. First, he took over the 36-gun, 300-ton royal frigate Hermione on June 6, 1692, and the next year he cruised aboard the 32-gun, 400-ton flûte Profond. While escorting a convoy with the 34-gun royal frigate Diligente in 1694, Duguay-Trouin was cornered near the Scilly Isles and captured on April 12 by six English warships under Adm. David Mitchell. The wounded young Frenchman was sent as a captive to Plymouth Castle, while Mitchell was knighted for this feat. But Duguay-Trouin and four companions escaped on June 19 of the same year and sailed home aboard a boat loaned to them by a Swedish friend.

In January 1695, Duguay-Trouin sallied once more with the 48-gun, 600-ton François, capturing HMS Nonsuch of 42 guns in a two-day running fight. Louis XIV rewarded this victory with a "sword of honor," while Duguay-Trouin renamed the Nonsuch the Sans Pareil. The next year, he used it to lure two unsuspecting English vessels under his guns off Vigo. In 1697, while commanding the Saint-Jacques des Victoires and two other ships, he snapped up a 15-ship Dutch convoy outside Bilbao. This triumph won the 24-year-old privateer a commission as a junior captain in France's Royal Navy.

When the War of the Spanish Succession broke out five years later, Duguay-Trouin enjoyed even greater success. Numerous captures gained him promotion to senior captain by 1705, and his scattering of a Portuguese convoy the next year earned him a knighthood in the Order of Saint-Louis. Hundreds more seizures resulted in René and his older brother Luc being ennobled in 1709. At a time when France's fortunes were otherwise faltering, their skills at sea were a ray of hope for the nation.

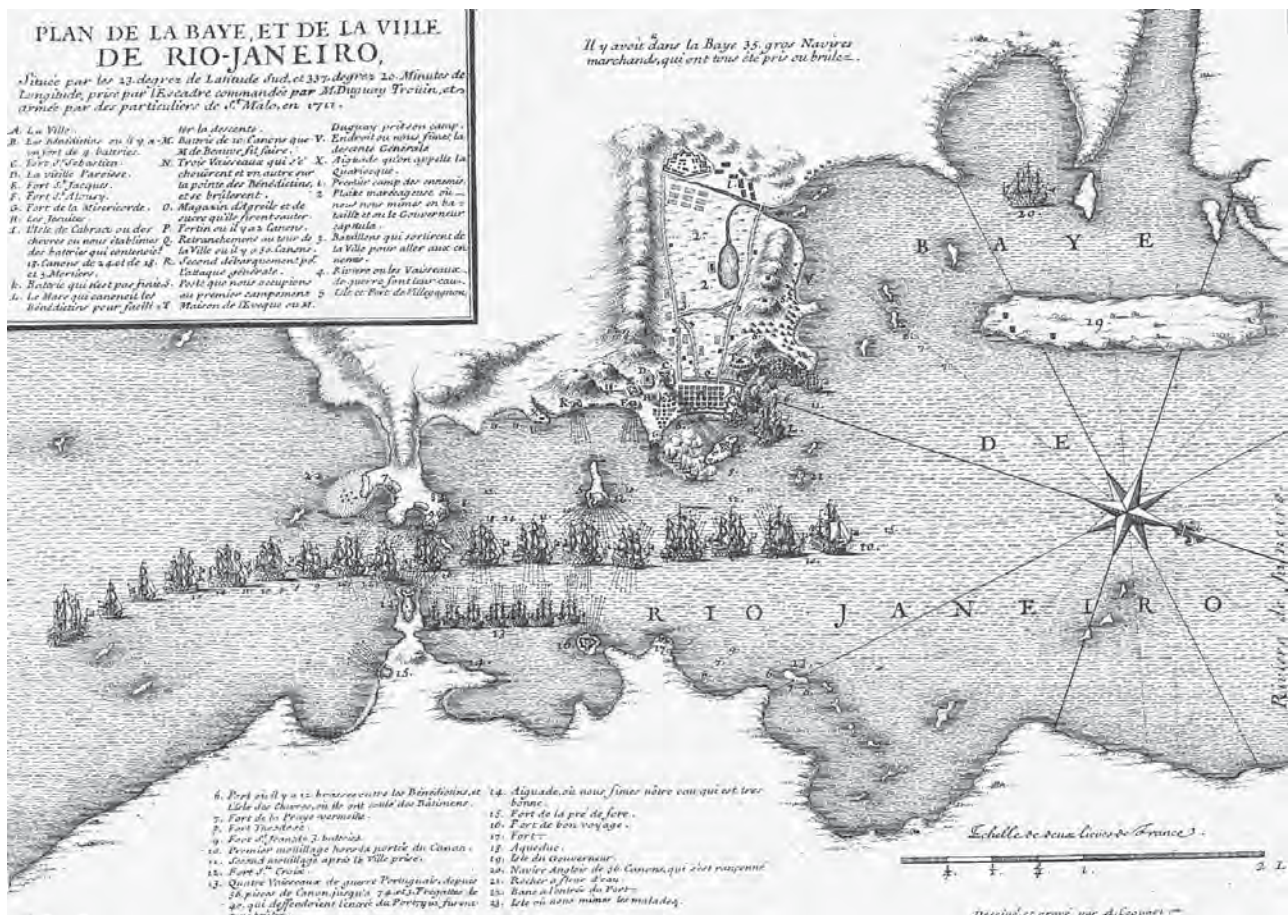

When peace feelers started in 1711, Duguay-Trouin led his first American foray. Ostensibly to avenge du Clerc's mistreatment at Rio de Janeiro, this expedition also promised rich booty. Royal warships were loaned, and investors showered him with funds. With typical boldness, Duguay-Trouin burst into Rio's harbor and unmanned the defenders with a quick assault. Yet profits proved meager, and he never again campaigned in the New World.

AUTUMN 1711. In northern Florida, the frontier captain Theophilus Hastings and Chief Brims of Coweta lead 1,300 Creeks on a destructive rampage through Choctaw territory, killing 80 and capturing 130. Another 200 Chickasaw under the Carolina frontiersman Thomas Welch visit like destruction upon Spain's native allies throughout this region.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1711. Duguay-Trouin at Rio. The Saint Malo privateer René Duguay-Trouin appears off Brazil with his 74-gun, 1,400-ton, 678-man flagship Lys and its sister ship Magnanime under the Chevalier de Courserac; the 64-gun, 1,100-ton, 550-man Brillant of the Chevalier de Goyon Beauport, Achille of Pierre de Rémy, Chevalier de Beauve, and Glorieux of Captain de la Jaille; the 58-gun, 800-ton, 486-man Fidèle of Miniac de la Moinerie; the 54-gun, 600-ton, 480-man Mars of Joseph Danycan; the royal frigates Argonaute of 46 guns, 500 tons, and 336 men under 28-year-old Emmanuel Auguste de Cahideuc, Chevalier Dubois de La Motte; Amazone of 36 guns, 450 tons, and 318 men under Lefer des Chesnais Le Fer; Aigle of 36 guns, 300 tons, and 238 men under de La Marre de Caen; Astrée of 22 guns, 250 tons, and 160 men under Rogon de Kertanguy; the victualler Concorde of 20 guns, 250 tons, and 300 men under Daniel de Pradel; the privateer frigates Chancelier of 40 guns and 246 men under du Rocher Danycan, and Glorieuse of 34 guns and 227 men under de la Perche; as well as the former galliot Bellone of 30 guns, 340 tons, and 229 men under de Kergu.

Although most of this fleet has been loaned by the French Crown, its financing comes from private sources. At 38 years of age, its commander has won fame as a brilliant commerce raider. Masked by mists and propelled by a favorable wind, Duguay-Trouin decides to burst directly into Rio's harbor, despite the formidable batteries covering its narrow entrance: 44-gun Fort Santa Cruz on its eastern shore, plus the 48 guns of Fort São João and Praya Vermelha on its western side. Fighting their way in behind Courserac (who is familiar with this roadstead), the French encounter four Portuguese warships and two frigates inside under Commo. Gaspar da Costa, who cuts his cables and grounds his ships beneath the protection from Rio's ramparts. At a cost of 300 total casualties, Duguay-Trouin has penetrated the harbor.

The next dawn, the Chevalier de Goyon occupies Cobras Island, where a French battery of 18 guns and 5 mortars is quickly installed. Duguay-Trouin meanwhile circles Rio on September 14 and, supported by covering fire from the Mars, disembarks more than 2,800 soldiers and sailors within a half mile of its walls. Before sunrise the next day, his encampment is struck by 1,500 Portuguese militia counterattackers, who are driven off after a sharp exchange. On September 19, Duguay-Trouin calls upon Rio's governor, Francisco de Castro Morais, to surrender. When this demand is rejected, the French begin a combined bombardment with their siege batteries and warships.

At 1:00 a.m. on September 21, a French prisoner slips out of Rio to advise the besiegers that the Portuguese have abandoned their city. Duguay-Trouin consequently occupies Rio, freeing 360 survivors from du Clerc's failed expedition of 1710. His second-in-command, Major General de Beauville, accepts the capitulation of the Portuguese harbor batteries, while Governor Castro withdraws five miles inland in the vain hope of being reinforced from São Paulo and Minas Gerais by Capt. Gen. Antônio de Albuquerque Coelho de Carvalho. The French loot the city warehouses, as well as 35 large and two-dozen small anchored vessels, before demanding a ransom to spare Rio's buildings. As any effective Portuguese military response is being hampered by renewed disturbances against the governor general at Salvador, as well as by lingering animosity between the twin Pernambucan cities of Olinda and Recife, the defenders reluctantly pay on October 10—although only 610,000 cruzados, far less than Duguay-Trouin expects.

The French then depart on November 13, having incorporated the 56-gun, 550-ton Nossa Senhora da Encarnação and the 44-gun Reinha dos Anjos into their fleet while burning the remainder. At a cost of 500 invaders' lives, Duguay-Trouin has devastated the city and burned almost 60 Portuguese merchantmen, but profits will prove to be disappointing for his investors. Moreover, the heavy-laden Magnanime and Fidèle are lost with all hands during his subsequent homeward passage on January 29, 1712, whereas the Aigle succumbs at anchor off Cayenne, prompting Duguay-Trouin's shareholders to complain bitterly once he regains Brest on February 8.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1711 (O.S.). Tuscarora War. Inland from Cape Hatteras in North Carolina, a native war party under Chief Hancock suddenly attacks Baron de Graffenried's colony of Swiss and Palatine Germans on the banks of the Trent and Neuse rivers, slaughtering 130 men, women, and children—among them the historian John Lawson—plus another 70 in isolated homesteads nearer the Pamlico. The heretofore peaceful Tuscaroras have been provoked by repeated encroachments upon their territory, but especially by the practice of certain white traders of selling Indian women and children into slavery whenever the Tuscaroras fail to pay their debts.

Frightened settlers now crowd into stockades, where many succumb to yellow fever, while a force of militiamen and Yamasee auxiliaries under Col. John Barnwell marches against Chief Hancock's village of Cotechney. This place is destroyed, but few casualties are inflicted. A standoff then occurs, resulting in an uneasy peace arrangement; yet, when the selling of Tuscaroras into bondage resumes the next year, a new round of fighting erupts in the autumn of 1712.

Col. James Moore of South Carolina thereupon leads a small body of militiamen and 900 Yamasee warriors against the principal Tuscarora stronghold of Neoheroka, leveling this palisaded town by March 1713 and killing or capturing 950 of its inhabitants—the prisoners being sold at £10 each to help offset the expedition's costs. Their spirits broken by this crushing defeat, the surviving Indians migrate north beyond the mountains of the Roanoke River headwaters, eventually joining their distant Iroquois-speaking cousins in New York as the sixth nation of the Iroquois Confederacy.

APRIL 1712. In eastern New York City, 25 black and 2 Indian slaves arm themselves and set fire to a building, killing 9 whites and wounding 7 others who rush to extinguish the flames. Gov. Robert Hunter sends regular troops to aid the local militia in quelling this uprising, driving the rebels into nearby woods on Manhattan Island, where some commit suicide and others eventually surrender to face execution. About 70 more slaves are also jailed—at least 21 being executed—in a subsequent hysterical outburst.

MAY 1712. When a large band of Fox or Mesquakie Indians advances out of their western Wisconsin and Illinois homeland to resettle amid their Mascouten allies near Fort Pontchartrain (modern Detroit, Michigan), fighting soon erupts for control over its lucrative fur trade. Governor Dubuisson besieges this camp for 19 days with 20 French soldiers, plus numerous Ottawa and Illinois allies, then pursues the fleeing Fox and overwhelms them after a fierce four-day battle. Mesquakie losses total some 1,000 men, women, and children slain or captured.

MAY 22, 1712. Tzeltal Rebellion. After five months of secret planning, the Tzeltal Indians of Chiapas (southern Mexico) rise in revolt under their chosen leader Juan García against Spanish oppression. The uprising begins with a sudden assault upon the congregants at Chilum or Chilón, who are surprised while at Sunday prayers inside their church and all beheaded. García thereupon leads a march through the neighboring towns of Ocosingo and Cuira, slaughtering every opponent in his path. When the natives of Simojovel refuse to join the insurrectionists, their village, too, is burned.

García eventually comes to command 15,000 poorly armed adherents but is finally halted at Huitzán or Huistán in November, just short of the provincial capital of Ciudad Real (modern San Cristóbal de las Casas), by a small army under the alcalde mayor Pedro Gutiérrez. The next month, the Spaniards are reinforced by troops out of Guatemala under Capt. Gen. Toribio José Miguel Cosío y Campo, Marqués de Torre Campo, who reaches Ciudad Real by December. The rebels are subsequently defeated in a series of clashes and driven back within their principal stronghold of Cahancú or Cancuc, surrendering shortly thereafter to face mass executions and imprisonment. Cosío returns into Guatemala by March 1713, his campaign concluded.

JUNE 1712. Cassard's Campaign. The 32-year-old Nantes privateer Jacques Cassard—veteran of many European and Antillean cruises, including the siege of Cartagena, and recently promoted to captain in France's Royal Navy—arrives before Suriname with a small fleet. King Louis XIV has furnished these ships and crews, and private subscribers have provided their financing.

Cassard ventures up the Suriname River until checked by the Dutch batteries guarding the approaches to their capital of Paramaribo. He thereupon reverses course and stands back out into the Atlantic, steering northwest toward Martinique.

In Europe, a general armistice is proclaimed at Utrecht, until final peace terms can be arranged.

JULY 1712. Cassard arrives at Martinique and requests that militia colonels François de Collart, Jean du Buc, and Louis du Prey augment his squadron's strength by supplying him with men. They raise 1,500 volunteers within three days, who accompany the expedition aboard 30 of their own craft when it departs northward to attack English Antigua.

Cassard drops anchor in Willoughby Bay by July 16, trying a disembarkation that same night, which is foiled by high wind and surf. Having lost the element of surprise, the French then veer southwest toward Montserrat.

Cassard bears down upon Carr's Bay first, then launches an assault against the capital of Plymouth on July 20. By hurrying men and artillery ashore to overwhelm the island's 400 unprepared defenders, who in the absence of Lt. Gov. John Pearnly are instead led by the planters George Wyke and Edward Parson, the French secure an immense booty—including 1,200 slaves and four rich merchantmen—as well as burning Stapletown to the ground and destroying all the artillery. The English meanwhile retreat into a mountain redoubt known as The Gardens between Galways Soufriere and South Hill, holding out until a quartet of English ships can appear with 600 reinforcements from Antigua, obliging Cassard's engorged expedition to scatter in the general direction of Basse-Terre (Guadeloupe).

OCTOBER 10, 1712. Having refreshed his followers, Cassard beats southeastward to attack Suriname again. Disembarking 1,100 men, the French advance up the river by both land and sea until they encounter the Dutch defenses before Paramaribo. Too tough to breach, the 16-gun frigate Méduse of Ensign d'Héricourt nonetheless slips past and into Suriname's unprotected hinterland, supported by troops under Beaudinard and Nicolas Hercule, Marquis d'Espinay Beaugroult. This threat to their properties compels the Dutch to sue for terms, and although Paramaribo itself does not surrender, its defenders give up 700,000 florins' worth of sugar, 730 slaves, plus some cash, for their plantations to be spared.

A French detachment under Lt. Baron de Moans de Grasse visits a like treatment against neighboring Berbice on November 15, farther to the west (in modern Guyana), extorting another 100,000 florins. Cassard's expedition departs in December, retiring to Martinique.

JANUARY 25, 1713. Cassard—supported by six Martinican freebooter vessels under Collart plus another three from Guadeloupe—descends upon Sint Eustatius, scattering its Dutch inhabitants into the jungle. He only obtains a meager ransom, however, before he veers southwest toward Curaçao.

FEBRUARY 6, 1713. Cassard's expedition parades before Curaçao's Fort Amsterdam, where he discovers that its Dutch defenders are forewarned of his approach. His flagship Neptune then strikes a reef, taking a considerable portion of the French siege train (1,000 mortar shells and 17 fieldpieces) to the bottom, while the Rubis is carried farther west by wind and currents.

It is not until 12 days later that Cassard and Collart can finally bring their troops ashore at Santa Cruz Bay in western Curaçao, suffering approximately 50 casualties from Dutch opposition—including the French commodore himself, who is wounded in the foot and cedes command to the Téméraire's Capt.

Anne Henry de Bandeville de Saint Périer. The attackers number 560 soldiers, 320 buccaneers, and 180 sailors, with which to subdue 800 Dutch troops and militiamen under Gov. Jeremias van Collen. Few of the defenders are regulars, however, so Dutch resistance remains perfunctory, confined to actions intended to delay any French penetration inland.

The invaders press forward and, on February 22, fight a pitched battle against a Dutch company entrenched atop a hill. The French captain Ruty drives against its center, supported by Collart on his left, until d'Espinay can outflank the defenders and send them reeling back into their capital of Willemstad. Bandeville thereupon occupies Otrobanda opposite the city, installing three small mortars, yet the French are otherwise powerless to menace Willemstad's major citadel (which is furthermore protected by three large ships anchored in the intervening channel). Although the invaders cannot inflict much damage upon the Dutch stronghold, they can wreak untold destruction among the island's unguarded plantations; therefore, when Bandeville sends an emissary under a flag of truce to propose terms, van Collen haggles for several days before agreeing to a cessation of hostilities on March 3. The French evacuate Curaçao without pillaging it, in exchange for 115,000 Spanish pesos.

The Treaty of Utrecht is finally signed on April 11, 1713, concluding 11 years of warfare. By its terms, France surrenders all claims to Hudson's Bay, Acadia, and Newfoundland, plus Saint Kitts, while retaining New France (Quebec), Ile Saint Jean (Prince Edward Island), and Ile Royal (Cape Breton Island). Although relatively little territory changes hands, Britain's star is now beginning to ascend, while France's wanes.

MINOR INCIDENTS (1713–1719)

Despite the official cessation of hostilities in Europe, localized frictions persist in the New World. The increasing population base and commercial prosperity of many American colonies lead to a gradual expansion and bring their residents not only into conflict with surrounding tribes but also against one another.

APRIL 17, 1713. English buccaneers advance out of Belize to occupy Cozumel Island (Mexico).

AUGUST 5, 1713. Buccaneers sack Chubulná on the Yucatán Peninsula (Mexico).

APRIL 1714. A dozen Englishmen lead 2,000 Alabama, Abinkha, Talapoosa, and Chickasaw warriors in a descent against the remnants of Spain and France's Choctaw allies in northern Florida, peacefully persuading them to switch allegiance to En-

Slave Asiento

In Spanish legal terms, asiento simply means a binding “agreement.” During the colonial era, the Crown and its overseas officials entered into scores of asientos every year to meet their empire’s needs. Such contracts were routinely negotiated with private individuals. They granted exclusive rights to supply foods and equipment or to perform services. And, usually, an asiento even regulated the heartless business of importing slaves.

But Spain owned no slaving depots in West Africa, whose coastal trade was reserved for Portugal by the 1494 Treaty of Tordesillas; therefore, the supply had to come from third parties. The first asiento to bring 4,000 African slaves into the Spanish Caribbean was granted as early as 1518 by the Emperor Charles V to his Flemish retainer Laurens de Goumenot. This courtier sold the privilege for 25,000 ducats to some Genoese traders. They, in turn, subcontracted with Portuguese slavers to actually transport the captives across the Atlantic.

Similar slaving asientos were issued over the next several decades for limited regions and periods. When Portugal was absorbed into the Spanish empire as of 1580, its slavers gained a broader monopoly, especially after signing the asiento of 1595. This bond was broken when Portugal revolted against Spanish rule in 1640. By now weak and bankrupt, the royal government in Madrid had to cast about for alternate suppliers. The notion of allowing private Spanish ships to sail to Angola to make their own purchases was rejected, as was an alliance with the African kingdom of Congo.

Madrid finally sold an asiento to the Genoese bankers Domingo Grillo and Ambrosio Lomelín in 1662, knowing that they would hire Dutch suppliers. The Netherlands had by now become the strongest maritime power in the world. Their traders had already smuggled at least 3,800 slaves to isolated colonists along the Spanish Main between 1646 and 1657, and this traffic was growing.

Grillo and Lomelín contracted the Dutch West India Company to bring African slaves to Curaçao, from where it legally delivered 24,000 over the next seven years to select Spanish American ports. But the Dutch also used such visits to sell great amounts of their own merchandise and gain local contacts. Profits proved excellent, as Spain’s colonists had abundant silver but were starved for imported goods. Even after Madrid cancelled the Dutch asiento in 1687, their smugglers would carry on a brisk trade out of Curaçao for decades.

These extra benefits made the asiento doubly attractive to foreign companies. When the French prince Philip of Anjou ascended the throne of Spain in 1701, one of his first acts was to sell the monopoly to French bidders. The ensuing War of the Spanish Succession prevented the French investors from prospering. And at the end of hostilities in 1713, the victorious British wrested a 30-year asiento from Spain for the importation of 144,000 slaves.

gland. The few who refuse seek shelter at Fort Saint Louis (Mobile).

APRIL 30, 1714. Annoyed by the persistent raids into Nicaragua and Costa Rica from the Caribbean coast by Miskito Indians, the Spanish Crown orders their “extermination or enslavement,” authorizing a 1,200-man sweep throughout that coastal region.

APRIL 23, 1715. Yamasee War. Two English traders—William Bray among the Yamasee and Samuel Warner among the Palachicola—hasten into Charles Town (later Charleston, South Carolina) to warn Gov. Charles Craven that a native uprising is imminent. This explodes three days later—at daybreak of Good Friday, April 15 (O.S.)—when fighters in red-and-black war paint surprise the veteran frontiersman Thomas Nairne and numerous other residents of Pocotalgio, slowly torturing them to death while ransacking their town.

Angry at having been victimized by dishonest Carolina traders during recent years, as well as by encroachments upon tribal lands, the Yamasee set out to exterminate all interlopers in their midst. More than 300 terrified English residents flee onto a ship anchored off Port Royal, watching in horror as their homes are destroyed and neighbors slaughtered. Farther northeast another Indian war party sweeps through the scattered plantations between the Combahee and Edisto rivers, claiming a further 100 lives.

Craven learns of these attacks while traveling overland toward Savannah in hopes of parleying with the chiefs and immediately orders out his militia. An assault upon his camp is repelled, after which Col. John Barnwell and Capt. Alexander Mackay are sent by sea to relieve Pocotalgio. In the week after Easter, Craven advances into rebel territory with 250 militiamen and settlement Indians and comes upon a Yamasee concentration near the Combahee’s head. Although outnumbered, he nonetheless defeats and disperses these natives into the swamps in an encounter known as the “Sadkeche Fight.”

Although the Yamasee onslaught is thus temporarily checked, many other tribes rise as well, and numerous traders are killed or robbed. Defensive measures are taken 30 miles around Charles Town, and frontiersmen begin bringing in numerous captives. In mid-June, the Santee border is attacked by another native group, and a relief column of 90 riders under Captain Barker is ambushed by Congarees, who kill this officer along with about a third of his command. Schenkingh’s Cowpen is also overrun when its commander, Redwood, foolishly admits an Indian party proposing peace, who then tomahawk the defenders. But a “brave and bold” officer, incongruously named Capt. George Chicken, marches north from the Ponds with 120 Goose Creek militiamen to inflict a punishing reverse upon these raiders by June 24.

Late in July, Craven marches north with 100 militiamen, plus 100 black fighters and Indians, to join the North Carolina forces of colonels Maurice Moore and Theophilus Hastings in a campaign against the Saraws, plus other hostiles. But no sooner has South Carolina’s governor crossed the Santee than word overtakes him of 700 Apalaches slipping through the Edisto defensive perimeter from the south to plunder its plantations, obliging him to hasten back to Charles Town’s defense. Halted short of Stono Island, the raider band retreats, burning Pon Pon (Jackson’s) Bridge. Shortly thereafter, HMS Valour, guard ship for Virginia, reaches Charles Town with 160 muskets and other supplies, greatly easing the colonists’ fears.

South Carolina’s militia is then reorganized, and the situation stabilizes. By autumn, Lt. Gov. Robert Daniel can lead a considerable expedition against the Indian town of Huspaw (near the northern mouth of the Altamaha), finding it deserted. A large Cherokee delegation arrives at the end of October, promising to join the English at Savannah one month later for a combined operation against the Creeks. The warriors fail to keep the rendezvous, though, so Moore marches into their territory with 300 frontiersmen in an attempt to persuade them to join the English cause. He eventually succeeds, and the rebel Creeks emigrate southwest by late January 1716 to seek shelter amid the Spanish and French. Only a few minor skirmishes ensue during the coming spring, and a peace treaty is concluded by 1717.

MARCH 14, 1716. The 64-year-old captain Louis de La Porte, Sieur de Louvigny, departs Quebec

City with 400 French coureurs de bois or “backwoodsmen” and 400 Indian allies in a punitive sweep against the Fox Indians deeper in the North American hinterland. He defeats them in a battle about 37 miles above modern Green Bay (Wisconsin) and returns into Quebec City by October 12.

EARLY JULY 1716. The Jamaican rover Henry Jennings raids a Spanish encampment at Cape Canaveral (Florida), setting 300 buccaneers ashore from two brigantines and three barcos luengos to plunder its tents after its 50 defenders have been dispersed. This encampment is the base for Havana’s sargento mayor or “garrison commander,” Juan del Hoyo Solórzano, who has been salvaging the remains of Adm. Juan Estaban de Ubilla’s treasure fleet, wrecked among the Palmar de Aiz Keys during a storm on February 19.

While del Hoyo and most of his men are absent at the wreck sites with their frigate Soledad (flag), plus the auxiliaries Paquita, Smith (English prize), Santa Rita, Jesús Nazareno, Animas, and the galley Perfecta, the raiders are easily able to secure 350,000 pesos’ worth of salvaged coin before sailing away. (Cuban authorities later retaliate by issuing letters of reprisal against British vessels, thereby heightening Anglo-Spanish tensions.)

DECEMBER 7, 1716. Bay of Campeche. Sargento mayor Alonso Felipe de Andrade exits Campeche with 100 soldiers and 280 volunteers under privateer captain Sebastián García, sailing aboard the hired frigate Nuestra Señora de la Soledad, two other frigates, a sloop, two coast-guard galliots under Capt. José de León, plus a pair of piraguas, to eliminate the English logwood establishments in the nearby Laguna de Términos. En route, they are joined by another sloop and two piraguas from Tabasco, bearing an additional 220 men.

A few days later, the Spaniards capture a Dutch pink outside the Laguna entrance, then cross its bar between 3:00 and 4:00 p.m. on December 11, forcing the surrender of another 18 foreign frigates and sloops the next day. Only an English captain named Thomas Porter continues to resist, melting into the jungle with 150 followers, while the rest of the poachers submit and are allowed to leave; unlike previous raids by the Spaniards, this time the Spaniards intend to stay. On December 15, de Andrade begins bringing ashore matériel to erect a redoubt to cover the Laguna entrance, thereby preventing future access.

EARLY APRIL 1717. Carpenter, one of Jennings's lieutenants, is captured aboard his frigate outside Havana by an 80-man Cuban coast-guard galliot.

JUNE 19, 1717. The French mercenary commodore Jean Nicolas Martinet reaches Concepción (Chile) after a perilous passage around Cape Horn, having been hired by the Spanish Crown to rid its South American coastline of foreign smugglers with his purchased ships Príncipe de Asturias (ex-Conquérant) of 700 tons, 64 guns, and 500 men; Triunfante (ex-Grand Saint Esprit) of 600 tons, 50 guns, and 400 men, commanded by Captain de la Jonquière; plus the store-ship Princesse de Valois of Captain Garnier du Fougerai. They have been joined off Cadiz the previous December by the 60-gun Spanish Nuestra Señora del Carmen (ex-English Pembroke) under Capt. Bartolomé de Urdinzu, and the 48-gun, 600-ton Peregrino (formerly the French Pèlerin) of one-eyed, one-armed, peg-legged Blas de Lezo y Olavarrieta. However, both Spanish vessels proved incapable of rounding the Horn so have turned back toward Buenos Aires.

After recuperating in Concepción, Martinet forges northward, seizing the French smuggler Fidèle off Cobija on September 3, then another five French vessels off Arica on September 11. These prizes are carried into Callao (Peru) by September 27, their crews eventually being repatriated to Europe aboard two of these captured vessels. In March 1718, the Peregrino enters Callao, although the Nuestra Señora del Carmen has once more circled back into the Atlantic, seizing two small Saint Malo frigates off the River Plate before being abandoned as useless. Urdinzu finally gains Callao in January 1720 aboard his two prizes. Martinet's ships return shortly thereafter toward Brest and Lorient via Cadiz, after which Blas de Lezo succeeds Urdinzu in command of the

Louisbourg

By the terms of the 1713 Treaty of Utrecht, France gave up its outposts on Newfoundland and Acadia (modern Nova Scotian peninsula). But it kept what are today known as Cape Breton and Prince Edward islands, where a new Atlantic stronghold was to be erected to replace Placentia. The strategic purpose of this new fort was to protect access to the St. Lawrence Seaway and mainland Canada, as well as to provide a shore base for fishermen who crossed from France every year to take cod from the Grand Banks.

The colonial engineer at Quebec City, Capt. Josué Berthelot de Beaujours, Knight of the Order of Saint Louis, was ordered on March 10, 1715, to go to Cape Breton Island to upgrade the neglected settlement at Port Dauphin (modern Englishtown, Nova Scotia). But an officer of the elite Royal Corps of Engineers named Jean-François du Verger de Verville, Knight of the Order of Saint Louis, was sent out from France to take over the project and replaced him the next year. After touring the island, Verville decided to create a new fortified town named Havre Louisbourg at its southeastern end, in a sheltered harbor that did not freeze in winter. Some 750 refugees had already settled around its shores.

Verville returned in the summer of 1717 to draw up plans, and work actually started two years later. His masonry walls proved very expensive to build because most materials, skilled laborers, and even beasts of burden had to be brought across the Atlantic. Cold weather prevented mortar from setting, so that cementing could only be done during the three or four warm months. Verville himself went home to France every autumn. Soon, the cost of his project grew so high that Louis XV asked his ministers whether he might one day be able to see Louisbourg rising over the horizon from his palace at Versailles.

In 1724, Verville was succeeded by 41-year-old captain Étienne Verrier, Knight of the Order of Saint Louis, a more seasoned and politic royal engineer from La Rochelle. They worked together for a year, after which Verville was reassigned. Verrier remained at Louisbourg as resident engineer for the next two decades. He slowly completed its fortifications, as well as the Royal and Island batteries. He also designed very beautiful public buildings, plus a lighthouse, which was raised on the harbor's southeastern headland in 1734 because of frequent fogs.

The town blossomed into a vibrant community. Vast amounts of cod were cured there for export to France and the West Indies. Sugar, rum, and molasses were imported for resale into New England. By the late 1730s, more than 150 ships were putting into Louisbourg every year. It became one of the busiest seaports in North America. Its population reached 2,500–3,000 permanent residents. Yet, ironically, exaggerated reports of the size and expense of its defenses generated fear in New England. Just as Verrier was finishing his labor in 1745, an English expedition disembarked and captured Louisbourg after a six-week siege.

remaining Spanish forces in the Pacific by 1723, amassing a tidy fortune in prize money.

JULY 15, 1717. El Carmen. Three buccaneer sloops anchor north of Tris Island in the Laguna de Términos (Mexico) and disembark 335 men to dislodge its newly installed Spanish garrison. After vainly calling upon Governor de Andrade to capitulate, the English wait until nightfall of July 15 to storm its eastern ramparts under cover of darkness.

Ens. Juan Muñoz's detachment is driven back from the walls, and the buccaneers gain the building's interior, only to be expelled by an unexpected 42-man sally from the Santa Isabel Bastion led by de Andrade himself. The Spanish commander falls mortally wounded, yet his men drive the English back to their ships, never to return. Because this victory has been won on July 16—feast day of Our Lady of El Carmen—both the fort and island are subsequently renamed Isla del Carmen by the Spaniards.

AUGUST 24, 1717. After four-and-a-half months of simmering unrest following the proclamation of a Crown monopoly on tobacco, Cuba's governor, Vicente Raja—in office little more than a year—is compelled to resign and flee for Spain when Havana's garrison refuses to support him during a popular uprising.

AUTUMN 1717. Buenos Aires's 35-year-old governor Bruno Mauricio de Zabala, Knight of the Order of Calatrava, installed into office only since July 11, dispatches an expedition shortly thereafter to extirpate an unauthorized shore camp established by the French captain Etienne Moreau at Maldonado (Uruguay), who has been bartering with the local Guenoa Indians for corambre and hides. The Spaniards surprise the four-gun battery covering Moreau's anchorage and detain him along with his flagship Saint François, 3 other French vessels, 220 tons of cargo, 18 cannon, and 55 men.

FEBRUARY 11, 1718. José Rocher de la Peña, gobernador de tercio or third-in-command of Spain's West Indian squadron, quits San Juan de Puerto Rico with his 160-man royal frigate San Juan Bautista, two privateer sloops belonging to Miguel Enríquez, a pair of coast-guard sloops from Santo Domingo, plus one sloop each from Cumaná and the island of Trinidad to proceed southeastward against English-occupied Vieques Island.

Rocher calls upon these trespassers to surrender, which their leader agrees to do; yet, when the Spaniards come ashore, the settlers flee into the jungle, obliging Rocher's men to spend the next 10 days hunting down as many as possible, while burning their dwellings and six-gun citadel. Eventually, he departs with four prize sloops, 92 black slaves, and a number of English captives, who are carried into Veracruz by July.

SPRING 1718. The renegade English privateer Edward Teach or Thatch (better known as “Blackbeard”)—having been driven out of the Caribbean and Bahamas by the spread of English Crown rule—blockades Charles Town (later Charleston, South Carolina) and extorts a small ransom.

AUGUST 4, 1718. On the afternoon of July 26 (O.S.), the veteran Woodes Rogers (see “November 25, 1708” entry in “Queen Anne’s War”) arrives outside New Providence as the Bahamas’s new governor designate, accompanied by 250 colonists aboard the 460-ton ex-Indiaman Delicia, frigates HMSS Milford and Rose, plus naval sloops Buck and Shark. Until now, the islands have been run by a private company, under whose absentee rule numerous renegade buccaneers have taken up residence. Rogers’s commission calls for an end to their piratical depredations, therefore many—such as “Blackbeard”—have already forsaken the Bahamas rather than submit to royal government.

However, the pirate Charles Vane’s flagship remains defiantly at anchor inside New Providence’s harbor, so after nightfall, Rogers sends the Rose and the Shark to take soundings in the anchorage, prompting Vane to respond with a recently captured French prize fitted out as a fireship. The Royal Navy frigate and sloop retreat out to sea, and next dawn the pirates get under way, evading Rogers’s attempted interception. With this threat removed, Rogers comes ashore the morning of August 7, to be greeted by an honor guard of 300 boozy buccaneers who have remained behind in New Providence under captains Benjamin Hornigold, Thomas Burgess, and others to swear fealty to the Crown.

EARLY SEPTEMBER 1718. Manuel Miralles departs Havana with the sloops Santa Rita of Capt. José Cordero, Ánimas of Juan Ramón Gutiérrez, Regla of Andrés González, Ave María of Juan Bustillos, Santa Cruz of Miguel del Manzano, Begonia of Ignacio Olavarría, and the brigantine Jesús Nazareno of Domingo Coimbra. Miralles’s commission is to drive off the foreign salvors working the Palmar de Aiz shipwreck sites (see “Early July 1716”), which Spain regards as its property.

He returns into Havana by September 25 with 5 captive British sloops, 86 prisoners, 98 black slaves, and 80,000 pesos in specie. Another 70 Englishmen are believed to have fled ashore. Miralles has left a 140-man, four-gun Spanish garrison behind under Cordero to guard the Palmar de Aiz anchorage, supported by 3 sloops, plus Coimbra’s brigantine.

NOVEMBER 21, 1718 (O.S.). Toward evening, Lt. Robert Maynard of HMS Pearl arrives opposite Ocracoke Inlet (North Carolina) with two hired Virginia sloops bearing 60 seamen. They trap the pirate Teach’s Adventure inside and next morning take it, slaying Blackbeard and 10 of his crew and wounding the other 9. The Royal Navy suffers 10 killed and 24 injured during this fray.

MAY 15, 1719. Off southern Cuba, the Jamaican rover Jennings arrives to make a retaliatory raid for the salvors driven from the Palmar de Aiz wreck sites by Miralles's flotilla. Some 200 men disembark at the hamlet of Casilda and advance upon its neighboring town of Trinidad, only to find its garrison alerted. Frustrated in his design, Jennings instead destroys several Casilda fishing boats before departing.

SEPTEMBER 1719. The pirate Bartholomew Roberts reaches Bahia (Brazil) from Africa with his 32-gun Royal Rover, plundering a 42-ship Portuguese convoy preparing to depart for Lisbon.

LATE 1719. Having been released, the French interloper Moreau (see "Autumn 1717" entry) returns with four vessels to once more barter ashore with Uruguayan natives in the vicinity of Maldonado. A counterexpedition of 75 troops and 30 militiamen under Capt. Martín J. Echaurri, dispatched overland by Governor Zabala of Buenos Aires, fails to catch these trespassers, although 30 of their empty huts are torched.

A second contingent of 54 soldiers, 27 militiamen, and 25 Chaná archers from Santo Domingo Soriano are therefore sent early next year under Capt. Antonio Pando y Patiño, who—guided by a mulatto laborer escaped from the French encampment—surprises Moreau's shore base at Castillos on May 24, 1720. The French commander is slain during the ensuing half-hour battle, shot through the mouth by the Spanish subaltern Pedro José Garaycochea. Six other interlopers lay dead, 15 are wounded, and 57 are taken prisoner.

WAR OF THE QUADRUPE ALLIANCE (1718–1720)

Despite its name, this conflict does not erupt overtly but, rather, starts as a "police action" in Europe intended to curb Spain's activities in the Mediterranean. Madrid never concluded peace with Austria following the War of the Spanish Succession, still disputing territories in Italy lost to Emperor Charles VI. Spain now hopes to regain these principalities through recourse to arms.

A Spanish expedition therefore invades Sardinia in August 1717, then enters Sicily one year later. Such aggression is opposed by France, Britain, and Holland, who have banded into a war-weary Triple Alliance to preserve the Treaty of Utrecht. Austria becomes a fourth coalition member in early August 1718, and a Royal Navy fleet—without any official declaration of war—destroys the Spanish expeditionary force off Cape Passaro (Sicily) on August 11.

The beleaguered Spanish government subsequently informs its American officials of these developments on September 14, 1718, ordering reprisals taken in the New World, then severs relations with Britain two days later. London in turn declares war on December 26, 1718, and hostilities spread when France also sends an army to invade northern Spain via the Pyrenees in March 1719.

APRIL 19, 1719. Joseph Le Moyne de Sérigny et de Loire, the 49-year-old subordinate (and brother) of Louisiana's 39-year-old governor Jean-Baptiste Le Moyne de Bienville, arrives at Biloxi aboard a French warship with orders for an immediate preemptive strike against the neighboring Spanish outpost of Pensacola.

MAY 14, 1719. French Seizure of Pensacola. Having learned of the outbreak of hostilities before the Spaniards, Le Moyne de Sérigny's expedition of four French warships and 600 men surprises Pensacola, calling upon its governor—Col. Juan Pedro Matamoros—to surrender. The latter refuses, but after a token three-day resistance, his 200-man garrison sues for terms because Pensacola's fortifications are incomplete, plus there are insufficient stores for his defenders and the 800 noncombatants to withstand a protracted siege. De Sérigny offers French citizenship to all inhabitants who elect to remain, then assigns the 22-gun frigate Comte de Toulouse and 20-gun Maréchal de Villars to transport the governor and defeated Spaniards across the Gulf of Mexico to Havana. The occupiers meanwhile begin transforming Pensacola into Louisiana's new capital and principal port, having been disappointed by the inferior harbor configurations at Mobile and Biloxi.

On July 4, as the pair of vessels bearing the defeated Spaniards approach Cuba, they are escorted into Havana by 14 Spanish privateer vessels that are exiting to raid Louisiana under Lt. Col. Alfonso Carrascosa de la Torre. Learning of Pensacola's fate, the Spanish governor Gregorio Guazo Calderón refuses to honor the French flags of truce, instead imprisoning their crews and using the Comte de Toulouse and the Maréchal de Villars to spearhead a second Cuban expedition, this time to reconquer the west Florida outpost.

Carrascosa de la Torre's force sets sail again on July 19, now consisting of the two French prizes; a 16-gun, 150-ton Spanish frigate; and eight other privateer craft bearing a total of 1,600 men that include two companies (150 soldiers) of Havana regulars under sargento mayor Estéban de Berroa, 900 volunteers, and more than 300 displaced Pensacola residents. They appear offshore on August 4, after having been delayed for two days by a lack of wind, and use their light-oared boats to disembark 100 men at Sigüenza Point, peppering the French positions while the Spanish squadron is towed over the bar. The disheartened 260 troops left as a garrison under Capt. Antoine Le Moyne de Châteauguay surrender the next morning, as well as 140 other Frenchmen. Spanish booty includes the Company of the West vessel Saint Louis of Captain du Colombier and the transport Dauphine of Captain Faraud, as well as 160 black slaves.

De Berroa and the Cuban coast-guard captain Antonio de Mendieta set sail on August 12 with three privateer craft to attempt an attack against Louisiana, but after sending a surrender demand ashore to Governor de Bienville the next day at Dauphine Island, they content themselves with merely blockading Mobile Bay.

JULY 5, 1719. The 50-year-old commodore Francisco Javier Cornejo Vallejo arrives off Veracruz from Cadiz and enters the next day with the leaky 60-gun warships San Juan Bautista and San Luis, as well as the 50-gun frigate San Jorge, bearing official dispatches announcing the commencement of hostilities.

JULY 9, 1719. The 66-year-old commodore Gilles, Marquis de Des Nos de Champmeslins, reaches Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien, Haiti) from Brest with his battered 60-gun, 900-ton flagship Hercule, as well as the 54-gun, 600-ton Mars of Captain Roquefeuil and Triton of Captain de Vienne, to campaign against the Spaniards.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1719. Demolition of Pensacola. After being joined at Cap François (Haiti) by the 36-gun company ship Union of Captain Mancellière-Grave and the flûte or transport Mary of Captain Japil, Commodore de Champmeslins has set sail for Louisiana on August 13; his five ships bear almost 2,000 men, including 250 fresh troops. His squadron appears off Dauphine Island by September 1, relieving Governor de Bienville's defenders the next day, which causes the Cuban privateer craft to retreat out of Mobile Bay.

The French quickly marshal their strength to reconquer Pensacola. De Sérigny sets sail by mid-September with a few hundred volunteers aboard Champmeslins's warships, while de Bienville leads a column of 100 Louisianans and 500 native auxiliaries overland. Champmeslins drops anchor off Pensacola's entrance by the evening of September 16, and the next morning de Bienville's skirmishers begin harassing the Spanish garrison holding Fort Carlos. The French squadron then shoots its way in past the 24-gun battery at Sigüenza Point and batters Carrascosa's anchored frigate into submission within three hours. The 800 Spanish defenders lose more than 100 men, therefore Matamoros offers to surrender Fort Carlos, and all resistance ceases. Some 626 Cuban survivors are repatriated to Havana with Mendieta, while Matamoros, Carrascosa, de Berroa, and their two companies of Spanish regulars are carried off to Europe by Champmeslins on November 2 as prisoners of war, after the French have razed the town and its defenses.

NOVEMBER 1719. South Carolina's local assembly revolts against the private London company that rules the colony, installing James Moore as an acting "royal" governor. The Crown eventually accedes to this unorthodox change of government, appointing its own representative one year later.

DECEMBER 13, 1719. A few hundred English buccaneers disembark at Tavabacoa Beach (Cuba) and march inland to assault the town of Sancti Spiritus. A Spaniard at work early in his fields sights the invaders and warns the residents, whose militia repel this attack at Sabana de las Minas, with several deaths resulting on both sides.

JANUARY 27, 1720. In Europe, Spain temporarily patches up its differences with France by signing a truce, but terms are not finalized for another year. The actual treaty is not concluded until March 27, 1721, hence some hostile deployments will persist.

FEBRUARY 1720. Spanish Attempt on the Bahamas.

Three frigates of the Armada de Barlovento's Commo. Francisco Cornejo and José Cordero, plus nine privateer sloops and brigantines bearing a combined total of 1,200–1,300 Cubans, appear outside New Providence (Nassau) to launch a surprise assault. Reluctant to steer directly across its bar because of the presence inside of Governor Rogers's flagship Delicia and the 24-gun frigate HMS Flamborough, the Spaniards instead try a disembarkation farther east. Three columns push ashore under captains Fernando Castro, Francisco de León, and Julián Barroso and cause considerable material damage before being repelled by Rogers's 500 militiamen. The Spanish then remain offshore and eventually make off with 100 slaves and considerable booty.

FEBRUARY 18, 1720. The 14-gun Royal Navy snow HMS Happy arrives at Casilda (Cuba) from Jamaica. Its commander, Lt. Joseph Laws, lodges a formal protest with the authorities at the inland town of Trinidad over the privateering activities of Christopher Winter and Nicholas Brown, two English Catholic rovers serving Spain. Specifically, the rovers are charged with stealing slaves from Jamaica, which Gov. Gerónimo de Fuentes denies, commanding Laws to depart two days later.

MAY 15, 1720. Having rounded Cape Horn, touched at Chiloé, then plundered and burned Paíta (Peru), the former Royal Navy lieutenant George Shelvocke's 24-gun, 160-man privateer Speedwell is wrecked off the Juan Fernández Islands, losing two-thirds of its complement.

Restoration of Pensacola

By the terms of the subsequent peace treaty, Pensacola was restored to Spanish control, therefore expeditions were ordered across from Veracruz and Havana to reoccupy Pensacola Bay in 1721. Given the ease of Santa María de Galve's fall, the authorities moreover decided to revive the earlier plan of erecting a stronghold at the western tip of its offshore island, as well as transferring the entire mainland settlement over to this more defensible site.

Work on a redoubt to cover the entrance channel commenced in 1723 and was completed three years later, the town that sprang up just east of it becoming known as Santa Rosa Punta de Sigüenza. (Florida State University archeologists excavated this site in 1964 and estimated its total number of buildings to be 35.) The tiny military garrison and civilian populace was sustained by semi-annual dispatches of arms, provisions, medicines, and payrolls from Mexico—although deliveries were often delayed by Gulf storms or enemy threats—while presidarios or “convicts” were also transported out to provide a labor force and to bolster the community once their sentences were served.

Most of the few hundred residents operated farms on the mainland and, later, felled large numbers of tall, straight, limber pines during the 1730s to export to Havana's shipyard. Because of their isolation, inhabitants furthermore indulged in clandestine trade with Louisiana.

(This ship originally cleared Plymouth on February 24, 1719, accompanied by the 36-gun, 180-man Success of veteran privateer John Clipperton—see “February 1704” entry in “Queen Anne's War.” Both are to have sailed in company, armed with Austrian commissions obtained at Oostende and renamed Starhemberg and Prinz Eugen; but upon Britain's entry into the war, their owners instead obtained English papers. Before quitting England, Shelvocke has also been demoted from the larger to the smaller ship, and soon after sailing, he quarrels with Clipperton and separates from him. While rounding Cape Horn, Shelvocke's first mate, Simon Hatley, kills an albatross, furnishing the inspiration for Samuel Taylor Coleridge's later poem “Rime of the Ancient Mariner.”)

JUNE 1720. The pirate Roberts ransacks a 22-ship British convoy in Trepassey Bay (Newfoundland), then seizes a half-dozen French vessels shortly thereafter off the Grand Banks. He chooses one of the vessels, a 28-gun ship, as his new flagship and re-names it Royal Fortune. He subsequently intercepts a string of prizes off New England in August, before returning into the West Indies by September.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1720. Cornejo's crewmen mutiny in Havana Bay, approximately 100 privateers landing at Luyanó Beach to march upon Jesús del Monte Monastery—south of the city—and lodge a heated protest regarding their lack of pay. Governor Guazo Calderón surrounds the sanctuary with two companies of troops (thereby incurring the wrath of the local bishop), and the rebels retreat aboard ship. Three days later, Guazo Calderón hangs their ringleaders.

OCTOBER 1720. Bartholomew Roberts stations himself on Saint Lucia and intercepts numerous English and French merchantmen visiting Barbados and Martinique, finally leaving this theater for Africa in spring 1721.

In Europe, Spain is overwhelmed by the Quadruple Alliance and accepts its terms; yet it is not until late March 1721 that Madrid finally instructs its Spanish American officials to restore confiscated British properties, thus perpetuating much simmering local resentment.

OCTOBER 16, 1720. Having constructed a 20-ton vessel called Recovery from the Speedwell's remains, Shelvocke and 46 survivors strike out from the Juan Fernández Islands toward the South American mainland and eventually capture the 200-ton Spanish merchantman Jesús María near Pisco, renaming it Happy Return. Shelvocke is subsequently boarded off Quibo by Clipperton, but the two Englishmen again part company, proceeding northwest separately.

Shelvocke thereupon captures the 300-ton Sacra Familia off Guatemala and, on March 24, 1721, meets Clipperton once more. Both captains try to patch up their differences for a concerted attempt against the galleon Santo Cristo de Burgos, which is about to depart Acapulco toward Manila, but they argue bitterly over prize shares. Clipperton therefore slips away one night in May 1721, heading across the Pacific alone in hopes of intercepting the galleon off the Philippines. Shelvocke withdraws his watch outside Acapulco a few days later, reaching Puerto Seguro near Cabo San Lucas (Baja California) by August 22, 1721, where he rests before departing westward.

TURMOIL (1721–1724)

Amid a spreading wave of stability and prosperity, some New World colonies still suffer minor upheavals, especially in Spanish America.

APRIL 4, 1721. Capt. Antonio, Marqués de San Miguel de Aguayo, arrives in San Antonio (Texas) with a Mexican expedition to bolster Spain's claim over this region against French encroachments out of Louisiana. On August 1, he strikes a bargain with his French counterpart, Louis de Saint Denis, establishing a new boundary between both territories.

JUNE 28, 1721. At Vila Rica in the Brazilian province of Minas Gerais, masked gold miners seize Gov. Pedro de Almeida, Conde de Assumar, angered by excessive duties being charged at royal smelters. After four days of threats, the governor agrees to reduce these rates; but upon regaining his freedom, Assumar has the miners' stronghold of Arraial do Ouro Podre burned on the night of July 14, and their leader Felipe dos Santos is subsequently drawn and quartered.

JANUARY 17, 1722. In western Mexico, a Spanish expedition under Capt. Juan Flores de San Pedro penetrates the Mesa del Tonati plateau (Nayarit) in two pincer movements and overwhelms its Cora defenders, bringing them under Crown rule.

AUGUST 23, 1722. Two English smuggling sloops arrive at Mariel (Cuba) escorted by a man-of-war. Havana's Governor Guazo Calderón sends two Spanish coast-guard vessels and two piraguas under Captain Mendieta, plus two companies of regulars and another of militiamen, overland to detain these interlopers. The English are attacked on August 25. The Royal Navy warship fights its way clear after two hours, but its consorts are captured, with 9 dead and 22 wounded (compared to 7 Spanish fatalities).

LATE 1722. The Spanish corsair Esteban de la Barca departs Yucatán with 40 men aboard a galliot and a piragua and captures a small English buccaneer vessel off Isla Mujeres, then an interloper brigantine and sloop off Belize, before ravaging its logwood camps.

FEBRUARY 18, 1723. An uprising occurs in Cuba against the Crown's proposed new tobacco monopoly. Learning that some 500 armed protesters are marching upon Havana, Governor Guazo Calderón sends the cavalry captain Ignacio Barrutia with two companies of mounted infantrymen to disperse this mob at 9:00 p.m. on February 20. Next dawn, Barrutia falls upon rebels outside the town of Santiago, receiving a volley that kills a horse and wounds a trooper before scattering the rebels with a charge. One rioter is killed, several others wounded, and 12 captured, who are promptly hanged at Jesús del Monte as a warning to others.

SPRING 1723. Araucano Independence. In Chile, natives near Purén rise against Spanish rule, sparking a general revolt throughout this realm. The 58-year-old governor Gabriel Cano de Aponte, Knight of the Order of Santiago, calls out his militia and places them under the command of his nephew Manuel de Salamanca. In August, the latter defeats a rebel concentration under Chief Vilumilla on the banks of the Duqueco River, yet the Spaniards are too few to hold the entire territory so abandon their outposts south of the Bío-Bío River. Eventually, the Spanish sign a peace treaty with 130 chieftains in February 1726, granting them autonomy within their lands.

NOVEMBER 4, 1723. Having reclaimed Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay), a Portuguese expedition departs east under maestre de campo Manuel de Freitas da Fonseca. The campaign consists of three companies (150 troops) and 100 colonists aboard the 50-gun warship Nossa Senhora da Oliveira of Capt. Manuel Henriques de Noronha, transport Chumbado of Francisco Dias, plus two minor consorts. They appear off Montevideo Bay by November 22 and six days later go ashore to erect a square redoubt.

Upon learning of this new establishment on December 1, Buenos Aires's Governor de Zabala immediately dispatches 250 soldiers under Lt. Alonso de la Vega aboard two warships under Commo. Salvador García Pose to compel the settlers to evacuate this territory. A protracted siege and blockade ensue, until the Portuguese eventually agree to withdraw on January 19, 1724. The Spaniards subsequently found their own city upon this same site.

Plan for the frontier presidio constructed on orders of Capt. Antonio, Marqués de San Miguel de Aguayo, at San Antonio de Abejar in Texas, 1722. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico)

SPRING 1724. Dummer's War. Hostilities erupt between English settlers living on the frontiers of Maine and Vermont and Abenaki Indians, instigated by the French. (This conflict will become known by the name of 47-year-old William Dummer, acting governor of Massachusetts, who exercises jurisdiction over these outposts.)

One of its major actions is a carefully planned expedition of over 200 colonial soldiers, which heads up the Kennebec River from Fort Richmond (Maine) in August under captains Johnson Harmon and Jeremiah Moulton. It is their intent to surprise the encampment of the 67-year-old French Jesuit missionary Sébastien Râle, who has long incited the Norridgewock Indians to resist English expansion. After pausing briefly at Ticonic (Winslow), where they leave their whaleboats and a 40-man guard, the New Englanders continue north on foot toward Narantsouak (Old Point/Madison). Coming within striking distance of this place around noon on August 12, the raiding party subdivides into two units of roughly 80 men each. Harmon, who advances through the cornfields, finds no natives and consequently misses the ensuing fight. Moulton, however, leads his men directly into the village, having ordered them to observe strict silence and not fire until the enemy empties its own guns.

Discovering the attackers, some 50–60 warriors rush out of their homes, firing wildly and receiving a heavy countervolley. The natives thereupon retreat to cover the escape of their women and children, being pursued by most of Moulton's men, who cut them down in the river and surrounding forest. Meanwhile, the old Norridgewock chieftain Mog and Father Râle continue to hold out in the village, the latter being killed by Lt. Richard Jaques, Harmon's son-in-law, as the friar fires from a cabin (against Moulton's direct orders, who wishes that the Frenchman be taken alive). The village is then looted, burned, and its dead scalped.

Another encounter occurs at Pigwacket (Fryeburg, Maine) on Sunday, May 9, 1725 (O.S.), when Capt. John Lovewell is ambushed while on a scalping expedition with 33 volunteers. A band of 80 warriors fells a dozen Englishmen—including Lovewell—with its opening volley. One volunteer runs away, leaving 21 others dug in under Ens. Seth Wyman, the sole surviving officer. Nonetheless, they hold a strong position, with a pond at their backs and two large fallen pines for breastworks. Toward nightfall, seeing the Indians making camp, Wyman sneaks across and kills their leader, effectively ending this fight. Eventually, 18 of his men return home, and peace is reestablished with the natives.

MARCH 16, 1724. The 64-gun Spanish flagship Estrella del Mar (also known as Sanguineto) of Commo. Francisco Cornejo, accompanied by the 66-gun Catalán of Capt. Antonio Serrano and the pink Volante of Capt. Pedro Moyano, depart Cartagena for Portobelo and shortly thereafter stumble upon four Dutch merchantmen, who are conducting clandestine trade off Tolú. These interlopers—mounting 36, 32, 22, and 20 guns, respectively—are chased into shallow waters by the Spanish pink, backed by the Sanguineto. The 22-gun smuggler is subdued after a two-hour exchange costing 10 Spanish dead and 30 wounded, while the remaining merchantmen escape out to sea. The victors incorporate this prize into their squadron and change its Dutch name into the Spanish-sounding Adriana Catalina.

APRIL 11, 1724. A Spanish expedition departs Ascensión Bay (modern Emiliano Zapata Bay, Yucatán) under Nicolás Rodríguez, with the corsairs José Aguirre, José Marqués de Valenzuela, Juan Rodríguez de Raya, Esteban de la Barca, Baltasar de Alcázar, and Juan de Ulloa acting as subordinates. Upon approaching Belize, Nicolás Rodríguez is to lead the main body inside its chain of reefs, while Marqués is to circle outside, catching any interlopers in between.

Marqués's galliot is shipwrecked, however, delaying the flotilla at Aguada Key until April 28, when they proceed to blockade Belize. Because two Royal Navy schooners under a captain named Peyton are protecting the poachers inside, they are allowed to exit unmolested on May 1 before the Spaniards disembark.

AUGUST 1724. Comunero War (Paraguay). An army of Guaraní mission Indians led by Col. Baltasar García Ros, lieutenant governor of Buenos Aires, is defeated on the Tebicuary River banks by 3,000 Paraguayans under the 34-year-old Dr. José de Antequera y Castro, renegade governor of that province.

Three years previously, Antequera had been sent to Asunción as a fiscal or “special prosecutor” by the audiencia of Charcas on behalf of Peru's acting viceroy, Archbishop Diego Morcillo. He was to investigate complaints by Paraguayan landowners about collusion with the powerful Jesuits by the then governor, Diego de los Reyes y Balmaceda. Finding the governor absent upon his arrival at Asunción, Antequera dispatched a force to imprison Reyes, who had escaped to Corrientes, from where he threatened to gain reinstatement. Antequera meanwhile was acclaimed as governor by the local audiencia in Asunción, receiving support from the landowners, who were eager to exploit the native laborers and territories, policies that the Jesuits had steadfastly opposed.

As a result, the new Peruvian viceroy José de Armendáriz, Marqués de Castelfuerte, seeks to end this impasse by dispatching García Ros's Jesuit-trained army in 1724, only to meet defeat this August. However, Antequera's victory unwittingly renders his position untenable, for it unites both Crown and Church officials against him. Support falls away, so that by 1725 he is forced to flee to Córdoba upon the approach of another Argentine army under Governor de Zabala; he is sheltered by some Franciscans before moving on to Charcas. Martín de Barúa enters Asunción as its new royal governor, while Antequera is finally arrested in 1726 and conveyed to Lima to stand trial.

His confinement in its viceregal palace proves so mild, though, that Antequera is able to dispatch his confederate Fernando de Mompóx y Zayas back into Paraguay to organize a second uprising, which, unlike the first—which entailed a dispute between aristocratic leaders—now involves the common people or comuneros. Even the new governor, de Barúa, joins in, venting his wrath against the Jesuits. For months, the comuneros rule in and around Asunción, and when de Barúa steps down in 1730, they adopt a republican form of government, and the leader José Luis Barreyro is thereupon proclaimed president of the province. This, in turn, provokes Viceroy de Armendáriz in Lima to eventually find Antequera and his lieutenant, Juan de Mena, guilty of heresy and treason, ordering their executions. This sentence proves unpopular enough to cause riots, so that the viceroy's troops shoot Antequera on his way to the gallows on July 3, 1731.

The Paraguayan revolt meanwhile plays itself out, Barreyro arresting Mompóx, who escapes his guards while being conveyed toward Lima and flees into Brazil. Comunero sentiment spreads as far as Corrientes, where Gov. Ruylobo Calderón is killed and Bishop Juan Arregui of Buenos Aires is elected to succeed him. Eventually, the rebellion is suppressed when retiring Governor de Zabala leads another Guaraní army from the River Plate into Paraguay, defeating the rebels at Tapabuy, then entering Asunción on May 30, 1735, to execute its last remaining leaders.

ANGLO-SPANISH FRICTIONS (1725–1729)

In April 1725, Madrid confounds Europe by allying with its former archenemy Austria. Fearing that this new alignment might threaten Britain's already limited access to Spanish American markets, as well as lend added weight to Madrid's claims for the restoration of Gibraltar and Minorca, London forges a new coalition of its own in September with France, Hanover, and Prussia (later joined by Holland, Sweden, and Denmark). Russia thereupon allies itself with Austria, and the Spanish government orders its American officials to begin confiscating English goods at the end of March 1726, believing that a war might be imminent. However, this conflict never materializes, as neither Spain's nor Britain's allies wish to plunge into a general conflagration in support of these two nations.

MARCH 12, 1726. The 36-year-old commodore Rodrigo de Torres y Morales, Knight of the Orders of San Juan and Calatrava, arrives off Cozumel (Yucatán) after delivering the annual situados or “payrolls” to the Spanish Main. With 600 men aboard his frigates Juan (flag), Nuestra Señora de Begonia (alias Holandesa), and some lesser consorts, his orders are to rendezvous with another seven vessels bearing 300 men from Campeche—led by the Cuban sloop Águila of José Antonio de Herrera—and to sweep the English logwood cutters from Belize. (While waiting for this contingent to appear, Lt. Tomás Varela's English prize Hamilton also captures the Boston sloop George of Richard Randall on March 22.)

By the time the Campeche reinforcements finally arrive on April 10, Torres instead opts to retire into Veracruz to refresh his capital ships, while leaving de Herrera to proceed against the English with only Águila and two smaller auxiliaries. The Spanish commodore is therefore reprimanded for dereliction of duty upon entering Veracruz on April 30.

JUNE 16, 1726. Hosier's Ill-Fated Campaign. To exert pressure upon Madrid, Francis Hosier—now a 53-year-old Vice Admiral of the Blue—appears off Bastimentos (Panama) with the 70-gun, 1,100-ton ships Breda (flag), Berwick, and Lennox; the 64-gun, 1,029-ton Superb (former French Superbe); the 60-gun, 925-ton Rippon, Nottingham, and Dunkirk; the 50-gun, 750-ton Leopard, Dragon, Tiger, and Portland; the frigate Diamond; the sloops Greyhound and Winchelsea; plus the snow Happy.

A treasure fleet is preparing to load in nearby Portobelo, so its Spanish governor inquires the reason for Hosier's presence. The English admiral replies that he has come to escort the licensed South Sea Company ship Royal George, but even after this vessel clears Portobelo, the Royal Navy fleet remains, prompting the Spanish authorities to cancel their convoy's departure.

Hosier thereupon institutes a close blockade, preventing ships from entering or departing Portobelo until mid-December, when he sails away toward Jamaica with his crews ravaged by disease. Some ships are so understrength that they experience difficulty working into Port Royal on December 14 (O.S.).

AUGUST 13, 1726. The 71-year-old admiral Antonio Gaztañeta y de Iturrizábalza reaches Havana with a storm-tossed fleet from Spain, bearing 2,000 troops under the command of the city's former governor, Gregorio Guazo—who dies 16 days later of yellow fever and is succeeded by Brig. Gen. Juan José de Andía y Vivero, Marqués de Villahermosa de Alovera.

JANUARY 24, 1727. Gaztañeta departs Havana with 18 ships, bearing a portion of the royal treasures from Veracruz and Cartagena safely across to Spain.

Yellow Fever

This disease is caused by a minute virus. In the Americas, it is carried in the saliva of the Aedes aegypti (stegomyia) mosquito, which infects humans when puncturing their skin to drink blood. The virus remains dormant for an incubation period of three to six days, then begins to multiply. It will move through the body's lymphatic system into major organs.

The first symptoms usually include a fever, backache, headache, chills, loss of appetite, nausea, and vomiting. If a victim is healthy and properly attended, most will improve after three to four days and make a full recovery. However, some patients experience a recurrence of the fever, at which point their skin turns yellow with jaundice. This symptom explains the name "yellow fever" or "yellow jack" given in the past to this disease. Bleeding can also occur from the mouth, nose, or eyes, as well as internally. Vomit darkened by blood prompted the Latin American name for the disease, vómito negro. Many patients who reach this phase will die within 10 to 14 days.

Those who survive develop an immunity, and if no fresh blood source is provided, the disease will dissipate; hence, outbreaks in warm-climate towns and among non-native people have historically been the worst. Before the virus and its spread were properly identified, any influx of people into a mosquito-rich environment could have dire results. Outbreaks in tropical seaports such as Havana, Portobelo, or Panama proved especially endemic. Thousands of passengers and crewmen with nonimmunized blood would disembark from a plate fleet. Mosquitoes multiplying in warm, stagnant waters could also spread a new strain of the virus. The Aedes aegypti even flourishes in containers with solid sides and flat bottoms, such as wooden cisterns or ships' casks.

As a result, the arrival of overseas expeditions often caused horrific losses. Such occurred on Martinique in 1691, on Curaçao in 1713, and to Hosier's fleet in 1727. Thousands of the redcoats who landed to conquer Havana in 1762 also died of yellow fever. So did thousands of new French settlers brought in the next year to attempt to populate Kourou in Guiana. Yellow fever also destroyed the French army sent to reclaim Haiti in 1802.

And the disease could be carried into other climes. Philadelphia endured a wet spring in 1793, leaving behind ponds that bred many mosquitoes during that unusually warm summer. French refugees fleeing the Haitian revolt then arrived, some infected with the virus. By early August, an epidemic began. Half the city population fled, yet an estimated 5,000 Philadelphians died by November. Only the onset of winter brought an end to the epidemic.

FEBRUARY 1727. Having replenished his crews, Hosier leads his fleet from Jamaica toward Havana, arriving outside the bay by April 2. He then circles around the Caribbean to blockade Cartagena to prevent Spain's treasure galleons from departing—whose government in turn retaliates by besieging Gibraltar back in Europe, although without either country actually declaring war.

Again, sickness breaks out among the English crews in the West Indies, eventually claiming Hosier's life on August 23 or 25 (O.S.), and his body is conveyed back to England aboard the snow HMS Happy under Cmdr. Henry Fowkes. Capt. Edward St. Loe of the Superb assumes temporary command over the fleet.

Vice Adm. Edward Hopsonn then comes out from England to replace Hosier, reaching Jamaica by January 29, 1728 (O.S.); however, Hopsonn, too, is dead of illness by May 18, followed by St. Loe on April 22, 1729 (O.S.), as this English fleet continues to suffer a horrific toll in lives. It is estimated that more than 4,000 of its 4,750 officers and men succumb during this three-year tour, its ships being maintained by fresh crews out of Jamaica.

SPRING 1727. An expedition of English logwood cutters and native auxiliaries leaves Belize and sails northward to Ascensión Bay (modern Emiliano Zapata Bay) to march inland and sack Chunhuhub and Telá. The governor of Yucatán, Antonio de Figueroa y Silva, leads a relief force out of Mérida, which drives the raiders back to their ships.

APRIL 1727. At Quiebra Hacha mill in the interior of Cuba, 300 black slaves revolt, and this rebellion soon spreads to other properties. They are quickly put down by the mill owner, José Bayona y Chacón, at the head of two mounted militia companies.

MAY 31, 1727. In Paris, a truce is signed between Britain and Spain, although still without fully resolving their disputes.

FEBRUARY 1728. Palmer's Raid. Angered by Spanish support for Yamasee forays, South Carolina decides to send a punitive expedition of 100 militiamen and 200 native allies into Florida under veteran Indian fighter and member of the Commons House of Assembly, Col. John Palmer. This group departs Charles Town (present-day Charleston, South Carolina) in small boats and moves south down its coastal channel without opposition until San Juan Island (mouth of the Saint Johns River) is reached early in March, where the dugouts are beached and Palmer's company proceeds afoot.

During their subsequent march overland, the raiders are spotted by a Spanish scout, who carries a warning into the Indian villages farther south. The Yamasee concentrate at Nombre de Dios, their best-fortified village, a short distance outside St. Augustine. Despite having lost the element of surprise, Palmer's small army wins a decisive victory by overrunning this place on March 9, slaying 30 Yamasee and capturing 15, while wounding many more and scattering the survivors into the Spaniards' Fort San Marcos. Unable to storm or besiege this more powerful citadel, Palmer rests in Nombre de Dios until March 13, then strips it bare and torches it before retracing his steps into South Carolina.

AUGUST 1728. In Wisconsin, the French—fearful of an alliance between the Fox with their Sauk (or Sac), Mascouten, Kickapoo, Winnebago, and Dakota neighbors—dispatch Constant Le Marchand de Lignery with 400 men and 800 native allies to make a punitive sweep through enemy territory. This force burns numerous empty villages but otherwise inflicts few casualties.

SUMMER 1729. Governor de Figueroa of Yucatán sends his nephew Alonso de Figueroa with a group of settlers from the Canary Islands to reclaim the town of Bacalar as a bulwark against the English logwood cutters operating out of Belize. To prevent raids, the governor also authorizes the Italian-born engineer Juan Podio to design and begin building 34-gun, four-pointed Fort San Felipe de Bacalar on the shores of Siete Colores Lagoon, 25 miles northeast of Chetumal. The fort is completed four years later.

In Europe, the Treaty of Seville is signed on November 19, 1729, settling many of the commercial and territorial grievances straining relations between Britain, Spain, France, and Holland.

INTERWAR YEARS (1730–1738)

Despite the promulgation of the Treaty of Seville back in Europe, the continuing spread of major mainland colonies into the interior of the New World leads to increasingly serious frontier flare-ups. Clashes between English settlers pushing southward out of Georgia into Spanish Florida, as well as the traditional Hispano-Portuguese conflict centering around what is today Uruguay, soon threaten to drag in their respective home governments.

MARCH 1730. A force of 600 French soldiers and native allies under 38-year-old captain Paul Marin, Sieur de La Malgue, heads westward from La Baye to confront the Fox Indians who control these trade routes, besieging their main village at Butte des Morts (Wisconsin) for five days. This action drives many tribesmen to seek refuge among the Iroquois south of Lake Ontario.

AUGUST 10, 1730. A French expedition from Fort Vincennes in Upper Louisiana besieges 900 Fox refugees in an extemporized fort. Further reinforcements arrive one week later, until the besiegers number 200 Frenchmen and 1,200 native allies.

Eventually the Fox attempt to escape under cover of darkness on September 9, only to be overtaken and trapped; 500 are ruthlessly massacred, and the rest are enslaved.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1730. A trio of Spanish Guipuzcoan privateers under Ignacio de Noblesia—the 46-gun frigate San Ignacio, 25-gun frigate Santa Rosa, and a 16-gun galley—seize the Dutch sloop Juffrau Elida of Capt. Leendert Franken off Borburata (Venezuela) for smuggling. These three ships have come out from Los Pasajes in Spain on July 15, commissioned by the Biscayan Company to enforce their trade monopoly along Venezuela's coastline.

AUGUST 13, 1731. Angered by the arrival in Venezuelan waters of the Biscayan Company privateers, 18 Dutch vessels hover menacingly outside La Guaira, delaying the departure of the company's merchantmen. The trio of privateers will nonetheless continue making captures.

AUGUST 1732. Fears of a Creek invasion grip the southern frontier of the Carolinas, prompting Col. Alexander Glover to marshal his colonial forces at Palachacola (Fort Prince George). One month later, the rumors prove to be false, so this alert is cancelled.

FEBRUARY 12, 1733. More than 110 English colonists land at Yamacraw Bluff (Savannah) under 37-year-old James Oglethorpe to establish a new colony between the Carolinas and Spanish Florida, named Georgia in honor of the king. The Spaniards resent this expansion, reacting with hostility.

FEBRUARY 21, 1733. A Spanish expedition assaults the English logwood establishments in Belize, by both sea and land. While a flotilla of Campeche privateers appears from Chetumal to distract its inhabitants by threatening the harbor front, troops under Yucatecan governor de Figueroa also arrive overland from Bacalar to surprise them from their rear, inflicting numerous casualties. De Figueroa then remains in Belize for several weeks, destroying numerous encampments before retiring. (While withdrawing toward Mérida, he dies of sickness at Chunhuhub on August 10.)

OCTOBER 1734. Baja California's Pericue Indians rise in rebellion and destroy the Santiago and San José settlements and slay its Jesuit missionaries. When the galleon San Cristóbal subsequently arrives from Manila, it is unable to resupply with fresh water and provisions following its transpacific crossing, so the authorities in Mexico City organize an expedition to reconquer these outposts. Santiago is reoccupied by April 1736 and San José in February 1737, after which numerous natives are herded onto reservations, most falling sick and dying.

JULY 9, 1735. The 50-gun Spanish warships Conquistador of Capt. Francisco Liano and Incendio of Capt. Agustín Iturriza arrive at Cartagena with the viceroy designate for Peru, the Marqués de Villagarcía. They are also carrying two young Spanish naval officers, the recently commissioned junior lieutenants Jorge Juan and Antonio de Ulloa, who are to join the French "Geodesic Mission" as observers.

For decades, scientists have been puzzled by varying meridional measurements in different latitudes, leading to the realization that the Earth is not a perfect sphere. To determine the exact divergence, which can affect navigation and the drawing of maps, the Academy of Sciences in Paris has won the backing of King Louis XV. He, in turn, has secured permission from his uncle, Felipe V of Spain, for one French team to take measurements of a degree of longitude at the equator in Peru, while another does the same near the North Pole in the Swedish province of Lapland.

The two Spanish naval lieutenants at Cartagena will not be joined until November by their 11 older French colleagues under Charles de La Condamine, who have traveled from La Rochelle and Martinique. The entire group then proceeds to Portobelo and reaches Panama City by December 29. They sail into the Pacific aboard the frigate San Cristóbal and disembark at Manta in Peru by March 10, 1736, to begin eight years of important scientific studies.

OCTOBER 3, 1735. Sacramento Siege. This morning, after several months of escalating tensions between Portuguese and Spanish settlers in what is today Uruguay, Gov. Miguel Salcedo y Sierralta of Buenos Aires, Knight of the Order of Santiago, disembarks 400 troops at Vacas River (30 miles from Colônia do Sacramento), supported from a distance by the 36-gun, 279-ton, British-built merchantman San Bruno, an armed galley, and two launches bearing another 650 men under Francisco de Alzaibar or Alzaybar. The Portuguese governor of Colônia—Brig. Gen. Antonio Pedro de Vasconcelos, Knight of the Order of Christ—has earlier commissioned the 30-man English merchant vessel of William Kelly as a privateer with 30 soldiers on board and now detaches 200 troopers with 500 mounts under cavalry captains Manuel Félix Correa and Inácio Pereira da Silva to shadow the invaders' movements.

After being reinforced by a Guaraní contingent out of the disputed borderlands between both nations, Salcedo advances upon Colônia, clashing outside its gates on October 20. The Spaniards then camp at Veras and continue to build up their strength, probing the defenses again on November 5 with 800 men before finally encircling the walls entirely on November 9 with 500 soldiers, 4,500 Tape native auxiliaries, and 36 siege pieces. Vasconcelos's 935 defenders are well able to resist, having 80 guns plus the galley Nossa Senhora da Penha de França and the smaller Camaragipe out in the harbor under Capt. Manuel de Carvalho Simão.

A protracted encirclement ensues, the Spaniards alternating their bombardments with calls for the garrison's surrender, which are refused. On January 6, 1736, Colônia is reinforced from Rio de Janeiro by the 50-gun frigate Nossa Senhora de Nazaré of Capt. Francisco Pinheiro dos Santos, the 20-gun Bom Jesús de Vila Nova (alias "Corta Nabos") of Dionísio Antônio de Azevedo, and four auxiliaries bearing 460 troops under Tomaz Gonçalves da Silva, in addition to their 370 crew members.

Unable to starve the Portuguese garrison into submission, Salcedo withdraws the bulk of his forces into Buenos Aires by February 10, leaving 500 cavalrymen and 200 infantrymen under Francisco Nieto to harry the defenders, who are weakened by an outbreak of dysentery. Another 270 Portuguese reinforcements under Capt. Tomaz Banhos arrive on April 5 aboard Kelly's privateer, the 30-gun galley Nossa Senhora de Nazaré (alias Leão Dourado), Bom Jesús da Confiança, and three other consorts under Capt. Cipriano de Matos Monteiro. They raid Argentine outposts on April 18, and Vasconcelos himself bloodies Nieto's besiegers on April 24.

JANUARY 1736. More than 170 Scottish settlers arrive at Savannah (Georgia) to establish a new town farther south called Darien, on the Altamaha River. They are joined one month later by more than 250 Londoners, who venture even farther south with the sloop Midnight and the scout boat Carolina to establish Fort Frederica, thus pushing back the Spanish borderlands.

MARCH 26, 1736. At 8:00 p.m., 40 poorly treated soldiers mutiny at Fort Nassau (Bahamas), even firing upon Gov. Richard Fitzwilliam when he attempts to intervene. The rebels then free a jailed French pilot, nail up the fort's seaward guns, board a large sloop, and set sail toward Havana by 3:00 a.m.

of the 27th. Unskilled sailors, they are overtaken next daybreak by Thomas Walker's sloop, arrested without a fight, and returned to stand trial. Their leader George Collins and 11 others are hanged, while the remainder are flogged and transported.

APRIL 19, 1736. The scout boats Carolina of Capt. William Ferguson and Georgia of John Ray, accompanied by a piragua from Darien (Georgia) with 30 Highlanders and 10 rangers under Capt. Hugh Mackay plus 40 Yamacraw warriors in canoes under their mico or "chieftain" Tomochichi, disembark on the northwestern tip of Cumberland Island to begin constructing star-shaped Fort Saint Andrews.

LATE MAY 1736. Georgia militiamen under Capt. Christian Hermsdorf begin constructing Fort Saint George, directly opposite the Spaniards' northernmost lookout station on the Saint Johns River (modern Fort George Island, near Jacksonville, Florida). This work is briefly interrupted by fears of possible Spanish retaliation, but it resumes once Highlander reinforcements arrive aboard the scout boat Georgia and a yawl.

JUNE 25, 1736. In retaliation for the Spanish siege of Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay)—although still without any official declaration of war by either Lisbon or Madrid—Portuguese commodore Luiz de Abreu Prego departs Rio de Janeiro with the 74-gun ships of the line Nossa Senhora da Victória (flag) and Nossa Senhora da Conceição of Capt. João Pereira dos Santos; the frigate Nossa Senhora da Alampadosa of José de Vasconcelos, Knight of Malta; the galley Santanna; the brigantine Nossa Senhora da Piedade (alias Bichacadella); a royal sloop or yacht; plus two hired merchantmen bearing 600 troops under Brig. Gen. José da Silva Paes.

Intended to reinforce Brazil's southwestern frontier, this expedition rendezvous off Santa Catarina Island on July 21–22 with the galley Corta Nabos and transport Rosa, bearing an additional 250 troops from Colônia do Sacramento. All weigh anchor together by August 1, encountering stormy weather and skirmishing with the Spanish frigates Hermiona of 52 guns and San Esteban of 50 guns—recently arrived from Cadiz under Capt. José de Arratia—on August 18, 20, and 26.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1736. The frigates Hermiona and San Esteban appear off Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay), disembarking 110 dragoons as reinforcements for its Spanish besiegers before continuing west toward Buenos Aires the next day.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1736. Abreu Prego and Silva Paes's expedition reaches Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay), reinforcing its Portuguese garrison and making a sally with 800 men in three columns before dawn on October 4 to drive back its Spanish besiegers. Numerous supply dumps are burned, obliging the Spaniards to retire beyond the San Juan River.

OCTOBER 1736. After heated protests from Gov. Francisco del Moral Sánchez at St. Augustine, Governor Oglethorpe of Georgia agrees to withdraw Fort Saint George from the mouth of the Saint Johns River and allow this border dispute to be resolved by Madrid and London. The Spanish governor is soon dismissed from office, while Oglethorpe instructs his followers to build Fort Amelia at the Saint Mary's River mouth.

LATE NOVEMBER 1736. As further reinforcements for Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay), the Portuguese warship Nossa Senhora da Arrabida of Capt. Luiz Antônio Berderod quits Rio de Janeiro, accompanied by the 30-gun Santhiago, the 8-gun Fangueiro, and the hired transport Centeno, bearing 350 soldiers.

DECEMBER 9, 1736. Capt. Antônio Rodrigues Figueira slips out of Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay) at dawn with 180 Portuguese troops aboard three brigantines and seven boats to raid a Spanish supply dump three miles up the San Juan River. This base is surprised and burned, but the attackers' retreat is then cut off. Rodrigues Figueira's force suffers 10 killed, 37 wounded, and 87 captured before winning free.

DECEMBER 24, 1736. Montevideo Blockade. Brigadier General Silva Paes departs Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay) with 720 Portuguese troops aboard the galleys Leão Dourado and Santana do Pôrto, the brigantine Piedade, the corvette São Francisco Xavier, and the royal sloop Nossa Senhora da Conceição and appears before Montevideo five days later in hopes of making a disembarkation. However, even after rendezvousing on December 31 with Abreu Prego's 500-man squadron, the attackers do not muster sufficient strength to overwhelm the 800 Spanish defenders who are backed by batteries and a 42-gun frigate anchored in the roadstead. Silva Paes therefore continues farther east on January 13, 1737, landing at Punta del Este to establish a new 130-man Portuguese outpost at Maldonado under maestre de campo André Ribeiro Coutinho. He then sails on toward Brazil.

SPRING 1737. At Guaymas (Mexico), the long-pacified Pimas Bajos natives rise up against the Spaniards, inspired by their medicine man. Capt. Juan Bautista de Anza puts down this rebellion and hangs its leader on June 1.

MARCH 15, 1737. Two additional Spanish warships—the Galga of 56 guns and the Paloma of 52 guns under Capt. Nicolás Geraldín—reach Ensenada de Barragán east of Buenos Aires, bringing in reinforcements aboard the transport Rosario, plus five Portuguese prizes intercepted off Brazil.

MARCH 16, 1737. In Paris, Portuguese and Spanish plenipotentiaries sign an armistice.

APRIL 7, 1737. The 48-year-old Spanish vice admiral Blas de Lezo reaches Cartagena (Colombia) with his 64-gun flagship Nuestra Señora del Carmen, better known as the Conquistador. Eight days later, his 60-gun vice-flagship Fuerte straggles in with five of the merchantmen they are escorting from Cadiz, the sixth having been lost to a storm.

MAY 15, 1737. Salcedo returns from Buenos Aires and materializes off Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay) with four Spanish frigates, two corvettes, and a boat flotilla to reinvigorate its besiegers. Nonetheless, his strength is insufficient to subdue the 1,000-man Portuguese garrison under Vasconcelos, bolstered by the brigantines Tavares, Sereia, Bigodes, Latino, and Caramujo lying in the roadstead. Both squadrons skirmish over the next few weeks without achieving any significant advantage.

SUMMER 1737. A Spanish expedition departs Campeche and attacks the English logwood establishments at Belize.

AUGUST 15, 1737. The royal Portuguese frigate Nossa Senhora da Boa Viagem of Captain Duarte Pereira reaches Maldonado (Uruguay) with news of the cessation of Hispano-Portuguese hostilities.

MARCH 15, 1738. The Spanish captain Daniel Huoni reaches Veracruz with his 70-gun flagship León and 60-gun vice-flagship Lanfranco (official name, Nuestra Señora del Pilar) to deposit the annual quicksilver consignment from Spain, a vital ingredient used to refine Mexico's ores.

Fearful of England's warlike preparations, the next month Madrid orders Commo. José Alfonso Pizarro, Knight of the Order of San Juan, to also sail for Veracruz with the 70-gun Africa (official name, San José), 64-gun Guipúzcoa, plus the 50-gun frigates Incendio (official name, San Lorenzo) and Esperanza to deposit an additional amount of quicksilver. Pizarro is then to bolster Spain's naval forces in the West Indies before safely conducting home the quicksilver convoy.

MAY 1738. Three transports arrive at Savannah bearing the first contingent of 629 soldiers of the 42nd Regiment of Foot, which Oglethorpe has raised in England to defend Georgia. He himself arrives by mid-September, with the remaining troops aboard another five transports.

JULY 20, 1738. The Spanish Crown, angered by its negotiations with London, authorizes its coast-guard privateers in the Caribbean to broaden the scope of their activities, detaining foreign vessels for merely sailing in "suspicious latitudes."

WAR OF JENKINS'S EAR, LATER KING GEORGE'S WAR (1739–1748)

Great Britain, as the world's rising maritime power, resents Spain's efforts to exclude its merchants from Central and South America. This friction is exemplified by an incident that occurs on April 20, 1731, when the Glasgow brig Rebecca of Capt. Robert Jenkins—homeward-bound from Jamaica—is intercepted and ransacked before Havana by the Cuban coast-guard vessel San Antonio (alias Isabela) of Capt. Juan de León Fandino. Jenkins himself is mistreated and his ear allegedly cut off, "to carry it to His Majesty King George."

The struggle between British smugglers and Spanish patrols eventually climaxes in March 1738 when George II announces that all British subjects with unsatisfied claims against Spain's guardacostas can apply for a letter of reprisal, to fit out as privateers and seize Spanish vessels by way of compensation. No licenses are ever applied for, it being held that such work more properly belongs to the Royal Navy. Diplomatic complaints fare little better, as the Spaniards lodge counterprotests against British activities. War is narrowly averted that year, then finally explodes the next spring.

When France eventually joins Spain in 1744—impelled by the eruption of the War of the Austrian Succession in central Europe—this expanded conflict will become known in Britain’s North American colonies as “King George’s War.”

JUNE 1739. The British government—dissatisfied with the progress of its negotiations in Madrid—decides to authorize limited strikes against Spanish shipping, without officially declaring war. Consequently, fleets will be sent to intercept the treasure convoys, and Commo. Charles Brown’s Jamaica squadron is alerted. Also, Edward Vernon is promoted to Vice Admiral of the Blue on July 9 (O.S.) and delegated to lead a five-ship squadron on a punitive sweep into the West Indies.

AUGUST 13, 1739. Having traversed the Atlantic from Havana in the belief that war will be averted, Commodore Pizarro and Captain Huoni materialize outside Santander with their four lightly armed, heavily laden ships. Informed that Admiral Had-dock is awaiting them before Cadiz with 10 men-of-war, the Spanish quartet instead enters Santander the next day and safely transfers all its bullion and cargo ashore by August 15.

AUGUST 25, 1739. Commodore Brown sorties from Port Royal (Jamaica) with his 70-gun flagship HMS Hampton Court, the 60-gun Windsor, the 50-gun Falmouth, Diamond, and Torrington, the 20-gun Shoreham, and the 14-gun sloop Drake to cruise around Cuba. On September 14, 34-year-old captain Charles Knowles of the Diamond pursues a Spanish

Admiral Vernon

Edward Vernon was born on November 12, 1684 (O.S.), at Westminster in London. He was the fourth and youngest child and second son of a secretary of state under King William III. Edward was sent to study at Westminster School at the age of seven. He volunteered for the Royal Navy and was entered on the books of HMS Shrewsbury on May 10, 1700 (O.S.).

Four months after Queen Anne’s War erupted, Edward was promoted to lieutenant aboard HMS Lennox on September 16, 1702. The teenage officer saw much action in the Mediterranean, and two years later he transferred aboard Adm. Cloud-isley Shovell’s flagship HMS Barfleur. Vernon won promotion to captain by January 22, 1706 (O.S.), and commanded several ships until Shovell’s fleet returned to England the next year. In May 1708, Vernon sailed for the West Indies with HMS Jersey as part of Commo. John Edwards’s squadron. The young captain served in that theater for the remainder of the conflict.

His peacetime service included three tours of the Baltic. Vernon was also elected to Parliament in 1721. He sailed to Gibraltar six years later with HMS Grafton, as that fortress was being reinforced against a five-month siege by Spain. Once more back in London, Vernon became a vocal supporter in Parliament of a war to protect British merchantmen against Spanish American corsairs.

As such, he was promoted to Vice Admiral of the Blue on July 9, 1739 (O.S.), and instructed to lead five warships in a pre-war Caribbean sweep. Now 54 years of age, Vernon was a fine choice. Politically astute, he also had years of experience in the West Indies. Energetic, brave, and well liked, he was known among seamen as “Old Grog,” apparently because of the grogram boat cloak that he often wore against the damp. (A combination of silk, mohair, and wool, grogram could be stiffened with gum to make it waterproof.) He soon distinguished himself at Portobelo, Chagres, Cartagena, and Guantánamo.

Perhaps most famously, Vernon also altered the navy’s daily rum ration, which had had such a bad effect on seamen in the tropics. A half pint of straight 80 proof rum, plus a gallon of beer, was too much every day. The admiral therefore ordered his captains on August 4, 1740 (O.S.), to consult with their ships’ physicians about the benefits of watering down the issue. When they concurred 17 days later, he signed Order No. 349, directing that each half pint of rum be diluted in a quart of water before distribution. Sugar, lime juice, and cinnamon could be added to make the mixture tastier. Disgruntled sailors referred to this new concoction as “grog.”

sail and fails to rejoin the group, instead returning directly to Jamaica with two valuable prizes. Capt. Edward Boscawen of the Shoreham meanwhile reconnoiters the approaches to Havana, destroys two Spanish sloops, and captures a third before landing at Puerto María on September 26 to burn a mass of lumber, despite opposition from two demi-galleys and a sloop.

AUGUST 27, 1739. In response to Britain's attempt on the Mexican quicksilver convoy and other hostile deployments, Madrid authorizes its American officials to take reprisals against British citizens and properties.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1739. An Angola-led slave insurrection occurs at Stono (South Carolina), during which 23 whites are killed, and panic grips the English colonies. Local militias are mustered and soon corner the rebels, killing about 40 and scattering the remainder into the swamps. Uneasy British settlers remain convinced that this uprising has been instigated by the Spaniards out of St. Augustine (Florida).

OCTOBER 2, 1739. Gov. Juan Francisco de Güemes y Horcasitas confiscates all English properties in Havana.

OCTOBER 8, 1739. Gov. James Oglethorpe of Georgia receives official notification of the breakdown of negotiations with Madrid, plus orders to "annoy the subjects of Spain, and put the colonies of Carolina and Georgia in the best posture of defense."

OCTOBER 9, 1739. Vernon arrives at Antigua with his 70-gun, 500-man, 1,147-ton flagship Burford under the flag captain Thomas Watson; the 60-gun, 400-man, 1,000-ton Princess Louisa of Thomas Waterhouse, Strafford of Thomas Trevor, and Worcester of Perry Mayne; plus the 50-gun, 300-man, 700-ton Norwich of Richard Herbert. After refreshing supplies, the British admiral proceeds to Saint Kitts, then detaches Waterhouse to cruise off the Spanish Main between La Guaira and Puerto Cabello with the Princess Louisa, Strafford, and Norwich before rejoining Vernon's main body at Jamaica.

OCTOBER 11, 1739. Commodore Brown maintains his blockade of Havana, his foraging parties being fired upon as they attempt to go ashore at Bacuranao, Jaruco, and Bahía Honda.

OCTOBER 22, 1739. Waterhouse bombards La Guaira (Venezuela) for three hours with HMSS Princess Louisa, Strafford, and Norwich before standing away westward.

OCTOBER 23, 1739. Vernon's squadron reaches Port Royal (Jamaica).

OCTOBER 30, 1739. In Europe, Britain declares war against Spain, which is officially promulgated two days afterward. Madrid reciprocates on November 26.

NOVEMBER 16, 1739. After being rejoined at Port Royal (Jamaica) by Waterhouse's detachment, plus Commodore Brown's flagship Hampton Court—which has returned on November 8 after leaving the Windsor and the Falmouth to maintain the blockade of Havana—Vernon decides that no Spanish treasure convoys will likely sortie, so he instead opts to attack Portobelo. Embarking 200 troops under Capt. William Newton, the British admiral quits Port Royal with HMSS Burford, Hampton Court, Princess Louisa, Strafford, Worcester, Norwich, and the 20-gun Sheerness of Capt. Edward Stapleton, heading southeast. The latter vessel is detached during his crossing to maintain watch on Cartagena.

NOVEMBER 24, 1739. At dawn outside Fort Amelia (Georgia), a dozen Yamasee warriors—allies of the Spanish—ambush a pair of Highlanders emerging for firewood, killing both and carrying their scalps to St. Augustine.

NOVEMBER 30, 1739. Portobelo. Vernon anchors seven or eight miles to windward of this Panamanian harbor, issuing final instructions for his attack. Next morning at 6:00 a.m., his half-dozen warships and two tenders get under way, led by Brown's Hampton Court, which weathers the Salmedina island group by 2:00 p.m., then stands directly toward Portobelo in a faint wind.

Shortly thereafter, the Royal Navy squadron opens fire against San Felipe de Sotomayor or Todo Fierro harbor fort ("Iron Castle" to the English), catching its Spanish garrison almost totally unprepared. Some 55 marines are rushed across from the city under naval captain Juan Francisco Garganta to raise the fort's strength to 90 men, yet only 9 of San Felipe's 32 guns are serviceable—and those are quickly reduced to 4 by the British bombardment. By 4:30 p.m. of December 1, when Brown sends boat parties ashore, scarcely 5 Spanish officers and 35 men remain to surrender, the rest having fled. At 8:00 p.m., the English shift their fire against Santiago de la Gloria fortress (Castle Gloria) beside Portobelo proper, sinking a Spanish sloop in the roadstead and doing other damage before ceasing their bombardment at nightfall.

British boat parties move to occupy the battered San Felipe harbor castle before Vernon's fleet continues against Portobelo in the distance, by George Chambers Sr. (National Maritime Museum, London)

At 5:30 a.m. of December 2, Vernon's squadron works deeper into the harbor, only to be approached soon afterward by a launch requesting terms from the acting governor Francisco Javier Martínez de la Vega y Retes. Vernon deems this overture unsatisfactory so gives Martínez until 3:00 p.m. to accept his conditions, while continuing to warp his squadron into the roadstead. The Spaniards capitulate that same afternoon, at which time the half-empty town is occupied without resistance. English casualties total three dead and five wounded aboard HMSS Burford and Worcester, with another seriously injured aboard the Hampton Court.

Vernon forbids any plundering and reassures the few remaining inhabitants that Britain's fight is against the Spanish Crown, not the Portobelans themselves. In keeping with London's policies, he then orders captains Knowles and Boscawen to throw down the defenses so as to leave this port "an open and defenseless bay." Upon withdrawing toward Jamaica on December 23 with his three Spanish prizes—two 20-gun ships and the newly renamed snow Triumph—Vernon leaves behind no occupying garrison, instead announcing that Portobelo will henceforth be treated as a neutral port as long as its Spanish authorities and guardacostas permit free trade.

DECEMBER 11, 1739. Governor Oglethorpe departs Frederica (Georgia) with 200 men aboard 14 boats, coasting south as far as the Saint Johns River (Florida) to probe Spanish preparations. Finding them weak, he reinstalls a small frontline garrison at Fort Saint George (see "October 1736" entry in "Interwar Years"), before retiring into Frederica by December 28.

DECEMBER 16, 1739. The Spanish ships of the line Galicia and San Carlos reach San Juan de Puerto Rico from El Ferrol, bearing the new viceroy designate for the recently resurrected Viceroyalty of New Granada, 45-year-old lieutenant general Se-bastián de Eslava y Lazaga Berrio y Eguiarreta, Knight of the Order of Santiago. However, these vessels will not be able to carry him on to Cartagena until April 1740.

JANUARY 14, 1740. Oglethorpe returns to Fort Saint George (near modern Jacksonville, Florida) with 180 men and is joined by an English privateer sloop. Three days later, this small expedition sails up the Saint Johns River to attack the Spanish outposts at Forts Picolata and San Francisco de Pupo. Arriving five miles downstream (north) of this former place at 4:00 p.m., Oglethorpe's company disembarks and creeps upon Picolata at 2:00 a.m. on the 18th, finding it abandoned. The Spanish garrison opposite at San Francisco de Pupo spots Oglethorpe's native auxiliaries and—mistaking them for Yamasee allies—sends a ferry across, which narrowly escapes capture.

During this confusion, Oglethorpe lands his British regulars a mile north of Pupo and marches upon it with four fieldpieces. The latter are hastily sited by artillery Ens. Sanford Mace, who opens fire just before sunset. Pupo's 12-man Spanish garrison capitulates at their second salvo, allowing Oglethorpe to leave behind 50 men to hold this place under Capt. Hugh Mackay Jr., while reversing course toward the coast and Frederica on January 22.

MARCH 6, 1740. After wintering at Port Royal (Jamaica), Vernon sorties with his squadron, detaching the 50-gun Greenwich to watch Santa Marta, then appearing off Cartagena on March 13 with his main body to take soundings. Four days later, Vernon directs his recently joined bomb vessels, Alderney of Cmdr. James Scott and Terrible of Cmdr. Edward Allen, to begin shelling the city. This galling fire persists until the morning of March 20 without the Spanish squadron sallying to challenge under Vice Admiral de Lezo—a grizzled veteran already missing his left leg, right arm, and left eye (see “June 19, 1717” entry in “Minor Incidents”).

Vernon thereupon leaves HMSS Windsor of Capt. George Berkeley and Greenwich of Charles Wyndham to continue the blockade and steers toward the north coast of Panama with the remainder of his squadron on March 21.

APRIL 1, 1740. Chagres. After watering at Portobelo on March 24, Vernon appears off Chagres with HMSS Strafford (flag), Princess Louisa, Falmouth, and Norwich; fireships Cumberland, Eleanor, and Success; bomb vessels Alderney and Terrible; tenders Goodly and Pompey; plus a Cuban prize brig and sloop. They bombard Chagres's tiny, 11-gun Spanish keep from 3:00 to 10:00 p.m., forcing its 30-man garrison under Capt. Juan Carlos Gutiérrez Cevallos to capitulate by 11:00 a.m. the next morning. The English thereupon strip the site bare and blow up the fortifications on April 8, sailing away the next day for Portobelo and Cartagena. Vernon eventually returns into Port Royal (Jamaica) by May 13.

APRIL 8, 1740. Capt. Robert Hodgson arrives at Río Tinto (Honduras), having been sent from Jamaica to transform the Mosquito Coast into a British protectorate, in conjunction with the Miskito chieftain Peter.

MAY 19, 1740. Oglethorpe returns from Georgia to the south bank of the Saint Johns River, disembarking an advance body of 100 men near modern Mayport (Florida) to secure this beachhead for a larger group of British colonials that are to follow.

James Oglethorpe

James Edward Oglethorpe was born on December 22, 1696 (O.S.), in London, England. He was the tenth and last child and third son of a prosperous landowner and member of Parliament. Young James grew up at Westbrook Manor on the family estate in Godalming, a small town outside the capital. In 1714, he was sent to Corpus Christi College at Oxford University but soon left for a French military academy. The adventurous teenager then traveled into Austria and fought against the Turks under Prince Eugene of Savoy.

After briefly returning to Oxford, Oglethorpe was elected to the family seat in Parliament in 1722. His life changed six years later when his friend Robert Castell was arrested for debt and died of smallpox in London's Fleet Prison. Its horrid conditions made Oglethorpe chair a parliamentary commission in 1729 to reform the many abuses in the justice system. He and friends such as John, Viscount Percival, became convinced that poor debtors should be given a chance at a better life by settling a new British colony in North America. There they could work their own lands, with large properties, class distinctions, and slavery being forbidden.

Military and economic concerns also led King George II to grant this project a charter in 1732. Oglethorpe was named 1 of 23 trustees who were to create and govern a new colony south of the Carolinas known as “Georgia.”

Next dawn, his Cherokee skirmishers chase some Spaniards toward Fort Diego, the northernmost Spanish fortification, while 220 regulars of the 42nd Regiment and 125 provincials of the South Carolina Regiment (under Dutch-born Col. Alexander van der Dussen) reach him that same afternoon.

On May 21, Oglethorpe leaves 45 men to hold his base camp, pushing almost 20 miles with the remaining 400 and a 4-pounder in hopes of overrunning Fort Diego (about a mile-and-a-half south-southeast of modern Palm Valley), which is defended by 50 Spaniards under plantation owner Diego Espinosa. A surprise British assault is repulsed at dawn, but Espinosa surrenders when Oglethorpe's main body appears around midday of May 22. A 50-man British garrison is then installed under Capt. Lt. George Dunbar, while the main column retires to the Saint Johns camp, where further reinforcements continue to appear.

MAY 27, 1740. As Oglethorpe's small army approaches captured Fort Diego this morning with fresh supplies, one of its units is ambushed by Yamasee warriors, who kill and behead a Ranger before being pursued for several miles by the British general himself—who has a horse shot out from under him before finally turning back.

MAY 29, 1740. Oglethorpe returns to his Saint Johns base camp, where more Carolina reinforcements have arrived with Commo. Vincent Pearse's Royal Navy warships. Next morning, the general finalizes plans for a combined land-sea assault against St. Augustine. After receiving a false report at 2:00 a.m. on May 31 that Fort Diego is under attack, however, he marches to its relief, establishing a new base camp beneath its walls.

JUNE 11, 1740. St. Augustine. Having reconnoitered the approaches to this Spanish stronghold, Oglethorpe marches south from Fort Diego with 300 regulars and 400 South Carolinians. Two days later, his forces occupy Fort Mosa, a deserted earthen fortification north of St. Augustine, in hopes that 57-year-old governor Manuel de Montiano y Luyando might be lured out of his main citadel to fight.

Instead, the Spanish defenses are found to be so exceptionally strong—recently augmented by 200 men aboard two sloops and six demi-galleys from Havana—that Oglethorpe retreats toward his Fort Diego base camp on June 14. Three days later, the British—now 1,500 strong—resume their offensive when Colonel van der Dussen's 500-man South Carolina Regiment disembarks at the mouth of St. Augustine's harbor (Point Quartell) to dig in. On June 22, a column of 137 Rangers, Highlanders, and Indians under Col. John Palmer reoccupy Fort Mosa. Oglethorpe lands unopposed the next day on Anastasia Island with 200 men of his 42nd Regiment, plus 200 seamen and a like number of Indians. His intent is to cut off the beleaguered Spaniards, then launch a general assault; however, just before dawn of Sunday, June 26, 300 Spaniards under Capt. Antonio Salgado surprise the English garrison in Fort Mosa from three directions. Although repelled twice, the Spaniards fight their way inside and overwhelm its defenders at a cost of 10 dead, slaughtering 63 besiegers—including Palmer—before marching two-score prisoners back into St. Augustine. Spanish morale soars, and when Oglethorpe calls upon de Montiano to surrender four days later, this is refused.

On July 5, van der Dussen shifts his South Carolinians to Anastasia Island, then two days later Oglethorpe transfers his own 42nd Regiment into a new camp near Fort Mosa. That same afternoon, July 7, a storm threatens, so Commodore Pearse stands out to sea with his 20-gun flagship Flambor- ough, accompanied by the 44-gun Hector under Sir Yelverton Peyton, the 20-gun Squirrel of Peter Warren and Phoenix of Charles Fanshaw, the 22-gun Tartar under the Hon. George Townshend, the 6-gun sloop Spence of William Laws and 8-gun sloop Wolf under William Dandridge, plus the 8-gun provincial schooner Pearl of Warren Tyrrell.

Before they can resume their blockade, a large Cuban sloop, two schooners, and four supply boats slip into the Matanzas River entrance 13.5 miles farther south, delivering 300 men and much-needed relief into St. Augustine by July 14. Discouraged, Oglethorpe orders the siege lifted next day, and all save two of Pearse's warships sail away on July 16. Van der Dussen's regiment returns to Point Quartell from Anastasia Island four days later, retreating northward to rejoin Oglethorpe at Fort Diego by July 26. The British general, learning that a schooner with more South Carolinians is about to meet him, proposes a quick return to surprise St. Augustine, but his weary troops refuse. The campaign has cost 122 British dead, 16 prisoners, and 14 deserters, the last invaders quitting Florida by August 6.

Oglethorpe's siege of St. Augustine.

JUNE 13, 1740. Zamboes from the Mosquito Coast attack the Spanish fortification at Matina (Costa Rica).

JUNE 17, 1740. Learning that Spanish reinforcements are on their way from Europe, Vernon sorties from Port Royal (Jamaica) with seven of the line and a fireship. The Worcester and the Falmouth are detached into the Gulf of Mexico to await a transport bearing the new viceroy designate for New Spain, Pedro de Castro Figueroa y Salazar, Duque de la Conquista and Marqués de Gracia Real.

Vernon meanwhile proceeds with his remaining ships to blockade Cartagena. After vainly awaiting the Spaniards' arrival, the English admiral returns to Jamaica aboard his flagship Burford on July 2, having left the Hampton Court to watch Cartagena. During his absence, the other pair of warships under captains Mayne and Douglas have intercepted the large Dutch merchantman Vogel Phenix between Capes Corrientes and San Antonio at the western tip of Cuba. The new Mexican viceroy—who is traveling aboard as a passenger—escapes on a fast, accompanying Puerto Rican sloop under the privateer captain Diego de Morales, but he leaves behind all his papers, providing the English with valuable intelligence.

SEPTEMBER 10, 1740. The veteran Spanish admiral de Torres arrives off Saint Barthélemy with the 70-gun ships of the line San Ignacio or Invencible (flag), Santa Ana, San Felipe, Príncipe, and Reina; the 60-gun Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe or Fuerte, Nueva España, Nuestra Señora del Carmen or Andalucía, Castilla, San Luis, Real Familia, and San Antonio; plus the lesser consorts Isabela and Hermoso. Together, this expedition is bearing 2,000 reinforcements for Spain's American garrisons. During their crossing, it has snapped up five English merchantmen and endured a storm that damaged the Santa Ana, as well as killing 60 men and incapacitating another 1,000.

Three days later, while steering west toward Puerto Rico, de Torres's fleet is struck by a hurricane and staggers into the small Puerto Rican port of San Francisco by September 15 with yet greater damage—the Fuerte and the Andalucía being obliged to continue toward Havana, eventually limping in on October 11.

Meanwhile, the Reina has captured an English privateer, after which the Spanish admiral transfers his flag aboard the Nueva España, sets some of his casualties ashore at San Francisco, then departs on October 6 for Cartagena. He arrives on October 23 and disembarks his crews to recuperate.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1740. HMSS Defiance and Tilbury reach Port Royal (Jamaica), having escorted a convoy of store ships from England.

OCTOBER 13, 1740. A large contingent of Virginia troops sets sail for Jamaica escorted by the 10-gun privateer sloop Wolf of William Dandridge. (Dandridge is from King William County and is the brother of Martha Dandridge, later Martha Custis, who one day will marry George Washington. Washington's elder half-brother Lawrence also commands one of four militia companies on this expedition and will be so impressed by Jamaica's naval commander in chief that, upon returning, he renames Hunting Creek plantation "Mount Vernon.") Britain's North American colonies eventually supply 3,600 men from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina toward Vernon's West Indian campaign.

OCTOBER 14, 1740. Vernon sails from Port Royal with part of his Jamaican fleet to cruise off Hispaniola and returns 17 days later.

OCTOBER 21, 1740. The 30-year-old French vice admiral Antoine François de Pardaillan de Gondrin, Marquis d'Antin, reaches Martinique with 10 ships of the line, joining 3 already on that station. (The Marquis originally departed Brest on August 25 with 14 of the line and 5 frigates, but he detached 4 ships one week later to cruise off Spain under the 75-year-old commodore Jacques, Comte de Roquefeuil.) D'Antin is being followed across the Atlantic by another 8 ships of the line under Admiral La Roche Alart, and upon uniting, his fleet is to attack English interests throughout the Caribbean in support of Spain—without any formal declaration of war by Paris.

After pausing briefly to refresh supplies and take on 1,200 militiamen at Martinique, d'Antin proceeds westward to Port Saint Louis (modern Les Cayes, Haiti) and arrives by November 7. However, while still awaiting La Roche Alart and contacting Spanish authorities throughout that theater, d'Antin's crews begin falling ill at an alarming rate. By the time La Roche Alart finally arrives on December 18 and Roquefeuil appears by January 8, 1741, all French complements are considerably depleted.

DECEMBER 2, 1740. Spain's Felipe V and France's Louis XV officially renew their Bourbon "family compact" by agreeing that Admiral d'Antin's French fleet is to assist Admiral de Torres's Spanish forces against the British in the West Indies.

DECEMBER 28, 1740. The 43-year-old English commodore George Anson arrives off Brazil at a latitude of 27°30' S with his 60-gun, 521-man, 1,005-ton flagship Centurion, accompanied by the 50-gun, 396-man, 866-ton Gloucester of Matthew Mitchell; the 48-gun, 384-man, 683-ton Severn of the Hon. Edward Legge; the 42-gun, 299-man, 559-ton Pearl of Daniel "Dandy" Kidd; the 24-gun, 243-man, 559-ton Wager of the Hon. George Murray; the 14-gun, 96-man, 201-ton sloop Trial of Lt. David Cheap; and the 16-man, 400-ton victualer pink Anna under Mr. Gerrard.

Anson's orders are to round Cape Horn and "annoy and distress" the Spaniards in the South Seas, to attempt to link up with British expeditionary forces advancing across the Isthmus of Panama, and to hunt the Acapulco-Manila galleons.

DECEMBER 30, 1740. Some 25 British warships—scattered by an Atlantic storm—begin arriving at Prince Rupert's Bay (Dominica) under Rear Adm. Sir Chaloner Ogle and Commo. Richard Lestock, escorting 100 transports bearing 8,000 soldiers under Maj. Gen. Charles, Lord Cathcart. The latter dies of dysentery on January 1, 1741, and is succeeded by his second-in-command, Brig. Gen. Thomas Wentworth. Ogle's vessels (except the detached 80-gun Cumberland) reassemble and set sail toward Jamaica on January 7.

JANUARY 16, 1741. The Spanish rear admiral Pizarro arrives off Punta del Este (Uruguay) from Santander with his 64-gun, 700-man flagship Asia (official name, Nuestra Señora de Loreto) and vice-flagship Guipúzcoa; the 54-gun, 500-man Hermiona; the 50-gun, 450-man Esperanza; the 40-gun, 350-man San Esteban; and the 20-gun sloop Mercurio. His mission is to counter Anson's venture (see "December 28, 1740" entry) by rounding Cape Horn first and taking up station in the South Pacific with his squadron, as well as by bolstering all coastal garrisons with the regiment of 500 Spanish regulars, which he is bringing.

Immediately after anchoring, Pizarro sends to Buenos Aires for provisions as well as news of any English movements.

Admiral Pizarro

José Alfonso Pizarro was born in Murcia in 1689. As a youth, he joined the naval service of the Knights of Malta in the Mediterranean. He later transferred into the Royal Spanish Navy, rising through the ranks. From a well-connected family, he also became a knight of the Order of Saint John. Promoted to commodore, he sailed to Italy with a squadron in 1736 to escort home its retiring Spanish army. Then in April 1738, he was sent to the Caribbean with the warships Africa and Guipúzcoa to guide home the quicksilver convoy from Veracruz.

Through good fortune, Pizarro evaded the British blockaders awaiting him outside Cadiz, instead slipping into Santander to safely discharge his cargo by mid-August 1739. Because of this success, when Madrid learned next year of Anson's plan to round Cape Horn, Pizarro (now a rear admiral) was ordered to lead a counterexpedition into the South Pacific to establish a permanent naval deterrent.

Despite failing to round the Cape on his first try early in 1741, Pizarro persisted. He made a second attempt from Montevideo a few months later, with only his flagship Asia and the Esperanza. Again, violent storms drove the dismayed vessels back. The admiral then sent the less-damaged Esperanza under Capt. Gabriel de Mendinueta to make a third try, while himself leading his handful of surviving seamen and 60 troops overland. After an epic march over the Pampas and Andes, the weary men reached Valparaíso in Chile by year's end. They were met by the Esperanza, plus two armed merchantmen sent down by the viceroy of Peru to travel on to Valdivia and Concepción.

After recovering and keeping watch against Anson's possible return southward, Pizarro eventually sailed into Callao aboard the Esperanza in the spring of 1743. A year-and-a-half later, he returned overland to Montevideo to find the Asia now refurbished. Conscripting South American hands, he set sail for Spain in November 1745, bearing a million pesos in bullion from Buenos Aires. His resentful South American crewmen mutinied one night, trying to seize the ship. Pizarro killed their ringleader and drove the rest into the sea. He entered Corcubión in Spain on January 20, 1746, after which the Asia was sailed on to El Ferrol to be broken up.

Because of this risky delivery and his perseverance, Pizarro was ennobled as Marqués del Villar and promoted to vice admiral. When the war with England ended, he was named on April 22, 1749, as viceroy of New Granada (modern Colombia). He did not reach Cartagena until November 6 and the inland capital of Bogotá by May 3, 1750. His four-year term was considered a success, but upon being succeeded on November 24, 1753, Pizarro was already in a wheelchair with a tumor in his leg. He died on the voyage home.

JANUARY 18, 1741. Cape Tiburón. This morning, as the Ogle-Wentworth expedition passes 20 miles south of Cape Tiburón (southwestern Haiti), four sail are sighted closer inshore. The British admiral detaches 30-year-old captain Lord Aubrey Beauclerk, youngest son of the Duke of St. Albans, to investigate with the 70-gun Prince Frederick and Orford, plus the 60-gun Lion, Weymouth, Rippon, and Dunkirk.

The unidentified foursome is the French 64-gun, 950-ton Ardent of 66-year-old Commo. Nicolas Hercule, Marquis d'Espinay Beaugroult; the 54-gun, 850-ton Mercure of Capt. Henri François Desherbiers, Marquis de Letandière; the 50-gun, 830-ton Diamant of Captain de Poisins; and the 44-gun, 500-ton frigate Parfaite of Capt. Constatin Louis d'Estournel, returning toward Admiral d'Antin's anchorage at Port Saint Louis (modern Les Cayes, Haiti) after visiting Petit Goâve. Suspecting that they might be Spanish men-of-war, the six Royal Navy warships chase them aggressively into the night, persuading the outnumbered French that war has already been declared back in Europe between London and Paris. Knowles's Weymouth even hails one of the French ships at 10:00 p.m. but receives no reply.

Beauclerk eventually fires a warning shot across one of the Frenchmen's bows, which responds with a full broadside, precipitating a round of inconclusive exchanges until dawn. At daylight of January 19, Knowles convinces Beauclerk that this encounter has been a mistake, so that after exchanging compliments with d'Espinay's ships, the Royal Navy squadron stands away to rejoin its main body (which has since begun reaching Jamaica). D'Espinay meanwhile reports to d'Antin, who is greatly discouraged by the arrival of this huge British reinforcement in the West Indies and therefore decides to abandon the theater altogether. He quits Port Saint Louis for France by February 7, leaving only seven ships of the line at Petit Goâve under Roquefeuil.

FEBRUARY 3, 1741. At Maldonado (Uruguay), Pizarro's squadron gets under way without awaiting its fresh provisions from Buenos Aires, for the Spanish admiral has learned from Portuguese sources that Anson's force lies only 500 miles northeast at Ilha de Santa Catarina (Brazil), threatening to precede him into the Pacific. The five Spanish warships—their 20-gun sloop being abandoned at Maldonado—stand southward in increasingly heavy weather, briefly spotting HMS Pearl before attempting to round Cape Horn on February 28.

Fierce snowstorms blow up out of the northwest on March 7 and disperse their formation, the Hermiona being lost with all hands on the Cape. Eventually, Pizarro's Asia limps back into Montevideo in mid-May with half its 700-man crew dead; the San Esteban suffers similar losses before regaining Baragán Bay (Argentina). The jury-rigged Guipúzcoa drifts helplessly onto Ilha de Santa Catarina and is wrecked, and the Esperanza reaches Montevideo with only 58 of 450 crew members still alive.

FEBRUARY 8, 1741. Vernon works his way out of Port Royal (Jamaica), joined by Rear Adm. Sir Chaloner Ogle's and Commo. Richard Lestock's fleets.

Augusta is obliged to turn back shortly thereafter, having been damaged while exiting the harbor. The formation is escorting 85 troop transports, but Vernon's first aim is to beat upwind toward southwestern Haiti and confront d'Antin's French fleet within Port Saint Louis (Les Cayes) before venturing against any Spanish American target.

FEBRUARY 11, 1741. Three and a half months after arriving, Admiral de Torres departs Cartagena with 14 Spanish warships and continues his passage toward Havana.

FEBRUARY 23, 1741. After assembling his huge expedition outside Port Saint Louis (Les Cayes, Haiti), Vernon prepares to attack next morning, only to discover that d'Antin's fleet has already sailed for France. Replenishing provisions, Vernon and Wentworth then decide to assault Cartagena instead, weighing anchor on March 8.

MARCH 13, 1741. Siege of Cartagena. Two English warships and an auxiliary anchor north of this city, off Canoas Point. Next day, a French sloop runs past, bringing the city warning from Charles Brunier, Marquis de Larnage, and governor of Saint Domingue (Haiti) about the intended British invasion. During the afternoon of March 15, advance elements of Vernon and Wentworth's 176 ships come up over the horizon, anchoring next afternoon between Hicacos Point and Grande Beach. Smaller English ships then feint a disembarkation north of the city, while the Weymouth, Dunkirk, Experiment, and the sloop Spence reconnoiter the bay's shoreline farther south near Boca Grande. Heavy swells preclude any easy landings, so the invaders opt for an attack against Boca Chica, still farther to the south.

The Spaniards use these few days' grace to good advantage. Viceroy de Esclava has been in office less than a year, but the city boasts a garrison of 1,100 regulars from the Aragón, España, and De la Plaza regiments, 300 militiamen, two 100-man free black companies, plus 600 native archers raised by Col. Melchor de Navarrete. In the harbor ride the 70-gun ships of the line Galicia (flag), San Felipe, San Carlos, and Africa, plus the 64-gun Dragón or Santa Rosa de Lima and Conquistador (although all these men-of-war mount considerably fewer than their full allotment of artillery). Their commander is Vice Admiral de Lezo, who shifts his four largest ships to cover the Boca Chica entrance, while sending many of his 600 sailors and 400 marines ashore to stretch the log boom and bolster the defenses. The Spaniards muster perhaps 4,000 defenders in total.

At 9:00 a.m. on March 20, the 80-gun HMSS Norfolk, Shrewsbury, and Russell move inshore to open fire against the Santiago and San Felipe batteries, while the 80-gun Princess Amelia and smaller Litchfield engage the Chamba Battery, bomb vessels rain shells upon Fort San Luis, and Commodore Lestock's division menaces the distant city of Cartagena itself. The Shrewsbury's cable is cut by a chance Spanish round, setting it adrift under the main enemy batteries, which inflict 60 casualties before the ship can crawl out of danger. Otherwise, the British succeed in silencing the batteries by noon, allowing Wentworth's disembarkation to begin at 2:00 p.m. north of Fort San Luis. The 8,000-strong English army comes ashore very slowly, however, some contingents not landing until the next day, then failing to install their first 12-gun mortar battery before San Luis until three days later and their two-dozen heavy siege artillery pieces by April 2. This sluggish pace threatens the entire enterprise, because sickness is already spreading throughout the invaders' ranks.

At dawn of April 1, 300 British sailors and 200 soldiers come ashore a mile from the 15-gun Abanicos Battery under naval captains Watson, Norris, Colby, Boscawen, Laws, and Cotes, as well as military captains James Murray and Lawrence Washington. Despite being ambushed by another hidden 5-gun battery at Varadero, they succeed in overrunning and temporarily spiking the guns of their intended target, although the Spanish battery commander, naval lieutenant José Campuzano, soon succeeds in unspiking several and resuming fire. At first light of April 3, Lestock ventures inshore with the vessels Boyne, Princess Amelia, Prince Frederick, Hampton Court, Tilbury, and Suffolk to commence a two-day bombardment against Fort San Luis and the nearby San José Battery, eventually retiring with numerous casualties (including Captain Beauclerk, who is killed). Both senior Spanish commanders, de Eslava and de Lezo, are also wounded during this exchange by shell fragments from a round that strikes the Galicia on April 4, although neither is seriously incapacitated.

The Spaniards have already resolved to abandon San Luis, so when Wentworth orders it stormed at 5:30 p.m. on April 5, its 500 surviving defenders hang out a white flag and beat for a parley. Unable to see or hear this display because of the smoke and din, the British grenadiers under Brig. Gen. William Blakeney press home their attack, while the exhausted Spanish garrison—fearing that this onslaught means that no quarter will be given—flee out of San Luis's far side. The men-of-war San Carlos, San Felipe, and Africa are scuttled shortly thereafter to block the channel. Knowles meanwhile lands a party of seamen on the southern bank and storms San José Battery, securing this abandoned position by 10:00 p.m.

He then rows out in the darkness to the Spanish flagship Galicia, finding it manned by only 60 men, thereby capturing it intact. He furthermore cuts the log boom so that the next morning Vernon's fleet can begin working past the scuttled Spanish ships, gaining the safety of the lower harbor by evening of April 7. The British admiral then presses north against the inner Spanish defenses, using the Burford and the Orford to stem the upper harbor while Knowles's Weymouth and a sloop destroy the Paso de Caballos batteries by April 8. So confident is Vernon of victory that he dispatches Laws's sloop Spence toward England, announcing Cartagena's imminent fall.

But the Spaniards continue to resist, scuttling their last two warships—the Dragón and the Conquistador—along with the rest of their merchant shipping on April 10 to block the Manzanillo Channel into the upper harbor, while also preparing to evacuate their 60-gun Santa Cruz fortress (known as Castillo Grande) after nightfall. Knowles notices this movement, so he sails the Weymouth directly beneath its walls and opens fire, then finds the fortress empty. Santa Cruz's seizure allows the English greater ease in clearing the block ships, Knowles being installed as garrison commander with 100 soldiers from Lord James Cavendish's regiment. By April 12, the first bomb vessels are shelling Cartagena proper, and on the night of April 16, a large-scale disembarkation is made by Blakeney three miles south of La Popa at Tejar de Gracias, intending to cut off the city from its hinterland. This encirclement is completed the following noon, when North American colonial militiamen occupy the La Popa heights unopposed.

Nevertheless, Wentworth closes upon Cartagena's ramparts very sluggishly, disease sapping his army. The 24-gun San Felipe de Barajas fortress, manned by 250 Spanish marines and soldiers from the Aragón and España regiments under military engineer Carlos Desnaux, checks the advance and prompts an assault at 3:00 a.m. on April 20 by 1,500 English troops under Brig. Gen. John Guise and colonels Wynyard and Grant, who suffer 645 killed, wounded, or captured. Disheartened, Wentworth announces a few days later that Cartagena cannot be carried with his remaining strength—only 3,569 of his original 8,000 soldiers still being left. A bitter dispute erupts with his naval counterpart as the English expedition prepares to withdraw.

At 5:00 a.m. on April 27, the captured Galicia—now transformed into a floating battery—approaches Cartagena's walls under Capt. Daniel Hore, exchanging broadsides with its defenders for seven hours

Smollett's Memoirs

Among the besiegers at Cartagena was a 20-year-old surgeon's mate named Tobias George Smollett. He was born in Scotland in March 1721, the second son and third child of a minor landowner, who soon died. Young Tobias completed some medical studies at the University of Glasgow before his rich grandfather also died, leaving him penniless. Traveling to London in 1739 in the vain hope of having his tragic play The Regicide performed, the teenager signed on next April as surgeon's mate aboard HMS Chichester, which sailed for Jamaica that October with Sir Chaloner Ogle's squadron.

Eight years later, having survived the ordeals of this campaign, Smollett published a lively account of his West Indian service. A best-seller, the ribald Adventures of Roderick Random included many details about the siege of Cartagena. For example, as yellow fever ravaged the fleet, his captain developed a morbid fear of inhaling any diseased scent. Smollett wrote:

I received a message to clean myself and go up to the great cabin, and with this message I instantly complied, sweetening myself with rosewater from the medicine chest. When I entered the room, I was ordered to stand by the door, until Captain Whiffle had reconnoitered me at a distance with a spy-glass. He, having consulted one sense in this manner, bade me advance gradually, that his nose might have intelligence before it could be much offended. I therefore approached with great caution and success, and he was pleased to say: "Aye, this creature is tolerable."

The injustices and callousness of naval life caused Smollett to resign when the Chichester returned to Plymouth in February 1742. He struggled to establish a medical practice in London's Downing Street, until his first novel appeared.

More works followed; Smollett's satirical novels were his most successful. Always proud and sharp tongued, he was fined £100 and jailed for three months in 1760 for describing Sir Charles Knowles in print as "an Admiral without conduct, an engineer without knowledge, an officer without resolution, and a man without veracity."

until it finally sinks. Six of the Galicia's 300-plus English crewmembers are killed and another 56 wounded, but under cover of this action, the diseased English army strikes camp and marches off to reembark. Their transports set sail for Jamaica that same day, leaving Vernon and his men-of-war behind to destroy the Spaniards' shipping and fortifications, while loading whatever stores, equipment, and booty they can find. Vernon eventually quits Cartagena's lower harbor by May 17, followed the next day by Ogle's division and, on May 20, by Lestock's, returning into Port Royal (Jamaica) by May 30. The Spaniards have endured some 600 deaths during this invasion, plus many other defenders wounded or lost, but they exult over their success. De Lezo dies of his wounds on September 7, being posthumously ennobled as Marqués de Ovieco, while de Eslava is created Marqués de la Real Defensa.

MARCH 29, 1741. A large party of Yamasee warriors raid Governor Oglethorpe's Hermitage Plantation (also called Carr's Fort, Georgia) during his absence, killing four servants and wounding several others before retiring south with their plunder. The governor dispatches scout boats in pursuit, which overtake the marauders before they can regain Spanish Florida.

JUNE 19, 1741. Anson in the Pacific. At daybreak, HMS Centurion sights the Juan Fernández Islands and anchors three days later after a gruelling passage around Cape Horn. That same day, June 22, his flagship is rejoined by the sloop Trial, by the Gloucester on July 8, and by the store-ship Anna on August 28. Of more than 1,000 original crew members and troops, only a third are still alive, the Severn and the Pearl having turned back into the Atlantic, while the Wager lies wrecked on the Patagonian coast.

The British are in fact fortunate, for three days prior to Anson's arrival, Peruvian Commo. Jacinto de Segurola has visited these islands from Concepción with his 44-gun, 450-ton flagship San Fermín, the 30-gun warships Concepción and Sacramento, plus the 24-gun hired merchantman Socorro. Convinced that the long-delayed enemy incursion has been cancelled, Segurola has already departed back toward his home port of Callao.

JUNE 30, 1741. In Havana, Admiral de Torres's 70-gun flagship Invencible is struck by lightning at 3:00 p.m., catches fire, and explodes an hour and a quarter later. This accident not only claims 16 lives and injures 21 men but also damages the remaining warships anchored nearby: the 70-gun Nuestra Señora de Belén or Glorioso, Príncipe, and Reina; the 62-gun San Isidro; plus the 60-gun Fuerte, Hércules, Nueva España, and Real Familia.

JULY 11, 1741. Guantánamo. Vernon quits Port Royal (Jamaica) to attack Santiago de Cuba with his 80-gun flagship Boyne and Ogle's vice-flag Cumberland; the 70-gun Grafton and Kent; 60-gun Montague, Tilbury, and Worcester; the 50-gun Chester and Tiger; the 20-gun sloops Experiment, Sheerness, and Shoreham; the bomb vessel Alderney; the fireships Phaeton, Strombolo, and Vesuvius; the sloops Bonetta and Triton; the hospital ships Princess Royal and Scarborough; plus the tender Pompey. This fleet is furthermore escorting 40 transports bearing 3,400 troops under Wentworth.

After rendezvousing 18 days later between Guantánamo Point and Caimanera (soon rechristened "Walthenham" by the British), Vernon dispatches eight warships on July 31 to cruise off Santiago. Judging its entrance impervious to sea assault, the redcoats are disembarked at three different beaches in Guantánamo Bay—renamed Cumberland Bay—on the night of August 4–5 and march against the nearby village of Catalina. However, the invaders, being 65 miles short of their objective, slow down three days later because of Wentworth's growing trepidations.

Santiago's governor Francisco Caxigal de la Vega, its sargento mayor or garrison commander Carlos Riva Agüero, and regional militia captain Pedro Guerrero only have 350 regulars and 600 militiamen in total, so they fall back before this British host. Nevertheless, Wentworth's army becomes paralyzed by fatigue and disease and spends the next four months encamped and sporadically raided by Cuban guerrillas. Vernon, exasperated by his colleague's inactivity, sends warships on independent cruises until Wentworth's sick list grows so long—2,260 soldiers being struck with fever by December 5—that the expedition is reembarked and sets sail at dawn of December 9 to return into Port Royal 10 days later. It is estimated that 3,000 Englishmen may have been incapacitated during this futile campaign.

JULY 20, 1741. After suffering many years of intermittent attacks, Panama's governor Dionisio Martínez de la Vega signs a peace treaty with the Indian chieftains Felipe de Uriñaquicha and Juan Sauni, greatly reducing anti-Spanish warfare throughout the Darién region.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1741. After breaking up his store-ship Anna, Anson resumes his Pacific penetration by departing the Juan Fernández Islands with the vessels Centurion, Gloucester, and Trial.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1741. Anson's trio of warships capture the 3-gun, 450-ton Spanish merchantman Nuestra Señora del Monte Carmelo of its master Manuel de Zamora bound from Lima toward Valparaiso. It is renamed Carmila and incorporated into the British squadron, bearing eight more guns.

On October 6, the 600-ton Nuestra Señora de Aranzazu is also intercepted, being armed with 20 guns to replace Trial, which is scuttled on October 15. Pressing farther north, Anson then seizes Bartolomé Urrunaga's 300-ton, 45-man Santa Teresa de Jesús on October 17, and the 270-ton, 43-man Nuestra Señora del Carmen under Marcos Moreno on November 21.

NOVEMBER 24, 1741. At 10:00 p.m., Anson sends a 58-man boat party in toward the unsuspecting town of Paíta (Peru) under lieutenants Percy Breitt and Augustus von Keppel, following three hours later with the larger ships. This advance force surprises the Spaniards at 2:00 a.m. of the 25th, carrying Paíta with the loss of a single man and another wounded. The next morning, the Centurion and the Carmila stem the harbor entrance, anchoring at 2:00 p.m. to begin the process of plundering Paíta's buildings. The ship Soledad is seized as a prize, while two snows, a bark, and a pair of demi-galleys are scuttled and the town put to the torch. Anson releases all his captives and withdraws on the afternoon of the 27th.

JANUARY 23, 1742. Capt. Edward Herbert's 50-gun HMS Tiger is lost on a key near Florida's Tortuga Bank, its crew managing to build a camp ashore, defended by 20 raised guns. The 60-gun Spanish warship Fuerte is sent from Havana to capture the survivors, but it also becomes lost. The Tiger's seamen, after two months on their island, take a sloop with their boats and reach Jamaica.

JANUARY 26, 1742. Some 2,000 troops reach Jamaica from England aboard a convoy escorted by the 50-gun Greenwich and Saint Albans and the 20-gun Fox. Many of these soldiers soon fall ill, precluding their use in any immediate operation.

FEBRUARY 1742. Santiago de Cuba is reinforced by 1,500 men of the Portugal Regiment and Almansa Dragoons under colonels Francisco Villavicencio and Alonso de Arcos Moreno, respectively, which were transported out from Spain by a Guipúzcoan convoy.

FEBRUARY 9, 1742. After burning several prizes and releasing more prisoners off South America, Anson arrives near Colima (Mexico) with the Centurion, the Gloucester, and three Spanish prizes in hopes of intercepting the annual Manila galleon. Two weeks later, he takes up station outside Acapulco, vainly awaiting the Nuestra Señora de Cavadonga—which already lies inside, having entered on January 6.

MARCH 15, 1742. Vernon quits Port Royal (Jamaica) with the Boyne (flag), the Montague, the Worcester, the Defiance, and two smaller auxiliaries in hopes of intercepting six Spanish vessels that are rumored to be sailing from La Guaira toward Cartagena. He leaves instructions for his second-in-command Ogle to follow with the remainder of his squadron, convoying Wentworth's 40 transports to a rendezvous off the Spanish Main. From there, this combined force will descend upon northern Panama in an attempt to march across its isthmus and seize the capital.

The latter contingent sets sail from Port Royal on March 18–19 with 3,000 troops, meeting up with Vernon before Cartagena on April 4. The expected Spanish squadron having failed to materialize, the admiral then veers around toward Nombre de Dios.

APRIL 7, 1742. Portobelo Fiasco. According to the strategy proposed by the veteran West Indian rover George Lowther—now breveted as a Royal Navy lieutenant commanding the sloop Triton—Vernon and Wentworth are to initially land 500–600 men at Nombre de Dios and hasten them inland to cut off the Portobelo-to-Panama road, thus preventing news of the main body's subsequent disembarkation at Portobelo from traversing the Isthmus. Instead, Vernon stands directly into Portobelo at 4:30 p.m., allowing its Spanish governor Juan José Colomo ample time to assemble his 80 regulars and 300 militiamen and make an orderly withdrawal into the interior. When the English come ashore, they find the Portobelo garrison already retired into the jungle, causing the invaders to lose heart. Almost 1,000 redcoats are already sick, leaving only 2,000 to march inland.

Next, word arrives that Panama City's 450 defenders have been augmented on March 22 by five warships and 1,400 men from Peru, leading the English army commanders to abandon this project altogether and sail away toward Jamaica aboard their transports by April 20. Vernon follows five days later, with eight of the line and three lesser craft, peering into Cartagena before running downwind to Jamaica and reaching Bluefields Bay by May 23.

APRIL 11, 1742. The Spaniards in Costa Rica complete work on Fort San Fernando, erected to prevent Zambo and privateer raids into the Matina Valley.

APRIL 23, 1742. The 40-gun Royal Navy frigate Eltham of Capt. Edward Smith and the 20-gun sloop Lively of Cmdr. Henry Stewart intercept three hired Spanish ships bearing reinforcements toward Puerto Rico and maul them before nightfall brings an end to this action.

MAY 17, 1742. Disappointed by the Manila galleon's failure to emerge from Acapulco, Anson waters at Zihuatanejo and scuttles his last three Spanish prizes before striking out westward across the Pacific with his two remaining warships.

JUNE 1, 1742. Ten Spanish vessels leave Havana bearing the first contingent of an expedition intended to reinforce St. Augustine and then to fall upon the advance British outpost of Saint Simons (Georgia).

One week later, they encounter HMS Flamborough off Florida, which drives two of the Spanish galleys and a sloop aground before retiring to carry a warning into Charles Town (present-day Charleston, South Carolina). Meanwhile, the main body of 25 Cuban vessels departs Havana on June 6, escorted by a 30-gun royal frigate under Capt. Antonio Castañeda. The fleet straggles into St. Augustine by June 15, after being dispersed by a storm.

Governor de Montiano quickly marshals 52 craft bearing 1,950 men, including two battalions of regular infantrymen, a regiment of dragoons (without mounts), gunners, numerous militia companies—some composed of runaway South Carolina slaves—and 60 Indian scouts. Finally, at 7:00 a.m. on July 1, this host sets sail from St. Augustine, Col. Miguel de Rivas Rocafull being left in charge of the settlement's 300-man garrison.

JUNE 15, 1742. Off the Bahamas, Capt. Thomas Frankland's Rose attacks a four-ship Spanish convoy and captures its largest vessel—a 10-gun, 80-man snow commanded by Juan de León Fandino—after a fierce two-hour fight. (This is the privateer who allegedly cut off Jenkins's ear, precipitating this conflict.)

JULY 2, 1742. Spanish Invasion of Georgia. This afternoon, four Spanish demi-galleys, two schooners, and nine piraguas—separated from de Montiano's larger fleet by heavy west-northwesterly seas—attempt to shelter in Cumberland Sound, being fired upon by Fort Prince William and the schooner Walker. After an hour's exchange, the Spaniards veer toward the north end of Cumberland Island, anchoring at the entrance to Saint Andrews Sound beyond range of the British artillery. A report reaches Oglethorpe next morning at Frederica (10 miles farther north), who immediately calls out his provincials—fewer than 1,000 men—to repel a Spanish invasion.

By July 4, the first British reinforcements reach Cumberland Island when Capt. William Horton leads a grenadier company and Indian band across from Jekyll Island. When Oglethorpe follows with two companies of regulars aboard three scout boats, though, he is intercepted in Saint Andrews Sound by the four Cuban demi-galleys and has to fight his way through with only two craft (while the third turns back, erroneously reporting that the British commander has been lost). Upon gaining Fort Saint Andrews, Oglethorpe orders it abandoned so as to concentrate his forces upon Fort Prince William. Next day, he watches as the Spanish flotilla stands away from Cumberland Island toward St. Augustine before they can be subjected to an English counterattack.

Oglethorpe returns to Saint Simons Island aboard the Walker, but on July 9 the main Spanish fleet of 36 sail comes up over the horizon, anchoring 10–12 miles northeast of Fort Saint Simon by the next afternoon. After the wind abates on July 12, de Montiano attempts a disembarkation on the southeastern side of the island, demurring when a sudden squall blows up. The Spaniards then shift to within five to six miles of the entrance to Saint Simons Sound on the afternoon of the 15th and, after reconnoitering its approaches next morning with a galley and two demi-galleys, stand in at 4:00 p.m. The British batteries open fire, backed by the Walker, the guard sloop Faulcon, and the merchant frigate Success of Capt. William Thompson, anchored west of Fort Saint Simons. The lead Spanish warships reply effectively, sending the Faulcon to the bottom and forcing their way to the Frederica River mouth by 5:30 p.m., suffering only five fatalities.

A half hour later, de Montiano's flagship hoists a red pennant, signalling his troops to disembark at a dry marsh just below Kings Creek, a mile and a half from Fort Saint Simons. Lt. Col. Antonio Salgado brings the first 500 Spanish regulars ashore at 7:00 p.m., under covering fire from a galley, two demi-galleys, and a packet, which scatters the few Georgia Rangers and native warriors lining the beach. By morning, as many as 1,500 Spanish troops are ashore under de Montiano, while Oglethorpe has abandoned Fort Saint Simons and concentrated 500 men in Frederica, simultaneously ordering the Walker, the Success, and a large South Carolina merchant sloop to flee out to sea. The Spaniards occupy the vacant fort the next day and, on the 18th, send a 115-man reconnaissance unit north under Capt. Sebastián Sánchez to probe the six-mile road leading into Frederica.

A mile and a half short of their destination, the Spaniards are set upon by a column of Georgia Rangers, Highlanders, Chickasaw, Yamacraw, and Creek warriors—all under Oglethorpe's personal direction—who succeed in killing or capturing 36 invaders (including Sánchez and his second-incommand, Capt. Nicolás Hernández). The British commander then digs in some of his companies and returns into Frederica for greater numbers. At 3:00 p.m., 150–200 Spanish grenadiers appear under Capt. Antonio Barba, having marched from Fort Saint Simons to cover their defeated colleagues' retreat. Despite a steady drizzle, they engage the British in a heated firefight, during which most of Capt. Raymond Demere's company of 42 regulars flees. Nonetheless, Lt. Charles Mackay's Highlanders hold, along with some Rangers and other troops, obliging the Spaniards to retire at 4:00 p.m. (this engagement becomes known as the Battle of Bloody Marsh).

On July 19, Horton's grenadier company, two foot companies, and Fort Saint Andrews's garrison reach Frederica, bringing Oglethorpe's total strength to 700–800 men. The Spaniards remain ensconced within Fort Saint Simons, both sides gingerly probing each other's defenses over the next few days, while shying away from any costly confrontation. Then, five British sail arrive from South Carolina at noon of July 25, prompting de Montiano to order an immediate withdrawal. By nightfall, Fort Saint Simons has been razed, the larger Spanish warships are standing out to sea, and de Montiano's army has been ferried across to Jekyll Island to destroy Forts Saint Andrews and Prince William during their retreat toward St. Augustine.

JULY 26, 1742. Retiring toward Florida, the remnants of de Montiano's expedition burns vacant Fort Saint Andrews on Cumberland Island (Georgia). Next day, the Spanish commander detaches his schooners, sloops, and other sea craft to sail directly toward St. Augustine, while using four demi-galleys and his flotilla of piraguas—who have rejoined after becoming separated—to proceed down the Cumberland River against Fort Prince William.

JULY 29, 1742. This morning, de Montiano reaches the southern end of Cumberland Island and attempts to use 200 troops to overwhelm tiny Fort Prince William, held by only 60 regulars and a Ranger detachment under Lt. Alexander Stewart. But the defenders have been forewarned of the Spaniards' approach and also know that Oglethorpe is marching to their relief, so they send eight snipers to fire upon the Spanish boats. Their resistance persuades de Montiano to forego his attack, steering instead toward St. Augustine with his boats, while the Cuban demi-galleys bombard Prince William's ramparts for an hour before following in his wake.

AUGUST 6, 1742. A South Carolina relief force of 1,092 men arrives off Saint Simons Island (Georgia) aboard four Royal Navy warships and eight armed provincial vessels to find de Montiano's Spanish expedition already gone. Four days later, Capt. Charles Hardy takes his flagship—and all other vessels except two provincial galleys—back to Charles Town on the unfounded fear of a Spanish assault against South Carolina during his absence.

AUGUST 24, 1742. A small expedition quits Port Royal (Jamaica), escorted by Cusack's 50-gun Litchfield and the 4-gun sloop Bonetta under Cmdr. William Lea, to sail west and establish an English presence on Roatán Island (Honduras). This convoy is accompanied by William Pitt, a well-known figure along the Mosquito Coast, who ensures a hearty welcome from Roatán's residents.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1742. Oglethorpe appears off St. Augustine with six Royal Navy warships, six armed provincial vessels, and a flotilla of scout boats. Two days later, they attempt to force entrance to destroy the half-dozen Cuban demi-galleys lying inside the bay but are repelled.

The British therefore shift southward to the Matanzas Inlet by September 10, trying to assault a large, partially built stone blockhouse on an island just inside its entrance (present-day Fort Matanzas monument), but they are again driven off. When the wind rises on the 11th, Oglethorpe sails away for Georgia, returning there safely by the 15th.

OCTOBER 2, 1742. Capt. Peter Lawrence's 60-gun HMS Tilbury catches fire accidentally and sinks off Hispaniola, taking down more than 100 crew members. Survivors are rescued by an accompanying Jamaican privateer sloop and another warship.

OCTOBER 4, 1742. Rear Admiral Ogle is instructed to relieve Vernon as commander in chief at Jamaica. His fleet consists of the 80-gun Cumberland; the 70-gun Kent and Grafton; the 60-gun Lion, Montague, Rippon, and York; the 50-gun Assistance, Saint Albans, and Litchfield; the 40-gun frigates Adventure, Eltham, Fowey, and Ludlow Castle; the 20-gun sloops Astrea, Experiment, Seahorse, and Shoreham; the 6-gun sloop Spy; the 4-gun sloop Bonetta; the fireships Strombolo and Vulcan; plus the bomb vessels Basilisk, Blast, and Thunder. At Barbados are the 50-gun Advice and Norwich, and the 20-gun sloop Scarborough. In the Leeward Islands are the 40-gun frigates Gosport and Launceston; the 20-gun Lively; and the Pembroke's Prize.

OCTOBER 30, 1742. Discouraged and at odds with one another, Vernon and Wentworth quit Jamaica for England.

NOVEMBER 18, 1742. Yamasee raiders launch a dawn attack against the Mount Venture trading out-

Lawrence Washington and Mount Vernon

When 22-year-old Lawrence Washington sailed from Virginia to fight in the West Indies, he left his father, Augustine, in control of his estates. After staggering back into Jamaica from the failed assault against Cartagena, he wrote to his father in May 1741 to say that, if he survived the war, he wished to build a home on one of three lots that he owned near the town of Fredericksburg. As a result, his father started laying out a modest farmhouse that same year on a vacant bluff overlooking the Potomac River.

When Lawrence Washington learned of his father's project late that same year of 1741, he apparently wrote to say that he wanted the home named "Mount Vernon" in honor of his commander. Despite the repulses at Cartagena and Guantánamo, the energy and stylish courage of the British admiral retained the young officer's admiration. The earliest known reference to "Mount Vernon" occurs in a letter written in early August 1742 by its neighbor, William Fairfax of Belvoir.

Sick and weak, Lawrence Washington returned from the war late in 1742. The next spring, his father died, leaving him in charge of family affairs. He married Anne Fairfax, and they moved into the completed Mount Vernon by July 1743. A welcome visitor was 11-year-old George Washington, Lawrence's half-brother from Augustine's second marriage. The young boy was greatly influenced by his older sibling. In 1746, Lawrence even suggested that George join the Royal Navy. The 14-year-old was very excited at this prospect, but George's mother, Mary, refused to give her consent.

Lawrence expanded Mount Vernon before his untimely death in July 1752. George, who was already living there and managing the plantation's operations, leased it as of December 1754. Three years later, he rebuilt the entire house, doubling it in size. After inheriting the estate outright in 1761, he poured more efforts into it, eventually rebuilding and doubling it once more. Despite all these dramatic changes, it never lost its original name.

FEBRUARY 22, 1743. Having returned into the West Indies the previous month after a brief sojourn in England, during which he has been promoted to commodore, 37-year-old Charles Knowles sets sail from Antigua for Saint Kitts with his 70-gun, 380-man flagship Suffolk and the Burford under Franklin Lushington; the 50-gun, 250-man Norwich of Thomas Gregory, Advice of Elliot Smith, and Assistance of Smith Callis; the 40-gun, 210-man frigate Eltham under its acting captain Richard Watkins; the 20-gun, 120-man sloops Lively under the acting commander Henry Stewart and Scarborough of Lach-lin Leslie; the 14-gun, 45-man sloop Otter of John Gage; plus the 8-gun, 40-man bomb vessel Comet of Richard Tyrrell.

Knowles takes on 400 militiamen from Colonel Dalzell's regiment aboard two transports, then heads southwestward on February 23 with the intent of attacking La Guaira. Knowles believes this port will prove an easy target, but the Spaniards have been forewarned of his plan, and it has been heavily reinforced by Caracas's governor, 47-year-old general Gabriel José de Zuloaga. After touching at Tortuga Island on February 27, the English expedition approaches La Guaira three days later.

MARCH 2, 1743. La Guaira. At first light, Knowles's squadron lies 15 miles east of this Venezuelan port, the Otter being sent ahead to reconnoiter its inner harbor. Spanish lookouts light signal fires at 6:30 a.m., warning both La Guaira and Caracas and prompting Governor de Zuloaga to gallop the 25 miles of winding road down to the coast with a large body of militiamen. The port's garrison commander, Mateo Gual, and Capt. José Iturriaga are meanwhile bracing for an assault. About midday, HMS Burford stands into the roadstead, followed by the vessels Eltham, Norwich, Suffolk, Advice, and Assistance. Despite the hail of rounds fired from six batteries—some using heated shot—the English men-of-war anchor in a double line by 1:00 p.m. and begin a furious exchange. The Spanish counterfire proves unexpectedly heavy and accurate, a heavy swell further preventing a British disembarkation.

After three and a half hours, the Burford cuts its cable to move out of range, and the frigate Eltham is also in distress. Both accidentally drift afoul of the Norwich, forcing it out of action as well and thus slackening Knowles's overall effort. Shooting ceases at sundown (8:00 p.m.), with the battered Burford seeking shelter to leeward, escorted by the vessels Norwich, Otter, and Assistance—which cannot anchor. The English bombardment resumes rather desultorily the next dawn from long range with the bomb vessel Comet, while de Zuloaga is obliged to return to his capital on March 4 to reassure its uneasy populace that the enemy has not come ashore. At 3:00 a.m. on March 5, Knowles sends boat parties into La Guaira's roadstead under cover of darkness, who board a French merchantman before being discovered and driven off.

Having suffered 92 killed and 308 wounded over three days, Knowles decides to retire westward before sunrise of March 6 and assail nearby Puerto Cabello. Despite instructing his captains to rendezvous four miles east of this latter port at the Borburata Keys, the detached Burford, Norwich, Assistance, and Otter instead proceed into Curaçao's capital of Willemstad, compelling the commodore to angrily follow them in. On March 28, he sends his smaller ships to cruise off Puerto Cabello and, after his main body is refitted, ventures to sea again on March 31, only to struggle against contrary winds and currents for two weeks before finally diverting to the eastern tip of Santo Domingo by April 19.

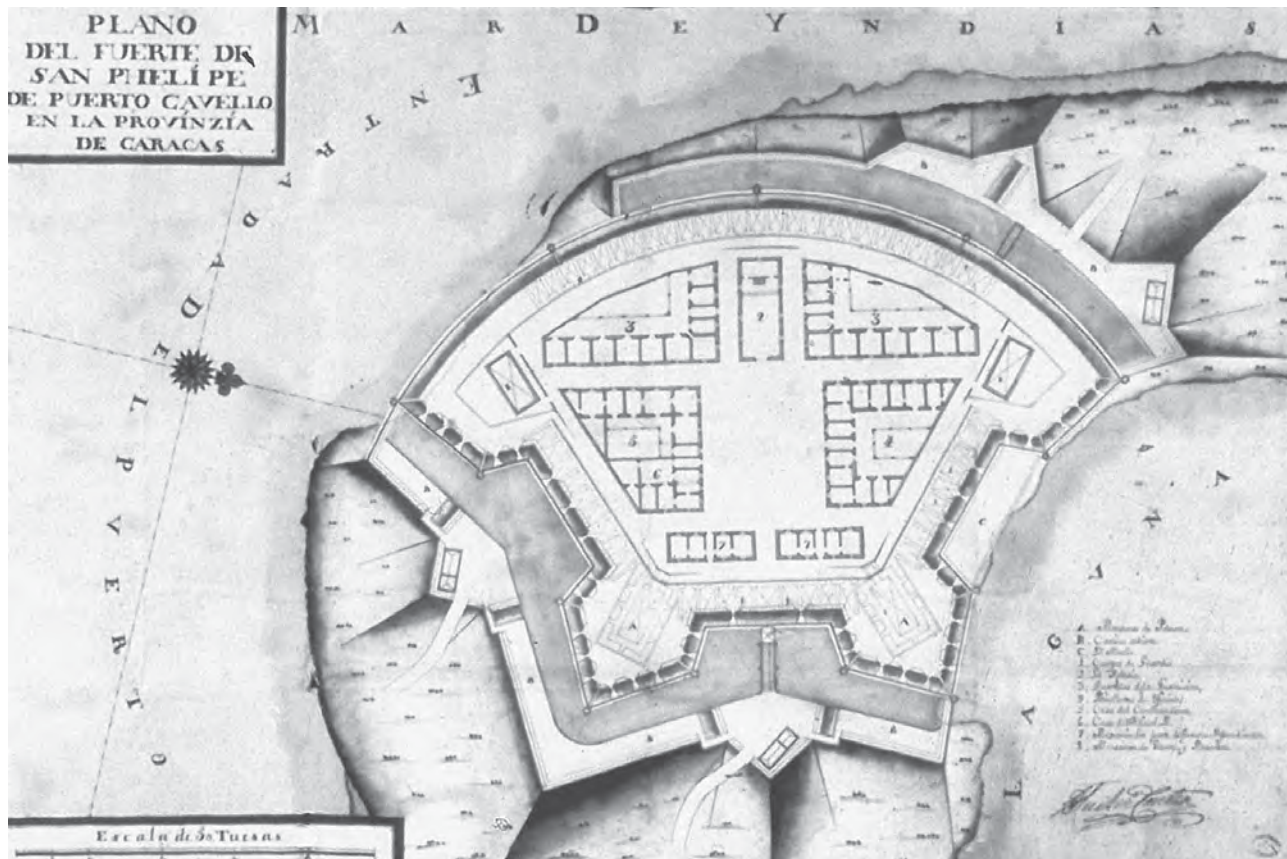

MARCH 15, 1743. At noon, Oglethorpe quits Cumberland Sound (Georgia) with an expedition of regulars, Rangers, and Indians, to make a reprisal raid against Spanish Florida. Two days later, his advance units establish a base on the southern banks of the Saint Johns River (near Mayport, Florida), from which a Creek war party steals upon St. Augustine and ambushes a Spanish piragua bearing 40 members of a labor battalion. Five are killed and scalped before the natives are obliged to retire by the guns of nearby Fort San Marcos.

After the warriors return into Oglethorpe's camp on the afternoon of March 22 and hold a celebration, they disperse, leaving the British general with only 200–300 regulars and provincials to march south three days later, hoping to lure the Spanish garrison out of St. Augustine into the open. Oglethorpe arrives three miles north of St. Augustine at 8:00 p.m. of the 27th, but after concealing his columns, a deserter from the 42nd Regiment—a soldier named Eels—reveals the attackers' presence to Governor de Montiano. The British immediately withdraw, returning into their Saint Johns base by the afternoon of the 29th. Two separate bands of Indian allies then attempt a raid on the outskirts of St. Augustine without result. Oglethorpe then materializes off Anastasia Island on the afternoon of April 8 with 80 troops aboard the schooner Walker of Capt. Caleb Davis and a pair of scout boats, escorted by the provincial frigate Success of William Thompson. High seas prevent any disembarkation, so the British sail away a few days later toward Georgia.

APRIL 26, 1743. Puerto Cabello. This afternoon, Knowles arrives four miles northeast of this Venezuelan port, sending his bomb vessel Comet to take up station inshore while preparing the remainder of his expedition for an assault. Next day, the 50-gun Norwich, 40-gun Eltham, and 20-gun Lively move in to bombard two small Spanish batteries—one mounting 15 pieces and the other 8—north of Puerto Cabello's main San Felipe harbor castle. This attack is intended to weary the batteries' defenders, after which a large force will be disembarked nearby under cover of darkness to overwhelm these isolated outposts, then turn their artillery against the main Spanish keep.

Knowles's operation starts well, with this trio of vessels pounding the batteries until 7:00 p.m., after which 1,100–1,200 Englishmen under Major Lucas are landed unseen at 10:30 p.m. But upon advancing, the troops stumble upon a 40-man Spanish company a half hour later, who fall back and turn two small artillery pieces inland, firing volleys of grape. The English troops panic, blazing wildly in all directions before eventually becoming so confused that they shoot into each other's ranks and precipitate a general stampede back to the boats.

On April 28, the same three Royal Navy warships resume their offshore bombardment, to little effect. On May 2, Caracas's governor de Zuloaga arrives overland with reinforcements for the Spanish garrison, whose normal complement is three companies of regulars and 300–400 militiamen. Next day, de Zuloaga is wounded in a leg after inspecting the Punta Brava Battery. By now running low on ammunition and provisions, Knowles decides to attempt a general assault on May 4 (April 23 [O.S.], Saint George's Day). However, the breeze dies away before his squadron can get under way at 1:00 p.m., so the operation is postponed until May 5. Knowles weighs anchor at 11:00 a.m., prompting the Spaniards to man their defenses. The vessels Assistance, Burford, Suffolk, and Norwich are to batter San Felipe Castle, while the Scarborough, Lively, and Eltham engage the fascine batteries farther north.

The battle begins shortly after 1:00 p.m. of May 5, the warships anchoring so close to San Felipe that only 11 of their guns can be depressed far enough to bear. At 4:00 p.m., the wind rises, and de Zuloaga fears that the English will charge the harbor mouth, so he orders its anchored block ship scuttled. Seeing the channel closing, Knowles finally gives the signal to retire two and a half hours later, only to then have his formation become becalmed. The English suffer heavily before eventually warping out of range by 9:00 p.m. Having endured 90–100 casualties in this last desperate gamble—plus another 100 from his previous tries—Knowles orders his most crippled ships to retire toward the Borburata Keys on the morning of May 7 (the Burford and the Assistance being barely able to move), while still shelling the inner harbor with his lone bomb vessel. The English commodore eventually offers a prisoner exchange, and after being grudgingly allowed to water by de Zuloaga a few days later, he sails away in two divisions on May 11 and 13 for Jamaica.

OCTOBER 25, 1743. French and Spanish diplomats formalize a Bourbon “family compact” by signing a treaty at Fontainebleau.

DECEMBER 15, 1743. Because of growing fears of a rupture between England and France, Knowles reaches Barbados with the 60-gun Superbe, 20-gun Biddeford, and bomb vessel Comet to assume joint command over this station with the 39-year-old commodore Peter Warren.

The latter arrives from North America on January 2, 1744, going on a cruise with the Superbe, while Knowles attends to the reconstruction of Barbados's defenses.

MARCH 15, 1744. In Europe, France officially declares war against Great Britain, which reciprocates on April 9.

LATE MARCH 1744. A 43-man Yamasee war party raids Capt. Mark Carr's Hermitage Plantation (also called Carr's Fort, Georgia), capturing 5 marines who are cutting logs. They are carried off toward Florida, pursued by Carr's soldiers and a band of Yamacraw warriors under Chief Toonahowi. The raiders are overtaken the next day on the north side of the Saint Johns River; 5 are killed, and the captives are released. Toonahowi dies during this fight.

MAY 3, 1744. Elderly Jean-Baptiste Louis Le Prévost, Seigneur du Quesnel and governor of French

Île Royale (Cape Breton, Canada), learns of France's declaration of war while at his stronghold of Louisbourg, so he begins organizing an expedition to reconquer some of his country's lost territories.

MAY 23, 1744. Boston learns of the outbreak of Anglo-French hostilities back in Europe. That same day farther northeast, a French expedition quits Louisbourg under 37-year-old captain Joseph-François du Pont Duvivier. The force consists of 139 soldiers and 212 sailors aboard the privateer Succès of 58-year-old Pierre Morpain (now capitaine de brûlot or "fire-ship captain" in France's Royal Navy), plus another sloop under Captain Doloboratz, a supply sloop, and 14 fishing smacks. It is their intent to eradicate the English frontier outpost of Canso (Nova Scotia).

Duvivier arrives in Canso's fog-shrouded roadstead next dawn, catching its English garrison—four incomplete companies of Lt. Gen. Richard Phillip's 40th Regiment, 87 ill-trained soldiers under Capt. Patrick Heron—completely off guard. The French bombard Canso's blockhouse, and Heron immediately surrenders; Lieutenant Ryall's Royal Navy sloop resists a bit longer out in the harbor before striking. The fortifications are then demolished, and Canso's buildings are set ablaze before Duvivier retires into Louisbourg with more than 100 prisoners.

JUNE 2, 1744. News of the war with France reaches Antigua, prompting numerous Royal Navy warships and English privateers to put to sea for prizes. Dispatches are also sent to Jamaica, arriving eight days later.

JULY 11, 1744. At the urging of Governor du Quesnel in Louisbourg, 37-year-old French missionary Abbé Jean-Louis Le Loutre convinces the Micmac Indians to rise up against the English outpost of Annapolis Royal (Nova Scotia). The outpost's 60-year-old lieutenant governor, garrison commander, and former Huguenot refugee Paul Mascarene discovers 300 natives six miles from his walls, poised to attack. He musters 75 effectives (out of approximately 100 soldiers) and the next morning repels this Micmac assault.

The warriors then remain outside his ramparts until July 16, when they withdraw toward Minas upon the arrival of the 14-gun Massachusetts provincial snow Prince of Orange under 61-year-old captain Edward Tyng, bearing 70 reinforcements.

AUGUST 1744. Rioting occurs in Puebla (Mexico).

AUGUST 2, 1744. The English merchant captain William Kinghill appears off Portobelo to demand the return of one of his ships. When it is not forthcoming, he batters the Panamanian port with a prolonged bombardment.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1744. Duvivier appears off Annapolis Royal from Louisbourg with 50 French troops, 160 Micmac, and 70 Malecite warriors, having approached overland via Chignecto and Minas. The English garrison has meanwhile been further augmented from Massachusetts and now numbers 250 well-armed troops. Duvivier therefore masks his army's small numbers, deceiving Mascarene into believing he is being besieged by a much larger force, while simultaneously hoping that the French 64-gun warship Ardent—which has reached Louisbourg on August 16 with a damaged bowsprit—can be repaired in time to lead a seaborne pincer movement against Annapolis Royal.

Unable to effect anything more against his entrenched foes, Duvivier opens negotiations with Mascarene on September 15, supposedly arranging terms for its capitulation. But this truce is cancelled on September 23, and the garrison's morale lifted when a New England brigantine and sloop arrive in Annapolis Basin on the 26th, bringing 50 Pig-wacket allies under 35-year-old captain John Gorham. Duvivier is then informed on October 2 that the Ardent will not join him, so he reluctantly lifts his siege and retires toward Minas a few days later.

OCTOBER 12, 1744. Off Martinique, five ships of Commodore Knowles's blockading squadron drive the 24-gun French Stanislas of Saint Malo ashore under the Anse d'Arlet batteries, setting it ablaze. A Spanish governor designate traveling as a passenger and three crewmen are killed.

OCTOBER 20, 1744 (O.S.). Jamaica is struck by a hurricane that drives eight warships and 96 merchantmen ashore, while inflicting heavy material damage upon Port Royal, Kingston, and Savanna-la-Mar.

OCTOBER 28, 1744. In Boston, 49-year-old governor William Shirley declares war against the Micmac and Malecite tribes for having aided Duvivier in his assault upon Annapolis Royal.

LATE OCTOBER 1744. Spanish admiral de Torres departs Havana with the ships of the line Glorioso, Castilla, and Europa, the frigate Flecha, as well as the merchantmen Perfecta and Brillante, transporting 8 million pesos in bullion across to La Coruña in Spain by January 2, 1745. Three weeks later, Philip V ennobles him as Marqués de Matallana de Val Madrigal and promotes him to commander in chief of Spain's Mediterranean fleet for having successfully eluded the Royal Navy's blockade with this treasure.

NOVEMBER 11, 1744. Simon Potter's privateer Prince Charles, bearing a commission from Gov. William Green of Rhode Island, appears off the Oyapock River mouth (eastern French Guiana) to take on water. Realizing that the 12 defenders of this isolated outpost are still unaware of any outbreak of hostilities, Potter disembarks three-dozen men and overruns Fort Saint-Louis, ransacking its surrounding district before making off with booty and seven prisoners.

A subsequent attempt to land 20 men from a pair of boats to burn some sugar plantations at Macouria, near the capital of Cayenne, is repelled, resulting in the death of 2 of Potter's privateersmen plus 7 captured.

DECEMBER 5, 1744. Commodore Warren returns to Barbados with the 44-gun frigate Launceston, capturing the 6-gun French privateer sloop Marie-Charlotte from Martinique as he arrives.

DECEMBER 28, 1744. Louisbourg's 400-man garrison—many of them Swiss mercenaries of the Karrer Regiment—mutiny against back pay and other injustices and are appeased by the new acting governor, 66-year-old Louis du Pont, Sieur Duchambon (his predecessor du Quesnel died on October 9).

MARCH 24, 1745. Reacting to Duvivier's Nova Scotia offensives the previous summer, Governor Shirley of Massachusetts has spent the ensuing winter raising financing for a counterexpedition against the main French stronghold of Louisbourg. Having assembled a sizable force, Shirley dispatches the provincial armed vessels Prince of Orange of 14 guns, Boston Packet of 12, and Fame of 24 by March 24 to prowl off Cape Breton in anticipation of an impending attack. The hired vessels Molineux of 24 guns, Caesar of 14, and 400-ton provincial frigate Massachusetts of 22 guns follow on the 27th, while the next day the 10-gun Resolute and 6-gun Bonetta also depart toward Canso, where this expedition is to rendezvous.

APRIL 4, 1745. At 4:00 this Sunday afternoon, 2,800 New England volunteers under the 50-year-old militia lieutenant general William Pepperrell—a merchant originally from Kittery, Maine—and the militia brigadier general Samuel Waldo set sail aboard 51 transports from Boston, escorted by the 24-gun Shirley, to launch a counterstrike against French Louisbourg. They are followed by a second contingent of 200 more New Englanders two days later.

APRIL 6, 1745. French reinforcements begin arriving at Martinique under a new governor general for the West Indies, 47-year-old Charles de Tubières, Chevalier de Caylus. His convoy takes six days to enter, being escorted by the 76-gun, 1,400-ton Espérance; 64-gun, 1,180-ton Northumberland (captured on May 19 of the previous year from Great Britain); the 64-gun, 1,200-ton Trident; the 64-gun, 1,050-ton Sérieux; the 50-gun, 830-ton Diamant; the 42-gun, 700-ton Aquilon; two or three frigates of 30–36 guns; two bomb vessels; and a pair of fireships.

APRIL 21, 1745. Pepperrell's New England expedition straggles into Canso (Nova Scotia) after being scattered by a storm, disembarking on the 26th to drill while awaiting Commodore Warren from the West Indies. They are to combine forces and then proceed against Louisbourg.

MAY 3, 1745. Capt. Philip Durell's 40-gun HMS Eltham reaches Canso, augmenting Pepperrell's expedition. That same morning, the new 32-gun, 500-ton French frigate Renommée of 42-year-old captain Guy François de Coëtnempren, Comte de Kersaint—unable to approach Louisbourg's harbor four days earlier because of dangerous ice—appears off Pope's Harbour, chasing the Rhode Island guard sloop Tartar.

Next day, the galley Shirley of Capt. John Rouse, the snow Prince of Wales, and a privateer are detached from the main English body to assist the Tartar, although the sloop successfully eludes its larger French opponent and returns by April 25 (O.S.). The Renommée meanwhile retreats back out into the Atlantic for France.

MAY 4, 1745. Warren reaches Canso from Antigua with the 60-gun HMS Superbe under the flag captain Thomas Somers, the 44-gun Launceston of Warwick Calmady, and the 44-gun Mermaid of James Douglas to assist in Pepperrell's forthcoming campaign against French Acadia. Without wasting time going ashore to visit with his old friend Pepperrell, Warren instructs his men-of-war to proceed directly toward Louisbourg and institute a blockade.

MAY 7, 1745. The 18-gun French privateer Saint Jean de Luz of Capt. Janson Dufoure picks its way through ice floes into Louisbourg, reporting that the previous day it has been chased by a trio of New England vessels. This is Governor Duchambon's first inkling of an impending enemy assault. Next day, the city's warning gun is fired, and the militia companies fall in when English blockaders begin intercepting incoming coasters—among them the 14-gun, 160-ton provision ship Marie de Grâce of Captain La Perrelle du Gauran, taken on May 10 by the Molineux.

MAY 10, 1745. Between 5:00 and 6:00 a.m., Pepperrell and militia Major Gen. Roger Wolcott's 100 sail get under way from Canso, standing northeastward and escorted by Massachusetts, the brig Boston Packet, and the 8-gun provincial snow Lord Montague. A separate contingent of 270 New Hampshire volunteers has already departed some days earlier under veteran colonel Jeremiah Moulton (see "Spring 1724" entry in "Turmoil") to seize the advance French outpost of Port Toulouse (today Saint Peter's, Nova Scotia) and then rejoin the main force before Louisbourg. Two companies of colonials also remain at Canso under Ammi Cutter.

MAY 11, 1745. Louisbourg. By 8:00 a.m., Pepperrell's expedition begins rendezvousing with Warren's blockading squadron off Gabarus Bay, and three hours later, the 7th Massachusetts Regiment's lieutenant colonel John Gorham leads a company of Indian rangers in an attempted disembarkation at Flat Point Cove. This landing is repelled by 20 French soldiers, obliging the invaders to land two miles farther west at Anse de la Coromandière (today Kennington Cove).

Rattled, Governor Duchambon belatedly sends 80 French volunteers out of Louisbourg, but their leader, Morpain, is unable to contain the hundreds of New Englanders now streaming ashore. His force suffers a half-dozen killed and a like number captured—including Morpain's second-in-command, the veteran Antoine Le Poupet de La Boularderie—without stemming the enemy onrush. By early afternoon, the first of 2,000 English colonials arrive within a mile and a quarter of Louisbourg's western ramparts and are fired upon by its batteries. Duchambon orders his gates closed at 4:00 p.m., and the city becomes besieged.

That night, 200 French troops and civilians under François Nicolas de Chassin de Thierry abandon the detached Grand Battery and retire undetected from this strong defensive emplacement into Louisbourg. Pepperrell himself comes ashore with more soldiers on the morning of May 12, and that same night—upon advice from Lt. Col. John Bradstreet of the 1st Massachusetts—sends Col. William Vaughan (a graduate of Harvard, class of 1722) with 400–500 men to probe the French defenses along the waterfront. Encountering no opposition, this force burns valuable warehouses and stores before retiring into its camp for the night. Vaughan, however, remains behind with a dozen men and the next dawn discovers that the formidable Grand Battery lies empty.

He therefore occupies it at 9:00 a.m. of May 13, beats off a feeble French sally, and by the next day the New Englanders can begin using its artillery to fire upon Louisbourg. A somewhat loose siege is thereupon imposed, Duchambon being asked on May 18 to capitulate. He refuses, still commanding 600 regulars and 900 militiamen. The New England irregulars refuse to storm Louisbourg's walls, so a protracted operation ensues—over Warren's strenuous objections. After a fortnight of artillery duels, the Rhode Island sloop Tartar of Capt. Daniel Fones captures a small French brigantine on Saturday, May 29, learning that a relief convoy is expected from France.

On the afternoon of May 30, Douglas's 44-gun HMS Mermaid sights the approaching 64-gun French Vigilant, commanded by Capt. Alexandre de la Maisonfort du Boisdecourt, Marquis de la Maisonfort and Knight of the Order of Saint Louis. Douglas lures this vessel toward the main British fleet, and by 9:00 p.m., the lone French man-of-war is overwhelmed by the combined broadsides of the vessels Superbe, Launceston, Mermaid, Eltham, Shirley, and Massachusetts. The French suffer 35 killed and 26 wounded, as opposed to only 6 casualties among the English and New England vessels. Because of heavy fog, the Vigilant cannot be boarded until next morning, when its captors find more than 500 men on board, as well as 1,000 barrels of powder, 40 cannon, and food intended for Louisbourg.

Some 400 New England volunteers under Captain Brooks attempt to storm Louisbourg's island battery just after midnight on June 6–7 but are repelled by Capt. Louis d'Aillebout, with 60 killed and 116 captured. British morale is restored by the arrival of more siege equipment on June 13 and 17, plus the capture of four French blockade runners. On June 19, the besiegers reveal the Vigilant's capture to the garrison, dashing its final hopes of relief. Just before sunset of June 26—amid massive English preparations for a combined land-sea assault the next dawn—Duchambon sends out an officer requesting terms. Louisbourg surrenders by the afternoon of June 28, its siege having cost the defenders 53 killed, as opposed to 101 New Englander deaths. Despite sending more than 1,200 volunteers back to New England by mid-September, Pepperrell is still left with a garrison of 2,250–2,600 men throughout that coming winter.

MAY 24, 1745. The 46-year-old commodore Fitzroy Henry Lee arrives at Barbados with a merchant convoy from England to assume command over the Leeward Islands station. His flag flying aboard the 70-gun Suffolk, he is accompanied by another ship of the line.

JUNE 1, 1745. Two French royal frigates of 36 and 30 guns under Captain Fouché, plus three privateers, make a descent upon the West Indian island of Anguilla, being repulsed by its militia defenders with 35 Frenchmen killed and 65 wounded.

JULY 1745. In Europe, the exiled Stuart prince Charles Edward—"Bonnie Prince Charlie" or the "Young Pretender"—lands in Scotland from France to raise the Highlands in revolt. Over the coming year, he will wage a protracted campaign to regain his title, taking Edinburgh by September 1745 and invading northern England in early December, only to have his hopes dashed when greater numbers of subjects do not rally to his side.

AUGUST 2, 1745 (O.S.). On patrol this morning outside occupied Louisbourg, the 12-gun Boston Packet of Capt. William Fletcher sights an approaching French ship. He signals the garrison and hoists false French colors to lure the strange sail closer. HMSS Chester and Sunderland are also towed out under false colors to join Fletcher.

When the British trio unmask and fire a warning shot, the arriving vessel surrenders. It is the 22-gun frigate Notre Dame de la Délivrance of Capt. Pierre Litan, which sailed from Cadiz around Cape Horn to Peru more than three years previously. Mauled on its return passage by a pair of British warships off the Azores, Litan has steered to Louisbourg for repairs. His cargo consists of £300,000 worth of gold and silver bullion, plus “cocoa, Peruvian wool, and Jesuits’ bark.” Also traveling aboard is the Spanish naval officer and scientist Ulloa, who is sent to London with his papers.

SEPTEMBER 10, 1745. The 60-year-old veteran Isaac Townsend (see “February 8, 1741” entry) arrives from Gibraltar at Barbados, now promoted to vice admiral and commanding the 80-gun Dorsetshire (flag); the 70-gun Ipswich, Lennox, and Princesa (captured five years earlier from Spain); the 60-gun Kingston, Pembroke, and Worcester; plus the 50-gun Hampshire.

Hoping to use local forces to invest French Saint Lucia, he finds upon reaching Antigua on October 2 that the English governors do not wish to lend troops for such a venture, so Townsend sorties 12 days later to blockade Guadeloupe, Dominica, and Martinique.

NOVEMBER 11, 1745. At 7:00 a.m., Townsend’s Lennox, Ipswich, the 60-gun Dreadnought, the sloop Hind, plus other lesser consorts intercept a 43-ship French convoy approaching Martinique under escort by the 53-year-old commodore Hilarion-Josselin’s (Comte Duguay) 74-gun, 1,500-ton flagship Magnanime and the smaller ship of the line Rubis. The convoy scatters, 14 of its members being captured by the English auxiliaries, while the ships of the line fight an inconclusive, long-range gun duel until next morning, when Townsend stands away toward Antigua with his prizes.

The English admiral subsequently learns that a second 80-ship convoy has parted company earlier from Duguay, sailing directly for Saint Domingue (Haiti) with the 55-year-old commodore Jean-Baptiste Macnemara’s 74-gun, 1,500-ton flagship Invincible; the 50-gun, 600-ton Jason; and the 32-gun, 440-ton frigate Atalante (sometimes mistaken as “Galante” in English reports). Consequently, Townsend detaches some of his men-of-war to reinforce Jamaica.

NOVEMBER 29, 1745. Lt. Paul Marin de La Malgue with 400 French Canadian militiamen, plus 200 Abenaki and Micmac allies, destroys Saratoga (New York), capturing 100 prisoners.

DECEMBER 26, 1745. At sunrise, a 32-ship convoy 18 days out of Port Royal (Jamaica)—bound for England and escorted by Capt. Cornelius Mitchell’s 60-gun HMSS Strafford and Plymouth, plus the 20-gun sloop Lyme—sights a 23-ship French convoy 30 miles west of Cape Saint Nicholas Mole (Cap du Môle, Haiti). The latter are making for France under the protection of Commodore Macnemara’s trio of warships. All the merchantmen scatter, leaving both naval squadrons to clash at 4:00 p.m. Mitchell engages at long range until evening, then breaks off and steers north before reversing course for Jamaica, while Macnemara returns into Saint Domingue. The Strafford suffers 5 killed and 8 wounded, the Plymouth, 8 dead and 14 injured.

(Two years later, Mitchell is court-martialed for not having attempted more during this particular affair but is eventually acquitted; see “August 8, 1746” entry.)

APRIL 1746. In Scotland, the Stuart pretender “Bonnie Prince Charlie” is defeated at Culloden near Inverness by an English army and flees back toward France this same September, never to return.

MAY 20, 1746 (O.S.). Admiral Townsend reaches the occupied fort of Louisbourg with three warships and two store-ships from England and the West Indies to relieve Warren as naval commander on that station.

JUNE 1746. The 56-year-old French commodore Hubert de Brienne, Comte de Conflans and Knight of the Order of Saint Louis, reaches Martinique with a 214-ship merchant convoy, escorted by his 78-gun, 1,500-ton flagship Terrible; the 74-gun, 1,500-ton Neptune; the 50-gun, 760-ton Alcyon; and the 46-gun, 500-ton frigate Gloire. Commodore Lee belatedly takes up station to blockade this French island, retiring empty-handed by July 3. Conflans thereupon sails again that very same day, guiding a significant portion of his charges on to Saint Domingue (Haiti).

JUNE 2, 1746 (O.S.). Commodore Knowles arrives at Louisbourg to relieve Warren as its governor 12 days later. When Warren and Pepperrell sail for Boston on June 16 (O.S.), they encounter a dispatch vessel at sea bringing news of a projected invasion of French Canada.

AUGUST 8, 1746. The 14-gun English sloop Drake of Cmdr. Edward Clark sights Conflans's four French warships off southwestern Saint Domingue, beginning their homeward leg with 93 West Indians. The Drake hastens northward and advises Commodore Mitchell four days later, who is cruising off Cape Saint Nicholas Mole (Cap du Môle, Haiti) with his 60-gun Strafford (flag), Lennox of Peter Lawrence, Plymouth of Digby Dent, and Worcester of Thomas Andrews, as well as the 24-gun frigate Seahorse. (The 44-gun Milford of Capt. Edward Rich also joins shortly thereafter.)

Mitchell steers for the French, coming within sight of Conflans's host by 3:00 p.m. of August 14. Unable to overtake in the faint breezes, the English commodore stands away northward, apparently to prevent the French convoy from slipping past and exiting the Windward Passage in the darkness. But the next day, Mitchell continues to maneuver for the weather gauge rather than bear down, thus allowing Conflans further respite. The English commodore still hesitates on August 16 and eventually allows the French to regain Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien), losing only a single merchantman to the Drake.

When Mitchell returns into Port Royal (Jamaica) on August 30, he is greeted by a storm of protest and a few weeks later is court-martialed and cashiered. Conflans has meanwhile departed Cap François after only a fortnight's stay, conducting his convoy safely into Brest by October—capturing the 50-gun HMS Severn en route.

AUTUMN 1746. The Mohawk chieftain Theyanoguin (also known as "White Head" or "Hendrick") visits French Gov. Charles de Beauharnois at Montreal, receiving gifts to remain neutral in the war.

Nevertheless, Theyanoguin and his warriors attack some French carpenters at Isle La Motte (Vermont) upon their homeward journey, so a raiding party is sent to kidnap him next spring. The Mohawk leader preempts this attempt with a large war band, which strikes at various points along the Saint Lawrence near Montreal before being dispersed by French forces under Louis de La Corne and Jacques Legardeur de Saint Pierre.

SEPTEMBER 10, 1746. French Counterstrike. The 37-year-old lieutenant general and admiral Jean-Baptiste Louis Frédéric de La Rochefoucauld de Roye, Duc d'Anville, arrives off Nova Scotia with his flagship Northumberland; the 64-gun vice-flagship Trident, Ardent, Mars, and Alcide; the 62-gun, 1,150-ton Borée and 62-gun, 1,100-ton Léopard; the 60-gun Caubon; the 56-gun, 850-ton Mercure and 56-gun, 830-ton Diamant; the 50-gun, 800-ton Tigre; the 30-gun, 490-ton frigate Mégère; the 26-gun, 650-ton flûtes or supply-ships Argonaute and Prince d'Orange; three bomb vessels; plus approximately 60 transports bearing 3,500 troops. His orders are to free Louisbourg, drive the English invaders from Acadia, then ravage the New England coastline as far as Boston.

However, his fleet is scattered by a storm three days later, and only some battered ships stagger into Chebucto Bay (modern Halifax) with their commander on September 17. More will arrive within the next two weeks, but 2,300 of his soldiers and sailors will die from scurvy and smallpox while at anchor. D'Anville himself collapses from a fit of apoplexy "while walking on his forecandle deck" on the morning of September 25 and succumbs two days later. He is replaced by the melancholy 55-year-old rear admiral Constantin Louis d'Estourmel, Knight of the Orders of Malta and Saint Louis (as well as commander of Trident), who, because of an attempted suicide on September 30, is quickly superseded by the more dynamic, 61-year-old rear admiral Pierre Jacques Taffanel de la Jonquière, d'Anville's original flag captain aboard the Northumberland (and also Canada's newly designated governor general).

Faced with the fact that thousands of his men are unfit for duty, de la Jonquière sets up camps ashore to tend to them and obtain fresh provisions. On October 2, a New England prize is taken outside Chebucto Bay, bearing dispatches revealing that Vice Adm. Lestock is to arrive soon in these waters with a large fleet. De la Jonquière therefore decides to pare down the size of his own force and instead assail the smaller English garrison at Annapolis Royal in conjunction with an overland offensive by 38-year-old Capt. Jean-Baptiste Nicolas Roch de Ramezay.

As a result, four transports are detached toward Quebec City on October 10 under escort by the frigate Renommée of Captain de Kersaint. Two days later, the French rear admiral burns his most crippled ships and English prizes in what will later become known as Bedford Basin, thus exiting next day with a reduced force. Reports nonetheless indicate that, of his 7,000 remaining sailors and soldiers, 2,274 are still listed as sick.

On October 11, de Ramezay appears two miles above Annapolis Royal with fewer than 700 French Canadian militiamen and native allies and encamps to await de la Jonquière's appearance. But as his fleet is rounding Cape Sable to circle into the Bay of Fundy, it is again struck by a storm and obliged to retreat back into Chebucto Bay without ever coming within sight of its objective. The discouraged rear admiral then lands his remaining troops and decides not to assume office as Canada's governor general but, instead, to steer his shattered expedition back toward Brest on October 26. De Ramezay withdraws from outside Annapolis Royal by November 3.

NOVEMBER 29, 1746. Lee's blockading squadron sights a recently arrived French convoy north of Martinique, sailing west toward Saint Domingue and escorted by Commo. Emmanuel Auguste de Cahideuc, Comte Dubois de la Motte and Knight of the Order of Saint Louis, with his 74-gun flagship Magnanime and the 48-gun, 650-ton frigate Étoile. HMSS Suffolk, Dreadnought, the 50-gun Sutherland, and the 44-gun Gosport give chase, skirmishing against the French escorts and snapping up six merchantmen, while the rest of this convoy scatters into the night. Dubois de la Motte eventually reaches Cap François (modern Cap-Haïtien) with his surviving charges.

MID-DECEMBER 1746. After having reinforced Louisbourg (Nova Scotia), Lt. Col. Arthur Noble and his 500-man 2nd Massachusetts Militia Regiment advances into the Minas region to occupy it unopposed during the winter. Noble himself establishes his headquarters in the town of Grand Pré by New Year's Day (O.S.), while Captain de Ramezay and his 680 men winter on the distant Chignecto Peninsula.

FEBRUARY 12, 1747. Hoping to surprise Noble's garrison at Grand Pré (Nova Scotia), de Ramezay detaches a column of 236 French Canadian raiders and 50 Micmac warriors under his second-in-command, Capt. Nicolas Antoine Coulon de Villiers. After a stealthy approach, they attack the occupied town at 3:00 a.m. on the morning of January 31 in a raging snowstorm. The 500 Massachusetts militiamen are caught utterly unprepared and about 70 are slain, some still in their beds. Noble and his younger brother, Ens. Francis Noble, are among the dead, so command of the defeated regiment falls to Benjamin Goldthwait. He and other survivors are repatriated to Annapolis Royal.

APRIL 5, 1747. While cruising 20 miles northwest of Cape Saint Nicholas Mole (Cap du Môle, Haiti), Commo. Digby Dent's 60-gun Lennox, Plymouth, and Worcester pursue a French convoy steering south from Cap François into the Bight of Léogâne. Its naval escort under Dubois de la Motte—the 74-gun flagship Magnanime, the 64-gun Alcide, and the 54-gun, 900-ton Arc-en-Ciel—turns to give battle, leaving the seven merchantmen protected by the frigate Étoile.

Action erupts shortly past noon, both formations crisscrossing repeatedly throughout the afternoon and firing as their courses intersect. At 4:00 p.m., the Lennox's foremast topples, compelling it to bring to and halting the engagement altogether when Dubois de la Motte subsequently retires back toward his convoy. The Plymouth has suffered 2 killed and 9 wounded; the Lennox, 11 dead and 25 injured; the Worcester, 4 killed and 5 wounded, allowing the French convoy to escape into Petit Goâve. Dent returns into Port Royal (Jamaica) by April 10 to refit and reprovision.

APRIL 25, 1747. Commo. Edward Legge arrives at Barbados with the 70-gun Captain, plus the 60-gun Dragon and Sunderland, escorting a 44-ship English convoy. A few days later, he proceeds to Antigua, relieving Lee as commander in chief. Legge is unpopular with his crews, and the council on that island has also complained to London of Legge's "drunkenness, incivility, and neglect of duty."

But Legge himself will sicken and die by September 19 (O.S.). Before this news can be carried to England, however, he is elected as a member of Parliament for Portsmouth.

MAY 2, 1747. Dubois de la Motte departs Petit Goâve (Haiti) with a 163-ship convoy for France. He will be intercepted outside Brest by Anson and lose 48 of his charges.

LATE JUNE 1747. The 70-gun, 1,900-ton Spanish warship Glorioso exits Havana under its 47-year-old captain Pedro Messía de la Cerda, Knight of the Order of San Juan (who will later succeed his father as Marqués de la Vega de Armijo). Although the ship was completed in the Havana yards seven years previously, this is only the Glorioso's second significant voyage. With 4 million pesos in silver bullion aboard, plus a million pesos in merchandise, as well as 760 crewmen and passengers, it hopes to speed across the Atlantic through the British blockade.

The tall and powerful Spanish warship encounters HMSS Warwick of 60 guns and the frigate Lark of 44 guns escorting a merchant convoy past the Azores on the afternoon of July 25 and fights its way past them by nightfall. Another 60-gun English warship and two frigates are engaged off Finisterre on the morning of August 14, before the damaged Glorioso slips into nearby Corcubión two days later to unload the royal treasure.

When the Glorioso emerges on October 10 to attempt to gain La Coruña, contrary winds oblige Messía to veer around and run south for Cadiz. Intercepted seven days later off Cape Saint Vincent by four English privateers under Commo. Hovenden Walker, the Glorioso mauls the frigates King George and Prince Frederick before other Royal Navy vessels begin to close in. HMS Dartmouth of 50 guns explodes the next day during its engagement, only 14 crewmen being rescued. Finally, Messía surrenders after another six-hour battle on October 19 against the 80-gun HMS Russell of Capt. Matthew Buckle, which leaves 33 dead and 130 wounded aboard the Glorioso. Despite losing his ship, the audacious traverse and safe delivery of the king's treasure will win Messía promotion and new titles. Eventually, he will become viceroy of New Granada (modern Colombia).

AUGUST 13, 1747. A force of Zamboes and English baymen from the Mosquito Coast capture, ransack, and destroy Fort San Fernando at Matina (Costa Rica).

JANUARY 8, 1748. Knowles—recently promoted to rear admiral and designated to command the Jamaica station—returns to Barbados from Louisbourg and Boston with HMSS Canterbury, Norwich, Lark, Fowey, and the sloop Achilles, escorting a merchant convoy. After cruising briefly with Capt. George Pocock (acting commodore in the Lesser Antilles since the death of Legge), Knowles reaches Port Royal by February 7.

LATE JANUARY 1748. The Spanish corsair Felipe López de la Flor departs Honduras to raid the English establishments at Roatán, Belize, and Yucatán.

FEBRUARY 17, 1748. Knowles quits Port Royal with 240 of Governor Trelawney's Jamaican troops aboard his 80-gun, 1,350-ton, 600-man flagship Cornwall under Capt. Richard Chadwick, as well as the 70-gun, 1,224-ton, 480-man Elizabeth of Polycarpus Taylor; the 60-gun, 1,000-ton, 400-man Plymouth of Digby Dent, Strafford of James Rentone, Warwick of Thomas Innes, and Worcester of Thomas Andrews; the 58-gun, 1,117-ton, 400-man Canterbury of David Brodie; the 50-gun, 767-ton, 300-man Oxford of Edmund Toll; plus the 6-gun, 100-man sloops Weazel and Merlin.

This expedition intends to attack Santiago de Cuba, but contrary winds prevent Knowles from beating northward, so he instead steers for Port Saint Louis (modern Les Cayes, Haiti). After watering in Tiburón Bay on March 9, then pausing at Ile à Vache to reorganize their landing forces, the English are prepared for battle.

MARCH 22, 1748. Port Saint Louis. Shortly before midday, HMS Elizabeth leads Knowles's squadron into this Haitian harbor, completely surprising its defenders. An imposing 78-gun island castle guards its roadstead, manned by 310 troops and a company of black gunners under Gov. Étienne Cochard de Chastenoye behind 24-foot-high stone walls. The first French guns open fire at 12:05 p.m., but Knowles's ships remain silent until all can anchor beneath the western and northern ramparts, letting fly with their broadsides simultaneously. A heated exchange then ensues over the next three hours, during which the defenders send a fireship down from the inner roadstead, compelling the Elizabeth to cut its cable and warp out of danger.

The remaining Royal Navy ships maintain such fierce pressure, however, that Chasteanoye sends an officer out at 3:00 p.m. to suggest terms. Knowles makes a counteroffer, and a half hour later the French commander accepts, his garrison having suffered 160 casualties, as opposed to 19 killed and 60 wounded among the British warships. The town and four anchored vessels are seized. Port Saint Louis's castle is dismantled and blown up, after which Knowles stands away on March 30, again hoping to assault Santiago de Cuba.

After pausing in Tiburón Bay to take on water once more, he continues north on April 5.

APRIL 8, 1748. Santiago de Cuba. This afternoon, Knowles sights Cuba, his fleet consisting of the vessels Plymouth, Cornwall, Canterbury (flag), Elizabeth, Knowles's warships pound the harbor castle guarding Port Saint Louis. (National Maritime Museum, London)

Strafford, Warwick, Worcester, Lennox, plus the smaller consorts Vainqueur, Vulture, and Sharp (tender). Dent's Plymouth, which has been selected to lead the attack, has earlier reconnoitered Santiago's entrance. Faint winds prevent the English from rushing its mouth the next morning, instead leaving them becalmed within view of the Spaniards—whose governor, Brigadier General Arcos Moreno, immediately orders a 200-ton ship warped out of the inner bay to support a 10-inch cable stretched from shore to shore.

When a breeze finally springs up that same afternoon, the Plymouth guides the squadron toward its entrance, only to sheer off when a chain is sighted in addition to the cable. Next day, April 10, Knowles gives up and shifts his flag back aboard the Cornwall, detaching vessels on independent cruises and then leading the remainder back to Jamaica, where he presses charges against Dent for not having burst the boom (who is eventually exonerated).

JULY 1748. A second raid by the Honduran corsair Felipe López de la Flor against the English logwood establishments in Belize ends badly when his vessel is ambushed from a cliff-top. The Hundurans suffer 3 killed, 11 wounded, and 1 captured.

JULY 10, 1748. News of the cessation of Anglo-French hostilities reaches Knowles at Jamaica, which induces him to lead his squadron into the Gulf of Mexico and take up station off Florida's Tortuga Bank in hopes of intercepting a Spanish treasure fleet between Veracruz and Havana before peace is concluded with this nation as well.

LATE AUGUST 1748. Knowles quits Port Royal (Jamaica) with his flagship Cornwall, with the vessels Canterbury, Tilbury, Strafford, Oxford, and a sloop tender, to await Mexican treasure ships off the Tortuga Bank.

OCTOBER 2, 1748. Learning of Knowles's presence off Florida, 56-year-old Spanish vice admiral Andrés Reggio Branciforte Saladino y Colonna, Knight Grand Cross of the Order of San Genaro and commander in chief at Havana, reluctantly puts to sea with his 74-gun, 710-man flagship Africa (officially designated as San Francisco de Asís) under Capt. Juan Antonio de la Colina and vice-flagship Invencible (also called San José) under Rear Adm. Benito Antonio de Spínola or Espínola; the 64-gun, 610-man Conquistador (official name: Jesús, María y José) of Tomás de San Justo, Dragón of Manuel de Paz, Nueva España of Fernando Varela, and Real Familia of Marcos Forestal; plus the 36-gun, 300-man privateer frigate Galga of Pedro de Garaycochea. Reggio's crews have been supplemented by a military regiment and numerous conscripts, his squadron moreover being accompanied by a brigantine and xebec.

The Spanish squadron edges away from Cuba, patrols sweeping the horizon before them, until they capture a British sloop on October 4 that reveals to the admiral that Knowles now has nine of the line with him rather than five. This information causes Reggio to retreat toward Havana, arriving by October 6 and remaining hove-to a dozen miles offshore.

OCTOBER 11, 1748. At dawn, Reggio's squadron sights a mass of sails coming up over the western horizon. By noon, a frigate signals that it is a homeward-bound English convoy out of Jamaica, consisting of several score merchantmen protected by a large and a small Royal Navy escort. Reggio orders a general chase, and both his warships and their prey scatter in every direction. The convoy commander is Capt. Charles Holmes, whose flagship Lennox is so old and decrepit that it has had 18 of its 74 guns removed. He vainly tries to protect his charges, even exchanging a few shots with the Galga, before turning northwest to advise Knowles that the Spaniards are at sea.

Coming upon the admiral that same evening off the Tortuga Keys, Holmes's report prompts Knowles to immediately begin beating upwind toward Havana with seven ships.

OCTOBER 12, 1748. Knowles's Action. Just before dawn, both squadrons sight each other east of the Cuban capital, on converging courses. Reggio's formation is regrouping after pursuing the Jamaican convoy the previous day (during which they have captured the merchantmen Julius Caesar, Mary, Gloucester, and Queen of Hungary). Upon spotting his enemy, Knowles orders his warships to rear around and form a line of battle; Reggio mistakes this evolution as more merchantmen fleeing from his squadron, so he races north. Sunrise reveals the heavy English two-deckers, so at 7:00 a.m. the startled Spanish admiral orders his lead ships Africa, Invencible, Conquistador, and Galga to wear round and unite with the Dragón, Nueva España, and Real Familia, which are coming up from astern.

Knowles signals his own squadron to tack toward the Spaniards, who remain clumped together but who sail away under easy canvas while the English experience difficulty closing the five or six miles in between because of light winds. Through faulty signal reading, the English line becomes disjointed, the Warwick, Oxford, and Canterbury lagging two miles astern of Knowles's flagship while the Tilbury and the Strafford surge a mile ahead. Thus, rather than bearing down upon the Spaniards en masse, the English approach piecemeal.

When the Spanish commander in chief orders the privateer Galga out of his line, Knowles does the same with the Oxford so as to have a reserve to aid any English warship that becomes hard-pressed.

Between 1:00 and 2:00 p.m. the wind picks up, so that the Royal Navy squadron gains. As the Tilbury creeps three-quarters of a mile off the Spanish line, shots ring out from Reggio's center. The range is too great for accuracy and no hits are scored, but when some of the Tilbury's guns respond, Knowles grudgingly signals his two van vessels to open fire, while steering directly toward the enemy flagship accompanied by the Lennox. The Cornwall holds its fire until shortly after 4:00 p.m. when it comes within pistol-shot range. It then crashes an opening broadside into Reggio's Africa. Ahead, the Strafford pours salvos into the Conquistador, while the Lennox joins the action from astern. Within an hour, the Conquistador is battered out of the Spanish line, its captain and two lieutenants being dead, and it surrenders to the Strafford, which then plunges into the smoke searching for another opponent. The British flagship also sheers out of the line, its main topmast head felled by a round from the Africa, and is quickly replaced in the British line by the Canterbury coming up from astern.

When the Warwick finally appears ready to overtake them by 5:30 p.m., Spanish resolve collapses. Low on ammunition, every Spanish ship attempts to save itself, the Strafford and the Canterbury clinging to the huge Africa, while the Tilbury and the Oxford pursue the vice-flag Invencible (the other Spanish warships limp off into the night, with the Lennox and the Warwick lagging far astern). By 9:00 p.m., the Invencible appears silenced, but its English attackers are too weak to prevent its escape. The same occurs with the Spanish flagship; the Strafford and the Canterbury pound the Africa until its main- and mizzen-masts fall, but the Royal Navy pair are too crippled to maneuver and so break off at 11:00 p.m. to begin setting up jury-rigging and claw back out to sea. Spanish casualties aboard their five surviving ships are more than 150 dead, plus a like number seriously wounded.

Next morning, the victors reassemble before Havana with their prize Conquistador. Most Royal Navy vessels have sustained some damage, so this day is spent effecting repairs. Early the following day (October 14), Knowles takes part of his squadron to windward, searching for the crippled Africa, which he finds at 4:00 p.m. on the 15th, dismasted and helpless in a small unguarded bay 25 miles east of Havana. When the Spaniards perceive the English warships standing in, they cut the Africa's cables and set it afire, sending it drifting ashore to blow up one hour later.

Knowles returns before Havana, preparing to follow up his victory by waylaying the Mexican treasure ships; but on October 16, a sloop approaches out of the west bearing news from Cadiz that peace preliminaries have been signed between London and Madrid back in Europe. Disappointed, Knowles deposits his prisoners ashore, then makes off toward Port Royal with the Conquistador.

(Bitter recriminations eventually lead to court-martial and even duels once this squadron regains England next year. The Spaniards, in contrast, exonerate Reggio after an inquiry in July 1749, investing him as Knight Grand Cross in the Order of San Juan de Jerusalem and giving him command of the Cadiz fleet, where he remains until his death 31 years later.)

Late in October 1748, the small Spanish frigate Industria of Ens. Antonio José Posadas reaches Cartagena with copies of the official peace, thus marking an end to the War of Jenkins's Ear.

SPANISH AMERICAN DISTURBANCES (1748–1754)

Oblivious to the general peace achieved in Europe, localized frictions continue in Spain's New World colonies, especially in the remote hinterlands of South America.

DECEMBER 1748. Capt. José de Escandón quits Querétaro (Mexico) with 750 troops and 2,000 colonists to establish a new Spanish colony amid the nomadic Tamaulipa Indians. After following a route through Los Pozos, San Luis de la Paz, Santa María del Río, San Luis Potosí, and Tula, his expedition enters Tamaulipa territory and sets down new settlements. De Escandón returns into Querétaro the next year, being ennobled as Conde de la Sierra Gorda and created a knight of the Order of Santiago for this privately financed effort.

APRIL 19, 1749. At Panaquire (Venezuela), the wealthy hacendado or "estate-owner" Juan Francisco de León leads a popular uprising against the Biscayan Company's monopolistic influence. During the blockades of the recently concluded War of Jenkins's Ear, ranchers in the Panaquire and Caucagua valleys smuggled their harvests out to Dutch Curaçao or French Martinique. When a dozen troops are sent into this region under the Biscayan Martín de Echeverría to end this practice, a violent reaction ensues.

Marching upon Caracas with several thousand adherents, de León enters the capital the next day, compelling Gov. Luis de Castellano to flee toward La Guaira two days later disguised as a friar. When no easing of the Biscayan monopoly results, de León leads a second march upon the capital on August 1, which again produces nothing.

However, a Spanish expedition under the naval officer Julián de Arriaga reaches La Guaira by November 28 to restore order and listen to local complaints. The Biscayan Company is allowed to resume operations, but on a limited scale. Two years later, Lt. Gen. Felipe Ricardos will arrive as Venezuela's new royal governor, backed by 1,200 troops. He will deport de León and five other rebel leaders to Spain aboard the man-of-war Santa Bárbara to stand trial, while also razing de León's Caracas home.

Because of a resurgence of Dutch smuggling during this interlude, the Biscayan Company will also station three new privateer sloops at Puerto Cabello, La Guaira, and the mouth of the Orinoco River in 1752.

JANUARY 13, 1750. Spain and Portugal sign the so-called Tratado de Permuta or "Treaty of Exchange," realigning the boundaries of their American empires by agreeing to an exchange of disputed territories; specifically, Colônia do Sacramento is to pass under Spanish control, while seven Jesuit "reductions" or mission towns in Ibicuy territory (a several-hundred-square-mile wedge of land east of the Uruguay River) are to pass over to Portugal. Many Spaniards are dissatisfied with this arrangement, feeling that their interests have not been upheld by their Portuguese-born queen, María Bárbara of Braganza. The Guaraní natives living along the eastern banks of the Uruguay River prove to be especially adverse, having been raided for many years by Brazilian slave-catchers known as bandeirantes. They thus fear this transfer and prepare to resist it.

JULY 6, 1750. A slave rebellion erupts on the Dutch island of Curaçao and is suppressed this same day.

SPRING 1751. The Spanish corsair José Antonio de Palma leads a Yucatecan expedition against the English logwood establishments at Belize and captures 43 interloper vessels off Río Hondo, before scattering another 57 farther upriver.

NOVEMBER 1751. An expedition of English logwood cutters plus Zamboes and Miskito Indians attack the Spanish garrison at San Felipe de Bacalar (Yucatán).

In northern Mexico that same month, the Pima Indians rise in revolt against the Spaniards and are put down the next year.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1752. After five months spent marshalling an Exército Demarcador or "Demarcation Army" in Río Grande do Sul province in southwestern Brazil, 67-year-old lieutenant general Gomes Freire de Andrade sets off at the head of 491 soldiers of his São Pedro Cavalry and Infantry Regiment; 204 of the Infantaria Velha and 104 of the Infantaria Novo regiments, as well as 189 gunners for 10 field-pieces, all from Rio de Janeiro; plus 104 men from the Santos Infantry Regiment of São Paulo. This army is to be guided by 160 local scouts in two mounted companies under Capt. Francisco Pinto Bandeira, supported by 266 teamsters and laborers for almost 6,000 horses, 1,000 oxen, and 73 wagons. After a month's progression along the shoreline, they meet at Castilhos Grande with a similar Spanish force sent from Buenos Aires by Capt. Gen. José de Andonaegui y la Plaza, Marqués de Valdelirios, and jointly begin erecting a series of border markers that stretch inland.

NOVEMBER 3, 1752. Pensacola's offshore island outpost of Santa Rosa Punta de Sigüenza is devastated by a two-day hurricane, which drives its Spanish survivors to seek refuge on the mainland. Relief soon arrives from Havana and Veracruz, but it is agreed that the fort and its town are too exposed so must be transferred deeper inside the bay. The military engineer Felipe Feringán Cortés will therefore draw up plans for a new quadrilateral stockade, with twin towers and four gates enclosing a new civilian compound.

His proposal is endorsed by the Crown and implemented in 1756 by the military engineer Agustín López de la Cámara Alta, who is supported by funds and 200 additional convict laborers from Mexico, plus 50 cavalymen and 100 women to help reinvigorate the population. The new mainland town is named San Miguel de Panzacola, and its new citadel is called Fort San Carlos.

DECEMBER 1752. The Spanish corsair Alberto José Rendón is killed in a confrontation off Belize against several English interlopers.

JANUARY 1753. As work progresses on the demarcation of the borderline between Spanish and Portuguese territories, General Andonaegui withdraws into Montevideo and Freire de Andrade moves into Colônia do Sacramento to prepare for the Portuguese outpost's transfer to Spanish rule.

FEBRUARY 26, 1753. Guaraní War. The Spanish and Portuguese surveyors marking the borderline between their territories reach Santa Tecla Chapel on the fringe of Jesuit missionary territory and the next day are barred from proceeding farther by José Sepé Tiarayú, corregidor of the nearby Guaraní town of San Miguel. He refuses to accept the transfer of his people to Portuguese rule as specified by the Treaty of Permuta (see "January 13, 1750" entry) or

Suppression of the Jesuit Order

Anger boiled in Portugal against the suspect role of the Society of Jesus in inciting Guaraní tribesmen to resist the transfer of royal authority. Pamphleteers even accused the Jesuits, a rich and powerful order, of acting like an independent fiefdom in the New World. And ominously, the Jesuits gained the enmity of Foreign Minister Sebastião José de Carvalho e Melo, who soon became the prime minister of Portugal.

Wishing to reform and modernize Portugal, Melo saw the doctrinaire order's grip on education and high society as an impediment to progress. Europe closely followed this struggle. A papal investigation into alleged Jesuit abuses was arranged by Melo with his own handpicked cardinal. This cleric pronounced the order guilty of "illicit and scandalous commerce" on May 15, 1758, therefore their properties were taken by the Crown. And when King Joseph I's carriage was fired on by assassins on the evening of September 3, Melo arrested the entire Távora family of the nobility and charged them with plotting regicide. All male members were executed, while their Jesuit confessor was burned at the stake in January 1759. The society was outlawed.

Jesuits soon were driven from France as well. Although banned from doing business like every other religious order, the society operated vast plantations on Martinique. That island's superior, Fr. Antoine La Vallette, borrowed heavily and then went bankrupt when British warships seized millions in goods at the beginning of the French and Indian War. Creditors turned to the procurator in Paris for payment but were rebuffed. They then sued and won a verdict in 1760. The society unwisely appealed to Parlement, which upheld the decision on May 8, 1761. More complaints followed, as well as attacks in the press. Parlement condemned the society to extinction on August 6, 1762, but Louis XV offered a compromise. If the French Jesuits separated from their order, the Crown would protect them. They refused, so were banished on March 9, 1764. In a larger sense, there was a growing sentiment that religious dominance was a constraint on the development of France. The king and his reform-minded ministers feared defiance from the rich, powerful society.

Other religious orders did not rally to the Jesuits' side. The immense wealth, holdings, and power held by the society also excited resentment by rulers.

to relocate them to the western banks of the Uruguay River. Although initially commanding only 68 men, the chieftain now has several hundred followers, so the outnumbered surveyors withdraw, blaming their repulse upon Jesuit machinations.

Representations are sent across the Atlantic to Madrid and Lisbon, requesting clarification of this impasse. Finally, generals Andonaegui and Freire de Andrade reconvene in March 1754 on Martín Vaz Island with orders to remove the Guaraní by force and complete the territorial realignment. The Portuguese general therefore sends a small contingent of Río Grande Dragoons up the Jacuí River from Porto Alegre to erect a small advance base named Jesus Maria José at São Lourenço Pass as a springboard for Freire de Andrade's main army. However, this outpost is taken by guile on April 29 by Sepé Tiarayú, effectively dooming the planned Portuguese offensive.

The Spanish general fares no better, marshalling 1,500 troops at Rincón de las Gallinas by May, only to struggle over impassable terrain toward the remote Guaraní ranching hamlet of Yapeyú. Torrential rains, the loss of most of his animals, and constant ambushes by the subchieftain Paracatú compel Andonaegui to turn back on August 10. Freire de Andrade manages to stagger into São Lourenço Pass by September 7, yet his exhausted army advances no further, reversing course downriver on November 18.

A renewed Hispano-Portuguese effort is not mounted until December 1755, when Freire de Andrade leads 1,200 soldiers from Río Grande to Forte São Gonçalo on the Piratini River, being joined by 1,820 Spanish troops under Andonaegui and Gov. Joaquín Viana of Montevideo for a push inland over the better-known route toward Santa Tecla. Within less than two months, their combined army enters Guaraní territory, and Sepé Tiarayú is killed by chance at Sanga da Bica (modern São Gabriel) during a nocturnal skirmish on February 7, 1756, when he is knocked from his horse by a Portuguese lancer of Col. Luiz Osório's regiment and then shot on the ground by Governor Viana.

The native leader is succeeded by the less charismatic Nicolás Ñeenguirú, corregidor of the town of Concepción. Three days afterward the invaders confront the bulk of the Guaraní rebels atop Caiboaté Hill in the mountainous country south of the Jacuí River. After giving Ñeenguirú but an hour to surrender, they advance at 2:00 p.m. to slaughter 1,511 poorly armed Indians and capture 154 in 70 minutes of lopsided fighting, during which only 3 Spaniards and 1 Portuguese are killed and 30 are wounded. The last sparks of Guaraní resistance are pitilessly annihilated at Chumieby near San Miguel on March 19, after which the army enters the empty and burning town three days later. Andonaegui begins rounding up and deporting Guaraní survivors over to the western side of the Uruguay River until June 8, when he officially cedes control of the territory to Freire de Andrade and withdraws.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1754.

A Spanish privateering expedition under José Antonio de Palma attacks the English logwood establishments at Belize, seizing numerous prizes and captives as well as burning many properties.

FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR (1754–1763)

As early as 1752, the century-and-a-half-long rivalry between French and English interests in North America provokes renewed fighting around Pickawillany on the upper Great Miami River, followed by a sweep through the upper Ohio Valley by French Canadians and their native allies, capturing or killing every English-speaking trader that they can find. Consternation grips Pennsylvania and Virginia, whose citizens consider this wilderness vital to their expansion inland from the Tidewater region—especially when it is subsequently learned that the French are building forts at the headwaters of the Allegheny River to contain any future English encroachments.

On October 31, 1753, a 21-year-old Virginia militia major named George Washington is dispatched to Fort Le Boeuf (near modern Waterford, Pennsylvania) by Gov. Robert Dinwiddie to demand that its French garrison evacuate the territory. This is refused, and Virginia retaliates by obtaining a special grant from the English Crown to build a rival fort at the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela rivers (modern Pittsburgh). But as English workmen are completing this emplacement in the spring of 1754, 500 French troops descend the Allegheny and occupy it, renaming the site Fort Duquesne. Virginia appeals to London for assistance and prepares to dispatch troops into the interior.

Although war is not yet officially declared back in Europe, this North American friction is symptomatic of other disputes developing between the French and British empires throughout the world. Hostilities soon begin to escalate, gradually evolving into a “great war for empire,” and two years later becomes intermingled with the Seven Years’ War, a separate conflict that erupted in central Germany in 1756 over completely unrelated issues.

MAY 1754. Recently promoted to lieutenant colonel and having returned up the Allegheny with 350 Virginia militiamen and backwoodsmen, Washington erects a temporary log stronghold dubbed Fort Necessity at Great Meadows (near Farmington or Confluence, Pennsylvania), 40 miles south of the French citadel of Fort Duquesne. From this advance base, the young officer presses northward with 40 men and at dawn of May 28 surprises a 30-man French outfit, killing its commander—35-year-old Ens. Joseph Coulon de Villiers de Jumonville—along with 9 others, while capturing all but one of the remainder before withdrawing.

JUNE 26, 1754. Jumonville’s older brother, 43-year-old Louis Coulon de Villiers, reaches Fort Duquesne with 600 French Canadian troops and 100 native allies to learn of his sibling’s death. Two days later, the garrison commander, Claude-Pierre Pécaudy de Contrecoeur, delegates Coulon de Villiers to a retaliatory strike against Washington’s position.

JULY 3, 1754. Coulon de Villiers’s expedition drives Washington’s troops—now reinforced by two independent companies under Captain McKay—back inside Fort Necessity, which proves to be in a poorly sited defensive position. After a nine-hour siege in heavy rain, the 400 defenders surrender at nightfall and are obliged to withdraw into their own country, promising not to build another fort upon the Ohio for another year. French casualties are 3 killed and 17 wounded.

FEBRUARY 1755. The 59-year-old, Scottish-born Edward Braddock—recently promoted to major general—arrives in Hampton Roads (Virginia) from England with a convoy escorted by the 50-gun Centurion of Capt. Augustus Keppel and Norwich of Samuel Barrington, which bears 1,000 infantrymen of the 44th and 48th regiments.

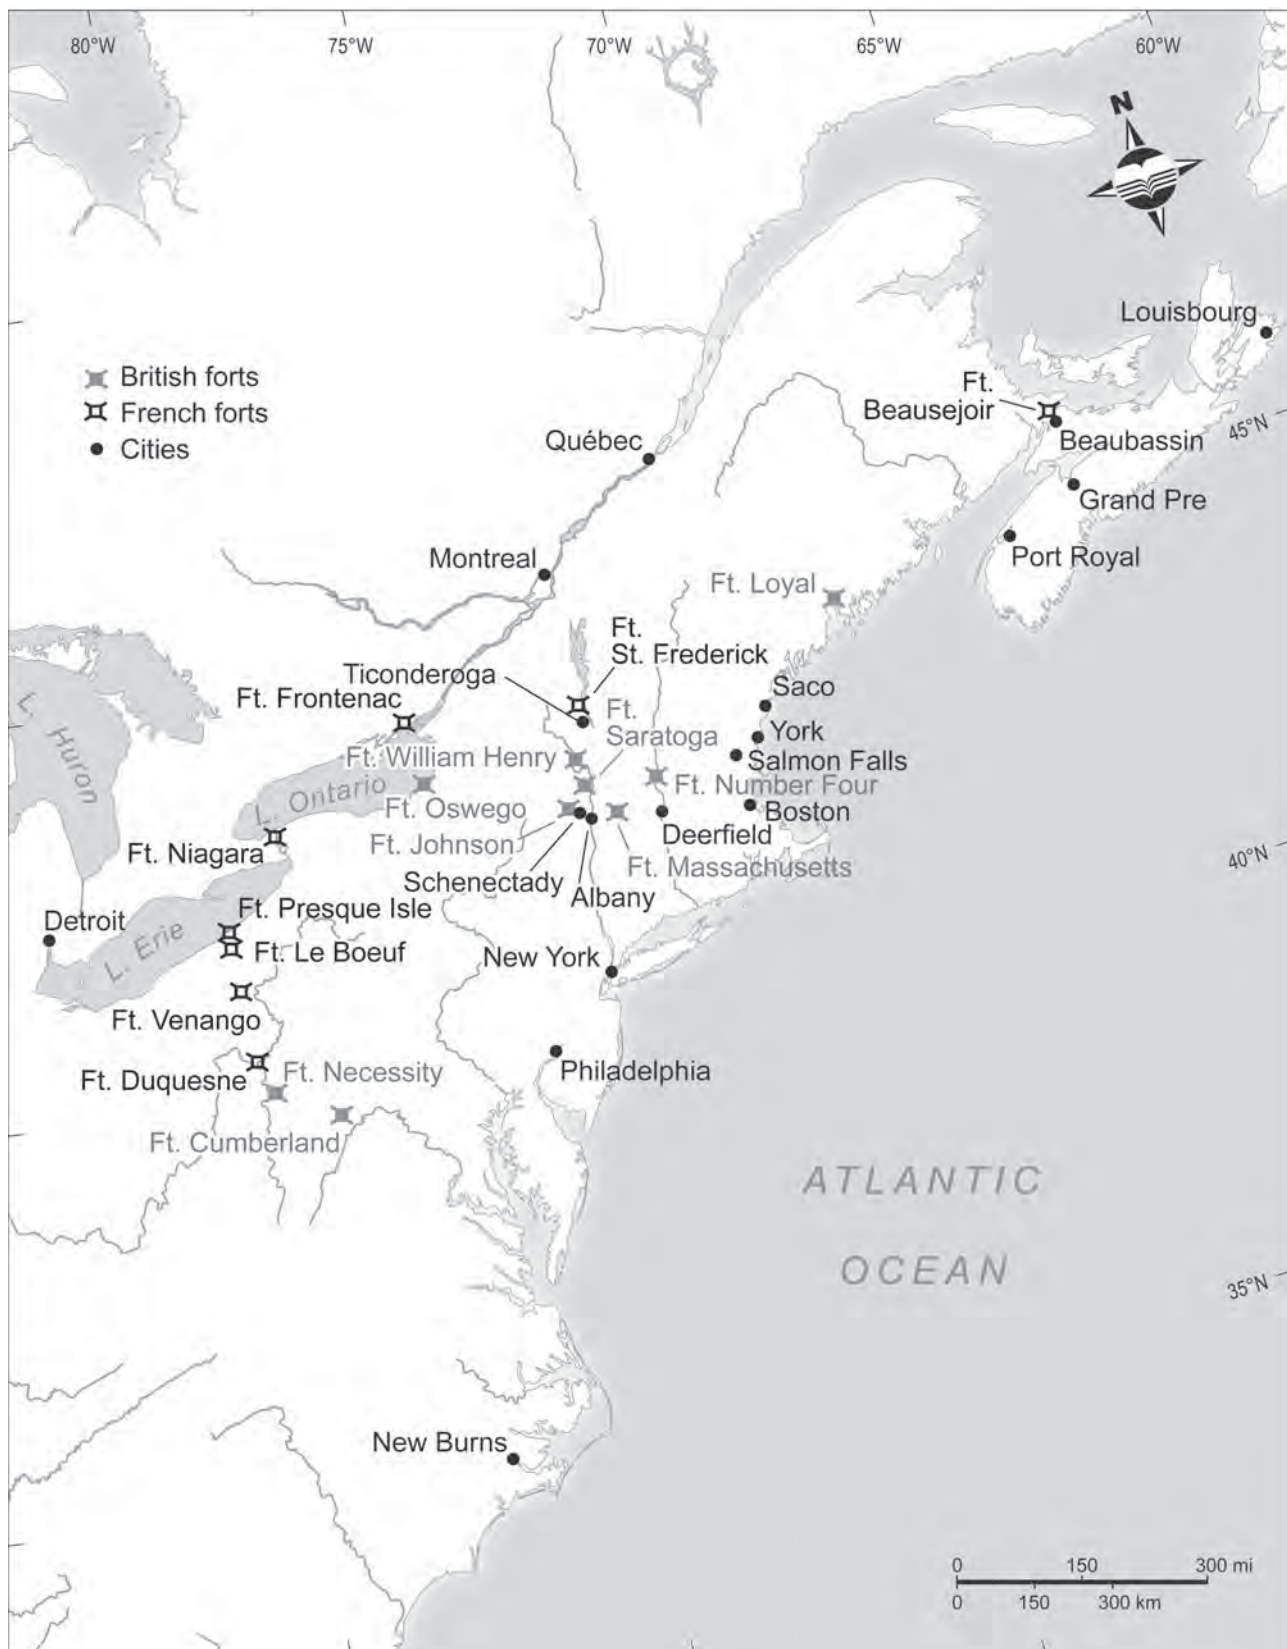

APRIL 14, 1755. The British decide upon a four-pronged offensive against the French in North America: Braddock’s regulars are to march inland and recapture Fort Duquesne (Pittsburgh); Governor Shirley of Massachusetts is to reoccupy Oswego with colonial forces, then drive toward Niagara; Commissioner William Johnson is to advance up the Hudson and take Crown Point; while Brig. Gen. Robert Monckton is to invade French Acadia (modern Nova Scotia and New Brunswick).

MAY 1755. Braddock reaches Fort Cumberland near Wills Creek with his two brigades: Lt. Col. Sir Peter Halkett commanding the 44th Foot—now 700 strong—plus 230 Virginia, New York, and Maryland Rangers, and a New York independent company; and Col. Thomas Dunbar leading 650 men of his 48th Regiment, 230 Rangers from Virginia and the Carolinas, and another New York independent company. Both units have 14 fieldpieces and 15 mortars.

JUNE 3, 1755. Bay of Fundy Campaign. After sailing northeast from Massachusetts, 2,000 Anglo-American colonials under brevet Brig. Gen. Robert Monckton and Col. John Winslow disembark under cover of Fort Lawrence (near modern Amherst, Nova Scotia) to advance across the Missaguash River and attack the principal French stronghold for the Acadia region: Fort Beauséjour (near modern Sackville, New Brunswick). Its defenders total 160 regulars under the corrupt and unpopular governor, 41-year-old captain Louis du Pont Duchambon de Vergor, Knight of the Order of Saint Louis, plus 1,200–1,500 reluctant militiamen scattered throughout the district.

Neither side is eager for battle; the British gingerly approach Fort Beauséjour and seize a nearby ridge by June 13, before opening fire with mortars into its crowded interior. The defenders’ morale soon collapses, and—faced with an Acadian mutiny—Duchambon de Vergor is compelled to capitulate to the invaders by June 16. His subordinate Benjamin Rouer de Villeray surrenders smaller Fort Gaspereau (near modern Port Elgin, New Brunswick) without a fight shortly thereafter. Determined to forever eradicate French influence from this disputed border region, the victors detain most of the Acadians over the next few weeks who have not escaped into the wilderness north of the Isthmus of Chignecto and expel them down the Atlantic Seaboard as far as Louisiana.

JUNE 6, 1755. In a further escalation of hostilities, 11 English ships of the line, a frigate, and a sloop under 43-year-old vice admiral Edward Boscawen sight 4 French ships of the line groping past fog-shrouded Newfoundland with 3,000 reinforcements for Quebec. The chase is resumed two days later, and on June 10–11, the 74-gun French Alcide of Captain Hocquart and Lys of Captain de Lorgeril—the latter's armament reduced to only 22 guns to accommodate more troops—are overtaken. HMS Torbay of the flag captain Charles Colby and HMS Dunkirk of Richard Howe subdue the former, while the Defiance under Thomas Andrews and the Fougueux of Richard Spry capture the latter.

Still, the transport Dauphin Royal eludes Boscawen's cruisers and along with another dozen ships from a scattered French convoy reaches its destination 11 days later, protected by 72-year-old rear admiral Dubois de la Motte's 74-gun flagship Entrepreneur and the Bizarre. They deposit several battalions of regulars, plus the 54-year-old, Saxon-born major general Jean Armand, Baron de Dieskau, who is to assume overall command of Canada's defenses. The English admiral meanwhile retires into Halifax by July 9 after detaching Rear Adm. Francis Holburne to blockade Louisbourg, his fleet being very sickly. (By the time Boscawen regains Britain in early November, almost 2,000 of his sailors and marines are dead.)

JUNE 25, 1755. Braddock's weary army begins reaching Little Meadows, deciding after a brief stop-over to advance upon Fort Duquesne with a 1,200-man vanguard, leaving Dunbar behind to guard the baggage train.

JULY 8, 1755. Contrecoeur, commander of the 1,600 French and Indians holding Fort Duquesne, delegates Capt. Daniel Hyacinthe Marie Liénard de Beaujeu to sortie with 250 French irregulars and 650 Indians to ambush Braddock's approaching army eight miles away at the Monongahela River crossing.

JULY 9, 1755. Braddock's Defeat. Lt. Col. Thomas Gage leads the British advance guard across the Monongahela, followed closely by Braddock with his redcoats in two columns, grenadiers on the flanks, and Virginia provincials (including Washington) bringing up the rear. Suddenly, Captain de Beaujeu rises from a nearby woods, waving his hat as a signal for his men to open fire. The French officer is killed almost instantly by the opening volleys, and many of his Canadian followers take to their heels, but the native contingent under captains Dumas and Charles Laglande fire steadily into the British ranks from their hiding places. The bewildered redcoats attempt to maintain battlefield formation, paying heavily as 63 of Braddock's 86 officers are killed or wounded, the commander himself finally falling, pierced through an arm and lung—after having five horses shot from beneath him. Out of 1,200–1,300 men, 914 become casualties, as opposed to 44 killed or wounded among the French and Indians.

Washington leads Braddock's survivors back to Gist's Plantation, where Dunbar orders the supply train destroyed to facilitate his army's retirement toward Fort Cumberland. Braddock dies of his wound on July 13 during this retreat and is buried at Great Meadows (near modern Confluence, Pennsylvania). His baggage falls into French hands, including all the plans for British offensives throughout North America.

AUGUST 8, 1755. A Franco-Indian war party ambushes a contingent of Anglo-American troops near Fort Edward (New York).

AUGUST 15, 1755. Dubois de la Motte's fleet departs Canada, eluding the British blockaders by daringly sailing through the Belle Isle Strait, thereby regaining France without mishap.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1755. When the acting Maj. Gen. William Johnson marches north from Albany with 3,000 Anglo-American colonials and 300 Mohawks (mostly from Caughnawaga, Quebec, under their elderly chieftain Theyanoguin), threatening to ally himself with native friends throughout this region and destroy Fort Saint Frédéric and ravage Franco-Canadian settlements as far as Montreal, Dieskau is sent to check him. The French general leaves part of his army in Fort Frontenac and travels down the Richelieu River, marshalling 1,500 regulars, 1,000 Canadian militiamen, and 500 Indians near the head of Lake George (the future site of Fort Carillon; today's Ticonderoga, New York).

At Johnson's base on Lac du Saint Sacrament (Fort Edward) at the southern end of the portage to the Hudson River, the English commander learns of Dieskau's deployment so decides to send a contingent 14 miles northwest to construct a fort to contain this French concentration. Dieskau learns of this countermove on September 3 and furthermore believes—mistakenly—that Johnson is left with only 500 men at Fort Edward, so he advances to engage the colonials' camp with a select corps of 200 French regulars, 600 Canadian militiamen, and about 700 Indians. But when Dieskau reaches Wood Creek on the Hudson by September 7, he learns his native allies will not storm Fort Edward's ramparts. He thus diverts his attack toward the contingent at the head of Lake George.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1755. Crown Point. Dieskau's small army advances toward this English concentration, his regulars marching along a wagon road while his militia and Indians serve as flank guards in the woods. Nearing their objective, the French learn that Johnson has detached 1,000 men under Col. Ephraim Williams and the Mohawk chieftain Theyanoguin (alias Hendrick) to hurry back and relieve Fort Edward, which the English commander in chief fears will be assaulted during his absence.

Dieskau draws his regulars up in the road and places his militia and natives in ambush along both flanks in the forest. His trap is sprung prematurely, yet nevertheless sends Williams's column reeling back toward the main English army. The colonel is killed, and 75-year-old, corpulent Theyanoguin has his horse shot out from under him, subsequently being easily run down, stabbed, and scalped. The defeated Anglo-Americans suffer 200 killed and stream back to the safety of Johnson's army, while Dieskau pursues.

But once the principal English position is confronted, French fortunes falter. Despite bravely assaulting Johnson's extemporized barricade of carts, tree trunks, overturned boats, and cannon for several hours, the battle ends in a stalemate. Dieskau is wounded three times in his legs and left propped up against a tree by his second-in-command Pierre-André de Montreuil, falling prisoner once the French retreat. Johnson claims a major victory, but in fact his thrust against Canada is halted, the invaders being left to erect Fort William Henry near this spot—to which the French counter by constructing Fort Carillon.

FEBRUARY 1756. Some 360 Canadians and Indians under Gaspard Joseph Chaussegros de Léry are sent to harass English communications between Fort Oswego on eastern Lake Ontario and Schenectady. On March 27, these raiders take Fort Bull on Oneida Lake, massacring its garrison, levelling its walls, and destroying a vast amount of stores, while maintaining steady pressure on isolated Oswego throughout the spring and early summer.

MARCH 11, 1756. At daybreak, the 60-gun HMS Warwick of Capt. Molyneux Shuldham is pursued off Martinique by the 74-gun Prudent of 58-year-old Capt. Charles Alexandre de Morell, Comte d'Aubigny. The latter ship is fresh out of France and further accompanied by the 34-gun frigate Atalante of 48-year-old Capt. Louis Charles, Comte Duchaffault de Besné, plus the frigate Zéphyr. With fewer than 300 crew members fit for duty, Shuldham attempts to flee in heavy seas, only to be overtaken and engaged off his weather quarter by the Atalante.

The Warwick's rigging is soon so cut up that, when the wind suddenly veers in a hard squall, the English warship is half swamped and the Prudent allowed to overhaul. After a half hour of one-sided shooting, Shuldham hauls down his flag. Duchaffault eventually sails the Warwick back across the Atlantic to Brest, where Shuldham is incarcerated for the next two years before being released, court-martialed in England, and exonerated for the loss of his ship.

MAY 8, 1756. The French warships Héros and Sirène of Commo. Louis Joseph Beaussier de l'Isle, Knight of the Order of Saint Louis, arrive in the Saint Lawrence Seaway from Brest in France with the 44-year-old major general Louis Joseph, Marquis de Montcalm and Knight of the Order of Saint Louis, plus two battalions (1,200 men) of the La Sarre and Royal Roussillon regiments aboard four transports. Montcalm's second-in-command is the 36-year-old brigadier general François Gaston, Chevalier (later Duc) de Lévis, and other aides include colonels Louis Antoine de Bougainville and François Charles de Bourlamaque.

After disembarking from his transport Licorne at Cap Tourmente and traveling overland into Quebec City by May 13, Montcalm proceeds toward Montreal one week later to report to his superior, the Canadian-born governor general Pierre de Rigaud de Vaudreuil.

MAY 18, 1756. Great Britain officially declares war against France after learning of the French invasion of Britain's Mediterranean base at Minorca.

JULY 2, 1756. Near Matina, the interim Costa Rican governor Francisco Fernández de la Pastora and his lieutenant are surprised on its beach by Zamboes, who carry him off to Moin and San Andrés Island to be executed.

Louis Joseph, Marquis de Montcalm. (National Archives of Canada)

JULY 23, 1756. The Scottish-born James Campbell, 4th Earl of Loudoun, reaches New York City to replace Shirley as commander in chief of the British forces in North America, accompanied by the 35th and 42nd Infantry regiments. The new commander dismisses Shirley for incompetence and orders him to England, then proceeds to Albany. Some 7,000 colonial troops have been mustered there.

JULY 26, 1756. Commo. Charles Holmes, commanding the Royal Navy squadron in Nova Scotia, begins cruising off Louisbourg with HMSS Grafton, Nottingham, Hornet, and Jamaica, skirmishing over the next couple of weeks against smaller enemy flotillas under Beaussier de l'Isle.

JULY 29, 1756. Oswego. A dubious Montcalm joins 3,000 men already massed at Fort Frontenac (modern Kingston, Ontario), leading them southward against the frontline English outpost at Oswego (New York). Despite his doubts, a few minor attacks are easily

Montcalm

Louis Joseph, Marquis de Montcalm, was born into a military family on February 28, 1712, at Candiac (France). He was taught by tutors, who found the young boy to be headstrong and opinionated. At the age of nine, he was given a commission as ensign in the d'Hainaut Regiment on August 16, 1721. A captaincy followed eight years later, by purchase.

Montcalm did not begin active service until the War of the Polish Succession in 1732. He served under Marshal de Saxe and the Duke of Berwick in the Rhineland. In October 1736, he married the well-connected Angélique Talon de Boulay, which helped his career. At the outbreak of the War of the Austrian Succession, he was wounded at the siege of Prague, then fought bravely in the retreat from Bohemia. He was allowed to buy the colonelcy of the Auxerrois Regiment on March 6, 1743, and was made a knight of the Order of Saint Louis in April 1744. His regiment was decimated, and Montcalm himself severely wounded and captured, by the Austrians at the disaster at Piacenza in June 1746. Exchanged, he was promoted to the temporary rank of brigadier general on March 20, 1747, before being wounded again at the Assiette defeat.

When hostilities ended in 1748, the remnants of his Auxerrois Regiment were merged into the Flanders Regiment. To compensate for his lost command, Montcalm was allowed to raise a cavalry regiment. Seven years of peace ensued, during which he lived as a rural nobleman, occasionally inspecting his troopers. When war with Britain loomed in the summer of 1755, many French officers did not wish to leave for a colonial backwater such as Canada. Montcalm therefore was selected after several others and was appointed on March 11, 1756, as major general for all regular forces in Canada. Small, vain, and determined to have his way in everything, his orders were strictly written. The governor general was to have precedence, while Montcalm had to obey his orders and remain on good terms.

Never having campaigned outside Europe, he found the vast wilderness ill-suited to his set-piece training. He scorned the guerrilla tactics used by the rugged French Canadian militiamen and their native allies and began sending a stream of complaints to Paris. Despite winning a few early victories, he also quarreled with the governor general and undermined morale with his bleak outlook. Surprised by Wolfe's ascent to the Plains of Abraham, he rushed impulsively into battle and died bravely.

brushed off as the French drive a road for their artillery, otherwise encountering little resistance from Oswego's isolated, unpaid, ill-supplied, and demoralized defenders.

After the French invest the garrison on August 10 and inaugurate a siege bombardment, pressing close up to its ramparts with the Canadian and Indian irregulars under François-Pierre de Rigaud de Vaudreuil (governor of Montreal and brother of New France's governor general), the Anglo-American defenders under Lt. Col. James Mercer capitulate (on August 14). French casualties total 40 men, and the English suffer 50 casualties, although 1,700 prisoners are taken along with several ships and more than 100 guns, plus plenty of stores. Oswego is stripped bare and burned to the ground.

MARCH 1757. François de Rigaud de Vaudreuil leads 1,200 French Canadian troops and native allies on a successful series of raids near the British base of Fort William Henry on Lake George (New York).

MARCH 16, 1757. The 50-gun HMS Greenwich of Capt. Robert Roddam is cruising off Cape Cabrón near Samaná Bay (Dominican Republic) when it sights eight large sail approaching to windward. This is a squadron coming out from France under 42-year-old commodore Joseph de Bauffremont, Prince de Listenois and Knight of the Order of Malta, his flag flying aboard the Tonnant. The Greenwich is pursued and eventually overhauled two days later by the 74-gun Diadème, 64-gun Eveillée or "Alert," and a frigate. Outnumbered and outgunned, Roddam surrenders, being carried into Saint Domingue (Haiti).

MAY 25, 1757. In New York, 3,500 English colonials go aboard 90 transports under the Earl of Loudoun to travel north to Halifax for a joint assault against the French fortress of Louisbourg. They are to be escorted by the 50-gun privateer Sutherland (flag) of Capt. Edward Falkingham, the 20-gun Nightingale of James Campbell and Kennington of Dudley Digges, the 16-gun Vulture of Sampson Salt, plus the 14-gun sloop Ferret of Arthur Upton—all under the command of the governor and rear admiral Sir Charles Hardy. Departure is delayed by rumors of five French ships of the line and a frigate off Halifax, which compel Hardy to send two sloops ahead to reconnoiter.

JUNE 5, 1757. At Louisbourg, five French ships of the line and a frigate enter from Saint Domingue (Haiti) under Commodore de Bauffremont to help bolster the garrison's defenses. Inside he finds four ships of the line and two frigates already arrived from Toulon, under Joseph-François de Noble Du Revest.

That same day, Loudonn and Hardy—reassured that there is no French squadron hovering off Nova Scotia—quit New York City with their troop convoy, reaching Halifax a few days later and disembarking their forces to unite with three infantry regiments and one artillery company already exercising ashore. English numbers total approximately 11,000 men.

JUNE 19, 1757. The 74-year-old French admiral Dubois de La Motte reaches Louisbourg with nine ships of the line and two frigates from Brest, bearing reinforcements, which raise its garrison to 7,000 effectives. Naval strength on this station is now 18 ships of the line and 5 frigates, but despite such powerful forces, Dubois de La Motte does not sortie to fall upon the weaker English squadrons at Halifax; instead, he obeys his instructions to hold Louisbourg at all costs, without hazarding any sea engagements.

JULY 7, 1757. After lengthy delays, Vice Adm. Francis Holburne reaches Halifax with 15 warships from Cork (Ireland), escorting a troop convoy intended to participate in the forthcoming campaign against Louisbourg.

JULY 13, 1757. On the Spanish half of Hispaniola, 180 members of Santo Domingo's garrison run riot, protesting their 28 months' arrears in pay.

AUGUST 2, 1757. After detaching the 20-gun Winchelsea of veteran captain John Rous and other frigates to reconnoiter the French concentration at Louisbourg, Admiral Holburne and Lord Loudonn load their forces aboard ship to proceed toward Gabarus Bay, six miles west of Louisbourg, and initiate their offensive.

En route, the English learn the true strength of French preparations so decide to abandon this project. Some troops are left in Halifax, others deposited in the Bay of Fundy to reinforce Fort Cumberland and Annapolis Royal, while the rest return into New York City with Loudonn—against whom there is a great public outcry for this retreat.

AUGUST 3, 1757. Siege of Fort William Henry. At the southern tip of Lake George (New York), 6,200 French regulars and Canadian militiamen under General Montcalm, backed by 1,800 Indian allies, arrive to besiege Lt. Col. George Monro's 2,500 men within 44-gun Fort William Henry (also called Fort George). After his initial call for capitulation is rebuffed, Montcalm institutes formal siege proceedings by digging a road, entrenchments, and gun emplacements. Eight French cannon open fire by August 6, and Monro requests terms three days later.

This surrender is quickly consummated; the English are allowed to retire with honors of war and their baggage (agreeing not to serve again for another 18 months), while all French prisoners in Anglo-American hands are to be restored to Canada.

But when Fort William Henry is evacuated, the British are attacked by the Indians, who kill at least 80 and drag 500–600 off to their camps. Montcalm and his officers attempt to intervene and succeed in recovering about 400; Governor General Vaudreuil later ransoms most of the rest, but not before several score are killed or otherwise mistreated. Because of this violation, the English generals Daniel Webb and Lord Loudoun refuse to recognize the articles of capitulation, thus Fort William Henry's survivors soon return to English service and no French prisoners are sent to Canada. Montcalm furthermore fails to follow up his victory by attacking the 1,200-man garrison under Webb at Fort Edward, 15 miles farther south, despite having orders to do so.

AUGUST 16, 1757. Admiral Holburne quits Halifax with part of his fleet and four days later appears off Louisbourg to probe its defenses. Admiral Dubois de La Motte signals his larger fleet to unmoor, at which the English ships bear away, disappearing by nightfall.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1757. Having returned to blockade Louisbourg with 19 ships of the line, two 50-gunners, and several frigates, Holburne's fleet is suddenly struck by a southeasterly gale toward evening. The next midday, the 60-gun Tilbury of Capt. Henry Barnsley and 14-gun sloop Ferret of Cmdr. Arthur Upton are lost, while Commodore Holmes's 70-gun Grafton is lucky to survive striking some rocks, and more than a dozen other vessels lie dismasted. The French save 280 of the Tilbury's 400 crewmen, imprisoning them, but under fair treatment.

Detaching the most damaged vessels directly toward England under Sir Charles Hardy and Holmes, Holburne leads his remaining ships back into Halifax. Eventually, he follows his first contingent across the Atlantic, leaving 40-year-old commodore Alexander, Baron Colville of Culross, to winter on this station with the 70-gun Northumberland and a handful of other vessels. The French admiral Dubois de La Motte also quits Louisbourg by October 30, escorting a large convoy home to Brest, arriving on November 23 with 5,000 men sick of typhus.

OCTOBER 21, 1757. This morning, Commo. Arthur Forrest appears off northern Saint Domingue (Haiti) with his 60-ton, 1,100-ton flagship Augusta and Dreanought of Maurice Suckling, as well as the 64-gun, 1,285-ton Edinburgh of William Langdon, having been detached from Jamaica by Rear Adm. Thomas Cotes to intercept a homeward-bound French convoy. The French under Kersaint, having recently been reinforced, exit Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien) to offer battle with the 70-gun flagship Intrépide and Sceptre of Captain Clavel (its armament having been reduced to act as a transport), the 64-gun Opiniâtre under Captain Molliou, the 50-gun Greenwich (recently captured from the English by Bauffremont; see "March 16, 1757" entry) under Captain Foucault, the 44-gun Outarde, as well as the 32-gun frigates Sauvage and Licorne.

Despite their inferior strength, the English decide to accept this challenge and steer into action with Suckling in the van, Forrest in the center, and Langdon bringing up the rear. Fighting erupts about 3:20 p.m., lasting two and a half hours until Kersaint signals one of his frigates to tow his damaged Intrépide out of the line. Other French ships thereupon begin to quit the engagement, their whole squadron eventually making off. The English suffer 23 killed and 89 wounded, although without securing any prizes, and are obliged to retire toward Jamaica. Kersaint, despite being wounded, is allowed to conduct his convoy toward France—although at the very end of his voyage the vessels Opiniâtre, Greenwich, and Outarde are driven ashore by a storm and wrecked.

MARCH 22, 1758. Admiral Hardy returns into Halifax from New York, assuming command of this station from Commodore Colville.

APRIL 5, 1758. Hardy's squadron sails from Halifax to blockade Louisbourg.

MAY 12, 1758. Admiral Boscawen reaches Halifax with a large convoy from England, drilling these troops ashore while waiting for 41-year-old major general Jeffery Amherst to arrive from New York with another large contingent of colonials.

MAY 29, 1758. Boscawen puts to sea from Halifax to launch an initial strike against Louisbourg, sighting HMS Dublin (which is bringing Amherst) while still clearing the harbor. After a brief shipboard conference, both New England and British contingents unite, their land forces now totalling 13,000 regulars divided into 14 infantry regiments, plus 4 American Ranger companies and a large siege train. Amherst's brigadier generals are 64-year-old Edward Whitmore, colonel of the 22nd Foot and veteran of Walker's failed effort (see "August 24, 1711 [O.S.]" entry in "Queen Anne's War"), who directs the 17th, 47th, 48th, and 58th regiments, 1st Royals, and Third Battalion of the 60th (Royal Americans); 49-year-old Nova Scotia governor Charles Lawrence, who commands the 13th, 22nd, 35th, and 45th Foot, plus the Second Battalion of the Royal Americans; and 31-year-old James Wolfe, who leads the grenadiers and light infantry plus the 42nd "Black Watch" Regiment. Boscawen's fleet consists of 23 ships of the line, 16 lesser warships, and 118 transports or auxiliaries, manned by 14,000 sailors and marines.

Simultaneously, another large Anglo-American army is to advance up Lake Champlain under Maj. Gen. James Abercromby, while Brig. Gen. John Forbes is to lead another 6,000 men against Fort Duquesne (Pittsburgh).

JUNE 2, 1758. Fall of Louisbourg. Lawrence's and Wolfe's divisions reach Gabarus Bay, reconnoiter its shore with Amherst, and decide to disembark on the western rather than eastern side of this French stronghold. Bad weather sets in, however, postponing any further action until Whitmore's division can also stagger into the bay by June 6.

The wind dies down on June 7, allowing Amherst to land one regiment under cover of Royal Navy bombardment and send it east around Black Point to establish a small base at Lorembec. At 2:00 a.m. of June 8, the main British force heads inshore to disembark in the teeth of strong French opposition, for Louisbourg's governor—the 56-year-old naval officer Augustine de Boschenry de Drucour, Knight of the Order of Saint Louis—has sortied with 2,000 soldiers to oppose any landing. (His garrison totals 3,500 troops divided into four regiments of regulars and 24 companies of marines, 4,000 sailors and militiamen, plus 4,000 civilians.) Under covering fire from the frigate Kennington and snow Halifax, Wolfe's division moves toward Anse à la Coromandière (modern Kennington Cove), followed by Lawrence and Whitmore. The first boats are repelled, but three others slip behind a rocky headland, their men gaining shore in Freshwater Cove. Lawrence's division distracts the defenders by making a feint farther east at Simon's Point, while Whitmore leads a pretended approach even closer to the town.

Wolfe's division is already marching around the French left by the time Lawrence and Whitmore move to Anse à la Coromandière and disembark. Drucour's columns therefore retreat inside Louisbourg, pursued by three British regiments who take 70 prisoners until halted by artillery fire from its ramparts. By June 11, Amherst is able to bring his light artillery ashore (mainly 6-pounders at Lorembec), although the seas continue too high to manhandle 24- or 32-pounders. Boscawen blockades Island Battery at the harbor entrance, while Amherst takes 1,200 of Wolfe's light troops and some fieldpieces on a long march around its inner shoreline, occupying Lighthouse Point at the far end. Meanwhile, Whitmore directs the siege works, which proceed mostly at night to avoid drawing French fire. Good weather returns by June 16, when Amherst lands and begins installing his heavy artillery. Inside the citadel, Drucour persuades his naval counterpart Jean-Antoine Charry Desgouttes to scuttle four of his ships to block the channel, leaving only five French ships of the line and a frigate afloat.

Over the next few weeks, the invaders patiently labor on their siege lines, driving them ever closer to the walls. A sortie by 725 French troops briefly overruns Black Point, killing an English officer and capturing 34 men but otherwise fails to halt the siege's progress. At noon of July 21, a heated ball from one of Amherst's batteries strikes Desgouttes's 74-gun flagship Entreprenant, igniting its magazine. The resultant explosion spreads fire to the Capricieux and Célèbre nearby, both being consumed by 4:00 p.m. During the night of July 25, the British send 50 small boats loaded with troops into the harbor, occupying the devastated Island Battery, then steal upon the 74-gun Prudent. Finding it hard aground, the boarders set it ablaze, then cut out the 64-gun Bienfaisant despite the presence of 152 crewmen still aboard. This operation only costs the English 7 killed and 9 wounded, and next morning Drucour requests terms. The actual surrender is effected on July 27, Boscawen transporting the 5,000 prisoners toward England, while Amherst repairs Louisbourg and installs Whitmore as its governor with a sizable garrison before departing for New York.

JULY 5, 1758. Fort Carillon. While Amherst has been subduing Louisbourg, a second powerful British force is threatening French Canada from the south. At the bottom of Lake George (New York), 52-year-old major general Abercromby marches north with 6,000 British regulars and 9,000 colonials. His aim is to capture Fort Carillon, or Ticonderoga as the English call it, thus opening up a passage to the Saint Lawrence and Montreal. Montcalm, Carillon's commander, feverishly strengthens its defenses, even contemplating blowing it up and retreating into Fort Saint Frédéric (Crown Point). But the English advance is delayed when the popular and able brigadier general George Augustus Howe, Abercromby's second-in-command, is killed in a skirmish on July 6 at a portage. This setback allows Montcalm more time for construction, and on the evening of the 7th, he is joined by his subordinate Lévis, who brings in 400 troops, thus augmenting Carillon's strength to over 3,600 men—mostly French regulars.

When Abercromby arrives the next day, he is under the mistaken belief that another 3,000-man relief column is about to reach Montcalm, so he launches a precipitate frontal assault without waiting for his guns to come up nor noticing that Carillon can be more easily assaulted from its rear. Shortly after noon of July 8, his regulars form up into four columns, with colonial skirmishers in between, and the attack commences. The English formations quickly disintegrate as they scramble through felled trees and then are shot to pieces by steady French musket fire from behind an abatis. The British bravely re-form and attack throughout the afternoon, finally giving up by 7:00 p.m. At this point, the French vault over their log barricades and drive off the remaining colonial skirmishers. The Anglo-American army disintegrates and flees into the night in wild disorder, abandoning their arms, equipment, and wounded, having suffered 1,944 casualties—1,610 of them regulars—as opposed to 377 among the French.

AUGUST 14, 1758. Fort Frontenac. The 44-year-old, Nova Scotia-born lieutenant colonel John Bradstreet sets out from Fort Stanwix (modern Rome, New York) with 157 regulars of the 60th Foot or Royal Americans, 2,100 colonials and native scouts, plus 200 New Englanders to man his flotilla of boats. After pausing at Oswego on August 21 for more craft, Bradstreet's expedition strikes north across Lake Ontario, disembarking west of Fort Frontenac (modern Kingston, Ontario) by the 25th.

That same night, the 30-year-old French commodore René-Hypolite Pépin—better known as La Force—warns Fort Frontenac's 68-year-old, infirm governor, Pierre-Jacques Payen de Noyan et de Chavoy, that redcoats and their Indian allies are ashore. Next day, Bradstreet's gunners build a battery overlooking this fort from the west and open fire at dusk. On Sunday morning, August 27, La Force attempts to escape with his flagship Marquise de Vaudreuil, snow Montcalm (ex-British Halifax), and brigantine Georges (ex-British London). They run aground and are abandoned, being lost to the British along with another six smaller vessels in the harbor when de Noyan capitulates to Bradstreet. The French governor is allowed to retire to Montreal with the non-combatants, but his garrison of 50 regulars and 60 militiamen are marched to Albany as prisoners of war and Fort Frontenac is destroyed. Although La Force and his men have rowed to La Présentation (modern Ogdensburg, New York), communication between Quebec and Louisiana is effectively severed, control over Lake Ontario now passing to the British.

SEPTEMBER 1758. Brig. Gen. John Forbes—a Scottish-born soldier in his sixties and colonel of the 17th Foot—advances upon Fort Duquesne with 1,600 men (including Montgomery's Highlanders, a battalion of Royal Americans under Swiss-born Henri Bouquet, numerous Virginians under Washington, plus other provincials and Indians). Conditions prove difficult, a road having to be tediously cut through the woods and Forbes himself falling ill from dysentery.

Upon approaching their objective in early November, Maj. James Grant—commanding 800 Highlanders and Virginians—gets permission from Bouquet to attempt a nocturnal assault against Fort Duquesne. Within a mile of this place, the attackers become lost and suffer 300 casualties from a French countersally. Driven back into Bouquet's camp, the Anglo-Americans endure cold and rain for a couple of weeks before learning that the 200-man French garrison is retiring. On November 25, Forbes occupies its abandoned remains, renaming this place "Pittsborough" and installing Bouquet as governor before returning to Philadelphia (where Forbes dies shortly afterward).

SEPTEMBER 2, 1758. This morning off Port-au-Prince, the 60-gun HMS Dreadnought of Capt. Maurice Suckling and 50-gun Assistance of Robert Wellingford chance upon the 74-gun French Palmier, which has previously taken the 10-gun English Stork. When the Royal Navy pair closes in, the wind dies away, leaving the Dreadnought engaged alone against the Palmier, which disables Suckling's ship before escaping.

OCTOBER 20, 1758. Montcalm is promoted to lieutenant general, thus gaining seniority over his former superior, Canada's Governor General Vaudreuil.

NOVEMBER 3, 1758. This afternoon, the 70-gun HMS Buckingham of Capt. Richard Tyrrell and 14-gun Weazel encounter a French convoy off Sint Eustatius, being escorted homeward from Martinique by the 74-gun Florissant, 38-gun frigate Aigrette, and 28-gun frigate Atalante. The two ships of the line fight each other from 3:00 p.m. until nightfall, both becoming disabled. The Buckingham suffers 7 killed and 46 wounded, including Tyrrell, who is thus powerless to prevent the Frenchmen's escape.

JANUARY 3, 1759. Eight English ships of the line, a frigate, and four bomb ketches reach Barbados under Commo. Robert Hughes, bringing total naval strength on this station—headed by 40-year-old commodore John Moore—up to: the 80-gun, 667-man flagship Cambridge of Capt. Thomas Burnett; the 90-gun, 750-man Saint George of Clarke Gayton; the 74-gun, 600-man Norfolk of Robert Hughes; the 70-gun, 520-man Buckingham of Richard Tyrrell (later Lachlin Leslie) and Burford of James Gambier; the 64-gun, 480-man Berwick of William Harman; the 60-gun, 400-man Lion of Sir William Trelawney, Rippon of Edward Jekyll, and Panther of Molyneux Shuldham; the 50-gun, 350-man Winchester of Edward Le Cras and Bristol of Lachlin Leslie (later Peter Parker); the 44-gun frigates Woolwich of Peter Parker (later Daniel Dering) and Roebuck of Thomas Lynn, the 40-gun Ludlow Castle of Edward Clarke; the 32-gun Renown of George Mackenzie; the 26-gun Amazon of William Norton; the 20-gun Rye of Daniel Dering; the 14-gun sloop Bonetta of Richard King and Weazel of John Boles; the 13-gun Antigua of Weston Varlo; the 10-gun Spy of William Bayne; as well as the 8-gun bomb vessels Kingfisher of Sabine Deacon, Falcon of Mark Robinson, Grenado of Samuel Uvedale, and Infernal of James Mackenzie. (The 66-gun HMS Lancaster of Capt. Robert Mann joins later, along with the 28-gun frigates Emerald and Griffin.)

Hughes's squadron is convoying 60 troop transports bearing 3,700–3,800 men of the following regiments under Maj. Gen. Peregrine Thomas Hopson: the 3rd Old Buffs (East Kent or Howard's) Regiment under Lt. Col. (brevetted Brig. Gen.) Cyrus Trapaud; the 4th (Royal Lancashire or Durore's) of Lt. Col. Byam Crump; the 61st (Elliott's) of Lt. Col. John Barlow; the 63rd (Manchester or Watson's) of Lt. Col. Peter Debrissay; the 64th (North Staffordshire or Barrington's) of Maj. Thomas Ball; and the 65th (York and Lancaster, or Armiger's) of Col. Robert Armiger. The Second Battalion of the 42nd "Black Watch" Regiment is also to join, plus units from the 38rd (South Staffordshire or "Ross's") Regiment, already serving at Antigua. Their intended target is to be Martinique, which Moore and Hopson set sail to attack on the morning of January 13.

JANUARY 15, 1759. Defense of Martinique. After passing between Saint Lucia and Martinique, the 100-ship English expedition of Moore and Hopson arrives off the southern coast of the latter island this afternoon and attacks the French batteries at 7:30 the next morning. HMSS Bristol and Rippon silence and briefly occupy a fort on Negro Point, while the Winchester, Woolwich, and Roebuck cannonade the batteries in Cas des Navires Bay, in anticipation of a disembarkation. This is effected starting at about 4:00 p.m. within Cas des Navires Bay, so that by the morning of the 17th almost 4,400 British troops are ashore. However, their numbers are apparently insufficient against the sizable militia concentrations marshalling under the French governor general, François de Beaumont, Comte de Beauharnois. The British are also too far away from any significant strongpoint, without food or water, so can only toil ineffectually through the dense underbrush while being galled by sniper fire.

This slow progression prompts the aged and infirm Hopson to ask Moore whether a combined attack might be attempted closer in to the capital of Fort Royal (modern Fort de France), but such a notion is rejected after a hasty conference among the naval officers. Hopson therefore orders a stealthy reembarkation, ordering his sappers to continue digging trenches until nightfall of January 17 to deceive the French into believing he is staying, after which his redcoats are extricated by moonlight in only a few hours. This abortive landing has cost them 22 killed, 49 wounded, 4 prisoners, and 1 Irish deserter. In point of fact, the French defenses are much weaker than Hopson realizes, with Beauharnois having slightly less than 600 regulars to defend Fort Royal, morale on his island being particularly low.

JANUARY 18, 1759. After withdrawing, Moore and Hopson's expedition probes northwest into the vicinity of Martinique's principal harbor of Saint Pierre. At dawn on the 19th, HMS Panther is sent in to sound its entrance, while the Rippon and two Royal Navy bomb vessels provide covering fire. They engage the batteries until 6:30 p.m., but the British fleet then stands away one and a half hours later without attempting a disembarkation, its commanders preferring to instead steer toward Guadeloupe.

JANUARY 21, 1759. Beauharnois sends two large privateer vessels, crammed with 400 Martinican volunteers, to warn his compatriots on Guadeloupe of the approach of Moore and Hopson's expedition.

JANUARY 22, 1759. Capture of Guadeloupe. At noon, the British fleet comes within sight of the southwestern tip of this island and spends the rest of this day reconnoitering its capital Basse-Terre. Between 9:00 and 10:00 a.m. the next morning, HMSS Lion, Saint George, Norfolk, Cambridge, Panther, Burford, Berwick, and Rippon bear down upon diverse French batteries and open fire, while Moore directs the action from aboard the frigate Woolwich and bomb vessels prepare to lob shells from farther out at sea. In a day-long exchange, the Royal Navy succeeds in silencing most of the defenders' guns, only the Rippon suffering extensive damage from French counterfire after running aground.

At 5:00 p.m., Moore directs his landing craft to board the troops, but Hopson countermands this order, feeling the day too far advanced. Basse-Terre—largely abandoned by its inhabitants—burns to the ground overnight, and at 11:00 a.m. of January 24 the British fleet anchors in its roadstead, setting men ashore just north of the smoldering ruins early that afternoon. The French, with only 100 regulars and a horde of undisciplined militia under Gov. Charles-François-Emmanuel Nadau du Treil, have all fled north to Dos d'Âne after haphazardly spiking their guns and failing to blow their citadel. The invaders occupy Basse-Terre, but then begin succumbing to disease, 1,500 falling sick by January 30. After vainly calling upon du Treil to surrender, the British venture inland, fighting a major skirmish four miles northeast of Basse-Terre on February 4 at Madame Ducharmey's plantation, which she defends tenaciously with her retainers, inflicting a dozen deaths and 30 wounded among Maj. Robert Melville's column before it retires.

On February 14, after six hours' bombardment by HMSS Berwick and Panther, frigates Roebuck, Renown, and Woolwich, plus the bomb vessel Bonetta and other lesser consorts, a force of Royal Marines and Highlanders under Colonel Rycout is set ashore on the eastern part of Guadeloupe (Grande Terre). Moore has detached this contingent with naval Captain Harman to establish another British foothold, being accomplished when Fort Louis's wall is breached, then overrun at bayonet point, wresting it from its French garrison under Joseph de Beaulés. Moore visits this captured bastion on February 22, returning to the main British camp three days later.

Hopson dies of disease at 1:00 a.m. of February 27 and is succeeded in command of the land forces by Maj. Gen. John Barrington. With only 2,796 soldiers left fit for duty, Basse-Terre laid waste, and French forces dug in at a strong defensive position at Dos d'Âne, the new commander decides to shift operations to the Fort Louis foothold. British casualties thus far have totaled 55 killed, 140 wounded, and 1,649 sick, plus several hundred more evacuated earlier toward Antigua. Early on March 6, after installing 500 men under Colonel Debrissay to hold Basse-Terre—supported by HMSS Saint George and Buckingham out in its roadstead—Barrington leads the remainder aboard the transports and straggles (due to difficult winds) into Fort Louis from March 7 to 12.

Moore then learns of the arrival at Martinique on March 8 of a squadron of eight French ships of the line (flag, Défenseur) and three frigates under 60-year-old commodore Maximin de Bompar—former governor general of the French West Indies—plus troop reinforcements. The British commodore therefore sails the bulk of his squadron toward Prince Rupert's Bay on the north coast of Dominica on March 14, arriving two days later to keep Bompar in check, while leaving only the Woolwich at Fort Louis to guard Barrington's transports. The latter meanwhile sends a flotilla of boats east on Guadeloupe to attack the towns of Sainte Anne and Saint François on March 25, disembarking between them with 600 men under lieutenant colonels Crump and Barlow. This assault not only succeeds in overrunning both places at the cost of only 1 British dead and 2 wounded, it furthermore draws off a 300-man French relief column from Gosier (two miles east of Fort Louis). Barrington avails himself of this weakness to send Maj. Charles Teesdale with 300 men to raid this latter place from the sea, destroying it on March 30. Teesdale thereupon advances upon the rear of the French besiegers surrounding Fort Louis, while Barrington simultaneously leads a sally. Between them, these two columns scatter the last organized French resistance upon the eastern half of Guadeloupe.

After Barrington falls ill, Brig. Gen. John Clavering begins the process of subduing the island's west-central portion when he disembarks 1,450 men near Arnoville on April 12, under the Woolwich's covering fire. The French fall back behind their Coin River defenses, only to have the invaders fight their way across at the cost of 14 dead and 54 wounded, seizing 70 prisoners and six guns. The French retreat pell-mell through the fortified town of Petit Bourg,

Fort Royal, Guadeloupe, under British occupation during the spring of 1759, by Archibald Campbell of the Royal Engineers. (Author's Collection) which the British occupy on April 14. Next day, Clavering sends Crump north with 700 men to destroy the vital French supply port of Baie Mahault, while another contingent of 100 redcoats marches southward to eradicate the seven-gun battery at Goyave. On April 20, Clavering leaves a 250-man garrison in Petit Bourg and resumes his advance, pressing the French into the island's southernmost corner. Next day, the islanders request terms and surrender on May 1. A relief force of 600 volunteers from Martinique under Governor General Beauharnois, aboard 18 coasters escorted by 2 of Bompar's frigates, reaches Sainte Anne on April 27—too late to affect the outcome. It thus withdraws two days later.

EARLY MAY 1759. Twenty French supply ships reach Quebec, bearing 350 recruits under Bougainville.

MAY 14, 1759. HMSS Berwick, Bristol, Ludlow Castle, and two bomb vessels set sail from Guadeloupe to subdue its neighboring island of Marie-Galante. The French inhabitants surrender without a fight, and Major Ball of the 64th Regiment is installed as governor.

JUNE 6, 1759. Wolfe (recently promoted to major general) and Vice Adm. Sir Charles Saunders set sail from Louisbourg with 8,500 soldiers of the 15th, 28th, 35th, 43rd, 47th, 48th, and 58th regiments—as well as Fraser's Battalion of Highlanders (the 78th) and the Second and Third battalions of the 60th (Royal Americans)—traveling aboard 119 transports, to invade the French within Quebec City. Wolfe's brigadier generals are Robert Monckton, George Murray, and George Townshend, while his quartermaster-general is Guy Carleton and chief engineer is Patrick Mackellar—once held prisoner at Quebec. Although without cavalry, the British expedition boasts three artillery companies and six American Ranger companies.

JUNE 23, 1759. A troop convoy sails from Guadeloupe toward New York, escorted by HMS Rye and bearing 693 men of the 3rd, 61st, and 64th regiments, plus 507 Highlanders, for Wolfe's army.

JUNE 26, 1759. Plains of Abraham. Wolfe's expedition reaches Île d'Orléans, four miles below Quebec City, immediately detaching Brigadier General Monckton to occupy Point Lévis on the southeastern banks of the Saint Lawrence River as an advance base. Two days later, the French send fireships downstream in an attempt to scatter Saunders's fleet, but this attack proves ineffectual, the vessels being lit too soon. The British therefore anchor safely in the lee of Point Lévis, installing artillery a few days later two miles west of this position to bombard Quebec's citadel.

On July 9, Wolfe probes east of Montmorenci Falls with a column of troops, vainly trying to lure Montcalm's garrison out from behind its defenses. On July 27, the French make a second fireship attack, which also proves unsuccessful. On July 31, Wolfe launches a combined assault directly against Montcalm's main position: the Beauport lines stretching eight miles east of the city. The disembarkation is hampered by a hidden rocky ledge close inshore, which slows up the pace of the landing so that the redcoats storm into battle piecemeal rather than as a single wave. The British grenadiers, in particular, suffer heavy casualties while climbing up the slope beyond, until eventually a downpour soaks the ammunition on both sides and Wolfe orders a withdrawal. British losses total some 500 officers and men.

The besiegers consequently attempt to break the defenders' morale by firing all nearby settlements and sending troops upstream to sever communications with Montreal. A lengthy stalemate nonetheless ensues, punctuated by occasional bombardments or sallies. Wolfe falls ill in late August and by early September decides to land a column of troops at a cove called Anse au Foulon above Quebec City to surprise Montcalm from the rear. News that French provision ships will soon attempt to bring relief to the beleaguered garrison prompts the British general to act, so at 1:00 a.m. of September 13, he sets forth with 1,700 troops aboard 30 boats. Once ashore, they are to be followed by a second wave of 1,900, while the first scales the 175-foot-high cliffs and secures passage out onto the Plains of Abraham beyond. A diversionary attack by British warships in the meantime diverts Montcalm's attention in the direction of Beauport.

At 4:00 a.m., Wolfe's vanguard under Capt. William Howe disembarks, picking its way up a darkened path and overwhelming the sentry post above. Having achieved this breakout, the British continue to ferry troops across the river during the next couple of hours until Wolfe has 4,500 redcoats arrayed for battle. Montcalm initially believes only a small party has landed, but upon galloping across to view the scene at 6:30 a.m., he realizes he is confronted by the main British thrust and summons out his own forces. Within three hours, he has massed 4,250 troops, the Béarn and La Sarre regiments on the right and the Guyenne and Languedoc regiments on the left.

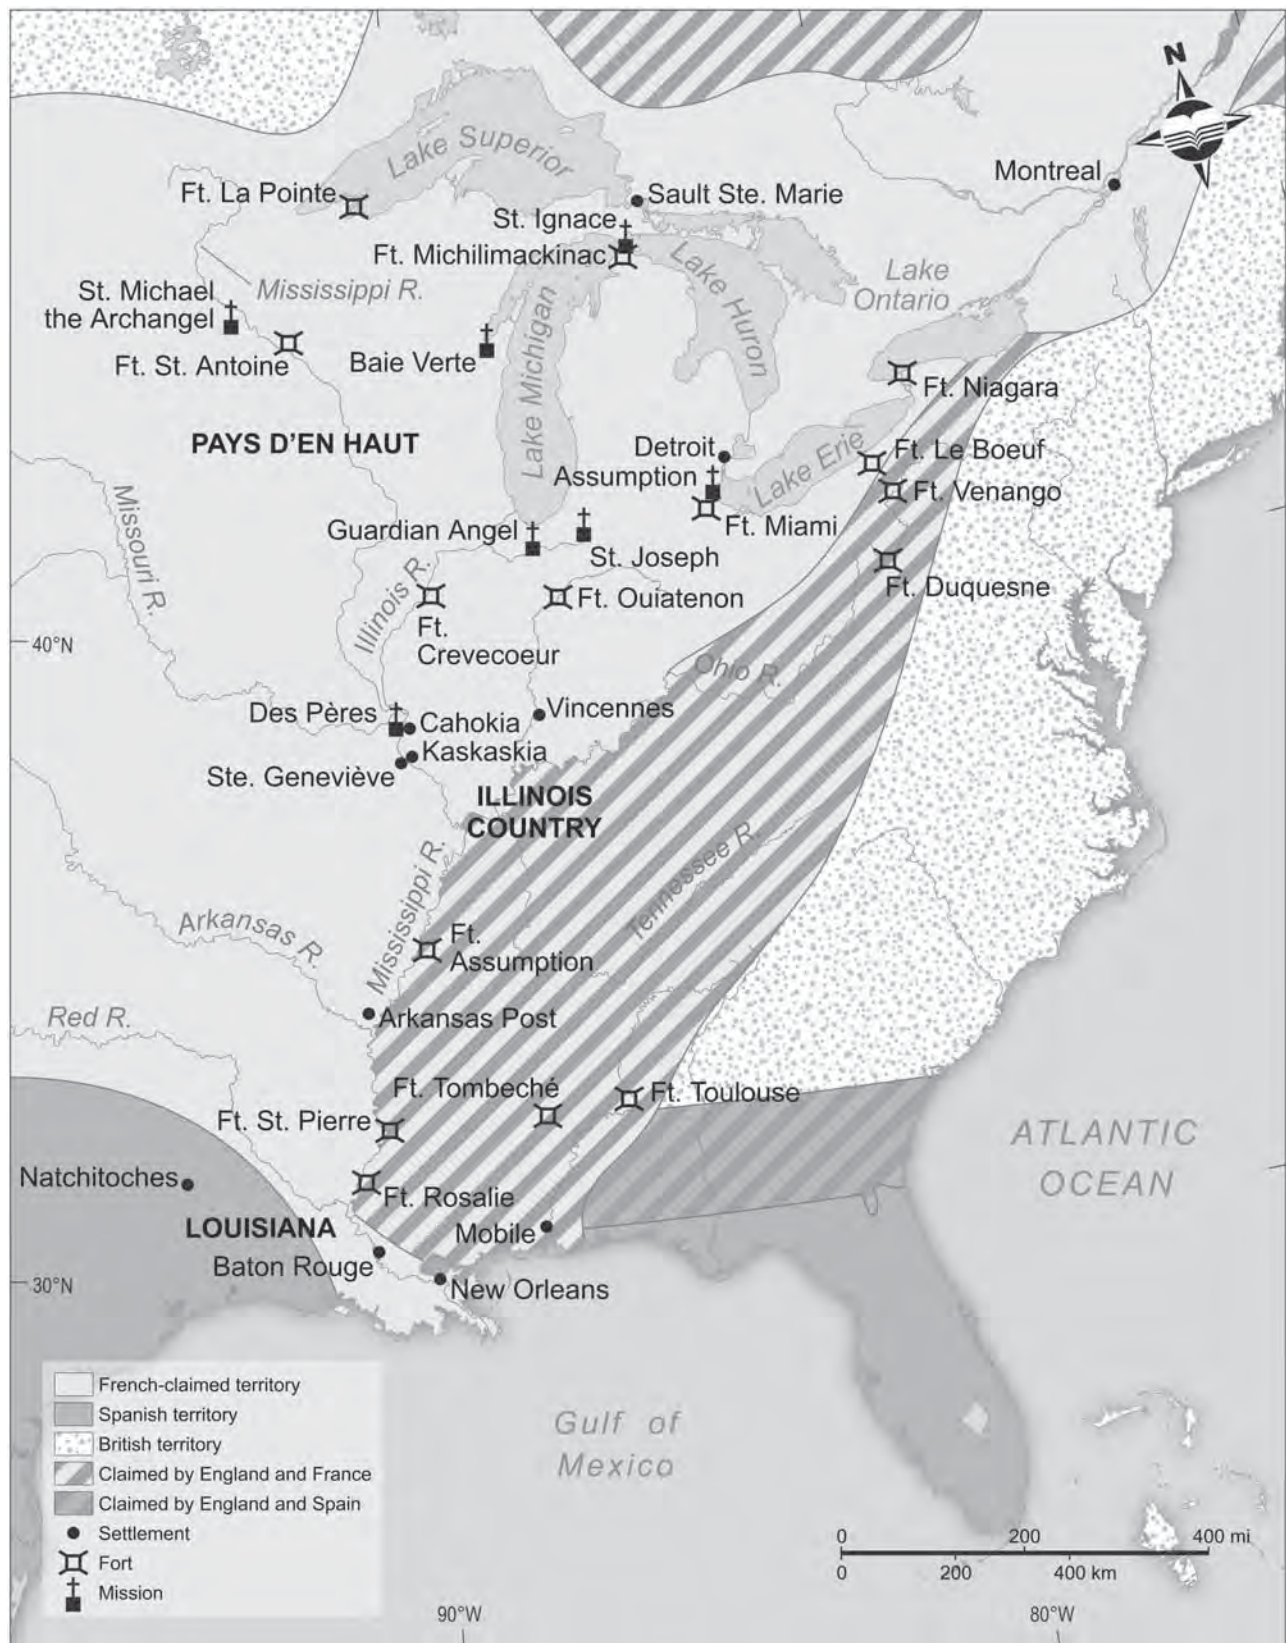

Montcalm attacks at 10 a.m., without waiting for the arrival of further reinforcements approaching out of the west under Bougainville. The French general underestimates the discipline of this British disembarkment, believing that he can dislodge Wolfe before the latter becomes too firmly entrenched. Instead, the French charge is greeted by long lines of redcoats rising out of the grass where they have been lying prone to avoid the galling fire from Indian and French Canadian skirmishers. British artillery also opens fire, having been hoisted up to the clifftops by hard-working naval parties. At 40 yards, the French assault is stopped dead in its tracks by a crashing volley, then rolled up by a redcoat counterattack with bayonets. Montcalm's army disintegrates and suffers 500 killed along with 350 captured before it scatters back into Quebec City and the surrounding countryside. British losses total 58 men—including the commander in chief himself, who receives three wounds—plus 600 injured.

Too late, Bougainville appears upon the battlefield, retiring west toward Montreal after witnessing the French flight. Montcalm is carried back into Quebec City, where he expires from his own wound on September 14. Townshend assumes overall command of the British land forces, continues the siege, and accepts the final capitulation of Quebec City on September 18.

an Anglo-American army to besiege the French garrison under 47-year-old François Pouchot inside Fort Niagara (New York). On July 24, the British and their native allies crush a French relief column approaching out of Ohio in the so-called Battle of La Belle Famille, prompting Pouchot's demoralized survivors to capitulate the next day.

AUGUST 1759. A joint expedition of Zamboes and English baymen—the latter aboard three sloops—are ambushed near Matina (Costa Rica) by Spanish lieutenant José Galiano, who kills 60 of the invaders and scatters the rest.

FEBRUARY 1760. A small French force attempts to recapture Pointe-Lévis opposite British-held Quebec City, but General Murray sends troops out of their winter billets across the frozen Saint Lawrence to drive them away.

APRIL 26, 1760. Ice on the Saint Lawrence River having broken, General Lévis travels downstream from Montreal with six frigates, assembling 7,000 troops at Saint Augustin to march upon the British captors of Quebec City, 15 miles distant.

APRIL 28, 1760. Lévis's Countersiege. Murray exits Quebec City with 2,500 redcoats to erect defensive works on the Plains of Abraham against Lévis's anticipated arrival. Before these can be completed, however, the first French troops appear on the road from Sainte-Foy. The British immediately attack, driving back the surprised French, who then regroup and press their outnumbered opponents back inside Quebec City, abandoning 20 British fieldpieces.

Lévis institutes a formal siege, shelling the ruined city, while both sides anxiously maintain watch northeastward—up the Saint Lawrence toward the open ocean—to see whether British or French ships are the first to arrive from across the Atlantic and bring relief from Europe after the debilitating Canadian winter. On May 9, the frigate HMS Lowestoft appears, cheering Murray's beleaguered garrison. The French redouble their bombardment, but by the 15th the first of Commodore Colville's five ships of the line appears below Île d'Orléans, bearing two fresh British regiments from Louisbourg. Next day, two more English frigates arrive, sailing upstream and driving Lévis's six smaller ones aground. Faced with this rapidly worsening situation, the French have no choice but to lift their siege and retreat toward Montreal.

Quiberon

As the third year of the French and Indian War drew to a close, strategists in Paris found their situation growing increasingly difficult. Guadeloupe had been taken in the West Indies, with other islands soon to follow. Louisbourg and Quebec City had both fallen, leaving Canada exposed. Clive had won a string of victories in India. Even the planned invasion of England, for which an army of 20,000 French troops had been gathered all summer at Vannes in southeastern Brittany, was crippled when the Mediterranean fleet out of Toulon was scattered by Admiral Boscawen on August 18, 1759, off Lagos (Portugal).

Still, France's chief minister, Etienne François, Duc de Choiseul, hoped to use the Brest fleet for one last desperate try late in the year. On October 14, 1759, Admiral Conflans was ordered to prepare his ships to escape for the Loire estuary. Once inside Quiberon Bay, they were to escort the troop transports out of the landlocked waters of the Morbihan and across to Scotland. An opportunity presented itself in the first week of November, after heavy westerly gales drove the blockading fleet of 54-year-old rear admiral Sir Edward Hawke to seek shelter in Torbay, on the south coast of England.

When the winds veered around to the east, Conflans emerged from Brest with 21 ships of the line and 3 frigates on November 14, 1759. Hawke left Torbay that same evening with 23 of the line and 2 frigates. Informed at sea of the French destination, the British fleet hurried in pursuit. At 8:30 a.m. on November 20, they sighted their foes preparing to enter the rocky, reef-lined entrance of Quiberon Bay. Despite rising gales and churning seas, Hawke ordered his ships to rush in after them.

Confident in the seamanship of his crews, honed by many months of blockade duty, the British admiral knew that his ships could follow the French in, even amid a rising storm. The first Royal Navy vessels opened fire around 2:00 p.m. as the French rear was rounding Les Cardinaux rocks. A fierce battle ensued inside the bay until nightfall. Hawke's fleet anchored overnight, and the next morning the English discovered that seven French ships were sunk or captured. Another six had squeezed over the shallow bar into the Vilaine River estuary, where they would remain for more than a year. Only eight escaped into Rochefort.

This spectacular victory broke France's naval power for the rest of this war. Not only did the threatened invasion of England evaporate, but so did major French expeditions overseas. Instead, it was the Royal Navy that, in the words of the historian Alfred T. Mahan, was "free to act against the colonies of France, and later of Spain, on a grander scale than ever before."

JUNE 18, 1760. The brand-new, 18-gun Spanish privateer xebecs San Pedro and San Pablo arrive from Los Pasajes at Pampatar (Venezuela) to bolster the Biscayan Company's efforts against foreign smugglers.

JULY 8, 1760. After a lengthy pursuit, five British men-of-war under Capt. John Byron capture the French frigate Machault of Lt. François Chenard de la Giraudais and four cargo vessels off Restigouche (Quebec).

JULY 14, 1760. Murray departs Quebec City with 2,500 redcoats to advance up the Saint Lawrence and bottle Lévis's army at Montreal in conjunction with two other British offensives: Amherst, who will approach Canada out of the west via Hudson–Mohawk–Oswego–Lake Ontario with 10,000 men; and Lt. Col. William Haviland leading 3,400 troops north from Crown Point (New York) up Lake Champlain.

AUGUST 7, 1760. Murray's army circles past the French battery at Trois Rivières (Quebec), his boats hugging the south shore of the Saint Lawrence River.

This same day farther southwest, Amherst's vanguard—Capt. Joshua Loring's snows Mohawk and Onondaga—quit Oswego, chasing away some French scout vessels near Lost Channel in the Thousand Islands.

AUGUST 10, 1760. Amherst's main flotilla—more than 900 armed galleys and whaleboats bearing 10,000 men and 100 siege-guns—departs Oswego (New York) to proceed down the Saint Lawrence River.

AUGUST 16, 1760. This evening, Amherst's expedition approaches deserted Pointe au Baril (modern Maitland, Ontario) to erect a battery ashore. Next day, the 13-gun, brigantine-rigged corvette Outaouaise (“Ottawan”) of Capt. Pierre Boucher de Labroquerie fires a signal-gun to warn Gov. Pierre Pouchot at nearby La Présentation (today Ogdensburg, New York), then weighs anchor to engage the enemy. Col. George Williamson's five armed galleys meet this challenge, hammering Outaouaise into submission after a three-hour struggle.

AUGUST 20, 1760. After marshalling his strength, Amherst resumes his advance up both banks of the Saint Lawrence against the French stronghold of Fort Lévis on Île Royal (today Chimney Island, New York). This log fort is defended by 200 French militiamen and five guns under Capt. Pierre Bouchot, plus the 12-gun, 160-ton, 100-man corvette Iroquoise of Commo. René La Force, beached offshore. The English bombard this place for three days, losing their prize Outaouaise (pressed into service as Williamson) and the snows Onondaga and Mohawk to Bouchot's counterfire. Finally, the French ammunition is exhausted by August 24, a wounded Bouchot being obliged to surrender the next day.

AUGUST 27, 1760. Murray's army reaches Valrennes, close to the east end of Île de Montreal, digging in to await the arrival of Amherst's and Haviland's contingents. Many disheartened French Canadian militiamen surrender to his forces, reducing Lévis's strength within Montreal to 2,500 men.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1760. Haviland's army arrives on the south shore of the Saint Lawrence, opposite Montreal.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1760. Surrender of Montreal. Amherst's 6,500-man army appears nine miles west of Montreal, bringing total British strength to 17,000 men, thus collapsing the morale of its outnumbered and beleaguered French garrison. Lévis requests terms and capitulates two days later; he surrenders on September 9 and is transported to New York along with his regulars as prisoners of war. The remaining portions of Canada quickly pass under English control.

OCTOBER 10, 1760. Commodore Colville's squadron sails toward its winter quarters at Halifax, arriving by October 24.

OCTOBER 17, 1760. At dawn, the 50-gun HMS Hampshire of Capt. Coningsby Norbury, 28-gun frigate Boreas of Samuel Uvedale, and 20-gun sloop Lively of Frederick Lewis Maitland intercept a French merchant convoy one day out of Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien)—the latter escorted by the 32-gun frigates Duc de Choiseul, Prince Edward, Fleur de Lys, and 20-gun sloop Valeur. Due to faint breezes, the British pursuit is hampered until evening, when the wind freshens.

At midnight, the Boreas engages the Sirène but is damaged aloft and forced to fall astern until 2:00 p.m. of October 18, when the French frigate is once more overhauled off the eastern tip of Cuba. The Sirène strikes 2 hours and 40 minutes later, having suffered 80 casualties, as opposed to 1 killed and another wounded aboard its Royal Navy opponent. The Lively has meanwhile used its sweeps to get alongside the Valeur this same daybreak, pounding it into submission after an hour and a half, with 38 killed and 25 injured aboard the French sloop. The Hampshire gets between the Duc de Choiseul and Prince Edward around 3:30 p.m., forcing the latter to be run aground and burned by its crew. The Duc de Choiseul escapes into Port au Paix, but the Fleur de Lys is found in an unprotected bay to leeward of this place on October 19. It is scuttled rather than be captured by the Hampshire and the Lively.

FEBRUARY 12, 1761. Charles III issues the “Pardo Declaration” whereby he rejects the Treaty of Permuta’s redrawn boundaries between the Spanish and Portuguese spheres of influence in South America (see “January 13, 1750” entry in “Spanish American Disturbances”). Shortly thereafter, Brazilian colonists begin settling in the Viamont and Yacuy territories.

MARCH 1761. Indian raiders destroy Cabagna (Costa Rica).

JUNE 3, 1761. Dominica. Having been scattered by stormy weather during their month-long passage from New York, the transports bearing four battalions of regulars, several companies of American Rangers, and an artillery train under 57-year-old Scottish-born lieutenant colonel (brevet Brigadier General) Andrew, Lord Rollo—escorted by the 64-gun Stirling Castle of Michael Everitt; the 50-gun Norwich of William McCleverty, Falkland of Francis Samuel Drake, and Sutherland of Julian Legge; the 44-gun frigate Penzance of Acting Capt. John Boyd, the 32-gun Repulse of John Carter Allen, plus the 28-gun Lizard of James Doake—fail to appear together at Guadeloupe.

Undaunted, the English commander decides to launch an immediate strike against the French garrison on Dominica with his early arrivals, before the enemy should learn of his presence. Having been reinforced by 300 West Indian militiamen under Colonel Melville, the expedition departs Basseterre by June 4, accompanied by Commo. Sir James Douglas’s Dublin (flag), Belliqueux, Montague, and Sutherland, plus a few frigates.

Two days later, they materialize three miles off Dominica’s principal town of Roseau and send a pair of emissaries ashore at noon to call upon the 2,000 island residents to surrender. After some con-

Fall of Pondicherry

On the far side of the Pacific, the last French stronghold in India surrendered on January 15, 1761. Pondicherry was the second foothold gained by the Compagnie des Indes Orientales along the Coromandel Coast as long ago as 1674, after it suffered a setback against the Dutch. A town was created there nine years later, which was captured by the Dutch in 1693. When they returned it four years later as part of the peace settlement, its fortifications were much improved. Trade then surged as of the 1720s and 1730s. Bolstered by this prosperity, the French East India Company further strengthened Pondicherry’s defenses and raised local Sepoy regiments.

These regiments campaigned very effectively on behalf of their Indian allies, as well as against British East India Company interests during King George’s War. When hostilities between England and France resumed in 1757, the aggressive lieutenant general, Thomas Arthur, Baron de Lally and Comte de Tollendal, was sent out as the new governor of French India. He disembarked in April 1758 and initiated a vigorous offensive, which soon ran out of steam. A hot-tempered man of Irish descent, he alienated many French colonial officials and local rulers.

The British meanwhile launched a campaign under the famed lieutenant general Robert Clive to impose their rule over all of India. Gradually, French detachments were defeated, and their outposts eliminated. The veteran colonel Eyre Coote at last began to close in on Pondicherry in early September 1760 with 4,500 British troops and sailors, plus 10,000 native auxiliaries, backed by 16 warships. Lally was pressed back inside, with only 1,000 men and a crowd of civilians.

The siege of Pondicherry tightened as of November 27, 1760, and the British batteries opened fire on December 6. Even though nine blockading warships were lost in a typhoon on New Year’s Day 1761, Coote persisted. The sick and starved French defenders finally offered to capitulate two weeks later. Their main gates were occupied on January 16, and the town itself was entered the next day. The victors evacuated their foes, then leveled the fortifications and burned the town. Although it was their hope that Pondicherry would never be reoccupied, the ruined town was returned to France two years later. Although rebuilt, it never again posed a threat to Britain’s monopoly over India.

fusion, the French governor de Longprie prepares to resist but is powerless to prevent an English disembarkation at 5:00 p.m. Melville quickly outflanks the defenses with the grenadier companies of the 4th and 22nd regiments, while Rollo leads the main English force against de Longprie's headquarters, snuffing out all resistance by nightfall. The invaders' losses total 8 killed and wounded.

JUNE 5, 1761. The 74-gun Centauro of Capt. Arthur Forrest captures the armed French merchantman Sainte Anne, pierced for 64 guns but only mounting 40.

AUGUST 15, 1761. Spain signs a secret "family compact" with France whereby they agree to join the war against Great Britain by spring 1762.

NOVEMBER 19, 1761. At the town of Cisteil (Yucatán, Mexico), an Indian baker known as "Jacinto" to the Spaniards—but Canek among his own people—leads a native uprising. When troops from the nearby Sotuta garrison under Capt. Tiburcio Cosgaya attempt to put down this rebellion, they are defeated, and half their number is slaughtered.

The provincial governor José Crespo y Honorato is obliged to send a sizable contingent under Cristóbal Calderón de Helguera to deal with this situation. The Spaniards fight their way into Cisteil, but Canek wins free, eventually being captured at the Huntulchac Hacienda. He is conducted into Mérida de Yucatán and broken alive upon a wheel in its main square on December 7.

NOVEMBER 22, 1761. Rear Admiral Rodney arrives alone at Carlisle Bay (Barbados), his squadron having been scattered during his transatlantic crossing. He is to assume command of the Leeward Islands's station from Douglas and marshal an expedition against Martinique. Immediately upon arriving, Rodney detaches Douglas's ships to blockade Saint Pierre (Martinique) and bombard its batteries.

DECEMBER 9, 1761. Rodney's three missing ships of the line, two frigates, and three bomb vessels reach Barbados.

DECEMBER 14, 1761. A convoy of British transports arrives at Barbados from Belleisle (France), escorted by HMS Téméraire and a frigate, bearing a large contingent of troops.

DECEMBER 24, 1761. Maj. Gen. Robert Monckton reaches Barbados with a troop convoy from British North America, escorted by three ships of the line and a 40-gun frigate.

JANUARY 5, 1762. Martinique Overrun. Rodney and Monckton set sail from Barbados with 13,000 troops and 1,000 auxiliaries, escorted by the 70-gun flagship Marlborough under the flag captain John Hollwell and Commo. Sir James Douglas's 74-gun vice-flagship Dublin under the flag captain Edward Gascoigne. The rest of the fleet is comprised of the 84-gun Foudroyant of Robert Duff; the 74-gun Dragon of Augustus John Hervey and Téméraire of Matthew Barton; the 70-gun Temple of Lucius O'Brien and Vanguard of Robert Swanton; the 64-gun Modeste of Robert Boyle Walsingham, Stirling Castle of Michael Everitt, Devonshire of George Darby, Raisonné of Molyneux Shuldham, and Alcide of Thomas Hankerson; the 60-gun Nottingham of Samuel Marshall; and the 50-gun Rochester of Thomas Burnett, Sutherland of Julian Legge, Norwich of William McCleverty, and Falkland of Francis Samuel Drake.

They are accompanied by the 44-gun frigates Woolwich of William Bayne and Penzance of John Boyd; the 40-gun Dover of Chaloner Ogle; the 32-gun Echo of John Laforey, Stag of Henry Angell, and Repulse of John Carter Allen; the 28-gun Actaeon of Paul Henry Ourry, Crescent of Thomas Collingwood, Lizard of James Doake, Levant of William Tucker, and Nightingale of James Campbell; the 20-gun sloops Fowey of Joseph Mead, Greyhound of Thomas Francis, and Rose of Francis Banks; the 16-gun Ferret of Cmdr. James Alms; the 12-gun Virgin and Zephyr of Cmdr. John Botterell; the 10-gun Antigua of John Neale Pleydell Nott and Barbados of Cmdr. Stair Douglas; plus the 8-gun bomb vessels Basilisk of Cmdr. Robert Brice, Thunder of Lt. Robert Haswell, Grenado of Lt. James Hawker, and Infernal of Cmdr. James Mackenzie.

This expedition joins Douglas's advance squadron off Martinique two days later, anchoring in Saint Pierre's Bay by January 8. From here, a unit is detached under Commodore Swanton to reconnoiter Petite Anse d'Arlet farther south, near Fort Royal (modern Fort de France), while another of five frigates makes a feint against La Trinité. Masked by these distractions, the initial British disembarkation takes place at Saint Luce in Sainte Anne's Bay on January 10 under covering fire from Douglas's squadron (which has earlier lost the 64-gun Raisonné on a reef). The distance to the island capital proves too great and difficult, however, so the British army blows up Sainte Anne's works and reembarks, proceeding by sea toward Fort Royal on January 14.

Early on the morning of January 16, the Royal Navy ships enter adjacent Cas des Navires Bay and open fire against its French batteries, silencing them by noon and thus allowing the troops to be landed. By sunset, two-thirds of the army are ashore, followed next day by the rest, plus 900 marines. The invaders establish a fortified camp, while the blue-jackets land artillery to clear the nearest French heights, Morne-Tartenson and Morne-Garnier.

By January 24, the British have their fieldpieces in place and launch a dawn assault against the former height. Col. William Rufane's brigade and the marines on the right, supported by 1,000 seamen in boats offshore, overrun battery after battery. Meanwhile, the massed grenadier companies, plus Lord Rollo's Brigade, slowly drive back the defenders in the center thanks to a flanking maneuver by Scott's Light Infantry. The Morne-Tortenson heights are won by 9:00 a.m., the British then coming up against still-higher Morne-Garnier. Brig. Gen. William Haviland secures a foothold on its left but, while digging in his batteries, is struck by a counterattack on the evening of January 27. His troops not only repulse it but, in turn, capture all the French batteries on the lower slopes of Morne-Garnier, even stealing to its summit by midnight. Defeated, the French governor general Louis Charles Le Vassor de La Touche leaves 1,000 men to hold Fort Royal while retiring with the bulk of his forces toward Saint Pierre.

The invaders drive on through difficult terrain, establishing a new battery atop Morne-Capuchin, which compels Fort Royal's citadel to beat for terms by the evening of February 3. Next day, 800 defenders surrender along with 170 guns, while Ramiers Island and 14 privateer vessels capitulate to Rodney out in its harbor. Fort Royal is renamed "Fort Edward." Hervey is thereupon dispatched with a small squadron to support the frigates off La Trinité, disembarking 500 seamen and marines, which seize that port. By February 16, the remaining portions of Martinique capitulate, this campaign having cost the British 500 casualties. Capt. George Darby of the Devonshire and Maj. Horatio Gates (later an American Revolutionary War hero) are delegated to convey dispatches announcing this victory to London, where each is rewarded with £500 from the king.

FEBRUARY 24, 1762. After the fall of Martinique, Hervey is detached to blockade Saint Lucia with the vessels Dragon, Norwich, Penzance, Dover, and Basilisk. He calls upon its French governor de Longueville to surrender and, after being rebuffed, attacks the next day. Seeing the warships approaching the harbor mouth, the outnumbered defenders capitulate.

MARCH 3, 1762. Commodore Swanton's blockading squadron is joined off Grenada by an expedition of British troops comprised of Brig. Gen. Huntington Walsh's 5th Brigade and a light-infantry corps under Lieutenant Colonel Scott. After the small garrison of regulars and numerous privateersmen refuse to capitulate, Walsh disembarks the next morning with the Grenadiers Light Infantry and the 27th Regiment. The governor agrees to surrender this island and the adjoining Grenadines by March 5. The British 95th Regiment is then sent to occupy St. Vincent, whose 1,100 inhabitants offer no resistance.

MARCH 7, 1762. This Sunday afternoon, the French rear admiral Charles, Comte de Blénac Courbon (grandson to the 17th-century West Indian governor general; see "October 3, 1677" entry in "Third Anglo-Dutch War and Franco-Spanish War") arrives from Brest off southeastern Martinique with his 80-gun, 1,800-ton flagship Duc de Bourgogne; the 74-gun, 1,500-ton ships Hector of Louis de Chatillon, Comte de Sanzay, Diadème of the Chevalier Fouquet, and Défenseur of Louis Armand Constantin, Prince de Rohan Montbazoin; the 64-gun, 1,100-ton Protée of Pierre-Claude Hocdenau, Comte de Breugnon, Dragon of the Chevalier des Roches, and the Brillant of Etienne Pierre, Vicomte de Rochechouart; the 32-gun, 550-ton frigate Opale of the Chevalier Doisy; the 28-gun, 425-ton frigates Diligente of Bory, and Zéphyr of the Chevalier de Grasse de Barre (perhaps François-Joseph, Comte de Grasse Tilly?); plus the 16-gun, 200-ton corvette Calypso of Duchilleau. They are furthermore bearing 3,000 regulars from the Juercy, Foix, and Boulognois regiments to bolster France's Caribbean garrisons.

Next evening, Blénac bears down upon Presqu'Île de la Caravelle and detaches Calypso to reconnoiter its coastal town of La Trinité, learning that Martinique is entirely in English hands. At 8:00 a.m. on the morning of March 9, his squadron briefly pursues the 44-gun English frigate Woolwich and 28-gun Aquilon, which flee northward to advise Rodney. On March 10, Blénac continues northwest toward Saint Domingue (Haiti), standing in to Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien) one week later; the Dragon strikes a hidden reef while entering and goes down with 50 hands that same March 17.

APRIL 4, 1762. This evening, the French corvette Calypso enters Havana, Captain Duchilleau presenting dispatches from Admiral de Blénac next day to the Spanish governor Juan de Prado proposing a joint operation against Jamaica. The Spaniard demurs, preferring to husband his resources for other duties, and Duchilleau departs the Cuban capital on April 10 to begin the two-week beat back into Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien).

APRIL 20, 1762. Pocock and Albemarle's expedition reaches Carlisle Bay (Barbados) from England with four regiments for the forthcoming campaign against Havana. Three days later, this fleet sails for Cas des Navires Bay on Martinique, arriving by April 26 to be further augmented by Rodney and Monckton's victorious forces.

On Thursday, May 6, Pocock and Albemarle get underway once more, heading northwest and being joined next day by a trade convoy out of Saint Kitts. They plan to rendezvous with other English contingents off Cape Saint Nicholas Mole (Cap du Môle, Haiti).

MAY 3, 1762. In Europe, a Spanish division crosses the Portuguese frontier after several weeks of diplomatic threats—yet without officially declaring war—because of the latter country's friendliness toward England, thus dragging another belligerent into the hostilities. Britain supports Lisbon with an expeditionary force.

MAY 27, 1762. Having been further reinforced by a squadron from Jamaica under Commo. Sir James Douglas, Pocock and Albemarle's expedition clears Cape Saint Nicholas Mole.

Their warships are manned by slightly more than 14,000 officers and men, plus another 3,000 hired sailors working the 160 transports, victuallers, ordnance ships, and hospital ships accompanying them to convey Albemarle's army. The latter force constitutes another 12,000 men.

JUNE 1762. Zamboes raid the Matina Valley (Costa Rica).

JUNE 2, 1762. At 9:00 a.m., the 22-gun frigate Mercury—advance scout of Pocock's expedition—spots five unidentified sail approaching out of the west. They prove to be the 22-gun Spanish frigate Tétis and 18-gun armed store-ship Fénix, escorting a hired Spanish brig and two private schooners from Havana sailing toward Sagua to pick up a cargo of timber. Despite faint winds, the 38-gun frigate Alarm chases these two Spanish men-of-war into the shallows by 2:00 p.m., engaging them in a one-hour gun duel before compelling both to strike. The other three Spanish craft seek refuge closer inshore, thus allowing the British fleet to press on toward Havana without any warning being carried into the Cuban capital.

JUNE 6, 1762. Siege of Havana. At dawn, lookouts atop Havana's harbor castle or morro espy a huge mass of ships 20 miles to the east and by 8:00 a.m. sound the alarm. After a perfunctory telescopic examination by Governor de Prado, the sails are dismissed as an England-bound Jamaican convoy, so the garrison stands down. It is not until 1:00 p.m.—after the English expedition has drawn considerably nearer—that the Spaniards are at last fully aroused, their strength consisting of 2,500 infantrymen of the Havana, Aragón, and España regiments, 1,000 city militiamen, 100 Havana and 200 Edimburgo Dragoons (the latter without mounts), and 70 gunners. Another four militia regiments—2,800 men, 700 of them being poorly trained and equipped lancers—can be raised from outlying districts.

A further 1,000 marines and 4,000 seamen are serving aboard the Marqués del Real Transporte's anchored 70-gun flagship Tigre (official name, San Lorenzo) under the flag captain Juan Ignacio de Madariaga, Aquilón (officially called San Damaso) of Vicente González y Bassecourt, Marqués González, Infante (also named San Luis Gonzaga) of Francisco de Medina, Neptuno (official name, San Justo) of Pedro Ignacio Bermúdez, Reina of Luis Vicente de Velasco, and Soberano (officially designated San Gregorio) of Juan García del Postigo; the 60-gun América (official name, Nuestra Señora de Belén) of Juan Antonio de la Colina, Asia of Juan Francisco Garganta, and British siege of Havana.

Europa (official name, Nuestra Señora del Pilar) of José Díaz de San Vicente; plus the 58-gun Conquistador of Pedro Castejón. The newly launched San Antonio and San Genaro have not yet been commissioned.

Unprepared, the Spaniards react frantically, not even having their log boom in place. By 2:00 p.m., the English expedition has drawn within six miles of Havana's entrance, at which time Albemarle transfers aboard his younger brother Augustus Keppel's Valiant to stand in toward shore, searching for a suitable disembarkation point. Pocock presses on west of the city with most of the other warships and nontransports as a feint. Before the invaders can surge ashore, however, a storm breaks, obliging the British to defer their landing.

The Spanish spend that ensuing night dispatching their best soldiers—the grenadier companies and pickets of the Aragón, España, and Havana regiments plus 200 marines—to meet Pocock's threat, but they fail to reinforce the tiny outposts at Bacuranao and Coximar where Albemarle actually intends coming ashore. The storm blows itself out, and redcoats begin boarding their landing craft at 6:00 a.m. the next morning, to stand in toward Bacuranao three hours later under covering fire from the frigates Mercury, Richmond, and Trent, sloop Bonetta, and bomb vessel Basilisk. The redoubt's few defenders flee, and by 10:30 a.m. the first British troops wade ashore. Albemarle joins them, and by 3:00 p.m. he has amassed several thousand troops, who subsequently march upon the square, 10-gun, stone fortress of Coximar, where some Spanish companies have rallied. The Dragon, along with the Bonetta, plus the bomb vessels Basilisk and Thunder, work close inshore to provide support fire, again putting the Spaniards to flight. At this point, the Dragon sends across its marines to secure this abandoned fortress, until Albemarle's regulars can arrive overland.

The English army thereupon encamps for the night and on the morning of June 8 strikes directly south toward Guanabacoa in three columns, believing the Spanish to be concentrating here. Yet only 600 troops (with 120 hastily acquired mounts) confront them under Col. Carlos Caro of the Edimburgo Regiment, the Spanish high command's attention still being distracted by Pocock's feint farther west. Caro confronts Col. Guy Carleton's leading column a half mile north of Guanabacoa, but his rattled troops break and flee after a half-hour's long-range skirmishing.

Albemarle and his staff therefore enter this town at noon and, by 4:00 p.m., witness the scuttling of the Spanish Neptuno in Havana's channel as a block ship. At 8:00 p.m., the untried defenders holding

La Cabaña heights begin firing at shadows, drawing heavy artillery fire from their own ships, the Aquilón and Conquistador, out in the harbor. This confused two-hour exchange not only results in 20 Spanish casualties—no English soldiers being anywhere near—but more importantly convinces Governor de Prado to order this high ground abandoned without a fight.

At 8:00 a.m. of June 9, the Spanish scuttle Asia astern of the Neptuno (despite the fact that Havana's log boom is at last installed). The English land commander meanwhile changes his line of advance, choosing to veer northwestward against Havana's eastern headland and El Morro, notwithstanding its imposing natural obstacles plus indications that a quick strike might carry the less well-defended city. Col. William Howe's scouts report that El Morro's promontory is set upon solid rock, making it impossible to dig approach trenches, while also protected by a trench 100 feet wide and 60 feet deep, invisible from out at sea.

Albemarle nevertheless leaves a flank guard in Guanabacoa under his second-in-command George Elliott, then retraces his steps into Coximar with the main body to march along the shoreline toward La Cabaña and El Morro. This maneuver allows the Spaniards time to recuperate from their initial shock and bolster El Morro's defenses. The Reina's 51-year-old captain Luis de Velasco is sent across with 400 seamen as artillerymen—thus raising the garrison's strength to more than 1,000 men—while on the night of June 9–10, the Europa is furthermore scuttled out in the channel.

Pocock meanwhile anchors off Chorrera Inlet, three miles west of Havana, while Albemarle establishes his supply beachhead at Miraguanes Point, two miles east of El Morro. Mounted Cuban irregulars under Capt. Diego Ruiz clash on the afternoon of June 10 with Elliott's advance guard at Corral Falso, killing and capturing a few redcoats before being driven off by an English counterattack, which claims Ruiz's life. Toward evening, Pocock sends the 64-gun Belleisle inshore (backed by the vessels Cerberus, Echo, Bonetta, and Lurcher) to bombard the ancient six-gun Spanish redoubt at Chorrera as a feint to distract the defenders from Colonel Carleton's stealthy advance through the eastern underbrush to occupy La Cabaña heights.

At 1:00 on Friday morning, June 11, the colonel's men overrun this Spanish position just as a rain-storm bursts, the Tigre, Aquilón, Soberano, and Conquistador opening up a desultory counterfire from out in the harbor. At dawn, the commandeered 30-gun private merchantman Perla is also warped into its channel by naval lieutenant Francisco del Corral to shoot at the English atop La Cabaña from closer range. Pocock meanwhile resumes his bombardment of La Chorrera, with such intensity that Col. Luis de Aguiar's militia defenders abandon this outpost by 11:00 a.m., allowing it to fall to a Royal Marine landing party around noon. Pocock then shifts his bomb vessels Basilisk and Thunder toward the San Lázaro Inlet to commence a galling fire against Havana's walls.

Albemarle's sappers and sailors struggle amid torrential downpours to drag his siege train into position atop the eastern headland, while Cuban guerrillas cut off several score English foragers and seriously alarm the invaders' encampments—where disease is also beginning to spread. It is not until June 22 that the first British siege mortars open fire against El Morro (killing 43 and wounding 243 of its garrison over the next week). At dawn of the 23rd, a pair of English howitzers also opens up from La Cabaña, obliging the Spanish ships Infante, Soberano, Tigre, and Aquilón to withdraw deeper into the harbor two days later. On Sunday the 27th, Pocock detaches the Defiance and the Hampton Court with nine lesser craft to probe westward along the coast in search of a suitable anchorage, in case of storms. Next dawn, they fight their way in past two scuttled ships blocking the mouth of Mariel, 25 miles west of Havana, seizing the 24-gun Spanish frigate Venganza of Capt. Diego Argote and the 18-gun store-ship Marte or "Mars" of Domingo Bonachea, plus occupying this port.

During the night of June 28–29, 720 troops under Col. Alejandro de Arroyo slip out of Havana aboard darkened boats, gliding across to El Cabresante from where they ascend El Morro's eastern headland to fall upon Albemarle's main siege works. Another 500 men under Lt. Col. Ignacio Moreno support this attack with a flanking maneuver, while 400 men under naval lieutenants Francisco del Corral and Juan de Lombardón advance upon an English battery being installed at an abandoned lime kiln at the foot of La Cabaña. All these contingents attack at sunrise of June 29 but encounter stiff resistance; Arroyo's and Moreno's forces suffer 38 killed, 70 wounded, and more than 100 captured (as opposed to 10 British casualties and 17 prisoners). Del Corral's sally is beaten off with 37 casualties and a large number of captives, and the naval lieutenant himself is badly wounded.

British assault columns pouring through the breach in El Morro's northeastern bastion on the afternoon of July 30, 1762. (Author's Collection)

The besiegers now hope to panic El Morro's demoralized garrison by simultaneously bombarding its eastern ramparts with two recently completed batteries of a dozen 24-pounders and four 13-inch mortars and its seaward face with a Royal Navy squadron. At first light on Thursday, July 1, the new batteries open fire, and at 8:00 a.m. HMSS Dragon, Cambridge, Marlborough, and Stirling Castle bear down to join in, accompanied by the frigate Trent. The Stirling Castle refuses to close, but the other three ships of the line drop anchor a couple of hundred yards off El Morro's northern face between 9:00 and 9:30 a.m. and pound it for the next five hours. But de Velasco's defenders refuse to yield, and the battered English men-of-war eventually withdraw, having suffered 44 dead and 148 wounded. El Morro endures 130 casualties and numerous dismounted guns, yet it remains unbowed.

Over the ensuing fortnight, almost 500 Spaniards are killed or injured within this citadel by continuous English shelling, although replaced every night from Havana, while the besiegers' sick lists soar to more than 3,500 men. On Sunday, July 11, Commo. Sir James Douglas's 50-gun Centurion appears out of the west, escorting a 160-ship Jamaican convoy toward London. Pocock and Albemarle commandeer cotton bales out of these merchantmen, dragging them onto El Morro's stark headland to be extemporized into fascines. Eliott also retreats from his flanking position at Guanabacoa, adding his contingent to Albemarle's dwindling ranks.

Before dawn of July 18, Pocock's San Lázaro battery is overrun by 300 Cuban militiamen, who make off with 18 English prisoners after spiking three of its guns. That same afternoon, Douglas's Jamaican convoy departs, yet within the next two days its bales allow the siege engineers to drive their lines to the very edge of El Morro's moat, from where a party of sappers dart across its northern walkway to begin mining the northeastern corner. To retard this operation, 1,500 Cuban militiamen slip out of Havana and assault the English encampments before sunrise of July 22, their initial approach being checked by 30 men of the 90th Regiment under Lt. Col. James Stuart. The green Cuban recruits do not press home their attack and are driven off within the hour by the Third Battalion of the 60th Foot (Royal Americans), who pursue these attackers down to the water's edge, killing, wounding, or capturing 250—as opposed to 50 English casualties.

Another 60 Spaniards are also slain or injured within El Morro while trying to support this sally. El Morro appears doomed, so on July 24, de Velasco—who a fortnight earlier has been taken wounded into Havana to convalesce—returns, relieving the Infante's Francisco de Medina.

At first light of July 28, 7 transports materialize out of the east bearing 1,700 troops from New York. They disembark at Chorrera by evening to begin recuperating from their voyage. They represent the first portion of a much larger contingent that has quit New York in two units. Sixteen transports were sent out on June 9, escorted by the 60-gun Intrepid of Capt. John Hale and smaller Chesterfield, with 668 men of the 46th Regiment of Foot and 335 of the New York City Independent Companies, plus 222 New Jersey, 217 Rhode Island, 90 New York, and 904 Connecticut provincials. Another 14 transports departed on June 30, escorted by the 40-gun frigate Enterprise of Capt. John Houlton, 28-gun frigate Lizard of Francis Banks, and 16-gun sloop Porcupine of Harry Harmood, bearing 590 soldiers of the 58th Regiment of Foot and 253 of Gorham's Rangers, as well as 477 New York provincials.

On the morning of July 21, the transports Juno and Masquerade of this first convoy run aground north of Cuba, only the latter being refloated (although all of the Juno's complement are later saved). That same afternoon, the second convoy blunders into the Chevalier de Fouquet's 74-gun Diadème, 64-gun Brillant, and 36-gun frigate Opale near the Caicos, having its transports Britannia, Pelling, Betsy and Sally, Nathaniel and John, and Hopewell seized with 488 soldiers aboard. Before dawn of July 24, Hale's first convoy again comes to grief when his consort Chesterfield and transports Industry, Smiling Nancy, Swallow, and Masquerade run aground on Cayo Confites, near Cayo Romano. The surviving passengers and crews remain behind, until Hale can send craft from Havana to their rescue.

During the night of July 29–30, a pair of Spanish schooners tow a floating battery out of Havana's harbor and around El Morro headland to open fire upon the English sappers. They suffer few casualties, the Spanish vessels being driven off. At sunrise, de Velasco's beleaguered garrison prepares to repel an English assault, retiring into its subterranean quarters at midday to eat and rest. At 1:00 that same afternoon, July 30, English charges are detonated, and El Morro's northeastern bastion explodes. Col. William Keppel and military engineer Lt. Col. Patrick Mackellar send the 1st Royal Regiment of Foot (later the Royal Scots) scrambling into this breach, followed by the 90th and 35th Foot. Although only numbering 650 men, this assault force overwhelms the 800 stunned Spaniards inside El Morro: both de Velasco and his 40-year-old second-in-command, the Aquilón's Marqués González, fall mortally wounded, along with another 341 defenders. Another 37 are wounded and 326 captured, slightly more than 100 Spaniards reaching Havana alive.

Artillery fire now rains down upon the city from both La Cabaña and El Morro, while 2,000 New Englanders advance from their San Lázaro encampment to occupy Jesús del Monte. On August 2, the frigate Echo brings in seven more transports from the second New York convoy (which have escaped de Fouquet's squadron). After transferring the bulk of his troops to the eastern peninsula and installing more batteries to encircle Havana, Albemarle sends a message to Governor de Prado on August 10, calling for surrender. Rebuffed, the English general orders his artillery to pound the city the next day, prompting La Punta's panic-stricken garrison to abandon their fortress. De Prado requests terms that same afternoon, which are agreed upon by the 13th; 936 Spanish regulars march out of Havana the next day to capitulate, along with a large naval contingent. Another 2,000 Spaniards remain injured or sick within the hospital, 3,800 having died during the siege. The British report 2,764 casualties due to death, wounds, desertion, or capture, many others still being diseased. The surrender of Governor de Prado's command not only includes the city but also the western third of Cuba from Cape San Antonio to Sagua, 160 miles farther east. Detachments of redcoats are therefore sent out to occupy these towns.

JUNE 12, 1762. Spain officially declares war against Portugal, more than a month after invading that country (see "May 3, 1762" entry).

JUNE 23, 1762. Newfoundland Campaign. The 39-year-old French commodore Charles Henri Louis d'Arsac, Chevalier de Ternay, materializes from Brest off Bay Bulls with his 74-gun flagship Robuste under the Chevalier de Ternay; the 64-gun Éveillé under François Aymar, Baron de Monteil; the 30-gun frigate Licorne of de Sillart de Surville; as well as the 26-gun transports Biche of Dupuy and Garonne of "Clonard" (actually, an Irishman named Sutton). This expedition is carrying 600 troops under the marine colonel Joseph-Louis-Bernard de Cléron, the Comte d'Haussonville, plus 160 Irish Catholics led by Sutton who are intended to spearhead a revolt of their fellow countrymen against English rule.

On June 24, this landing force marches on Saint John's, twenty miles farther to the north, and takes the town three days later. A systematic destruction of all English fisheries ensues, some 460 vessels being seized or destroyed. Capt. Thomas Graves—the British governor for Newfoundland, who is lying at Placentia with his 50-gun Antelope and 24-gun Siren—immediately requests aid from Commodore Colville at Halifax. The latter sets sail on August 10 with his 70-gun flagship Northumberland, John Jervis's 40-gun frigate Gosport, and the 20-gun Massachusetts sloop King George. By August 25, both contingents are blockading de Ternay within Saint John's harbor.

On September 11, 1,300 New York troops arrive via Louisbourg under Lt. Col. William Amherst and are disembarked two days later at Torbay, its French occupiers being easily driven back; yet, on the foggy night of September 15–16, de Ternay's squadron slips its cables and escapes out into the Atlantic. D'Haussonville's garrison is consequently compelled to surrender by September 18.

JULY 26, 1762. Up the San Juan River in Nicaragua, a British expedition from Jamaica and Miskito allies approach Fort de la Imaculada Concepción at 11:00 a.m. aboard seven large boats and numerous lesser craft, disgorging along both banks and closing in by 3:00 p.m. The Spanish garrison commander, Capt. José Herrera y Sotomayor, has died unexpectedly 11 days previously, so Lt. Juan de Aguilar y Santa Cruz commands the defenders during 6 days of resistance, inspired by the heroic examples of the dead captain's 19-year-old daughter, Rafaela Herrera. Diseased and discouraged, the British finally lift their siege and retreat on August 3.

JULY 27, 1762. Having been notified three months earlier by the royal frigate Victoria of Spain's impending declaration of war against Portugal, the River Plate's 47-year-old governor Pedro Antonio de Cevallos Cortés y Calderón (also spelled "Ceballos") has been secretly marshalling an expedition. Getting wind of these preparations on July 27, the Portuguese authorities at Colônia do Sacramento in Uruguay (see "October 2, 1704" entry in "Queen Anne's War") brace to receive an assault.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1762. A Spanish force sets sail from Buenos Aires under Governor de Cevallos, consisting of the 26-gun royal frigate Victoria of Lt. Carlos José de Sarria; the private merchantman Santa Cruz of the Mendineata Company; 3 dispatch vessels; 12 gunboats; and 15 troop transports bearing 700 regular infantry troops, 200 dragoons, 1,800 militiamen, and numerous native laborers. Another 1,200 Jesuit-led Indians depart the mission district around that same time, while a 113-wagon Spanish siege train travels overland from Montevideo.

Starting as of September 7, de Cevallos's expedition takes a week to disembark in Uruguay. From this advance staging area, it is his intent to attack the nearby Portuguese settlement of Colônia do Sacramento as soon as he receives final authorization from Madrid. On September 28, a tartan arrives from Cadiz with word that war has officially been declared as of June 12 (see "May 3, 1762" entry), so de Cevallos's host advances on October 1.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1762. French admiral de Blénac sails from Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien) with five ships of the line and two frigates, bearing 600 regulars of the Murcia and Granada Infantry regiments, who have marched across this island from Santo Domingo as belated reinforcements for Cuba. Two days later, de Blénac deposits them at Santiago de Cuba and learns that Havana surrendered four weeks previously, after which he proceeds into the Bight of Léogâne to rendezvous with a homeward-bound French merchant convoy. He eventually wins his way clear of the Caribbean, although losing one merchantman in the Windward Passage to the 22-gun English frigate Echo of Capt. John Kendrick and another pair to privateers operating out of New Providence (modern Nassau, Bahamas).

SEPTEMBER 10, 1762. On orders from the Portuguese general Freire de Andrade (ennobled four years previously as Conde de Bobadela), his regional subordinate colonel, Thomáz Luíz Osório, arrives at Castilhos on the shores of Merín Lagoon with 400 men of the Dragoon Regiment of Rio Pardo, 10 small artillery pieces, plus a work column, to commence construction a month afterward of a border keep to be called Fort Santa Tereza in honor of Bobadela's personal patron saint.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1762. The 400 Portuguese infantrymen, 40 troopers, 32 gunners, 230 militiamen, and assorted crewmembers of 10 small vessels defending Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay) are reinforced from Rio de Janeiro by a 10-ship convoy

Siege of Manila

In a single blow, a British expedition sailed from Madras in India to attack the most far-flung corner of Spain's empire. On the afternoon of September 23, 1762, look-outs at the entrance to Manila Bay were astonished when this fleet rose out of the South China Sea. Rather than halt to await the pilot boat, the 13 ships swept past, leadsmen working in their chains. None of the men-of-war, fully half being heavy two-deckers, displayed any flag or fired a salute. They simply disappeared into the enormous harbor.

At its far end, residents panicked when these unknown warships dropped anchor near the naval base of Cavite, 10 miles short of Manila. The 870 Spanish defenders were roused from their peacetime lethargy. Next morning, a boat visited the silent and menacing squadron with a message from the acting governor of the city, Archbishop Dr. Manuel Antonio Roxo. The reply was that England and Spain had been at war for almost nine months, shocking news that had not yet reached the Philippines.

As a result, Rear Adm. Samuel Cornish had brought an 1,800-man army under Brig. Gen. William Draper to conquer the city and its islands. The boat returned into Manila with a call for its immediate surrender, which was rejected by that afternoon. British frigates then bore down on the sleepy hamlet of Malate, about a mile southeast of the capital, and opened fire so that Draper's army were able to disembark overnight. His troops were joined by more than 1,000 Royal Marines and sailors from Cornish's warships, as well as several hundred Indian porters.

By dawn of September 25, the invaders had probed north into the very outskirts of Manila, and a siege began. Sallies and countersallies ensued for 10 days, during which the redcoats were infuriated by the Filipinos' practice of beheading British bodies. When the besiegers finally burst through a breach at dawn of October 6, they butchered every defender they could find. Hundreds leaped into the Pasig River to escape, where more than 300 drowned.

escorted by the frigate Nossa Senhora da Estrêla of Capt. João da Costa de Ataíde and the brigantine São Pedro e São Paulo. Although conveying only 65 soldiers, this expedition nonetheless brings in abundant ammunition and supplies.

OCTOBER 1, 1762. Sacramento. De Cevallos's expedition appears a mile and a half outside Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay), proclaiming their intention to attack this Portuguese outpost, while simultaneously erecting a siege camp. Saplines are begun, the garrison shooting their first defensive rounds on October 5 after the attackers draw close to its walls. The Spaniards respond by firing heated rounds into the settlement, then calling upon its defenders to surrender on October 6, a proposal that is rejected. The besiegers maintain only a poor naval blockade, however, and de Sarria's squadron allows Portuguese vessels to slip in and out with resupplies. Nevertheless, two batteries of 24- and 18-pounders commence battering a breach by October 11, while mortars drop shells behind the Portuguese ramparts.

A pair of gaps appear by October 20, but de Cevallos prefers to renew negotiations one week later with the wounded garrison commander—Brig. Gen. Vicente da Silva da Fonseca—rather than storm the walls; they finally hammer out capitulation terms by October 30. Three days later, the gates swing open and 2,355 Portuguese soldiers and sailors surrender with full honors of war, along with 1,600 civilians. Spanish casualties during this campaign total 12 dead and 200 wounded, while their booty includes 87 artillery pieces and 26 vessels anchored in the roadstead—mostly British ships.

NOVEMBER 2, 1762. River Plate Campaign. An Anglo-Portuguese expedition arrives at Rio de Janeiro, spearheaded by the private English vessels Lord Clive (former Kingston) of 50 guns and the 28-gun frigate Ambuscade. Both have been purchased from the Royal Navy by a group of London investors, to be sailed by captains John Macnamara—an ex-East India Company officer—and William Roberts in a surprise raid against the River Plate before word can precede them of the latest outbreak of war between Portugal and Spain. During a stopover at Lisbon, the two have furthermore been joined by a pair of Portuguese transports bearing 500 troops under Lt. Col. Vasco Fernandes Pinto Alpoim, plus five store ships, all nine setting sail on August 3, 1762, for Brazil.

Macnamara departs Rio for the River Plate on November 21, accompanied by the 38-gun Portuguese frigate Glória, and is disappointed upon arriving to find its Spanish defenders already alerted. He thus steers toward recently conquered Colônia do Sacramento in hopes of retaking it. On January 6, 1763, Macnamara anchors close offshore with his two English and one Portuguese man-of-war, while the transports wait farther out at sea. After a three-hour bombardment of the Spanish defenses, smoke can be seen rising from Lord Clive, which explodes and takes 272 of its 350 crew members down with it—including Macnamara. The badly mauled Ambuscade, with 105 of its own dead and 40 wounded, subsequently leads this defeated expedition back into Rio de Janeiro.

JANUARY 1763. Having refurbished Sacramento, Governor de Cevallos leads two columns eastward in a coastal sweep through what is today northeastern Uruguay to eliminate other Portuguese outposts. East of Negra Lagoon, Fort Santa Tereza is taken with ease on February 19 as Colonel Osório has only 150 men remaining of his unpaid, demoralized garrison. Similarly, Fort San Miguel offers scant resistance at the Chuy Narrows, launching an unsuccessful 400-man sally before its defenders melt away, leaving only 25 officers and 280 troops to surrender to the 3,000 advancing Spaniards. The town of Río Grande (Brazil) is therefore abandoned by Gov. Eloy Madureira and occupied by the Spaniards on April 24. It is there where de Cevallos is eventually informed of the cessation of hostilities in Europe as of April 8 and so concludes his campaign.

As of November 3, 1762, a triumphant England has also signed peace preliminaries with French and Spanish representatives at Fontainebleau, marking an effective end to their hostilities. By their terms, Britain will retain Canada and all of France's North American possessions east of the Mississippi (except the islands of Saint Pierre and Miquelon off Newfoundland), plus Spanish Florida, which Madrid agrees to cede in exchange for Havana's return. To compensate Spain for this loss, Louis agrees to give Louisiana to Charles III. In the Caribbean, Britain is to retain possession of Grenada, Dominica, Saint Vincent, and Tobago, while Martinique, Saint Lucia, Guadeloupe, and Marie-Galante are to be restored to French rule. Elsewhere, the victorious British also secure vast new territories in Africa and India, thus establishing their first global empire.

BOUNDARY DISPUTES (1763–1774)

The conclusion to the Seven Years' War finds Europe's powers spent, and a renewed conflict will not erupt for another generation. Nevertheless, minor frictions persist in the New World, some of them as a direct result of the recently realigned borders.

FEBRUARY 23, 1763. At Magdalenenburg Plantation on the Canje River in Berbice (Guyana), slaves revolt against their brutal Dutch masters, sparking a general uprising throughout this region. By March 8, Gov. Simon van Hoogenheim abandons Fort Nassau, sailing down the Berbice River with its terrified white populace crammed aboard three large merchantmen, the slaver Adriana Petronella, and a few sloops. Some 2,000 black rebels then take over the evacuated district under their leader Coffy.

On March 28, the hired English brigantine Betsy reaches van Hoogenheim's isolated refugee camp at Fort Andries, bringing 100 Dutch reinforcements from Suriname. After an initial probe up the Canje is repelled at Fredericksburg Plantation by black rebels under Fortuyn, the Dutch troops recapture Dageraad by March 31. On April 2, hundreds of blacks under Accara attack this outpost from different directions, suffering heavy losses.

After five weeks of uneasy negotiations, Coffy himself attempts another all-out assault on May 13, storming Dageraad's ramparts with three columns of 500–600 men apiece. They are decimated by accurate counterfire from the 10-gun Sint Eustatius bark Zeven Provinciën out in the river, plus the entrenched troops, so that after five hours' fighting the poorly armed rebels withdraw, having suffered considerable losses as opposed to a dozen Dutch dead and 10 wounded.

A stalemate thereafter ensues, until Capt. Maarten Haringman's warship Sint Maartensdijk arrives from Holland on October 28, bearing 150 soldiers—the first contingent of a much larger expedition organized by the States-General to restore order under Lt. Col. Jan Marius de Salve. By this time, the disgraced Coffy has already committed suicide, and the blacks have fallen out among themselves along tribal lines. On December 19, van Hoogenheim pushes upriver from Dageraad, encountering little round his vital baggage train while his light forces, trailing behind, act as a mobile reserve. When the frustrated Indians attack Bouquet's encampment again the next morning, they are repulsed with heavy casualties, then broken when the British light forces catch them from the rear on August 6, producing a wholesale rout.

Both sides suffer comparatively heavy losses during this clash, yet Bouquet is able to march the remaining 150 miles and relieve Fort Pitt a week later. Native hopes that France might resume its former role in North America gradually fade, while the more conciliatory actions of Amherst's successor, Maj. Gen. Thomas Gage, win over a number of tribes and cause dissension among the rest. The rebellion loses momentum, and Pontiac lifts his siege of Detroit. He accepts British rule by spring 1765, but this change of heart makes him enemies among his own people, and he is murdered four years later by a Peoria warrior.

JUNE 1763. A band of Zamboes under chiefs Alamar and Quiantales raid the Matina Valley (Costa Rica).

NOVEMBER 29, 1763. The French officer Bougainville (see "May 8, 1756" entry in "French and Indian War") drops anchor between Santa Catarina Island and the Brazilian mainland with his brand-new, 300-ton frigate Aigle under Capt. Nicolas Pierre Duclos-Guyot. Although bearing a temporary commission as captain in France's Royal Navy, Bougainville is actually bringing a private expedition to establish a colony in the uninhabited archipelago 300 miles east of the Strait of Magellan, known as the Falklands or Malouines.

These 2 large and 200 small South Atlantic islands have been known to sailors since the late 16th century. When the English salvor John Strong sailed through in January 1690, he named them the "Falkland Islands" in honor of Lucius Carey, Viscount Falkland (see "February 20, 1690" entry in "King William's War"). French sailors out of Saint Malo also came to know about this grouping, dubbing it the Malouines (see "June 24, 1699" entry in "The Darien Disaster"). This latter name will be transcribed later into Spanish as Maluinas, which will evolve into "Malvinas"—the "u" and "v" being interchangeable in 18th-century script.

After being welcomed ashore by the Portuguese governor Francisco Antônio Cardoso de Meneses y Sousa and refreshing provisions, Bougainville resumes his voyage southwestward on December 14. He hopes to meet his slower consort, the 120-ton corvette Sphinx under Lt. François Chenard de La Giraudais, which has become separated.

DECEMBER 28, 1763. Bougainville's Aigle anchors off Montevideo, to a cool reception from its Spanish governor, José Joaquín de Viana. The French commander does not reveal his destination, but he obtains some supplies. Three days later, his consort Sphinx arrives.

The reunited vessels depart on January 14, 1764, steering south. The suspicious Spanish governor will dispatch a warning to Madrid.

JANUARY 31, 1764. Bougainville's expedition sights the Sebaldes or Jason Islands, steering east into the heart of the Falklands Archipelago. After exploring for 11 weeks, he will found his first formal establishment at Port Louis on the largest eastern island by April 5. The Sphinx immediately sets sail to carry word of this new foundation to Guadeloupe in the West Indies. Bougainville departs three days later with the Aigle, leaving behind 30 residents.

JUNE 1764. The newly appointed French governor general at Saint Domingue (Haiti)—34-year-old Vice Adm. Charles-Henri, Comte d'Estaing—lays claim to the Turks and Caicos islands, provoking heated diplomatic recriminations from London. Eventually, the French are obliged to retire, this grouping being annexed to Bahamian authority.

AUGUST 1764. Determined not to cede any more of Río Grande do Sul Province, its newly appointed Portuguese governor—Col. José Custódio Faria—completes the construction of a new border keep christened Fort São Caetano da Barranca do Estreito and installs a garrison of four companies of regulars under Capt. Francisco Pinto Bandeira, while simultaneously commencing work on Fort Tebiquari (modern Taquari).

JANUARY 1765. The 40-year-old English circumnavigator John Byron touches at the Falkland Islands with HMS Dolphin of 24 guns and 150 men and the 14-gun Tamar under Cmdr. Patrick Mowat, leaving a small party behind at Port Egmont on its main western or Saunders Island before striking out into the Pacific. He is unaware of any French settlement in the archipelago. Once he regains London in May 1766, Byron reports upon the strategic value of this group, so the British government sends out Capt. John Macbride with the 32-gun frigate Jason and 100 settlers aboard three lesser consorts to maintain its claim upon this territory.

Meanwhile, the Spanish government has lodged a protest with Paris about Bougainville's original colony, which the French agree to withdraw on condition that this explorer be indemnified for his expenses. Bougainville duly makes a second voyage out to Buenos Aires, where he is joined by the Spanish naval captain Felipe Ruiz Puente, and continues on to Port Louis, which is renamed "Puerto de Nuestra Señora de la Soledad" and given over to Spanish rule on April 1, 1767. After the French depart, Ruiz begins corresponding with the English settlers at Port Egmont on the western island, insisting that they, too, must leave. Cmdr. Anthony Hunt therefore departs toward England for instructions aboard his 14-gun Tamar.

MAY 22, 1765. Embittered by the implementation of new taxes during a period of economic depression, a mob several thousand strong—summoned out of the poorer neighborhoods of Quito (Ecuador) by evening church bells and fireworks—demolishes the royal customs house in Santa Bárbara Square, plunging the city and its surrounding district into several weeks of anarchy.

When local authorities attempt to restore order a month later by arresting more than two-score ring-leaders, which they punish with public floggings and duckings in water, a second uprising erupts on the evening of June 24, quickly escalating into violence in which two or three people are slain. The audiencia palace and homes of prominent peninsular Spaniards are ransacked, and Crown rule effectively lapses and is replaced by a broad-based popular coalition of local Creoles, who attempt to contain subsequent outbursts (although some more radi-

Antonio de Ulloa

Antonio de Ulloa y de la Torre Guiral was born at Seville on January 12, 1716. The second son of the city mayor, who was also an economist of repute, both he and his brother showed great promise in mathematics at the Colegio Mayor de Santo Tomás. The elder Fernando was destined for the army and become a military engineer. The younger Antonio was sent to Cadiz by his parents at the age of 13 to enroll in the Royal Spanish Marine Academy. As there were no vacancies, he sailed in 1730 as a volunteer aboard the South American plate fleet of Adm. Manuel López Pintado. Over the next two years, he visited Cartagena, Portobelo, Havana, and Santo Domingo.

Upon returning to Spain, de Ulloa reapplied and was accepted to the Marine Academy on November 28, 1733. By then, though, he was aboard the royal warship Santa Teresa, escorting reinforcements from Barcelona to Italy for the campaign against the Austrians. Shortly after regaining Spain late in 1734, the 18-year-old was assigned to the "Geodesic Mission" because of his intellectual gifts.

This scientific expedition was organized by the French Academy of Sciences to take exact measurements at the equator in Peru, and de Ulloa's participation shaped the future course of his life. After reaching Cartagena the next summer with his 21-year-old Spanish colleague Jorge Juan y Santacilia and being joined by the French delegation, they proceeded into Peru by spring of 1736 (see "July 9, 1735" entry in "Interwar Years"). Eight years of stimulating research ensued. By the time the 28-year-old de Ulloa left Callao on October 22, 1744, aboard the French frigate Délivrance, he carried a wealth of observations. When two accompanying vessels were captured off the Azores by British warships, the Délivrance limped toward Louisbourg in Nova Scotia for repairs. Instead, it was seized in mid-August 1745, as this French stronghold was then in English hands.

Yet when de Ulloa reached England as a prisoner, he was befriended by men of science and elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in April 1746. Freed with all his papers by July, he traveled through Lisbon to Madrid. De Ulloa and Juan were reunited and promoted to junior captains. They then wrote accounts of their trip. When published two years later, they both became famous and full captains as of October 24, 1748. They toured Europe, studying naval and scientific techniques.

Because of his work on natural platinum at the gold mines of Chocó (Colombia), de Ulloa was also appointed on July 11, 1754, as the new governor for the troubled royal mercury mines at Huancavelica (Peru). He did not actually assume this post until November 4, 1758. Five turbulent years ensued, during which time he bickered with the corrupt local parties. Despite failing to achieve reforms, he was promoted to rear admiral and received orders on July 13, 1764, to go to Havana, where he received a new assignment as governor of Louisiana. This position proved to be even more difficult, for he was chased out in less than two years.

cal elements even call for full independence from Spain).

Once passions cool, the numerous differences among the city's diverse ethnic and social groupings, plus fears of an Indian descent out of the hinterland, sap the coalition's unity and hasten calls for a peaceful restoration of royal control. When a column of viceregal troops finally enters Quito on September 1, 1766, under the conciliatory governor of Guayaquil, Antonio de Zelaya, they are enthusiastically received.

MARCH 5, 1766. The 50-year-old rear admiral Antonio de Ulloa arrives at New Orleans with 90 troops to assume office as Louisiana's first Spanish governor, after a difficult five-year tenure in a similar capacity at the mercury mines of Huanacavelica (Peru). Despite his fluency in the French language and customs, many local residents remain resentful of their transfer to Madrid's rule, and they complicate de Ulloa's task.

MAY 28–29, 1766. Overnight, a mixed force of Portuguese regulars under Col. Marcelino de Figueiredo from Fort São Caetano and local Brazilian irregulars attempt to surprise the Spanish garrison holding the town of Río Grande, failing when high winds disperse their flotilla of boats.

DECEMBER 25, 1766. After reoccupying Concepción (Chile) following a 40 years' truce with this district's Mapuche or Araucano Indians (see "Spring 1723" entry in "Turmoil"), the Spaniards are again subjected to a major native uprising when they attempt to resettle the Mapuches into three large towns. Their chieftain, Curiñancu, torches the churches and dwellings of the Spanish troops under maestre de campo Salvador Cabrito, who withdraw north of the Bío-Bío River.

MAY 14, 1767. Jesuit Expulsion. At dawn, a Spanish dispatch vessel sails into the harbor at Havana. Its captain presents Gov. Antonio de Bucareli with a sealed order from King Charles III, which is not to be opened until the night of June 15–16. A packet of similar secret letters is also to be forwarded by the Cuban governor to Crown officials in other Spanish territories.

Fearful that a war is about to be declared, Bucareli gathers his senior staff on the appointed evening and calls out his city garrison. Instead, the surprised officers read that they are to arrest every Jesuit in Cuba and immediately deport them to Cadiz. By sunrise of June 16, bewildered clerics are being herded aboard a vessel.

Troops will be used to make similar mass arrests on June 25 in Mexico City, on July 12 in Argentina, on July 31 in Bogotá, on November 30 in California, and so on. More than 2,600 Jesuits are sped across the Atlantic to join another 3,400 already expelled from Spain. The king has allegedly done so because of the society's "constant meddling in politics," its challenges to royal authority, and its burning of Bishop Palafox's books in Mexico. But other reasons have also moved Charles, which he says are guarded "in my royal soul." One may be the suspicion of Jesuit involvement in the March 1766 food riots in Madrid, which obliged the king to briefly flee his capital and dismiss his chief minister. For all of this, the Society of Jesus has been dissolved and its vast Spanish American properties added to the Crown's lands.

OCTOBER 27, 1768. In New Orleans, a French mob—after two years' fruitless attempts to get Louisiana's transfer to Madrid rescinded—spike the city guns, then swarm through the streets the next afternoon, prompting the Spanish governor de Ulloa to seek refuge aboard the frigate Volante out in its harbor. De Ulloa sets sail for Havana on November 1, after which the Creole leaders offer allegiance to the English at nearby Pensacola and even contemplate independence.

AUGUST 17, 1769. Spanish Louisiana. The 45-year-old, Irish-born inspector general and a knight of the Order of Alcántara, Alejandro O'Reilly y McDowell, reaches New Orleans this afternoon from Havana with 2,000 Spanish troops aboard a frigate and 23 lesser consorts to reimpose Madrid's rule over the 5,500 inhabitants of this former French colony. O'Reilly proceeds mildly, Spanish rule is peaceably proclaimed on August 18, and the 12 ring-leaders of Creole independence are arrested at a breakfast three days later (half are later executed and the others transported to Cuba). O'Reilly departs early in March 1770, leaving Luis de Unzaga y Amézaga as interim governor of the pacified province.

DECEMBER 3, 1769. In Chile, a raiding party of Pehuenche Indians under Chief Lebián eradicate the Spanish settlements on La Laja Island, then defeat 30 soldiers under Cabrito, before overrunning the garrison at Santa Bárbara on December 9 and severing all communication with the fort at Purén.

JANUARY 1, 1770. The Spanish garrison holding Antuco (Chile) is struck by a surprise native attack, suffering 14 killed and 80 wounded.

JUNE 10, 1770. The Falklands. Capt. Juan Ignacio de Madariaga's frigates Industria, Santa Bárbara, Santa Catalina, and Santa Rosa, plus the xebec Andaluz, surprise the English settlement at Port Egmont. This squadron has been dispatched by Buenos Aires's governor Francisco Bucareli to expunge the British claim and bears 1,400 soldiers and a siege train under Col. Antonio Gutiérrez.

Although the English have erected a wooden blockhouse and an eight-gun battery of 12-pounders, these are no match against such a force. The Spaniards wade ashore, and after a token exchange of shot, Royal Navy commanders William Maltby and George Farmer sue for terms. They and other settlers are detained for the next 20 days, then permitted to sail for England aboard their sole remaining vessel, the 16-gun Favourite, while the new occupiers rename the town "Cruzada" and assume ownership.

When news of this seizure reaches Britain, it produces a heated public outcry. Paris refuses to back Madrid in its predicament, so the Spaniards are eventually obliged to back down on January 22, 1771, alleging that this act was done without Charles III's authorization. They offer to restore Port Egmont as it existed before being captured, and the 32-gun frigate Juno of Capt. John Stott arrives in April to resume British rule, accompanied by the 14-gun Hound and store-ship Florida.

(Three years later, Britain unilaterally abandons the Falklands because of the cost of maintaining such a remote garrison.)

SEPTEMBER 21, 1770. Spanish efforts to suffocate Mapuche resistance in southern Chile are dealt a severe blow when 200 troops marched across from Buenos Aires are attacked and decimated atop Marigüño Hill. Peace will not be fully restored until the 1784 Treaty of Santiago de Tapihuc.

MAY 16, 1771. Regulator Revolt. After prolonged resentment against southeastern residents of the Carolinas, who control its government and commerce, certain Scotch-Irish settlers in its northwestern corner—calling themselves Regulators—refuse in the spring of 1771 to have anything more to do with this province. Gov. William Tryon raises 1,018 militiamen and 30 light cavalymen to put down this rebellion, marching west and burning many farms and homes.

On May 16, his army confronts 2,000 half-armed Regulators at Alamance Creek (20 miles west of Hillsboro, North Carolina), defeating them in a two-hour battle in which he suffers 9 killed and 61 wounded. Some 20 Regulators die, 50 are injured, and a dozen captured—of whom 10 are later hanged, effectively ending this insurrection.

LATE DECEMBER 1772. Holland dispatches 800 soldiers—plus the gunboats Charon and Cerberus—to Suriname under Swiss-born colonel Louis-Henry Fourgeoud to subdue several thousand runaway slaves or "maroons" settled along its Upper Cottica River. Despite repeated campaigns over the next few years, the latter prove too elusive to be brought to battle.

NOVEMBER 1773. After repeated complaints about Portuguese cross-border cattle raids out of Río Grande do Sul Province, the Spanish governor of Buenos Aires—Mexican-born Juan José de Vértiz y Salcedo—leads more than 1,000 men northward from Montevideo to begin erecting early the next year the large, pentagonal Fort of Santa Tecla at the confluence of the Negro and Piraízinho rivers (near modern Bagé), intending to use it as an advance base against the Brazilian guerrillas.

The latter respond to this incursion when 100 local militiamen under Rafael Pinto Bandeira ambush a Spanish supply column at Santa Bárbara on January 2, 1774. Three days later, Vértiz scatters a 21-man Portuguese detachment from Piquiri, but he is defeated at Tabatingá on January 10 and is chased back to the occupied town of Río Grande.

OCTOBER 10, 1774. Point Pleasant. In Kentucky, the inland expansion of English settlers following the collapse of French influence produces a series of skirmishes with the local Shawnee, Delaware, Wyandotte, and Mingo (western Iroquois) natives—becoming known as “Lord Dunmore’s War” after Virginia’s governor John Murray, Earl of Dunmore.

In autumn, Dunmore links up with 1,100 Virginia militiamen under Col. Andrew Lewis at the confluence of the Kanawha and Ohio rivers. On the night of October 9, a Shawnee army under Chief Cornstalk crosses the Ohio and attacks the colonials at dawn. In a fierce day-long fight, the Virginians hold their position, and by evening the Indians withdraw, having suffered heavy casualties. The militiamen endure 50 killed and 100 wounded, but native power in the Ohio Valley is broken.

UNDECLARED HISPANO-PORTUGUESE CONFLICT (1775–1777)

In South America, the expansion of both Spanish and Portuguese territories creates competition, which eventually explodes into open hostility. Due to the reluctance of each belligerent’s European allies, these campaigns are never endorsed by any official declaration of war.

OCTOBER 1775. Along the undefined jungle border between Guyana, Venezuela, and Brazil, a Spanish expedition under Antonio López explores and claims the Parima district at the Orinoco headwaters, only to be ambushed while retiring into Venezuela’s plains by a sizable Portuguese contingent, which has recently founded a new settlement at the Mao River mouth.

OCTOBER 31, 1775. The Brazilian guerrilla chieftain Rafael Pinto Bandeira, with 200 riders, surprises and takes the 40-man Spanish garrison holding the border keep named Fort São Martinho.

FEBRUARY 19, 1776. The Spanish brig Santiago, the auxiliaries Misericordia and San Francisco, the schooner Pastoriza, and the corvette Dolores, anchored under Capt. Francisco Javier de Morales off the occupied town of Río Grande (Brazil), are suddenly attacked from out at sea by two Portuguese frigates, two store ships, a sloop, and four armed boats under Irish-born commodore William Robert MacDouall. Although expecting to be backed by a simultaneous assault ashore by units from the reorganized, 4,500-man Portuguese army in the district under Lt. Gen. Johann Heinrich Böhm—an Austrian mercenary sent to Brazil almost nine years previously—MacDouall’s warships are in fact left unsupported. They thus suffer heavy losses and are repelled after a three-hour firefight during which the Spaniards suffer 15 killed and 25 wounded, while sinking the Portuguese sloop and burning another beached vessel the next day.

FEBRUARY 28, 1776. Pinto Bandeira and Maj. Patricio Correia Câmara of the Rio Pardo Dragoons attempt to surprise the 250-man Spanish garrison holding Fort Santa Tecla near Bagé after a stealthy approach with their 193 guerrilla riders, 366 dragoons, and 60 Indian chasseurs. The defenders resist, yet become besieged and finally surrender on March 25, marching off next day toward Montevideo, while the exultant Portuguese throw down the fort’s walls.

MARCH 5, 1776. Lagoa dos Patos. Despite MacDouall’s earlier repulse, the Portuguese army under Böhm musters to evict the 1,500-man Spanish garrison holding the town of Río Grande (Brazil), laying siege to it for 27 days. Eventually, 200 grenadiers of the Royal Bragança and Moura regiments under Maj. José Manoel Carneiro de Figueiredo steal across the Lagoa dos Patos at 3:00 a.m. on April 1, seizing Fort Trinidad, despite being detected and fired upon by the anchored Spanish Santa Matilde. Another 200 grenadiers of the Royal Rio de Janeiro and Estremoz regiments under Maj. Manoel Soares Coimbra simultaneously take Fort Mosquito by 4:30 a.m., turning its artillery upon the Spanish warships. Böhm brings 1,100 more troops across the river by dawn, while MacDouall's squadron appears and bombards Forts Ladino and Novo.

The outlying Spanish batteries and outposts surrender by the morning of April 2, after which their surviving units withdraw from the town toward Fort Santa Tereza. The Spanish flagship Santiago and two lesser vessels escape out to sea, the other four having been beached and burned. When news of this unexpected Portuguese victory reaches Europe, it will bring a halt to the diplomatic negotiations between both governments, as Madrid prepares to retaliate on a grand scale.

JUNE 20, 1776. A sergeant and 12 Spanish soldiers sent into the Mao district along the Venezuela-Brazil border are attacked by 200 Portuguese troops and 500 native auxiliaries, which were rushed up the Amazon River from Belém by the governor of Pará.

OCTOBER 22, 1776. A popular uprising occurs in Urubamba (Peru), followed by disturbances in Arequipa, which are eventually put down by a series of executions in Cuzco.

FEBRUARY 6–7, 1777. A 116-ship, 19,000-man Spanish expedition appears off Brazil, spearheaded by the fleet of Vice Adm. Francisco Javier Everardo Tilly y Paredes, Marqués de Casa Tilly and Knight of the Order of Santiago, comprised of the 74-gun Poderoso of the flag captain Juan de Lángara, San Dámaso of Francisco de Borja, Santiago la América of Antonio Asorio y Herreras, San José of José Bauzes, and Monarca of Antonio Osorio y Funco; the 64-gun Septentrión; the frigates Santa Ana, Santa Clara, Santa Florentina, Santa Teresa, Santa Margarita, Santa Rosa, and Liebre; the Chambequín Andaluz; the bomb vessels Santa Casilda and Santa Eulalia; plus three lesser consorts. They intercept a trio of Portuguese merchantmen bound from Rio de Janeiro toward Europe—although the Spanish formation's actual purpose is to retaliate on a much grander scale for recent clashes in South America. Some 8,600 infantrymen, 640 dragoons, and 150 gunners from 10 different regiments are aboard 96 transports under the veteran lieutenant general Pedro de Cevallos (see "September 3, 1762" entry in "French and Indian War"), Knight of the Orders of Santiago and San Genaro and now also viceroy designate for Buenos Aires.

Originally directed to assault the advance Portuguese outpost of Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay), de Cevallos decides to assail Brazil's Santa Catarina Island in passing, over the objections of his naval counterpart, Admiral de Tilly. While coasting southwest toward this destination, the huge Spanish fleet brushes aside MacDouall's four Portuguese ships of the line, four frigates, and four auxiliaries, which it finds anchored at Garupas on February 17.

FEBRUARY 20, 1777. Santa Catarina. De Cevallos and Admiral de Tilly materialize outside this Brazilian base, filing into Canavieiras Bay at the northern end of the island to probe for a landing spot. The entrances on either side of Ratones Island are covered by Forts São José and Santa Cruz, so the attackers disembark at nearby São Francisco Beach on the night of February 22–23, without opposition.

It is de Cevallos's aim to take Fort São José from the rear, while simultaneously shelling it from out at sea with his 60-gun ship of the line Septentrión, the Liebre, and two bomb vessels; but the 2,900 unprepared Portuguese defenders under Gen. Antônio Carlos Furtado de Mendonça abandon all their citadels without a fight, most retreating over to the mainland by boat, then deserting en masse upon being marched to reinforce Río Grande. Both of Santa Catarina's forts therefore fall into Spanish hands by February 25, along with 195 artillery pieces, after which 3,816 surviving Portuguese troops and residents gradually give themselves up by March 5 rather than face starvation in the jungle.

MARCH 28, 1777. After installing a garrison on Santa Catarina Island under Irish-born colonel William Vaughan of the Hibernia Regiment, de Cevallos sails southward with the bulk of his forces, intending to disembark at Lagoa dos Patos—again, over Admiral de Tilly's protests—and attack the Portuguese concentration at Río Grande in conjunction with a northeasterly movement out of Uruguay by a Spanish army under Vértiz. Instead, his expedition encounters such heavy weather that de Cevallos is obliged to stagger into Maldonado by April 18, without seeing action. He then detaches his heavier ships of the line on May 10 to cruise in search of MacDouall's Portuguese squadron, while retaining his lighter craft to conduct his army on toward Sacramento.

APRIL 9, 1777. Antonio Barreto, newly designated governor of the "Upper Orinoco," departs Santo Tomé de Guayana (Venezuela) with 50 soldiers aboard nine small vessels to sail upriver. He gathers an additional 50 soldiers farther inland, then probes the Portuguese defenses along the Negro River.

APRIL 21, 1777. The 74-gun Spanish ship of the line San Agustín of Capt. José N. Zapiáin and the smaller auxiliary Santa Ana (having arrived too late from Europe to overtake de Cevallos and de Tilly's expedition, as well as becoming separated from their 74-gun consort Serio and frigate Magdalena) are captured near the mouth of the River Plate by MacDouall's Portuguese squadron.

MAY 22, 1777. Sacramento. Mariscal de campo Victorio de Navia Osorio disembarks the vanguard of de Cevallos's 4,500 troops at El Molino (three miles from this Portuguese outpost) and is joined the next day by the commander in chief, despite heavy rains. This expedition is further reinforced from Buenos Aires, then begins digging its first siege works by May 30, consisting of a mortar battery, another battery of eight-pounders to fire heated shot, plus a pair of heavy pieces and other lighter ones to protect the flanks. The surprised 700 Portuguese soldiers and 300 sailors under Col. Francisco José de Rocha—already half starved because of a prolonged Spanish blockade—quickly sue for terms and surrender by the afternoon of June 4. The Spaniards' booty includes 700 prisoners, 141 artillery pieces, and 2,300 muskets.

De Cevallos spends the next two months demolishing the fortifications at Sacramento and the twin batteries on adjacent San Gabriel Island with explosives, before finally scuttling blockships to close up the harbor's entrance. He then reembarks his troops to sail east toward Maldonado on August 4. It is his intent to launch another offensive against Río Grande, but this is cancelled when news reaches

Viceroyalty of the River Plate

Since the 16th century, Spain's American empire had been made up of three viceroyalties: that of New Spain, with its capital in Mexico City; the viceroyalty of Peru, with its capital in Lima; and New Granada, with its capital at Bogotá. South America's riches had for two centuries been shipped up the Pacific coast to Panama to meet the annual plate fleets arriving from Cadiz. But when their sheltered anchorage at Portobelo was razed by the British in 1739 and other Caribbean ports were menaced, Spain's ministers began searching for an alternate outlet.

The obvious choice was Buenos Aires. Large amounts of silver could be safely brought down out of the Andes from Potosí for shipment across the Atlantic. The seaport's population therefore doubled because of this shift in pattern, from 10,000 inhabitants in 1744 to more than 20,000 by 1763, making Buenos Aires the fastest-growing city in South America. But it was not until General de Cevallos was about to set sail with a huge expedition to contest Portuguese advances out of Brazil that Charles III finally decided to elevate the region into a fourth viceroyalty.

On giving the general his commission at San Ildefonso on August 1, 1776, the king also named him viceroy of a vast new jurisdiction. The "Viceroyalty of the River Plate" was to encompass modern Argentina, Bolivia, Paraguay, and Uruguay. (A good part of southern Brazil was included as well.) De Cevallos saw that his offensive against the Portuguese came to a successful end before reaching Buenos Aires to assume office as viceroy on October 15, 1777.

Twelve days later, Charles III issued another royal decree from Spain, formally constituting the new viceroyalty. Overland trade with Peru and Chile was liberalized as of November 6, 1777, as well as seaborne traffic the next year. Soon, dozens of transatlantic merchantmen were arriving at Buenos Aires every year with goods, slaves, and so on. Millions of pesos in bullion were also being exported, plus hundreds of thousands of hides, as cattle ranching boomed. A 20-year bonanza began, eventually leading to nationhood.

him on August 27 of the restoration of relations between Madrid and Lisbon back in Europe.

JULY 9, 1777. De Tilly sets sail from Santa Catarina Island with seven ships of the line and five frigates, steering toward Río Grande. However, bad weather hampers his progress, compelling him to stand into the River Plate by July 26. While approaching harbor after nightfall, his frigate Santa Clara is wrecked on the Banco Inglés, going down with 120 hands.

The death of José I of Portugal on February 23, 1777, has produced a reversal in Lisbon's policies, as he has been succeeded by his Spanish-born queen, María Victoria, who brings an end to these disputes by a preliminary treaty signed at San Ildefonso on October 1. The Portuguese give up all claims to Sacramento and Uruguay, further agreeing to restore the ship San Agustín to Spain. The latter returns Santa Catarina Island and agrees to recognize Río Grande as falling within Brazilian territory. This agreement is finalized at El Pardo on March 24, 1778, and one month later, de Tilly's expedition quits the River Plate for home.

Independence (1775–1825)

Oh God! It is all over!

—Great Britain's Prime Minister Lord North, upon learning of the Yorktown defeat (1781)

AMERICAN REVOLUTIONARY WAR (1775–1783)

With the collapse of France's New World empire, Britain's North American subjects no longer need protection from the home country. Long-simmering political, economic, and social grievances therefore come to the fore, leading to a transatlantic split. Tensions finally come to a boil in Virginia on March 23, 1775, when its provincial convention calls for a "posture of defense," prompting Gov. John Murray, 4th Earl of Dunmore, to retaliate by seizing the powder supply at Williamsburg.

On April 14, Lt. Gen. Sir Thomas Gage, the "martial law Royal Governor" or commander in chief at Boston—under mounting pressure to take action against the spreading American sedition—decides to destroy the military supplies stored at nearby Concord and arrest any delegates headed for the Second Continental Congress. Consequently, Lt. Col. Francis Smith of the 10th Regiment of Foot is delegated to march 800 men through Lexington—an incursion that the colonial militia vows to oppose.

Paul Revere and William Dawes carry warnings of this sortie a few days later, so that Samuel Adams and John Hancock—both staying in Lexington while en route to attend the Philadelphia Congress—escape on the night of April 18. Around midnight, the consumptive Lexington militia captain John Parker draws up his 130 "minutemen," dismissing them with instructions to assemble again upon the beat of a drum.

APRIL 19, 1775. Lexington and Concord. At dawn, Smith's vanguard—six companies of light infantrymen under Maj. John Pitcairn, 200 redcoats in all—reaches Lexington, six miles short of Concord. Parker's minutemen are summoned, but because of insufficient weapons, only 70 muster upon its green while the rest run to its arsenal. Pitcairn's regulars meanwhile advance in three lines intending to surround and disarm the Americans, who give way. Although both sides are under orders not to fire, a shot rings out in the gloom, and ragged shooting commences resulting in 8 American dead and 10 wounded. Only a single redcoat receives a leg wound, while Pitcairn's horse is struck twice; but this skirmish rouses American resistance so that, by the time Smith's regiment approaches Concord a few hours later, 150 minutemen are drawn up along a ridge behind the North Bridge under militia colonel James Barrett. British captain Walter Laurie advances with three companies, while Barrett's farm and Concord are searched for hidden war stores.

At this point, Laurie's men are driven back with some losses, until Smith can bring up reinforcements and eventually break off this engagement. Having accomplished their immediate objective, the redcoats begin their return march toward Boston around noon through countryside now in a fury. From Merriam's Corner a mile outside Concord, they are har-rassed by sniper fire, unsuccessfully rallying at Fiske's Hill where Pitcairn loses his horse and pistols and Smith is wounded. Upon regaining Lexington, the British are reinforced by Brig. Gen. Lord Hugh Percy with 1,400 men and two 6-pounders, and they fight their way through until they reach the safety of naval guns at Charlestown Neck. Of the 3,765 Americans involved in these daylong clashes, 50 are killed, 40 wounded, and 5 missing. British casualties total 250 men plus 26 deserters.

APRIL 23, 1775. The Massachusetts Provincial Congress at Watertown authorizes the formation of various state regiments into a so-called Army of Observation. Still professing to be loyal subjects of the Crown, this force supposedly is intended only to "observe"—actually, to contain—the 3,000 redcoats crowded inside Boston under Gage.

Within a month, well over 12,000 colonial volunteers gather under the overall command of the sickly 47-year-old major general Artemas Ward. They are grouped into 24 Massachusetts regiments, as well as 3 each from Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. With that assembly, the Revolutionary War becomes fully joined.

MAY 2, 1775. In Virginia, the radical 38-year-old major Patrick Henry leads a rebel force to retrieve the powder seized by Governor Dunmore at Williamsburg, who furthermore agrees to pay £330 by way of compensation.

MAY 3, 1775. To obtain military stores for the Patriot cause, 34-year-old major Benedict Arnold is temporarily promoted to colonel by the Massachusetts Committee of Safety and ordered to raise a few hundred men in the western counties to seize Fort Ticonderoga, an isolated British outpost on Lake Champlain. (It will never be clearly known whether this venture is Arnold's own plan or someone else's.) Four days later, a separate force of 175 mostly Green Mountain Boys under the 36-year-old acting colonel Ethan Allen reaches Castleton (Vermont) on a similar commission out of Connecticut. They stealthily reconnoiter the British fort and realize that its garrison is entirely unaware of the state of hostilities.

On May 9, Arnold reaches Castleton with his contingent and attempts to assume overall command. Allen and his rowdy followers refuse to comply, agreeing merely to act in concert. At 2:00 a.m. the next morning, 83 of the Green Mountain Boys pile into the only two boats available at Hand's Cove and set out across the lake with Allen and Arnold. Rather than wait until the entire joint force is ferried across, both commanders lead a charge into Fort Ticonderoga at dawn on May 10. Its garrison of 2 English officers and 46 soldiers—mostly invalids, along with two-dozen women and children—is taken completely by surprise, hence Capt. William Delaplace surrenders without resistance.

Allen's cousin and subordinate, Maj. Seth Warner, then marches a group 10 miles farther north and occupies Fort Crown Point, capturing another 9 Englishmen along with 10 women and children. In this fashion, the Revolutionaries obtain 78 guns, 6 mortars, 3 howitzers, thousands of cannonballs, and 30,000 flints. On May 12, Allen sends Fort Ticonderoga's captive garrison as prisoners to Gov. Jonathan Trumbull of Connecticut.

MAY 18, 1775. Arnold sails northward from Skenesboro (New York) with 50 volunteers aboard a small schooner and several bateaux. They seize Fort St. Johns and the 70-ton sloop Enterprise, removing most supplies and torching the remainder before returning to Fort Crown Point. Allen and most of his Green Mountain Boys having departed for home, Arnold retains possession of both it and Fort Ticonderoga. However, these forts are soon conceded to Connecticut, and a regiment is sent out under Col. Benjamin Hinman to garrison both with Arnold as his second-in-command. Arnold, however, declines and departs.

MAY 25, 1775. Gage's beleaguered garrison within Boston is joined by other contingents from England under major generals William Howe, John "Gentleman Johnny" Burgoyne, and Henry Clinton, bringing their combined strength to 6,500 men. These new arrivals also bring orders to impose martial law throughout rebellious Massachusetts. However, some 15,000 colonials are encamped defiantly outside Boston, although short on ammunition and accoutrements.

JUNE 2, 1775. Faced with rising rebel sentiment, North Carolina's unpopular royal governor, Josiah Martin, reaches Fort Johnston on lower Cape Fear, having abandoned the capital of New Bern.

JUNE 12, 1775. In Boston, Gage offers a royal pardon to all insurgents except Samuel Adams and John Hancock; this proposal is ignored by his American besiegers, who learn the next day that the British intend to launch a four-pronged sally on June 18 to occupy Dorchester Heights, Roxbury, Cambridge, and the Charlestown Peninsula. General Ward and the Massachusetts Committee of Safety boldly counter by sending 49-year-old colonel William Prescott with three regiments totaling 1,600 men across to Charlestown Peninsula at 9:00 p.m. on June 16 to dig in atop Breed's Hill (rather than the higher Bunker Hill) and to repel any British disembarkation.

JUNE 17, 1775. Bunker Hill. At dawn, the British inside Boston are surprised to see colonial forces entrenched on the nearby Charlestown Peninsula. The HMSS Glasgow, Lively, Somerset, and Falcon open fire against these new American redoubts, in anticipation of the English army's sally to destroy them and subsequently march toward Cambridge to scatter the Army of Observation.

At noon, General Howe lands at Moulton's Point and just north of Charlestown with 2,400 heavily burdened redcoats, who are twice repulsed as they attempt to advance upon the colonials' lines. A simultaneous disembarkation by British light infantry at the Mystic River beach to launch a flanking maneuver is also bloodily repelled by Col. John Stark's New Hampshire troops. Reinforced by an additional 400 troops under General Clinton and a battalion of Royal Marines ferried across from Boston, Howe's third attack succeeds in driving the provincials—who are running low on ammunition—from their redoubts and eventually off Breed's and Bunker hills altogether.

However, although the Americans retreat toward Cambridge, Howe halts his pursuit at the neck of the Charlestown Peninsula. While the British have won the day and remain in possession of the battlefield, their casualties total 226 dead and 828 wounded, as opposed to 145 colonials killed and 304 wounded. More importantly, the naval bombardment of Charlestown generates much additional animosity against the Loyalist cause, such that Gage is obliged to abandon his plans for pushing inland.

JULY 2, 1775. George Washington arrives at Cambridge and the next day assumes command over the roughly 17,000 provincial troops surrounding Boston. Many of them have enlistments due to expire at the end of the year, thus necessitating the recruitment of a more professional Continental Army.

AUGUST 17, 1775. Because of a bout of rheumatic gout, 41-year-old American major general Philip John Schuyler temporarily cedes command of his 1,200 troops—gathering at Crown Point (New York) for a projected campaign against British Canada—to 39-year-old, Irish-born brigadier general Richard Montgomery. Learning that two 60-foot, 12-gun boats are nearing completion at the British base of Saint Jean 20 miles south of Montreal, Montgomery disembarks with 1,500 men at Île aux Noix on the Richelieu River by August 30, thereby preventing them from reaching Lake Champlain—an action Schuyler fully approves of upon reassuming command on September 4.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1775. Invasion of Canada. Schuyler's 1,400-man American army approaches the British base at Saint Jean (Quebec), which consists of a barracks fortified by two redoubts defended by 200 regulars and several cannon under Maj. Charles Preston, as well as an Indian contingent under Chief Sotsichouane, "the Grenadier." Disembarking from their flatboats and canoes a half mile from this stronghold, the invaders are ambushed by a 100-man Indian party under Sotsichouane and the Anglo-American Loyalist captain Gilbert Tice, suffering 16 killed. Schuyler thereupon judges Saint Jean too difficult to storm so returns to Île aux Noix with his force.

After being reinforced by another 500 New Yorkers under Col. Rudolph Ritzema, the Americans once again invade Saint Jean on September 10 and are repelled despite three assaults led by the colonel in person. Montgomery reassumes command over this American army six days later and receives a further 270 reinforcements. However, by this time British major general Sir Guy Carleton

Siege of Boston

On June 7, 1775, the Continental Congress at Philadelphia decided to raise an army for common defense. One week later, they voted to take over the temporary Army of Observation already operating in Massachusetts. Then on June 15, George Washington of Virginia was unanimously elected as commander in chief. He agreed to serve as lieutenant general without pay, only expenses. Under him would be four major generals and eight brigadier generals. A 50-article code of military conduct was also passed.

Washington reached Cambridge on July 2, 1775, with the aim of professionalizing Major General Ward's militia throng (whose enlistments were mostly due to expire by year's end). Ironically, the long stalemate with the British defenders inside Boston gave the American commander time to create three separate divisions and start drilling. He also had a chance to reorganize his Continental Army as of New Year's Day.

On January 24, 1776, Washington received 60 tons of artillery captured from Fort Ticonderoga. Henry Knox brought it across the frozen Connecticut River on sleds. At last ready to challenge the British garrison, who could not be starved into submission because the Royal Navy controlled Boston Bay, the American general suggested an assault the next month while the harbor was still frozen and boat movements would be hampered. But the Massachusetts Committee of Safety rejected this plan and instead proposed that Dorchester Heights be seized.

On the night of March 4, 1776, after a lengthy artillery duel, Washington sent several thousand Continental troops under Brig. Gen. John Thomas to scale these heights. By the next morning, they had dug in with prefabricated defenses and heavy cannon. Realizing that this sudden move atop Dorchester Heights could destroy the British ships anchored in Boston's Back Bay, critical to the garrison's survival, Howe agreed to evacuate the city. The last redcoats trooped aboard by March 17, and the last warships cleared the harbor 10 days later. Washington and his new Continental Army had won their first great victory.

has increased Saint Jean's garrison to 500 men, with another 90 stationed at nearby Chambly, frustrating the invaders' plans.

Farther east, though, Col. Benedict Arnold has set out from Cambridge (Massachusetts) on September 12 with an additional 1,100–1,200 American volunteers to advance up the Kennebec River, then down the Chaudière to attack the main British stronghold at Quebec City.

Saint Jean (Quebec), Col. Ethan Allen crosses the Saint Lawrence River this night, disembarking below Montreal with 110 men, while Col. John Brown is to lead another 200 ashore above it. The latter fails to appear, however, so at dawn on September 25, Allen's contingent is alone and faced by 35 British regulars and 200 Canadian volunteers under Carleton. Allen and 40 of his men surrender and are held prisoner for the next two and a half years.

ish armed forces in North America by Maj. Gen. Sir William Howe.

OCTOBER 18, 1775. The British outpost at Chambly (Quebec) surrenders to Montgomery's army, heartening the Americans, who tighten the siege around the larger British base at nearby Saint Jean.

OCTOBER 24, 1775. In Virginia, the heavy-handed royal governor Lord Dunmore—upon learning of Gage's offer to pardon all except two insurgents (see "June 12, 1775" entry)—flees onto a British warship and sends Capt. John Squire with six tenders into Hampton Creek to bombard the town. When a party additionally lands to set fire to this place, they are driven back by American riflemen, and Col. William Woodford arrives overnight with 100 colonial militiamen to defend Hampton against a second attack.

At sunrise on October 25, the British open fire again and move in, only to be repelled once more by heavy counterfire. Two British sloops are beached and captured, five ships are sunk, and one is captured with seven sailors aboard. There are no American casualties, however—as at Boston—this Loyalist aggression has only stiffened the rebels' resolve.

OCTOBER 30, 1775. British general Carleton vainly tries to raise Montgomery's siege of Saint Jean (Quebec) by crossing at nearby Longueuil, only to be repelled. Three days later, on November 2, this isolated, half-starved forward outpost finally surrenders to the Americans, opening the road into Montreal.

NOVEMBER 11, 1775. Montgomery disembarks above Montreal with a strong American force, while Carleton only has 150 British regulars and a few militiamen left to defend the town. The next day, Carleton's garrison evacuates aboard 11 ships as the invaders enter Montreal.

While attempting to escape down the Saint Lawrence into Quebec City, the retreating British are further intercepted off Sorel, capitulating by November 19 (although Carleton and a few officers succeed in escaping ashore in a small boat).

The Howe Brothers

It was well known that 49-year-old vice admiral Richard, Viscount Howe, and his 46-year-old brother, Maj. Gen. Sir William Howe, were sympathetic to the colonists' cause. Both had earlier seen extensive service in the Americas, and their eldest brother, George, had even died fighting at Ticonderoga in 1758. The two brothers' selection to command the British response against the American Revolutionary War was seen as a conciliatory gesture. They were men capable of using their friendships to craft a reunification rather than just conduct a military campaign.

Admiral Howe was born in London on March 8, 1726. When he was nine years old, his father died while serving as governor of Barbados. Distantly related to the royal family, the 14-year-old Richard shipped out on Commodore Anson's epic circumnavigation aboard HMS Severn in 1740, although his ship was forced to turn back. Howe then fought at the bombardment of La Guaira in February 1742, as well as aboard Admiral Knowles's flagship Cornwall off Havana in October 1748. Peacetime patrols off West Africa had ended when Howe, now a captain in command of HMS Dunkirk, helped start the French and Indian War by capturing the Alcide off Newfoundland in June 1755. He served off France for the next several years, a firm and skillful officer nicknamed "Black Dick" by his crews. After succeeding to his brother George's Irish peerage in 1758, he was elected to Parliament four years later. He then served on the Admiralty Board and as treasurer of the navy. He was promoted to rear admiral by 1770 and to vice admiral five years later.

William was born on August 10, 1729. At the age of 17, he bought a commission in the Duke of Cumberland's dragoons and fought in Flanders. He gained great distinction during the French and Indian War. First, his regiment forged ashore to help conquer Louisbourg in June 1758. He then led the crucial nocturnal ascent to the Plains of Abraham outside Quebec City, helping Wolfe win his last battle in September 1759. Promoted to brigadier general, William took part a year later in the capture of Montreal, before returning home to be elected to Parliament in 1761. He also served as adjutant general for the capture of Havana in 1762.

Both men were admired as fine and experienced officers, who often spoke in support of American grievances before the House of Commons. General Howe had even assured his Nottingham constituents in 1774 that he would resist active duty against the colonists. Despite all their talents and prowess, however, the course of the Revolution could not be diverted.

City with 600–650 half-starved survivors from his 230-mile wilderness trek from Massachusetts, American colonel Benedict Arnold crosses the Saint Lawrence River, then, from the Plains of Abraham, attempts to invade the British garrison of 50-year-old lieutenant colonel Allan MacLean of the Royal Highland Emigrants. Unable to breach the city fortifications without a siege train, the invaders must remain encamped outside until November 19, when they retire westward to Pointe aux Trembles to await the arrival of another American contingent from Montreal under Montgomery.

The latter appears by the evening of December 2, joined the next day by 600 of his troops with some artillery. The Americans still cannot fully besiege Quebec City's 1,700-man garrison (now under General Carleton), however, so instead decide to storm it from two directions in the early hours of December 31, their approach being muffled by a blizzard. Montgomery leads 500 men by a southerly route toward Près de Ville, reaching this point by 4:00 a.m., only to be suddenly killed—along with two dozen of his men—by a pair of British 3-pounders. His second-in-command, Col. Donald Campbell, quickly orders a retreat.

Arnold meanwhile approaches from Saint Roch with another 700 men by a northerly route, drawing fire, which wounds him in a knee. His second-in-command, six-foot, four-inch Kentucky colonel Daniel Morgan, pushes forward into the alerted lower town, only to become trapped in Sault au Matelot. He is obliged to surrender by 9:00 a.m. along with his 425 followers. Total American casualties are 30 killed and 42 wounded, compared to 5 dead and 13 injured among the defenders.

DECEMBER 9, 1775. Virginia's Royal Governor Lord Dunmore attempts to halt the advance upon Norfolk of Colonel Woodford's 390 rebels, choosing to make a stand nine miles outside the town at Great Bridge by fortifying one end of its causeway, which is otherwise surrounded by impenetrable swamps. Woodford arrives and builds a redoubt at the bridge's opposite end, leaving Lieutenant Travis with 90 men to hold this emplacement, while taking the remainder to a hill several hundred yards farther back.

Dunmore impetuously orders Captain Fordyce to charge across the 40-yard span, supported by Capt. Samuel Leslie's 230 men. Fordyce's first attack is driven back, so he brings up two cannon for a second attempt. The Americans deceive the British officer into thinking that their redoubt is abandoned by holding their fire until his assault column has advanced to within point-blank range. A ferocious volley kills Fordyce and sends his men reeling back in defeat. Although this whole action has taken only 25 minutes, the British suffer 62 casualties and lose both cannon, while only a single American is wounded in a hand. More importantly, the way into Norfolk now lies open.

JANUARY 10, 1776. Hoping to restore Crown rule in the Carolinas, from where he has been driven in July 1775, Governor Martin calls for Loyalists to help put down "a most daring, horrid, and unnatural rebellion." Volunteers are to gather at Cross Creek (modern Fayetteville, North Carolina), then march to the seaside town of Brunswick, below Wilmington, to be armed.

FEBRUARY 5, 1776. The Loyalist militia brigadier general Donald MacDonald and Lt. Col. Donald McLeod reach Cross Creek with a small British contingent to begin a campaign aimed at restoring Royalist rule throughout the Carolinas. Although they raise 1,600 Highlanders and Loyalists into an extemporized force within 10 days, then start toward the coast on February 20 to be supplied by Governor Martin's British flotilla anchored off Brunswick, an American concentration under Col. James Moore of the 1st North Carolina Continentals bars their path at Rockfish Creek.

MacDonald and McLeod consequently veer eastward with their ill-equipped host, crossing Cape Fear ahead of another American militia force hastening from New Bern under Col. Richard Caswell. Outmaneuvered, Caswell decides to march his 850 men "to take possession of the bridge upon Widow Moore's Creek," 20 miles from Wilmington, which he knows the Loyalists must cross to reach the coast. Moore also detaches a 150-man contingent under Col. Alexander Lillington to this same spot, while himself hoping to overtake MacDonald from the rear.

FEBRUARY 18, 1776. This morning, the 57-year-old American commodore Esek Hopkins sets sail from Delaware with the 30-gun frigate Alfred (flag) and 24-gun Columbus, the 14-gun brigs Andrew Doria and Cabot, the 12-gun sloop Providence, the 10-gun sloop Hornet, and the 8-gun schooners Wasp and Fly to attack Lord Dunmore's Loyalist squadron in Chesapeake Bay, or any other target of convenience.

FEBRUARY 25, 1776. Moore's Creek. The Patriot colonel Lillington reaches the bridge at Moore's Creek, and his 150 men dig an earthwork on its eastern side. The next day, Caswell's 850 men also arrive and dig earthworks on its western bank. Both positions are highly defensible, the wide sluggish creek being otherwise surrounded by swampy terrain. MacDonald and McLeod's 1,600 Anglo-Loyalists, only half of whom bear arms, encamp for the night six miles farther west.

Knowing that their only hope is to win through to the coast, McLeod persuades his fellow officers to attempt a surprise dawn attack against Caswell's encampment on the western bank. The Loyalists therefore resume their march at 1:00 a.m. of February 27, Capt. John Campbell and 75–80 picked Scottish "broadswordsmen" leading in the vanguard. An hour before dawn, they reach the American camp, only to find it abandoned.

Having detected the Loyalist throng, Caswell has withdrawn overnight into Lillington's trenches on the eastern side, furthermore removing the bridge's planks, greasing its girders, and deploying his artillery. The Loyalists nonetheless push bravely across at daybreak of February 27, only to break when Captain Campbell and 30 of his vanguard are easily shot down by the opening American volleys. Their retirement turns into a rout when the defenders cross Moore's Creek to pursue McLeod's main body. Loyalist losses are 30 killed, 40 wounded, and 850 captured over the next several days, including McLeod. American losses during this one-sided exchange total a single man killed and another wounded.

MARCH 3, 1776. Bahamian Raid. American commodore Hopkins bears down upon New Providence (modern Nassau) with his flagship Alfred under Capt. John Paul Jones, the Columbus, the Andrew Doria, the Cabot, the Providence, the Wasp, and two Bahamian sloops captured 50 miles away off Great Abaco Island. Notwithstanding the ample warnings given of a potential raid, the Bahamian governor, Montfort Browne, is taken completely aback, receiving the report clad in his nightshirt at the door of Government House. Shaken, he orders that warning guns be fired from Fort Nassau to muster New Providence's militia companies; these discharges also deter the American squadron from standing straight into the harbor (although two guns actually tumble from their decrepit mountings, and few volunteers gather).

Instead, Hopkins opts to circle through the Narrows into Montagu Bay, three miles from New Providence, where he disembarks 200 marines and 50 sailors under Capt. Samuel Nicholas at the mouth of Fox Hill Creek, a mile east of Fort Montagu. The British governor attempts to counter this landing by hastening two detachments overland, one to confront the invaders, the other to strengthen Fort Montagu; both, however, melt ignominiously back into their civilian homes, hence the Americans enter Nassau unopposed the next morning to receive Browne's surrender. Hopkins's squadron thereupon anchors in the roadstead and spends the next fortnight stripping the defenses of more than 100 cannon plus a considerable amount of other war matériel, before finally departing homeward with the governor and a dozen other prominent captives.

MARCH 17, 1776. The Americans' 11-month siege of Boston finally ends when General Howe orders Castle William blown up and evacuates the America's first naval hero was born John Paul on July 6, 1747, the son of a gardener at Arbigland estate in Kirkcudbright, on the south coast of Scotland. At the age of 12, he shipped out of Whitehaven as an apprentice aboard the merchantman Friendship. He made several voyages to Virginia, where his brother had settled near Fredericksburg. By 1766, Paul was serving as the 19-year-old first mate of the slaver Two Friends. Disgusted by this cruel traffic, he abandoned his lucrative position two years later at Jamaica. Sailing home to Scotland, he became second mate of the brig John.

John Paul Jones

When its captain and first mate died of yellow fever during the 1768 voyage, Paul safely brought the John into port. The grateful Scottish owners appointed him to command, and Paul made two voyages into the West Indies. While at anchor off Tobago in 1770, he ordered a sailor flogged so severely that the man died a few weeks later. Charges were laid, obliging Paul to leave the John. While visiting Virginia, his brother suggested that he change his name to "John Paul Jones" to shed his tarnished reputation. When his brother died in 1773, Jones abandoned his maritime fortunes and moved to Fredericksburg to take over the estate.

Two years later, after the Revolutionary War erupted, he hurried to Philadelphia to seek a command in the new Continental Navy. Thanks to a recommendation from the influential Richard Henry Lee of Virginia, he was appointed on December 22, 1775, as first lieutenant of the 30-gun flagship USS Alfred. After participating in the Bahamian raid, he was given independent command on May 10, 1776, of the 12-gun, 90-man sloop USS Providence. Jones made several successful cruises along the Atlantic Seaboard as far north as Nova Scotia, capturing 16 prizes by early October. Promoted onto the larger Alfred, he set sail on November 2 to raid British supply routes in Canada, returning triumphantly into Boston by December 16.

Yet for all his tactical brilliance, Jones was vain and difficult. After quarrelling with Commodore Hopkins and his superiors, he was not assigned another ship until June 14, 1777. After preparing this brand-new, 18-gun, 140-man, 300-ton sloop USS Ranger for sea, he set sail for France on November 1. Jones was to deliver news of British general Burgoyne's surrender and to assist the commissioners Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, and Arthur Lee. He would never again fight in American waters. Shortly after France allied itself with the United States in February 1778, Jones began raiding the British Isles. His attacks culminated on September 23, 1779, when his 42-gun Bonhomme Richard and two French consorts defeated HMS Serapis and HMS Countess of Scarborough off the east coast of England.

Unemployed once hostilities ended, Jones took service briefly in 1788 as a Russian rear admiral. Back in Paris, he was appointed in June 1792 as U.S. consul to treat with the Bey of Algiers for the release of American captives. Jones, however, died in his apartment on July 18 and was buried in an unmarked grave. After six years of searching, his remains were found in 1905 by the U.S. ambassador to France and returned aboard USS Brooklyn to be reburied with highest honors at the Naval Academy at Annapolis (Maryland).

last of his 12,000 redcoats aboard 140 vessels for Halifax (Nova Scotia), planning to regroup and initiate a new campaign in New York. The colonials jubilantly occupy the city, retrieving 69 usable cannon and other valuable stores. Massachusetts will remain free of British forces for the remainder of this war.

MAY 6, 1776. The British ship Surprise reaches Quebec City with supplies, effectively putting an end to its winter-long siege by the survivors of Montgomery's and Arnold's expeditions. A sally shortly thereafter by its British garrison under Carleton and MacLean chases the demoralized Americans away.

MAY 20, 1776. An Anglo-Canadian force under Capt. George Forster descends the Saint Lawrence from Fort Oswegatchie (Ogdensburg, New York), capturing 400 Americans at the nearby Cedars.

JUNE 1, 1776. British general Burgoyne and the 37-year-old Brunswick major general Friedrich Adolf Riedesel, Freiherr or "Baron" zu Eisenbach, reach Quebec City with an Anglo-German army. After disembarking the Prinz Ludwig Ernst Dragoon Regiment five days later, the remainder of this expedition proceeds upriver toward Trois Rivières on June 7.

JUNE 6, 1776. Trois Rivières. Mistakenly believing this advance Canadian outpost to be held by only 300 British troops, Patriot brigadier General William Thompson is sent forward by Maj. Gen. John Sullivan to occupy it with 2,000 Americans from Sorel (Quebec). Sailing up the Saint Lawrence, Thompson disembarks seven miles above Trois Rivières at 3:00 a.m. on June 8, then strikes inland, leaving 250 men to guard his boats. His main body is comprised of the regiments of colonels Arthur St. Clair, William Irvine, William Maxwell, and “Mad Anthony” Wayne.

A Canadian guide deliberately leads the invaders into a swamp, so they do not confront the British until dawn and in much greater numbers than anticipated because Lt. Col. Simon Fraser has recently reinforced Trois Rivières with the British 24th Regiment plus four other fresh battalions. Wayne’s 200-man vanguard immediately attacks and is initially successful, although the defenders soon drive the Americans back into the swamp from their line of trenches, killing or wounding 400, plus taking another 236 prisoners—including Thompson. British losses are only 8 killed and 9 wounded.

The American survivors return into Sorel by June 11, much discouraged, and after being joined by Arnold’s garrison—which has been driven out of Montreal by the approach of Carleton and MacLean’s 4,000 redcoats—retreat into Fort Ticonderoga (New York) by late July.

JUNE 8, 1776. Three days after appearing off Sullivan’s Island (South Carolina), Commo. Peter Parker’s 55-vessel British fleet crosses its bar and deposits General Clinton’s army on Long Island, in anticipation of securing nearby Charles Town (modern-day Charleston) as a regional base of operations. American major general Charles Lee meanwhile feverishly fortifies the city, while Col. William Moultrie prepares Sullivan Island’s 25-gun, 1,200-man garrison to resist this British incursion. Parker and Clinton delay for almost three weeks before advancing, giving the Americans ample time to strengthen their defenses.

JUNE 10, 1776. British vice admiral Molyneux Shuldham quits Halifax (Nova Scotia) with his 50-gun, 370-man flagship HMS Chatham, leading another 7 warships, which are to escort General Howe’s army aboard 120 transports into New York Harbor 19 days later. En route, they are joined by the 32-gun, 220-man frigate HMS Flora under Capt. John Brisbane, with an additional 28 transports bearing almost 3,000 Highlanders of the 42nd and 71st regiments from Scotland.

JUNE 14, 1776. Carleton reaches Trois Rivières (Quebec) with Burgoyne’s and Riedesel’s expeditionary force, creating a British concentration of 8,000 troops.

JUNE 17, 1776. Carleton’s army reoccupies Montreal.

JUNE 28, 1776. Sullivan’s Island. This morning, Parker’s Royal Navy warships bear down to bombard the earth and palmetto-log ramparts of the American fort on Sullivan’s Island (South Carolina), in anticipation of General Clinton’s expedition then pressing up-channel against Charles Town. The British simultaneously launch a 100-man diversionary attack from nearby Long Island, which is quickly repelled by Colonel Moultrie’s defenders, leaving the bulk of the subsequent fighting to Parker’s men-of-war.

The British bomb-vessel Thunder opens fire from a range of a mile and a half, while the 50-gun HMS Bristol and HMS Experiment cover the approach to within 400 yards of the frigates Active and Solebay, plus the smaller consorts Syren, Actaeon, and Sphinx. A ferocious, daylong exchange ensues, with the attackers suffering heavy casualties while being totally unable to discomfit the well-protected Americans. During the afternoon, the Actaeon and the Sphinx collide, then run aground along with the Syren. By 9:30 p.m., Parker draws off in defeat, his vessels having suffered 420 casualties as opposed to negligible

Continental Congresses

Seeking a place to express colonial grievances, as Benjamin Franklin had proposed in 1773, the First Continental Congress assembled in Philadelphia's Carpenters Hall on September 5, 1774. Twelve of the thirteen colonies sent delegates, Georgia being the sole exception, as it still needed British regulars to contain Creek border raids. Among the 55 members attending were George Washington, Samuel and John Adams, Patrick Henry, Richard Henry Lee, John Jay, and so on. They did not want outright independence; rather, they hoped to send a unified message to King George III instead of to Parliament. Upon adjourning in late October, they agreed to reconvene the next spring if their complaints were not addressed.

The Second Continental Congress opened in the Philadelphia State House on May 10, 1775, presided over by John Hancock. Amid growing tensions, its delegates agreed five weeks later to appoint Washington as commander in chief of a new Continental Army. But no rupture with Britain had as yet been authorized, and the so-called Olive Branch Petition was passed on July 5, asking the king to halt the war and try to reconcile. George III refused to even receive it, instead declaring his American colonies to be in rebellion on August 23 and urging that "the traitors [be brought] to justice."

As hostilities deepened, Congress struggled to raise money, its paper currency devaluing rapidly while its nonbinding resolutions were often ignored. Many delegates also shrank from breaking altogether with England, fearful that it would lead to social anarchy. However, more radical members—swayed by impassioned Philadelphian opinion makers such as the author of Common Sense, Thomas Paine—gradually adopted a series of resolutions that tended toward ever-greater autonomy.

But it was not until the British garrison was expelled from Boston in March 1776 that the crucial moment finally arrived. That same June, the last hesitant delegates were removed, and Congress voted a "Declaration of Independence" by July 4. When the "Liberty Bell" pealed four days later announcing the reading of this historic document to a jubilant throng assembled on the State House steps, the royal crest was torn from above the door and thrown into a bonfire. The path toward American freedom had been taken.

losses among the defenders. The British abandon their project of capturing Charles Town and retire north to join General Howe's forces investing New York.

AUGUST 12, 1776. This morning, British commodore William Hotham's 50-gun, 365-man flagship HMS Preston and seven lesser consorts appear off Sandy Hook (New York), escorting more than 130 transports bringing almost 8,900 Hessian troops out from England. This army, known as "Von Heister's Division," is comprised of eight regiments—Lieb Guards, Erbprinz or "Hereditary Prince," Prinz Carl, Dittfurt, Donop, Lossberg, Knyphausen, and Trümbach—as well as the Linsing, Block, and Minnigerode Grenadier battalions. They will disembark on Staten Island over the next few days, joining General Howe's main British army for an assault against New York City.

AUGUST 22, 1776. An American outpost on Long Island (New York) reports signs of heightened activity in General Howe's massive British concentration on adjacent Staten Island in anticipation of crossing from this marshalling area and attacking New York City. A few days later, this Anglo-Hessian army strikes across—covered by the fleet of Howe's brother, Adm. Richard Howe—then moves north toward the Brooklyn defenses, with Colonel Grant commanding 5,000 redcoats on the left, Gen. Leopold Philipp von Heister leading 5,000 of his Hessians in the center, plus generals Howe, Clinton, and Charles Cornwallis, 1st Marquess Cornwallis, bringing up another 10,000 British troops on the right. Awaiting them are 6,500 American defenders along the Brooklyn defenses under Maj. Gen. Israel Putnam, with another 3,500 out in front holding the Guian Heights.

AUGUST 24, 1776. Following his withdrawal from Canada, Benedict Arnold realizes that naval control over Lake Champlain will become important, so he departs Crown Point (New York) for Windmill Point, near the Canadian border, with a small flotilla.

AUGUST 27, 1776. Long Island. Howe's 20,000-man army bears down upon the ridge called Guian Heights, whose four passes are strongly held by 3,500 American defenders. At 9:00 a.m., the British general orders a frontal assault by his 5,000 Hessians in the center, followed shortly thereafter by an advance by Colonel Grant's 5,000 redcoats on the left.

It is Howe's aim to draw General Putnam's American reserves over to the left, then outflank all the defenses with a massive movement by his right wing.

Grant encounters stiff opposition and is killed, his left wing having to be reinforced by 2,000 more British troops from Staten Island. Nevertheless, this effort draws away the American reserves, allowing Howe to then move his remaining 10,000 men—supported by 28 guns—around behind the American left. The defenders' line along Guian Heights finally disintegrates, American major general John Sullivan being routed and captured in the center, while Brig. Gen. William Alexander fights a brave delaying action before eventually surrendering to Heister, thus allowing 2,000 Patriot survivors to safely retreat behind the Brooklyn defenses. Still, American losses total more than 1,400 killed, wounded, or captured, compared to 380 British and Hessian casualties.

Howe then presses on against the Brooklyn defenses, which the Americans abandon on the night of August 29–30. Consequently, New York City becomes closely besieged.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1776. In an attempt to blow up the 64-gun HMS Eagle, flagship of Admiral Howe's blockading fleet off New York, a one-man American submersible called the Turtle (designed by David Bushnell of Westbrook, Connecticut) is released after dark by two whaleboats. Its sole crew member, Sgt. Ezra Lee, eventually reaches his target by patiently turning his hand-crank, but he cannot then attach his "torpedo"—a cask filled with 150 pounds of powder, plus a timer—against its barnacle-encrusted hull. At daybreak, he narrowly avoids capture while retiring behind Governors Island, his mine exploding harmlessly in the water.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1776. Fall of New York. After a two-week wait, Howe resumes his drive to capture New York City, despite the relief efforts being organized by the American commander in chief, George Washington. This morning, five British warships take up station 200 yards off Kip's Bay and are followed at 10:00 a.m. by a fleet of transports bearing 4,000 redcoats out of Newton Creek (Long Island). The Royal Navy's bombardment commences at 11:00 a.m., and the British troops disembark on both sides of Kip's Bay by 1:00 p.m., as its defenders flee without offering opposition.

American major general Putnam, realizing that the invaders cannot be contained in their new bridgehead, gallops south to bring as many troops and artillery out of doomed New York City as possible. Leading them north along Post Road (now Lexington Avenue), he succeeds in evading the rapidly closing British, who have now been joined atop Onclenberg (Murray) Hill by a further 4,000 redcoats under Clinton. General Howe arrives by 2:00 p.m. and has his entire main army ashore three hours later, advancing south and west toward the Hudson River and northwest toward Harlem Heights. Washington extemporizes a three-line defense at this latter place, while the British penetrate three-quarters of a mile from their landing point by evening, establishing their own line from Horn's Hook to Bloomingdale (East 90th Street).

The next morning, a 150-man reconnaissance company under American lieutenant colonel Archibald Cray contacts the advance British troops—two infantry battalions and some men of the Black Watch, under Brig. Gen. Alexander Leslie—near present-day East 105th Street, fighting a sharp engagement that soon attracts further attention. The British are driven back when Lt. Col. Thomas Knowlton and Maj. Andrew Leitch attempt to encircle them from the right with 230 American Rangers, although both American lieutenant colonels are slain along with 28 of their men plus 100 wounded or missing, compared to 14 dead and 150 injured among the British ranks. Eventually, the British return at 2:00 p.m. with 5,000 redcoats, effectively ending all resistance around New York, as Washington draws off with his army. Nevertheless, Howe has failed to destroy the American force, thus having to spend the next month fortifying New York to secure it as his base of operations.

OCTOBER 11, 1776. After withdrawing into the half-mile channel between Valcour Island and Cumberland Head in the northwestern corner of Lake Champlain (New York), Benedict Arnold's American flotilla is attacked by a superior British force advancing down from Saint Jean under Carleton. The 12-gun British schooner Carleton leads the charge, a general engagement erupting shortly after noon. Although the attackers withdraw by dusk, most of the American ships have nonetheless been crippled, so they attempt to escape into the lake that same night.

At dawn the next day, Carleton sails in pursuit and overtakes the Americans by 11:00 a.m. of October 13 off Split Rock—28 miles short of their base at Crown Point, New York. The 110-man Washington of Brigadier General Waterbury surrenders and the Lee runs ashore, while Arnold's other vessels are beached on the Vermont shore and set ablaze. Of 15 original American ships, only the Trumbull, the Enterprise, the Revenge, and the Liberty reach Crown Point safely. The British therefore temporarily retain control over all of Lake Champlain.

OCTOBER 13, 1776. After four weeks spent fortifying New York, General Howe traverses to the mainland at Pell's Point with 13,000 redcoats to hunt for Washington's 6,000-man American army. A fortnight later, the American commander in chief falls back upon White Plains to await his enemy.

OCTOBER 28, 1776. White Plains. At dawn, Howe's army bears down upon his outnumbered American foes, bringing them into position to outflank them. Belatedly recognizing his danger, Washington immediately fortifies 180-foot Chatterton's Hill on his right with 1,600 men and two guns under Brig. Gen. Alexander McDougall, while sending out Maj. Gen. Joseph Spencer to fight a delaying action. The latter skirmishes with the approaching redcoats for an hour before finally retreating to rejoin the main body at 9:30 a.m. to avoid being entirely cut off.

Three Hessian regiments under Maj. Gen. Wilhelm, Freiherr or "Baron" zu Innhausen und Knyphausen, are meanwhile building a bridge over the Hudson, while Brigadier General Leslie also fords the river farther south with two regiments. Eventually, the bulk of Howe's 13,000-man army works its way across and engages Washington's main body. The Massachusetts militiamen facing the British dragoons on the American right are the first to flee, then Washington's center gradually gives way after stubborn resistance. The defenders' casualties total 150, compared to the 310 suffered among the British and Hessians.

Howe thereupon prepares to finish off the 6,000-man American army the next morning, but he is prevented by a heavy storm. Washington escapes with his main force once more, this time into Connecticut.

NOVEMBER 15, 1776. Howe's British army closes in on Fort Washington—a crude, pentagonal earthwork atop 200-foot Mount Washington (modern-day Harlem Heights at the northern tip of Manhattan Island, New York)—calling on its garrison to surrender this afternoon. When that offer is rejected, 7,000 British and Hessian troops prepare a three-pronged assault for the next day, while the American major generals Putnam and Nathanael Greene visit its 2,900 defenders under Col. Robert Magaw, reassuring themselves as to their positional strength. (Unbeknownst to the Americans, however, the spy William Demont has already revealed Fort Washington's weaknesses to its attackers.)

NOVEMBER 16, 1776. Fort Washington. Before dawn, Major General Knyphausen advances from King's Bridge with 3,000 Hessians aboard 30 flatboats and crosses the Hudson upriver to attack Harlem Heights on its weak northern side; Brig. Gen. Lord Hugh Percy leads another 2,000 redcoats up from the south to dislodge 800 Americans under Lt. Col. John Cadwallader, who are holding the rise one and a half miles below Fort Washington. Brig. Gen. Edward Mathew's 2,000 men are then to cross the Harlem River from the east at midday, followed by Cornwallis's reserves to complete the rout of the Americans.

Knyphausen's troops, supported by heavy artillery fire from British batteries and the 32-gun frigate HMS Pearl, push Fort Washington's outlying defenders back after stubborn hand-to-hand combat. Percy—subsequently supported by Mathew, Cornwallis, and two more battalions under Colonel Sterling—drives the Americans up Harlem Heights, securing 170 prisoners. Magaw is once more called upon to surrender overcrowded Fort Washington and agrees at 3:00 p.m. American losses total 59 killed, 96 wounded, and 2,837 prisoners, plus nearly 150 cannon and 2,800 muskets, compared to 136 dead and 646 injured among the British and Hessian troops.

NOVEMBER 18, 1776. After the fall of Fort Washington, the Americans must also evacuate their 2,000-man garrison at Fort Lee, on the opposite bank of the Hudson (New York). Cornwallis does not cross the river until two days later, bringing 4,500 redcoats ashore six miles north of Fort Lee on the morning of November 20, only to find Washington's army already escaped into New Jersey. Only 150 American stragglers are detained, plus some valuable supplies.

DECEMBER 11, 1776. Washington's retreating army crosses the Delaware River into Pennsylvania, causing Congress to abandon its headquarters at Philadelphia. His British pursuers under Cornwallis go into winter quarters shortly thereafter.

DECEMBER 13, 1776. American major general Lee is captured by a British patrol in New Jersey. Sullivan assumes command over his troops and continues their march to rejoin Washington.

DECEMBER 26, 1776. Trenton. Hoping to recuperate his demoralized army's fortunes following their recent string of reverses, Washington halts his retirement into Pennsylvania long enough to launch a surprise counterattack back across the Delaware River against the 1,400-man Hessian garrison now billeted in Trenton (New Jersey).

Col. Johann Gottlieb Rall, overall commander of these three Hessian regiments—although forewarned of an imminent American assault—misinterprets reports of this movement as a mere foraging probe so allows himself to be carried off to bed after a drunken Christmas celebration. The next morning at 8:00 a.m., 2,400 American troops with 18 guns emerge out of a fierce snowstorm, marching directly into Trenton from the north under General Greene and out of the west under Sullivan, brushing aside the garrison's few pickets. The unprepared Hessians of Rall's own Grenadier Regiment, as well as the Knyphausen and Lossberg Fusilier regiments, are driven eastward out of Trenton into open fields, where Rall is killed and 105 of his men shot dead or wounded before the 920 survivors surrender. American losses are only 2 wounded.

Despite this lopsided victory, though, Washington once again retires beyond the Delaware, his secondary attacks—with 2,000 men under Cadwalader against Bordenton and 1,000 under Brig. Gen. James Ewing against Trenton Ferry—having been unable to wholly secure his Trenton position.

DECEMBER 30, 1776. Encouraged by his Trenton success, Washington recrosses the Delaware with 2,000 men, only to encounter a superior British force advancing from Princeton (New Jersey) under Cornwallis. Fighting a delaying action until nightfall, the American general leaves 400 men with their campfires burning as a diversion, while he slips east toward Princeton with the remainder.

JANUARY 3, 1777. Princeton. At dawn, British lieutenant colonel Charles Mawhood sets out from Princeton with 1,200 men from two of his three garrison regiments to join Brigadier General Leslie on the Trenton Road. Upon reaching Clark's Orchard, though, Mawhood is confronted by 350 Americans under Brig. Gen. Hugh Mercer, and a skirmish ensues in which the latter are pushed back and Mercer killed.

British soldier in white coat and blue leggings. (Parks Canada)

At this point, Washington catches up to the British formation with his main body, dispersing it while inflicting 65 casualties and capturing 35 prisoners. The Americans thereupon march on to Princeton, where the depleted British garrison fortifies itself inside the college building, only to be flushed out by artillery. A further 200 redcoats are therefore seized, Cornwallis's reinforcements arriving after Washington has already left.

JANUARY 6, 1777. Washington's exhausted 1,600-man army retreats into winter quarters at Morristown (New Jersey).

MARCH 23, 1777. A force of 500 redcoats disembarks with four light guns from a Royal Navy frigate and some transports and destroys the American depot at Peekskill (New York), which its small Patriot garrison under Brigadier General McDougall is powerless to defend.

APRIL 23, 1777. Danbury Raid. Inspired by the success of his Peekskill foray, General Howe dispatches Brig. Gen. William Tryon with 2,000 British and Hessian troops to destroy another American depot—this time at Danbury (Connecticut). The raiders depart Long Island (New York) on April 23, landing near Fairfield by the evening of April 25. The next day, the British march 23 miles cross-country into Danbury, arriving by 3:00 p.m. to chase away its 150-man American garrison and burn a vast quantity of supplies.

Tryon thereupon returns toward the coast via Ridgefield, 15 miles farther south, while American general Benedict Arnold scrapes together 600 men and a 6-pounder to oppose him on some high ground beside the Saugatuck River. The redcoats outflank this position, but Arnold is then joined by a further 100 Americans under Brig. Gen. David Wooster, attacking the British rearguard on April 28. This attack is driven off by 400 redcoats under Brig. Gen. William Erskine, which enables Tryon's expedition to reembark without any greater loss. British casualties during this campaign total 150 killed and wounded, compared to 100 American—the latter including Wooster and Col. John Lamb.

JUNE 26, 1777. Brigadier General Fraser departs Crown Point (New York) with the vanguard of Burgoyne's 9,500-man army that has come south from Canada. It is the British commander's intent to push down Lake Champlain and the upper Hudson River until reaching Albany, meeting Howe's army there (which is to meanwhile sweep through Pennsylvania).

JULY 2, 1777. Fraser's British vanguard overruns Mount Hope (New York) and is joined by Burgoyne's main body the next day.

JULY 4, 1777. Ticonderoga. After posting Riedesel's Hessians on the east side of Lake Champlain to attack the Americans holding Mount Independence, Burgoyne installs his artillery atop Mount Defiance on its west side to cover the approaches into Fort

Hessians

The first two brigades of 8,900 German mercenary troops landed at Staten Island on August 15, 1776. Because Britain needed more soldiers to contain the spreading rebellion, London had resorted to hiring extra men from among the 300 or so German principalities of Central Europe. This had been a common practice during the 18th century. German princes often hired out their idle troops during times of peace, for profit. Almost 17,000 of the more than 30,000 of these soldiers who served the British Crown in America came from the principality of Hesse-Kassel. All German mercenaries therefore became commonly known as "Hessians."

Most arriving German regiments were almost fully up to strength, with 700 men apiece. Their ranks were soon thinned by disease and combat. The ill-paid conscripts included petty criminals, debtors, pressed men, and other undesirables, yet they had excellent officers and a reputation for disciplined courage. Such mercenaries made up roughly a third of total British land forces during the Revolutionary War. At least some Germans participated in every major battle, but their presence was largely confined to northern campaigns, where they served mostly as garrison troops after 1777.

American authorities tempted the Hessians to desert. The German Americans living in Pennsylvania and other states proved a strong incentive. When hostilities finally ceased in 1783, slightly more than 17,000 Hessians returned home. About 7,500 had died, but the remaining 5,500 were believed to have remained, becoming citizens of the United States. Many changed their names, married, and settled down as farmers or craftsmen. In 1786, London paid £471,000 to the Landgraf Friedrich II of Hesse-Kassel for the thousands of his troops who never returned from America.

Ticonderoga. Realizing that this twin deployment will soon doom his 2,500-man garrison, American major general St. Clair decides to evacuate, preceding this retirement with a heavy artillery exchange. Under cover of darkness, 500 of his men leave by boat shortly after midnight on July 5–6, sailing south toward Skenesboro; the rest march out stealthily across Ticonderoga's boat bridge at 2:00 a.m., hastening southeast toward Castleton (Vermont).

Burgoyne sets off in pursuit the next morning by water, delegating Brigadier General Fraser to chase the retreating Americans overland. That same day, July 6, the British commander in chief gains Skenesboro, and the next day his vanguard unit—the 9th British Regiment under Lt. Col. John Hill—overtakes Col. Pierce Long's 150-man Patriot rearguard outside Fort Anne, reinforced by 400 New York militiamen under Col. Henry van Rensselaer. Not expecting to encounter so much resistance, Hill's redcoats are chased up a 500-foot ridge by this American delaying action, which holds out for two hours. Finally, an Indian war-whoop farther north heralds the appearance of Burgoyne's main body, convincing Long and Rensselaer to break off the fight, setting Fort Anne ablaze before retreating 13 miles farther south to rejoin General Schuyler's army at Fort Edward.

Meanwhile, Fraser has also caught up with part of St. Clair's contingent by the evening of July 6; specifically, 1,000 men under American colonel Seth Warner, which includes the latter's own Vermont Regiment plus colonels Turbott Francis's and Nathan Hale's regiments. The American general has detached this force to make a stand at Hubbardton (New York) and cover his rearguard's escape, while he continues toward Castleton with his main body. After halting three miles short of Warner's camp, Fraser advances at 4:30 a.m. of July 7 with 750 men, then surprises and routs Hale's regiment. Warner's and Francis's troops rally, however, and halt the British charge with a heavy volley. Fraser thereupon attempts to outflank the American left atop Zion Hill, but the Americans swivel back to contain this threat while simultaneously threatening Fraser's left. At this point, Riedesel arrives, immediately attacking the American right while sending his grenadiers in a flanking movement. Colonel Francis is killed and his regiment pulls back, leaving Warner's Vermonters to face a bayonet charge alone, which overwhelms them. Two hours of heavy fighting has left the Americans with 80 casualties plus 320 captured, while the Britons and Hessians suffer 35 killed and 150 wounded.

Nevertheless, the bulk of St. Clair's army escapes intact, while Burgoyne must leave behind 1,000 men to garrison Ticonderoga.

JULY 25, 1777. British lieutenant colonel Barry St. Leger departs Fort Oswego (New York) with 350 redcoats, plus 1,650 Canadian and Loyalist militiamen and native allies, to advance east-southeastward up the Mohawk River and threaten Albany in conjunction with Burgoyne's drive out of Canada.

JULY 29, 1777. Burgoyne's army overruns both Fort Edward and Fort George, although his drive southward is now slowing because of his lengthening supply lines out of Canada, plus the lack of anticipated Loyalist support in central New York.

JULY 31, 1777. Schuyler's American army retreats southward across the upper Hudson River into Stillwater, 30 miles above Albany (New York).

AUGUST 2, 1777. Fort Stanwix. St. Leger arrives outside this American outpost (also spelled Stanwix, on the Mohawk River near Rome, New York) and stations his 350 regulars a quarter-mile northeast of its fort, while dividing his Canadian and Loyalist militiamen between two outposts on the west bank of the Mohawk River and Wood Creek, with Indian allies patrolling the intervening forests. The 550-man Patriot garrison under Col. Peter Gansevoort therefore finds itself besieged, although word arrives on August 5 of an 800-man American relief column approaching under Maj. Gen. Nicholas Herkimer.

St. Leger detaches 400 Loyalists, Canadians, and Indians eastward under Chief Joseph Brant and Maj. John Butler to ambush this column 10 miles away at Oriskany. Their chosen trap is a ravine 200 yards wide, heavily wooded on both sides, which the mile-long American column enters without its 60 Oneida scouts perceiving any danger. At 10:00 a.m. of August 6, shooting begins, and Lt. Col. Richard Vischer's 200-man Patriot rearguard immediately takes flight. Herkimer is wounded, but he nonetheless directs his remaining 600 men on to high ground, where hand-to-hand combat rages for another 45 minutes before being interrupted by a heavy downpour. During this hour-long pause, Maj. Stephen Watts arrives with further British reinforcements, and fighting resumes until early evening when the attackers withdraw. Herkimer's column is so decimated as to be unable to continue, having suffered 140 casualties, double the ambushers' numbers.

Gansevoort's garrison meanwhile attempts a few sallies against the depleted British siege lines that same morning, after which a three-day truce is arranged around Fort Stanwix. The Patriots are subsequently able to get a report of their predicament through to General Schuyler, who dispatches another 800-man relief column under Gen. Benedict Arnold on August 10. By the time this second contingent approaches, Anglo-Indian morale has declined so precipitously that St. Leger must raise his siege by August 22 and retreat westward to Lake Oneida. Arnold quickly rebuilds Fort Stanwix's strength to 700 men. He then returns eastward with 1,200 men to swell the American numbers closing in upon Burgoyne around Saratoga.

AUGUST 15, 1777. Bennington. Having been detached southeast from Burgoyne's main army to raid the American depot at Bennington (Vermont), Hessian lieutenant colonel Friedrich Baum's 800-man contingent is encamped at Cambridge this morning when he learns of a superior Patriot force gathered farther northeast at Manchester. Baum calls for reinforcements from Burgoyne before pressing on with his advance, and the British general sends an additional 640 men and two 6-pounders for support, under Lt. Col. Heinrich Breymann.

Patriot brigadier General John Stark meanwhile closes in upon Baum with 1,500 members of the Green Mountain Boys, followed out of Manchester by another 300 Americans under Colonel Warner. Heavy rains slow progress on both sides, but by the afternoon of August 16, Baum's British and Hessian troops are drawn up on the Walloomsac River, where they are attacked by a double American envelopment: Col. Moses Nichols leads 200 Patriots on the right flank, while Col. Samuel Herrick takes 300 to attack the enemy rear. At the same time, colonels David Hobart and Thomas Stickney deliver a small pincer attack against the Loyalist redoubt on the left bank, routing its defenders after a single volley and thus seizing two more Hessian positions. Baum makes a stand atop a hill on the right bank—his men's ammunition running low—but is eventually mortally wounded when a reserve dump explodes. Breymann's relief column reaches Sancoick's Mill by 4:30 p.m. and presses on the remaining four miles to rescue Baum in the mistaken belief that Baum is still able to resist. Instead, Breymann encounters Warner's fresh contingent at Walloomsac, which defeats the Hessians after a hard-fought struggle, the latter running out of powder and fleeing into the night. British and Hessian casualties total 205, plus another 700 captured, compared to 60 Americans killed or wounded.

AUGUST 19, 1777. The 49-year-old, British-born major general Horatio Gates replaces Schuyler as commander in chief of the Patriot forces confronting Burgoyne's offensive in New York State.

AUGUST 24, 1777. Howe's 15,000-man British army reaches Elk River, a few miles from Delaware Bay, intending to overrun the Patriot capital of Philadelphia in twin columns, then to strike northward to relieve Burgoyne.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1777. At 9:00 a.m., Brigadier General Maxwell's Patriot forces fire upon the vanguard of General Cornwallis's "Grand Division" as the redcoats attempt to cross the Christiana River at Cooch's Bridge (Delaware). From the British left, Hessian lieutenant colonel Wurmb leads an attack that envelops the American right, driving the defenders back at bayonet point.

Maxwell only withdraws a short distance, however, and quickly re-forms his troops and continues this delaying action. When British light infantrymen come up in support, the Patriots finally withdraw to rejoin Washington's main body at White Clay Creek. British casualties from these skirmishes are 25 killed or wounded, compared to 30 Americans.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1777. Brandywine. To check Howe's drive northeastward against Philadelphia, Battle of Brandywine Creek.

Washington decides to make a stand at Brandywine (Pennsylvania) with 10,500 troops, centering his defense upon Major General Greene's division and Brigadier General Wayne's brigade at Chadd's Ford. On their left, Brig. Gen. John Armstrong is guarding Pyle's Ford, while Major General Sullivan on their right is responsible for all other northern crossings. As reserves, Major General Alexander waits behind the American right, while Maj. Gen. Adam Stephen is to support the defenders at Chadd's Ford.

At 10:30 a.m., Major General Knyphausen opens fire against this latter position and advances with 5,000 Hessians, launching a diversionary attack while Howe and Cornwallis circle left with 7,500 redcoats in a wide movement intended to turn the American right. An hour later, Washington learns of Cornwallis's approach upon Taylor's and Jeffrey's fords farther north, so he directs Alexander and Stephen to march their reserves toward the Birmingham meetinghouse to cut off this threat. Instead, confused Patriot communications halt this redeployment. At 2:00 p.m., two British divisions are sighted atop Osborne Hill, two miles north of Sullivan's flank. Alexander and Stephen belatedly resume their march toward Birmingham but, after being joined by Sullivan, are attacked southwest of this place by Cornwallis. By 5:30 p.m., as Washington reaches the battlefield, Sullivan's left is already crumbling, although his right is temporarily shored up by Brig. Gen. George Weedon's brigade. Ultimately, Sullivan's wing collapses, and the defeated Americans stream back toward Chester. At this point, Knyphausen's Hessians increase their bombardment and drive across Chadd's Ford, forcing back Wayne and Maxwell and linking up with Cornwallis by 7:00 p.m. Patriot losses total 1,200 killed, wounded, or captured, compared to 580 British and Hessian losses. Despite his victory, Howe—who establishes his headquarters at nearby Dilworth—has been unable to crush Washington's army.

SEPTEMBER 13, 1777. In New York State, Burgoyne's increasingly isolated 5,600-man British army crosses the Hudson River, probing cautiously down its west bank in hopes of finding General Clinton's reinforcements already awaiting them in or near Albany.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1777. Freeman's Farm (or First Battle of Saratoga). Having discovered a 12,000-man Patriot army under Major General Gates four miles ahead, barring his advance at Bemis Heights

(New York), Burgoyne probes forward in three columns: Brigadier General Fraser leading 2,200 redcoats on the right in a wide sweep toward Freeman's Farm; Burgoyne taking a 2,600-man central column south, then west to meet Fraser; while General Riedesel and Maj. Gen. William Phillips follow the Hudson River Road with another 800, guarding the British supply boats.

Brig. Gen. Benedict Arnold persuades the American commander to allow him to sally with 3,000 men of Brigadier General Morgan's and Col. Henry Dearborn's units to maul the British vanguard. The Americans attack Burgoyne's contingent at Freeman's Farm by 12:45 p.m., while the British commander is still waiting for Fraser to appear. The British recoil and form up along the northern edge of the clearing, fighting back and forth against the Patriots who occupy its southern edge for the next four hours. Riedesel eventually sends 500 troops and two artillery pieces to reinforce Burgoyne, which allows the British and Hessian troops to drive off the Americans with a heavy counterattack at nightfall. Their casualties nevertheless total 600 killed and wounded, double the Patriots' losses.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1777. Paoli. To cover Washington's withdrawal northward following his Brandywine setback, American brigadier General Wayne conceals 1,500 troops and four guns two miles southwest of Paoli Tavern on the west bank of Pennsylvania's Schuylkill River to ambush passing British forces. Instead, General Howe gets wind of this plan and detaches Maj. Gen. Charles Grey to surprise this force with two British regiments and a light-infantry battalion.

The British attack shortly after midnight, producing chaos in the Patriot camp. Wayne succeeds in extricating his artillery and numerous survivors by daybreak but suffers 150 killed, wounded, or captured during this action, compared to 6 dead and 22 injured among the British. (Wayne is subsequently court-martialed for inattention, but is honorably acquitted.)

SEPTEMBER 24, 1777. British lieutenant general Sir Henry Clinton is reinforced in New York City, bringing his strength up to 2,700 redcoats and 4,200 Hessians. He now feels sufficiently strong to attempt a relief effort into the interior to ease pressure on Burgoyne's beleaguered expedition, so he sets out nine days later with 3,000 troops in three divisions.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1777. The British enter Philadelphia, and Cornwallis is installed as its garrison commander, while Howe's main body encamps five miles away at Germantown (Pennsylvania).

OCTOBER 3, 1777. Germantown. Two days after reaching Center Point (Pennsylvania), Washington's retreating 11,000-man American army reverses itself at 7:00 p.m. to return under cover of darkness and attack Howe's British encampment outside Philadelphia. The Patriots know that their enemies are dispersed, with 3,000 redcoats guarding the overland supply routes from Delaware Bay and another contingent acting as Cornwallis's garrison inside Philadelphia; only 9,000 remain with Howe at Germantown.

At dawn on October 4, the American vanguard crests Chestnut Hill, southwest of Germantown's main British encampment. Washington's intent is for Major General Sullivan and Brigadier General Alexander to continue advancing along Shippack Road, while Major General Greene leads a wide encircling movement against the British right. Instead, the first Patriot units are driven back from Airy Hill by Capt. Allen McLane's Light Horse before Greene can even begin to deploy. Sullivan therefore orders Brigadier General Wayne to cover his left and two other regiments to guard his right, while he advances against the British lines. This American approach—through dense fog—is further delayed at Chad House on the British left by Lt. Col. Thomas Musgrave's 40th Regiment, which makes a brave stand against heavy odds for 30 minutes. Greene eventually pushes forward to begin encircling the British right, but by this time its units have been strengthened, and he must veer southward to avoid being cut off.

Washington is just about to order a general assault when Major General Stephen's troops sight Wayne's line in the gloom, and they mistakenly commence exchanging volleys with each other. Although order is restored within a few minutes, the American commander believes that his plan has by now so miscarried that he must commence a retirement. (Stephen is subsequently court-martialed and dismissed from the service.) The Patriots withdraw in good order, without any vigorous pursuit by the British. Only Cornwallis emerges from Philadelphia with three fresh battalions to follow Washington for five miles, soon giving up the chase. American casualties total 675 killed or wounded, plus 400 captured, as compared to 540 dead or injured Britons and Hessians and 14 prisoners.

Despite being repulsed, Washington's surprise attack proves that the Patriot cause is still vigorous, and his army, dangerous. Howe remains in Philadelphia, whereas the Americans eventually withdraw northward into grim winter quarters at Valley Forge.

OCTOBER 5, 1777. Fort Clinton. This evening, British lieutenant general Clinton disembarks on

Valley Forge

Driven from the Patriot capital, Washington entered Valley Forge with the first of his 12,000 weary, hungry, cold Continental troops and auxiliaries on December 19, 1777. Eighteen miles northwest of Philadelphia, this bowl had been named for the iron forge on the banks of Valley Creek, burned by the British that September. The American commander chose this valley over several other possibilities for his winter quarters because it was defensible and close to the main British concentrations. Protected by the high ground of Mount Joy and Mount Misery, as well as the Schuylkill River to its north, Valley Forge could not easily be surprised or assailed. Its defenders could also prevent British foraging parties from raiding deeper into Pennsylvania.

There was no shelter available for the thousands of shivering Continentals, however, so Washington's troops immediately began cutting logs and building cabins. Within days, there were six inches of snow on the ground. Still, 2,000 crude huts were erected over the next month. Only then could work start on military defenses. But the lack of provisions, clothing, or blankets, as well as crowded and unsanitary conditions, proved much more dangerous than the British. Almost 3,000 men had no shoes, while another 2,000 died of typhus, dysentery, or pneumonia. Washington despaired that his army seemed about to "starve, dissolve, or disperse." Repeated pleas for help from the displaced and bankrupt U.S. Congress went unanswered. Meanwhile, redcoats were snugly housed in Philadelphia. Howe was living luxuriously in a four-story redbrick mansion in Germantown, while his officers were entertained at Loyalist banquets. Supplies were plentiful, thanks to the Royal Navy's control of the sea.

In a remarkable display of willpower, the Continentals refused to be daunted by their misery. Survivors began drilling under the Prussian drillmaster Baron Friedrich von Steuben by March 1778. Spring also brought word of a new alliance with France. Fortunes were reversed, thanks to stubborn Patriot resolve. When news finally arrived of an imminent British retirement from Philadelphia, a hardened and more confident Continental Army marched back out of Valley Forge in pursuit on June 19.

the east side of the Hudson (opposite Stony Point, New York), routing a small American outpost in a diversionary move. Patriot major general Putnam immediately withdraws four miles into the surrounding hills, calling for reinforcements from Fort Montgomery and Fort Clinton on the west side of the river, which are Clinton's true objectives. To further deceive his opponent, the British general leaves 1,000 redcoats at Verplancks Point, while slipping the remaining 2,000 across the Hudson in heavy fog, occupying Stony Point by the next morning.

Leading his soldiers up through 850-foot-high Timp Pass and down into Doodletown (two and a half miles from Fort Clinton), Clinton drives off an American patrol at 10:00 a.m., then detaches 900 redcoats to circle around Bear Mountain and attack Fort Montgomery from the west. Meanwhile, he guides the rest in an encircling movement and, by 4:30 p.m., is in position to storm Fort Clinton from the south. Although the former stronghold is carried without much difficulty, the latter presents greater problems, its defenses being protected by an abatis and 10 cannon. Having no siege guns and little room to maneuver, Clinton's troops must mount a frontal assault, supported by a single regiment circling Hessian Lake to attack from the northwest. The redcoats suffer 300 casualties overwhelming this garrison, compared to 250 American losses under Brig. Gen. James Clinton. The next day, October 7, the British break the boom across the Hudson and rout the Patriot garrison within Fort Constitution.

OCTOBER 7, 1777. Bemis Heights (or Second Battle of Saratoga). At 11:00 a.m., an increasingly isolated Burgoyne advances from his camp deep in New York State to make a second reconnaissance in force against Gates's 20,000-man American army waiting atop Bemis Heights. This redcoat thrust—1,500 men and 10 guns in all—is led by Capt. Edward Fraser's rangers and other auxiliaries in some woods on the very far right, the lieutenant colonel Earl of Balcarres's light infantry on the right, Major General Riedesel's Hessians in the center, plus Maj. John Ackland's grenadiers on the left.

Gates instantly dispatches Brigadier General Morgan to attack the British right and Brig. Gen. Enoch Poor to fall upon their left. The latter's 800 Patriots strike first, shattering Ackland's bayonet charge with a heavy volley, which mortally wounds that officer along with many of his men. Meanwhile, Morgan defeats Edward Fraser's rangers in the woods, then wheels around to catch Balcarres's light infantry in their flank and rear. When the latter turn to meet this threat, they are routed by Colonel Dearborn's force bearing down upon their exposed left.

Burgoyne orders a retreat as more and more American units continue to appear—eventually 7,000 are committed—but his message goes astray, obliging Riedesel to eventually make a fighting retirement on his own initiative into Balcarres's redoubt. British major general Simon Fraser then attempts to mount a delaying action with the surviving light infantry, but he is killed, hence, after only 52 minutes, the Britons and Hessians are withdrawing in considerable disarray. American major general Benedict Arnold follows up this success by launching two fierce assaults upon the British entrenchments, failing to carry Balcarres's redoubt but overrunning Lieutenant Colonel Breymann's (who is shot by one of his own men in the heat of battle). This operation costs the British 600 killed or wounded, plus another 200 captured, along with 10 guns; American casualties total 150 dead or injured.

The next day, Burgoyne orders a general retreat, but his diminished army is soon surrounded by Gates at nearby Saratoga. On October 12, the British officers vote unanimously to open negotiations for a surrender, which begin two days later and conclude with the capitulation of Burgoyne's entire army on October 17.

OCTOBER 21, 1777. Col. Carl von Donop is detached with 2,000 Hessians and two fieldpieces from Howe's occupying forces at Philadelphia to attack American-held Fort Mercer (New Jersey) on the Delaware River, which—along with Fort Mifflin on Mud Island (Pennsylvania) opposite it—is preventing seaborne supplies from reaching his army. Donop's contingent camps overnight at Hadsonfield, then sets out at 3:00 a.m. of October 22 toward Fort Mercer.

OCTOBER 22, 1777. Fort Mercer and Fort Mifflin. At noon, Donop's 2,000 Hessians arrive outside Fort Mercer—an unprepossessing earthwork located on Red Bank, New Jersey—calling upon its 400-man garrison under Lt. Col. Christopher Greene to surrender. The Patriots refuse, so the besiegers confidently prepare for an assault.

At 4:30 p.m., two grenadier battalions and the Mirbach Regiment advance from the north, while more Hessian units approach out of the west and Lengerke's battalion and a company of jägers are held in reserve. Fort Mercer's outer defense on its northern side is only a brush abatis, which the defenders promptly abandon, giving the impression of great weakness; however, the French military engineer du Plessis has reinforced the fort's interior with a stone wall, lined with some of the Americans' 14 guns. Therefore, as the Hessians attempt to cut their way through the branches, they are decimated by a withering counterfire, which causes them to break and flee. A second assault is directed by Donop in person, but it also fails, costing him his life. Hessian casualties total 400 killed, wounded, or captured, compared to 40 dead or injured Americans. (The British support ships Augusta and Merlin are also blown up out in the Delaware during this second attack.)

The remaining Hessians settle in for a loose siege, and a fortnight later are joined by a British contingent, which arrives to bombard Fort Mifflin on the opposite, or Pennsylvania, bank of the river. This latter stronghold boasts 18 10-pounders and four blockhouses of 4 guns apiece, manned by 450 Patriots under Lt. Col. Samuel Smith. Rather than directly assault this island redoubt, the Royal Navy commences a long-range bombardment on November 10 with five land batteries located on Province Island, plus a floating battery of 22 24-pounders upstream. These are reinforced on November 14 by 10 warships from Admiral Howe's battle fleet. Overnight on October 15–16, therefore, after sustaining 250 casualties compared to 7 British killed and 5 wounded, the surviving Americans retreat across the Delaware into Fort Mercer.

Without its counterpart, the latter fort cannot hold out long, so the Patriots also evacuate Fort Mercer on November 20, opening up the Delaware as far as the British encampments at Philadelphia.

FEBRUARY 6, 1778. In Paris, French ministers sign a treaty of "commerce and amity" with American plenipotentiaries, plus another secret accord promising a military alliance.

MARCH 7, 1778. Off Barbados, the 64-gun HMS Yarmouth of Capt. Nicholas Vincent chases a squadron of American ships, overhauling the 32-gun frigate USS Randolph of Capt. Nicholas Biddle. During this running fight, the American frigate suddenly explodes and goes down with all 315 hands (except 4, clinging to wreckage, who are rescued five days later by the British). The Yarmouth's losses total 5 killed and 12 wounded.

MARCH 9, 1778. Elsewhere in the West Indies, the British 24-gun Ariadne of Capt. Thomas Pringle and the 18-gun Ceres of Cmdr. James Richard Dacres oblige the 20-gun, 180-man American warship Alfred of Capt. Elisha Hinman to strike, while its 32-gun consort Raleigh flees.

MARCH 15, 1778. Having learned two days earlier of the treaties signed between France and the United States, Britain withdraws its ambassador from the court at Versailles.

JUNE 22, 1778. The British decide to abandon Philadelphia, withdrawing toward New York while being closely pursued by an American force. It takes eight days to reach safety at Middleton.

JULY 8, 1778. The 49-year-old French vice admiral Jean-Baptiste, Comte d'Estaing, having sailed from Brest on April 13, arrives off the Delaware coast with his 90-gun flagship Languedoc under Captain de Boulainvilliers; the 80-gun vice-flagship Tonnant of his second-in-command de Broves, under Flag Captain de Bruyères; the 74-gun César of Rear Adm. Pierre Claude Hocdenau, Comte de Bruegnon,

Admiral d'Estaing

Jean-Baptiste Charles Henri Hector Théodat, Comte d'Estaing and Marquis de Saillans, was born on November 24, 1729, in the Château de Ravel-Salmérange, in France's centermost province of Auvergne (the modern department of Puy-de-Dôme). He was enrolled as a musketeer in May 1738, intended for a military career. Appointed as a lieutenant in the Rouergue Regiment in September 1745, he went to fight in Flanders. Promoted to captain by November 1747, then to colonel the next January, he was wounded during the siege of Maastricht. After peace was restored, he was sent on a mission into England.

When the French and Indian War broke out a few years later, d'Estaing was promoted to brigadier general in October 1756, then shipped out the next year for India as part of the small army under Gen. Thomas Arthur, Baron de Tollendal and Comte de Tally. This expedition set sail from Brest, escorted by a royal squadron led by the flagship Zodiaque of Commodore Antoine, the Comte d'Aché, protecting a Compagnie des Indes convoy. D'Estaing would fight bravely in various minor actions before finally being wounded and captured by the British during the two-month siege of Madras in 1758.

D'Estaing then chose a new career path. Released on parole, he reached Île de France the next year and, before his exchange could be ratified, transferred to the East India Company and fitted out two ships to make a descent on the English establishments in the Persian Gulf. After destroying two forts and seizing a 40-gun English prize, he made a second similar raid along the Sumatran coast. On his way back to France in 1760, he accidentally fell into English hands and was imprisoned in Portsmouth for violating his parole. As this charge could not be substantiated in court, he was allowed to complete his passage. Once in France, d'Estaing became a field marshal in February 1761, then a lieutenant general in July 1762. He was preparing to lead a seaborne expedition against the Portuguese colony of Brazil when hostilities ceased.

Now preferring a naval career, d'Estaing used his influence to transfer into the French Navy as a lieutenant general in December 1763. Many officers would resent his intrusion at such a high rank, hardly alleviated by the fact that he had been described as "haughty, vain, and demagogic." In February 1764, he reached Saint Domingue (modern Haiti) with the title of governor general. His tenure would prove so unpopular that he was recalled by March 1766. Nevertheless, his connections ensured that he was appointed inspector general at Brest in August 1772, and he received command over the Toulon squadron the next year. Seniority carried him up to vice admiral by February 1777, 14 months before he set sail to aid the American Revolution.

under Flag Captain de Raymond, as well as the Hector of Moriès Castellet, the Zélé of Louis Jacques, Comte de Barras Saint Laurent, the Guerrier of Louis Antoine, Comte de Bougainville, the Marseillais of Lapoye Vertrieux, and the Protecteur of d'Apchon; the 64-gun Vaillant of Joseph Bernard, Marquis de Chabert Cogolin, Provence of de Champorcin, and Fantasque of Pierre-André de Suffren; the 50-gun Sagittaire of François Hector, Comte d'Albert de Rions; plus other lesser auxiliaries.

Although he has captured a number of English vessels during his transatlantic crossing, d'Estaing's real mission is to furnish aid to American forces. After detaching the advice ship Chimère toward Philadelphia, he sails for Sandy Hook (New York), arriving two days afterward.

AUGUST 2, 1778. France officially declares war against Great Britain.

AUGUST 17, 1778. The French frigate Concorde reaches Martinique with orders from Paris to begin taking reprisals against the English. The West Indian governor general, Claude François Amour, Marquis de Bouillé du Chariol, consequently decides to launch a surprise attack against neighboring Dominica, for which he issues a call for volunteers.

Five days later, the 32-gun Concorde—having proceeded on its voyage—surprises the like-sized HMS Minerva, capturing it after a two-and-a-half hour engagement during which Capt. John Stott and his first mate are killed.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1778. After sunset, a force of 1,200 French troops and 1,000 volunteers departs Martinique aboard the frigates Tourterelle, Diligente, and Amphitrite, the corvette Étourdie, plus numerous lesser vessels. They slip ashore on Dominica the next dawn, obliging its outnumbered English garrison to surrender without a shot being fired.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1778. Off Boston, the 50-gun, 345-man HMS Experiment of Capt. Sir James Wallace, and the 28-gun, 198-man Unicorn of Cmdr. Matthew Squire, intercept the 32-gun, 235-man American frigate Raleigh of Capt. John Barry, which is returning from commerce raiding. Although the American vessel is able to avoid capture until the next morning, it is eventually crippled, beached, and captured.

NOVEMBER 25, 1778. Cruisers from Admiral d’Estaing’s fleet intercept three English transports, learning that they are part of a much larger convoy bringing out several thousand reinforcements for the British West Indies, escorted by three 64s and two 50s under Commodore Hotham. D’Estaing hovers indecisively off Désirade for the next two days, before finally leading his entire force into Fort Royal (modern Fort de France), to strengthen Martinique’s defenses.

DECEMBER 11, 1778. Saint Lucia Campaign. One day after Commodore Hotham’s convoy reaches Barbados, Rear Adm. Sir Samuel Barrington sets sail from this island with seven ships of the line and a troop convoy bearing more than 4,000 soldiers under Maj. Gen. Sir William Meadows. Two days later, they fall upon Saint Lucia, disembarking a sizable contingent near Cul de Sac Bay, from where this unit quickly secures the anchorage. The next day, the invaders march upon its capital of Morne Fortuné, which is evacuated without a fight by Gov. Claude Anne Guy de Micoud. The French retire into the jungle, allowing Meadows and his subordinate, Grant, to occupy the other major anchorage—the Carénage, three miles north of Cul de Sac—without any loss by the evening of December 14.

Meanwhile, an American privateer has carried news of this activity to d’Estaing at Martinique, who sorties with his fleet, accompanied by numerous auxiliaries under Governor General Marquis de Bouillé. They arrive off Saint Lucia on the evening of December 14 and the next dawn attempt to disembark at the Carénage, believing it to still be in French hands. Counterfire from ashore soon convinces d’Estaing otherwise, so he steers his squadron into Cul de Sac Bay, where Barrington has anchored his men-of-war in a line across its mouth to screen the English transports inside (which still hold a goodly proportion of Meadows's army). After a couple of passes, during which broadsides are exchanged at long range, the French admiral retires into Choc Bay and disembarks his own soldiers.

On December 18, this French army advances inland in three columns, led by d'Estaing, Bouillé, and the Comte de Lowendal, respectively. At the foot of Morne de la Vierge, they encounter the English land forces drawn up in a defensive position, which repel the attackers with heavy losses during several hours of intense fighting. D'Estaing's army suffers 840 total casualties and withdraws out of range, leaving the admiral to contemplate another naval assault. But when the frigate Iphigénie signals that the wind is favorable for another such attempt on the morning of December 24, the French squadron takes until 3:00 p.m. to work into position, at which point a discouraged d'Estaing calls off the operation. When word subsequently arrives that Vice Adm. John "Foul Weather Jack" Byron is soon expected in the West Indies—having departed Rhode Island on December 14 with the Princess Royal (flag), the Royal Oak, the Conqueror, the Fame, the Grafton, the Cornwall, the Sultan, the Albion, the Monmouth, the Trident, the Diamond, and the Star—the French reembark their troops during the night of December 28–29, then return into Martinique by December 30.

DECEMBER 23, 1778. Georgia Counteroffensive.

With the northern campaigning season halted by winter, Lt. Col. Archibald Campbell appears off Tybee Island at the mouth of the Savannah River with 3,500 English and Loyalist soldiers, escorted by Commo. Hyde Parker's squadron. The British commander in chief, Henry Clinton, has dispatched this army from New York almost a month previously to mount a pincer campaign with Franco-Swiss-born Brig. Gen. Augustine Prévost, who is to advance north from east Florida and meet Campbell.

Georgia is defended by 1,050 Americans under Maj. Gen. Robert Howe, stationed at Sunbury, 30 miles south of Savannah. To defend his capital, Howe enters Savannah on Christmas Day with 850 men, finding its fortifications in such disrepair that he instead establishes himself a half mile to the southeast, on the road leading toward the British beachhead. Here the Americans dig a defensive trench after destroying a causeway over a marshy stream, with swamps on either side. Col. Samuel Elbert commands the colonials' left, Col. Isaac Huger, the right, with Col. George Walton on the extreme right. Howe further has one gun on each flank, plus two in his center.

On December 28, Parker's advance ships arrive at Girardeau's Plantation, two miles below Savannah, and wait for the tide after driving off a pair of American galleys. The invaders then push back a small company under Capt. John Smith, establishing a disembarkation point ashore from which a line of English skirmishers advance to within 800 yards of Howe's trench. Recognizing that the American general is expecting an assault upon his left flank, Campbell sends a battalion of light infantry to reinforce this notion, while sneaking Baird's Light Infantry and Turnbull's New York Volunteers by a secret path through the swamps to fall upon the American right. Walton's unit is wiped out in a sudden descent from its rear on December 29, creating such turmoil within the American ranks that Campbell runs his guns forward and orders his English infantry to charge.

Howe's army disintegrates, attempting to escape across the Musgrove Swamp causeway, only to be overtaken by the onrushing British units. Some of the American right and center get through, but Elbert's militia are either captured or drowned in the swamp. The British suffer 3 killed and 10 wounded; the colonials' losses total 180 dead and 450 prisoners, as well as losing 3 ships, 3 brigs, 8 smaller craft, 48 cannon, 23 mortars, and their supply depot when Savannah falls. Despite this victory, Campbell does not pursue, allowing Howe to camp for the night eight miles away at Cherokee Hill, before retiring to join Maj. Gen. Benjamin Lincoln at Purysburg.

JANUARY 6, 1779. Byron's fleet anchors off Saint Lucia, with several ships damaged by storms (particularly the 64-gun Trident) and missing both the frigate Diamond and the 74-gun Fame, which do not limp into harbor until January 8 and 16, respectively. Disease also infects the British crews; one month later, more than 1,200 lie ill.

JANUARY 11, 1779. D'Estaing sorties from Fort Royal (Fort de France, Martinique) to reconnoiter Saint Lucia the next day, and confirms that Byron and Barrington have united their squadrons when he sights their 15 ships of the line anchored within its main harbor. The British sally with 13 ships of the line and 3 frigates, obliging the French admiral to retire back into port.

FEBRUARY 3, 1779. After the victory at Savannah and the taking of Fort Augusta, Prévost decides to avail himself of British naval supremacy in the region and attempt the Patriot island fortress of Port Royal (South Carolina). He disembarks Major Gardiner with 200 soldiers and one gun to try to carry this place by surprise, which is being defended by 320 Americans under Brig. Gen. William Moultrie and three guns.

The British attack lasts three-quarters of an hour, their gun being disabled early on but, nonetheless, enjoying the advantage of occupying woodland while the rebels fight out in the open. After an indecisive exchange, both sides run out of ammunition and retire simultaneously, although Moultrie then sends his mounted troops in pursuit of the retreating British, harrying them back to their boats. Gardiner's attackers suffer some 50 casualties, as opposed to 30 Americans, and this setback discourages the British from attempting any further seaborne ventures until the fall of Charleston in May 1780.

FEBRUARY 10, 1779. The fall of Savannah also stirs embers of Loyalist counterrevolution in Georgia's backcountry, where Lt. Col. John Hamilton is dispatched with 200 mounted troops to raise recruits. Another Loyalist force, soon swelling to 700 men, attempts to join him from North Carolina under Colonel Boyd. The Patriots are concerned to prevent the juncture of this sizable column with Hamilton's company, which, after bloodying a rebel contingent, has retired into Fort Carr.

Col. Andrew Pickens assumes command of the 350 Americans remaining in this sector, crossing the Savannah River at Cowen's Ferry on February 10, then recrossing near Fort Charlotte, where he locates Boyd's approaching North Carolinians. The latter attempt to fight their way across at Cherokee Ford but are prevented by a two-gun outpost manned by eight rebels, so they move five miles upstream and traverse on rafts, continuing their march toward Fort Augusta. Pickens shadows from the Georgia side, observing as Boyd's Loyalists cross the Broad River on February 13 and encamp near Kettle Creek.

Next morning, the outnumbered Patriots surprise the North Carolinians while their horses are grazing and cattle are being slaughtered. Col. John Dooley commands the rebels' right, Pickens, the center, and Col. Elijah Clarke, the left. The Loyalist pickets open fire upon perceiving the American advance, then fall back into camp, where Boyd manages to resist for about an hour before being mortally wounded and his army routed. The Patriots suffer 30 casualties, as opposed to 40 among the North Carolinians, but they also capture 70 prisoners (5 of whom are subsequently hanged). This puts an end to the Loyalist uprising in Georgia's backcountry for a while, although 300 of Boyd's defeated force nonetheless succeed in winning through to the concentration at Fort Augusta.

FEBRUARY 19, 1779. The 56-year-old admiral François-Joseph Paul, Comte de Grasse Tilly, arrives at Martinique from Brest with the ships of the line Dauphin Royal, Magnifique, Robuste, and Vengeur, bearing troops. Despite this reinforcement, his superior d'Estaing decides to remain on the defensive inside Fort Royal with his 16 ships of the line and 2 frigates.

FEBRUARY 27, 1779. Briar Creek. In Georgia, an army of 2,600 American militiamen under Brig. Gen. John Ashe, plus 100 regulars under Colonel Elbert, advance down the Savannah River to break the British stranglehold upon the coast. General Prevost, the English commander in chief for this theater, counters by detaching units to repel this offensive—in particular, 900 troops under Lt. Col. Mark Prevost, who circles far west to surprise the Americans from the rear.

On February 27, Ashe's army reaches Briar Creek, pausing to begin rebuilding its bridge and to construct a road to link up with the Patriots under Brig. Gen. Griffith Rutherford at Mathew's Bluff, five miles east. Opposite Ashe, on the south side of Briar Creek, is Maj. John Macpherson with a battalion of British troops plus some Loyalist militia. On March 3, Colonel Prevost's 900-man flanking column takes Ashe utterly by surprise, trapping his army with a three-mile-wide swamp behind them and the bridge as yet unfinished. The American commander desperately attempts to regroup his army in three columns, only to have the British attack smash through his ranks, compelling the Halifax Regiment to flee and the militiamen to dissolve in panic. Patriot casualties total 200 (many of them drowned in the swamp) plus another 170 prisoners, including Elbert. The British suffer only 5 killed and 11 wounded.

Ashe is subsequently court-martialed and censured for "want of sufficient vigilance," while only 450 of his militiamen eventually rejoin the American army.

APRIL 12, 1779. In Europe, French and Spanish plenipotentiaries sign an alliance against England.

APRIL 26, 1779. The 55-year-old commodore Louis-Philippe Rigaud, Marquis de Vaudreuil, reaches Martinique with the ships of the line Fendant and Sphinx, having seized several English slaving stations in West Africa on his outward passage.

Notwithstanding the arrival of this pair, plus the 50-gun Fier bringing in a convoy, Admiral d'Estaing still refuses to quit the safety of Fort Royal with his 19 ships of the line.
